Specimens of the nature and closeness of the coincidence of these three classes are annexed by Dr. Nolan, in separate columns, from which the four following examples are selected. He has prefixed the readings of the received text and authorized English version (from Matt. v. 38. 41. and 44.), in order to evince their coincidence with that text, to which the preference appears to be due, on account of its conformity to the Italic translation contained in the Codex Brixianus.

The preceding short specimen will sufficiently evince the affinity subsisting between the Latin and Greek manuscripts, throughout the different classes into which they may be divided: at the same time it will illustrate the dissimilarity which those classes exhibit among themselves, in either language, regarded separately. Still further to evince the affinity which in other respects they possess among themselves, Dr. Nolan exhibits a connected portion, comprising the first twelve verses of the fifth chapter of St. Matthew's Gospel, in the original and the translation: from which we select the six following examples:—

CLASS I.

Codex Cantabrigiensis.

1. Ἰδὼν δὲ τοὺς ὄχλους, ἀνέβη εἰς τὸ ὄρος καὶ καθίσαντος αὐτοῦ, προσελθόντες αὐτῷ οἱ μαθηταὶ αὐτοῦ

On these different classes of manuscripts in the Greek and Latin, Dr. Nolan remarks, that it must be evident, on the most casual inspection, that the manuscripts in both languages possess the same text, though manifestly of different classes. "They respectively possess that identity in the choice of terms and arrangement of the language, which is irreconcilable with the notion of their having descended from different archetypes. And though these classes, in either language, vary among themselves, yet, as the translation follows the varieties of the original, the Greek and Latin consequently afford each other mutual confirmation. The different classes of text in the Greek and Latin translation, as thus coinciding, may be regarded as the conspiring testimony of those churches, which were appointed the witnesses and keepers of Holy Writ, to the existence of three species of text in the original and in the translation."¹

Having thus produced the testimony of the eastern and western churches to the existence of these classes, the learned inquirer proceeds to ascertain the antiquity of the classes: which he effects by the Latin translation.

"As the existence of a translation necessarily implies the priority of the original from which it was formed; this testimony may be directly referred to the close of the fourth century. The Vulgate must be clearly referred to that period, as it was then formed by St. Jerome: in its bare existence, of course, the correspondent antiquity of the Greek text, with which it agrees, is directly established. This version is, however, obviously less ancient than that of the Verceli or Brescia manuscript; as they are of the old Italic translation, while it properly constitutes the new. In the existence of the ancient version, the antiquity of the original text with which it corresponds is consequently established. The three classes of text, which correspond with the Vulgate and Old Italic version, must be consequently referred to a period not less remote than the close of the fourth century."²

The system of classification being thus carried up as high as the fourth century, Dr. Nolan justifies it by the testimony of Jerome; for this learned father, who lived at that period, asserts the existence of three classes of text in the same age, which respectively prevailed in Egypt, Palestine, and Constantinople. The identity of these classes with the different classes of text which still exist in the Greek original and in the Latin version,³ our author then proceeds to establish. And this he effects by means of the manuscripts which have been written, the versions which have been published, and the collations which have been made, in the different countries to which St. Jerome refers his classes; founding every part of his proofs on the testimony of Adler, Birch, Woide, Munter, and other critics who have analyzed the text and versions of the New Testament.

The result of this investigation is, that the three classes of text, which are discoverable in the Greek manuscripts, are nearly identical with the three editions, which existed in the age of Jerome; with which they are identified by their coincidence with the Latin translation which existed in the age of that Christian father. Of the first class, the Codex Bezae, or Cambridge manuscript, is an exemplar: it contains the text which Jerome refers to Egypt, and ascribes to Hesychius. Of the second class, the Codex Vaticanus, or Vatican manuscript, forms the exemplar, and contains the text which Jerome refers to Palestine, and ascribes to Eusebius; and of the third class, the Moscow manuscript, collated by Matthæi, and by him noted with the letter V, and the Harleian manuscript in the British Museum, No. 5684., noted G. by Griesbach, are the exemplars, and contain the text which Jerome attributes to Lucian, and refers to Constantinople. The result of Dr. Nolan's long and elaborate discussion is, that, as the Occidental or Western, Alexandrine, and Byzantine texts (according to Griesbach's system of recensions) respectively coincide with the Egyptian, Palestine, and Byzantine texts of Dr. Nolan, we have only to substitute the term Egyptian for Western, and Palestine for Alexandrine, in order to ascertain the particular text of any manuscript which is to be referred to a peculiar class or edition. "The artifice of this substitution admits of this simple solution: the Egyptian text was imported by Eusebius of Verceli into the West, and the Palestine text republished by Euthalius at Alexandria, the Byzantine text having retained the place in which it was originally published by Lucianus. In a word, a manuscript which harmonizes with the Codex Cantabrigiensis must be referred to the first class, and will contain the text of Egypt. One which harmonizes with the Vatican manuscript must be referred to the second class, and will contain the text of Palestine. And one which harmonizes with the Moscow manuscript must be referred to the third class, and will contain the text of Constantinople."

The advantages stated by Dr. Nolan as resulting from the system of recensions just developed are twofold:—In the first place, it leads not only to a more adequate method of classification, but also to the discovery of a more ancient text, by means of the priority of the old Italic version to the New or Vulgate Latin of Jerome. And, secondly, it coincides with the respective schemes of Dr. Griesbach and of M. Matthæi, and derives support from their different systems. It adopts the three classes of the former, with a slight variation merely in the name of the classes; and, in ascertaining the genuine text, it attaches the same authority to the old Italic translation, which the same distinguished critic has ascribed to that version. It likewise agrees with the scheme of Matthæi, in giving the preference to the Καὶνὴ Ἐκδοσις, the Greek Vulgate or Byzantine text, over the Palestine and Egyptian; but it supports the authority of this text on firmer grounds than the concurrence of the Greek manuscripts. "Hence," it is observed, that "while it differs from the scheme of M. Matthæi, in building on the old Italic version, it differs from that of Dr. Griesbach, in distinguishing the copies of this translation, which are free from the influence of the Vulgate, from those which have been corrected since the times of Eusebius of Verceli, of Jerome, and Cassiodorus. And it affords a more satisfactory mode of disposing of the multitude of various readings, than that suggested by the latter, who refers them to the intentional or accidental corruptions of transcribers; or by that of the former, who ascribes them to the correction of the original Greek by the Latin translation: as it traces them to the influence of the text which was published by Eusebius, at the command of Constantine."

VI. Widely different from all the preceding theories is the system of recensions proposed by the learned Romanist Professor Hug, of Fribourg, who affirms the existence of three recensions or editions, and divides the history of the sacred text of the New Testament into three periods, viz:—

1. The First Period comprises the text of the New Testament, from the time when its several books were written to the third century. That text, according to the testimony of Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Irenæus, and other fathers, was early the object of imprudent or rash alterations: although their statements were greatly exaggerated, yet the fact is certain, that such alterations were actually made; and the text, thus altered, was, according to Hug, what is commonly termed ΚΟΙΝΗ ΕΚΔΟΣΙΣ, or the common edition, which, he thinks, is in a great measure represented in the Codex Bezae or Cambridge Manuscript. Though almost every where the same, this edition had two forms, a little different, one of which corresponds with Griesbach's Western Recension, and the other with his special Asiatic Instruments, and particularly with the Peschito or old Syriac version.

2. Second Period.—The defects of the common edition having been perceived about the middle of the third century, three learned men, severally and independently, though nearly simultaneously, undertook the arduous task of purifying the text, and of restoring it to its first form, by the aid of manuscripts, viz. Origen in Palestine, Hesyehius in Egypt, where he was a bishop, and Lucian, a presbyter at Antioch, in Syria. The work of Hesyehius was generally received in Egypt, and became the source of the Alexandrine family: that of Lucian, which was better known, and has sometimes been termed the Editto Vulgata, or Lucianus, was introduced into divine worship in Syria, in Asia Minor, in Thrace, and at Constantinople; and that of Origen, having been made in his old age, and left for publication by his pupils, was confined within Palestine, where it was soon superseded by the edition of Lucian, and in no long time was entirely lost.

3. The Third Period of the history of the text of the New Testament embraces the variations made therein, from the threefold recension in the third century, to our own time.¹

VII. Professor Eichhorn approaches nearer to the opinion of Hug than to that of Griesbach, on the subject of ancient recensions. He considers the existence of a twofold text in the second century as fully proved, viz. the African and Asiatic; though neither of these texts was regulated by any certain critical laws. He denies that Origen was the author of a peculiar recension: but he is of opinion that Hesyehius and Lucian in the third century did severally undertake and complete a revision of the text; and that ever since that period there has been a threefold recension of the text of the New Testament, viz. 1. The African (or Alexandrine); 2. The Asiatic (or Constantinopolitan); and, 3. A mixed text formed out of these two, because there were some, who, notwithstanding the recensions of Hesyehius and Lucian, had acquired ecclesiastical authority in the African and Asiatic churches, yet frequently preferred to follow the authority of more ancient manuscripts.² The text thus formed continued the same until the seventh century; after which time, until the New Testament was issued from the press, no learned men applied themselves to the collation of the text with MSS.³

VIII. The last and most important (as it is the most probable) of the various systems of recensions, which have been proposed, is that announced by Dr. J. Martin Augustin Scholz,⁴ one of the professors at Bonn upon the Rhine. From the differences, which are sufficiently perceptible in the manuscripts and editions of the Greek text of the New Testament, Dr. Scholz concludes that these instruments naturally divide themselves into two great classes, which are the same throughout the books of the New Testament. To the first of these classes belong all the editions and those numerous manuscripts, which were written within the limits of the patriarchate of Constantinople, that is, in Asia or in the eastern parts of Europe, and which were destined for liturgical use: the second class comprises certain manuscripts written in Egypt, and the western part of Europe. Transcribed, unquestionably, from copies which were valuable on account of their age and beauty, they were intended only to preserve the contents of those copies; but, as they presented a different text from that which was generally received, they could not be employed in divine service: hence they were for the most part negligently written, with an incorrect orthography, and on leaves of vellum of different sizes and qualities. To this class, Professor Scholz gives the appellation of Alexandrine, because its text originated at Alexandria: it is followed by several Latin and Coptic versions, by the Ethiopic version, and by the ecclesiastical writers who lived in Egypt and in the west of Europe. The other class he terms the Constantinopolitan, because its text was written within the precincts of the patriarchate of Constantinople: to this class Dr. Scholz refers the Syriac versions (Peshito and Philoxenian), the Gothic, Georgian, and Slavonic versions, and the quotations from the New Testament which occur in the works of the ecclesiastical writers, who flourished in Asia Minor, Syria, Palestine, and the eastern part of Europe, especially Greece and Constantinople. There are, moreover, extant other manuscripts, which belong sometimes to one class, and sometimes to the other, and which also exhibit some peculiar varieties; but, after repeated examinations of them, he is of opinion that they do not possess sufficient characters to constitute them distinct classes. The conclusion to which Dr. Scholz has arrived, is, that the Constantinopolitan text is almost always faithful to the text now actually received, while the Alexandrine text varies from it in innumerable instances; and this conclusion he founds, not only upon the actual collation of six hundred and seventy-four manuscripts, but also upon an induction of historical particulars, of which the following is an abstract.

The separation of the MSS. of the New Testament into two classes, in the manner just stated (Dr. Scholz argues), is so conformable to the real state of the text, that it is secure from every attack: there would, indeed, be very little ground for the objection, in order to combat this classification, that the text of the greatest number of manuscripts is not yet known, and consequently uncertain. This objection can only be repelled à posteriori. For this purpose, after having determined the text of a great number of manuscripts by actually collating a few chapters, Dr. Scholz proceeded to collate them nearly at length. When, therefore, eighty manuscripts exhibited, almost constantly, the same additions, the same omissions, and the same various readings, with the exception of a few obvious mistakes of the transcribers and some unimportant modifications;—when, further, after taking here and there fifteen or twenty chapters, he uniformly found in three or four hundred other manuscripts the same various readings as in the first eighty;—he considered himself authorized to conclude, that the remainder of the uncollated manuscripts would present the same results as in these fifteen or twenty chapters; and that like results would be presented by all the manuscripts written in the same place and under the same circumstances as these four hundred manuscripts were written: that is to say, that all the manuscripts which were written within the patriarchate of Constantinople, and were destined to be used in divine service, followed the text of the Constantinopolitan class.

It is by no means surprising that this classification should be thus clearly connected with ecclesiastical jurisdiction. The history of the propagation of Christianity shows us with what strictness, especially within the jurisdiction of the patriarch of Constantinople, missionaries enjoined on their converts the minutest rites of the principal church, and also to what warm disputes the least deviation from them gave rise. These discussions always terminated in reducing them to the most entire conformity with the metropolis.

Further, from the fifth to the middle of the fifteenth century, a greater number of copies of the sacred books was made at Constantinople than in all the rest of the patriarchate. Transcribed and collated in the same convents under the eyes of the superiors, then sold and resold by the monks and priests to distant churches, all these copies presented the same text, as well as the same characters and the same menologies (or calendars of Greek saints for every day in the month throughout the year), in all the provinces which were subject to the influence of the metropolitan church, of its literature, booksellers, and monks.

When Islamism was diffused from India to the Atlantic Ocean;—when thousands of Christians were imprisoned, driven to apostacy, or sold as slaves;—when the flames had devoured a prodigious number of Greek manuscripts;—when the use of the Greek language was interdicted, and the capital of Greek literature was overthrown,—THEN the influence of Constantinople extended, without a rival, over almost every thing that remained to the Christians who spoke Greek. The text of the Constantinopolitan church, and the manuscripts which contained it, were generally adopted. The text of the other class, on the contrary, which had till then been used for divine service within the limits of the patriarchate of Alexandria, and the manuscripts belonging to that class, disappeared almost entirely. The copyists ceased to transcribe them: the most ancient and valuable perished; and their text was preserved only in a few libraries, or by a few lovers of literature, as curiosities, or as venerable relics of ancient and lost documents.

Although the Alexandrine text is sometimes found in liturgical books or in lectionaries, Dr. Scholz cannot believe that the manuscripts, which contained it, were ever destined for divine service: they have, in fact, been written with so much haste and incorrectness, that such could never have been their destination. The manuscripts of both families ordinarily have few corrections and no various readings in the margins: every thing, on the contrary, indicates that they are not exact copies of ancient exemplars.

That so few very ancient manuscripts of the Constantinopolitan text are now extant, is a circumstance which ought not to excite surprise. They must necessarily have been worn out, and have perished, in consequence of the daily use made of them for divine service. In the fourth century the text may be regarded as equally fixed with the canon of the New Testament; after which time the veneration of believers for the sacred books would not allow the introduction of any change. Before that period, therefore, the alterations must have taken place, which gave rise to the division of manuscripts into two classes. Since that period manuscripts have been collated and even corrected, but never arbitrarily and always after ancient documents: besides, the corrections so made were of little importance, and had only a limited influence. Although different manuscripts may be of the same country, it does not necessarily result that their text exhibits an absolute identity, but only a general conformity in the greatest number of cases.

What then, it may be asked, was the origin of the Constantinopolitan text? Dr. Scholz is of opinion that it was the original text, nearly in all its purity, and derived directly from autographs. This he regards as certain as any critical fact can be: history leads us to admit it; external evidence confirms it; and it is completely demonstrated by internal proofs.

The greater part of the writings of the New Testament were destined for the churches in Greece and in Asia Minor, where the idea of forming a collection of them would originate, as is evident from Saint John's approbation of the collection of the first three Gospels. These writings were, from the beginning, read in the religious assemblies of the Christians; and when the originals were worn out or lost by use or by the calamities which befell many of the churches, apographs or correct transcripts from them were preserved in private libraries as well as in the libraries attached to the churches. These holy writings were further multiplied by numerous copyists for the use of private individuals. In transcribing the text, the Constantinopolitan scribes certainly did not imitate the audacity of the grammarians of Alexandria: this would be in the highest degree improbable, if the question related to profane authors; but it becomes utterly incredible as it regards the New Testament. On the contrary, these writings were cherished with increasing religious veneration. The long series of venerable bishops, who presided over the numerous churches in Asia, the Archipelago, and in Greece, transmitted to the faithful the instructions which they had received from the apostles. Far from altering in any degree that sacred deposit, they laboured with pious vigilance to preserve it pure and unimpaired. In this state they left it to their successors and to new churches; and, with the exception of a few errors of the copyists, the text remained without alteration until the reigns of Constantine and of Constantine. At that time, however, some Alexandrine MSS. were dispersed at Constantinople, whence alterations were introduced into many Byzantine manuscripts. This circumstance accounts for a tendency in the Constantinopolitan family to approximate nearer to the Alexandrine text than we should otherwise expect.

Let us now examine the complaints of the ancients relative to the alterations made in the text of all literary productions, generally, and particularly in the text of the New Testament. These complaints have no relation to those countries, in which Christianity existed during the first three centuries with the greatest purity. The fathers, who lived and wrote in those countries, did not participate in these accusations.² If they did not bring to the study of the New Testament the critical acumen of Origen, the greater part of them were not destitute of a truly classical education; and such important diversities of readings, as are sometimes discernible in the Egyptian or Alexandrine copies, could not have escaped them. Consequently, they were unknown to them; and the manuscripts which were made use of for public worship must have been transcribed with sufficient exactness, so as to give no cause for discontent.

We should have a further proof of the authenticity of the Constantinopolitan text, if we could find it agree with that of other countries equally distinguished by the contiguity of their churches, and by the number and learning of their pastors. These two texts, however, must have continued independent of each other; and the monuments of both must present vestiges of a higher antiquity, apparently ascending (at least since the third century) to distinct sources. In such case we should evidently be authorized to conclude that this twofold text is really conformable to the original text.

We have extant critical documents, some of which were written in Palestine, and others in Syria, which agree with those of Greece and Asia Minor, even in readings that are utterly insignificant. This is the case with six Palestine manuscripts (and particularly with the Codex Regius Parisiensis 53.),³ which were copied in a convent at Jerusalem after very ancient manuscripts. Consequently, they make known to us the text of that country for a long period of time. The text of these six exemplars is not absolutely identical, which circumstance still further corroborates the argument, and shows that they faithfully represent to us the ancient witnesses for the text of the New Testament.

We do not here appeal to the testimony of Justin Martyr, as he frequently cites from memory or alludes to apocryphal gospels: but the writers of Palestine, who are less ancient than he was, exactly follow a text conformable to that of Constantinople. In Syria, besides some Greek manuscripts already referred to, and which appear to have been written in that country, we find the Peshito and the Philoxenian Syriac versions; the first, executed in the third⁴ and the second in the sixth century: both these versions follow the Constantinopolitan text; no doubt therefore can now remain on this subject. The text which prevailed in Asia and in Greece during the first ages of Christianity also prevailed in Syria. It is the same text which somewhat later prevailed at Constantinople, whence it was diffused throughout the eastern empire, and which has been preserved to us with a greater degree of purity than any other text, and without any important alterations.

As the sacred books were, from the beginning of Christianity, destined to liturgical use, it would become necessary sometimes to write in the margin, for the direction of the public reader, certain initial or final words or phrases, with which he was to commence or terminate the portion appointed to be read in the church, in order that the whole passage might be the better understood. From the margin it became impossible, in later times, to prevent these words or phrases from passing occasionally into the text. In many manuscripts, however, they have remained in their original place; but, as might naturally be expected, there was only a small number of copyists sufficiently exact to leave them there.⁵ From all these facts and arguments Dr. Scholz concludes that the Constantinopolitan text, as it is actually found either in manuscripts, or in the Evangelistaria, Lectionaria, and other ascetic books, must be regarded as the purest text; especially as it is that which has in every age received the sanction of the church, and has always been employed in divine service.

It would now remain to prove by internal arguments, derived from the very variations from the Constantinopolitan text, which are discoverable in the Alexandrine text, that the former is indeed the authentic text. But for this purpose

² Dr. Scholz, in his Prolegomena to the New Testament, pp. v.—vii. has treated this subject at length, and has given numerous references to the fathers and early ecclesiastical writers, who attest the care of the ancient Christians in preserving the sacred text from being corrupted.

it will be sufficient to appeal to competent judges, and particularly to the profoundly learned Dr. Griesbach,¹ who very rarely followed the Alexandrine text, notwithstanding his predilection in favour of the ancient manuscripts in which it is preserved. Further, the remarkable agreement which exists among the Constantinopolitan manuscripts, and the scrupulous delicacy of the copyists who transcribed them, are almost a proof of the legitimacy of this text; for, on a comparison of them with the Egyptian exemplars, the traces of corruption every where observable in the latter will readily be perceived. Every one of these exemplars has so many peculiar variations, as to place the mutual relationship of that class of manuscripts beyond all doubt.²

There exists no difference between the manuscripts of the Alexandrine family and those of what may be called the Occidental or Western family. Both, in Dr. Scholz's judgment, form but one class: they vary, however, from each other in so many instances, that, if we do not confine ourselves to one single family, and to its general character, we must institute as many classes as there are manuscripts. Instead, therefore, of dividing the Egyptian documents into two classes as he had formerly done,³ on the authority of the distinguished critics who had preceded him, Dr. Scholz now reunites them together under the name of the Alexandrine family, because they exhibit the corrupted text of Alexandria, whence they have originally issued.

Egypt, then, is the country whence the alterations of the text of the New Testament principally originated. They commenced in the very first century. This is demonstrated by the most ancient monuments of the text; for instance, the Codices Vaticanus, Alexandrinus, and Ephremi, which unquestionably are copies of very ancient exemplars, and exhibit Egyptian interpolations. Witness, also, the Egyptian and Latin translations made in the second and third centuries after exemplars of the same description; and, finally, the quotations of the fathers and ecclesiastical writers of the same country. Clement Alexandrinus, Origen, and Dionysius Alexandrinus all made use of this text. The complaints of the ancient doctors of the church, and of Origen in particular, relate to these manuscripts, and to the conduct of the Alexandrian copyists. The ecclesiastical writers who indicate or discuss various readings made use of manuscripts of the same description, of which only they consequently spoke. Jerome, who certainly employed manuscripts of both families, seems to have had but a very obscure apprehension of the difference subsisting between them. His notice of them, therefore, is sufficiently vague. To this obscure apprehension it should seem that we must refer the passage of his letter to Damascus bishop of Rome, in which he condemns upon hearsay the exemplars of Lucian and Hesychius. He speaks of their labours in an uncertain and unsatisfactory manner: he mentions neither the city nor the country where their text was adopted; and the expressions "asserit perversa contentio, . . . nec in Novo" [Testamento] "profuit emendasse," show in what horror Jerome and his contemporaries held such corrections; and, consequently, what little chance they had of being adopted, even if they had been preferable to the Egyptian text.

Enough has been said concerning the origin of this text. At Alexandria, where it is well known that great numbers of manuscripts were transcribed, the grammarians were “Ipse etiam Griesbachius aliique ingenue fatentur, lectiones Alexandrinæ longe pleræque PLANE RESPONDAS ESSE.” Scholz, Proleg. pp. CLXVII. CLXVIII.

* The Sahidic version (which was in the dialect spoken in Upper Egypt) may be added as an example of the variations above referred to. In the Gospels and Acts of the Apostles it agrees with D. or the Codex Bezae very nearly 119 times; with D. and A. (the Codex Alexandrinus), 16 times; with D. A. and other Egyptian exemplars, 112 times; with D. A. and the Vulgate, 86 times; with D. and the Vulgate, 82 times; with A. very nearly 11 times; with A. and several other Egyptian exemplars, 51 times; with A. and several Latin versions, 41 times. In the Epistles of Saint Paul it agrees with A. and D. 83 times; with A. alone, 3 times; with A. D. and other Egyptian exemplars, 14 times; with A. and others, 5 times; with A. and the Vulgate, 16 times; with D. alone, twice; with D. and other exemplars, 7 times; with D. and the Vulgate, 7 times. In the Catholic Epistles it agrees with A. 5 times; with A. and others, 14 times; with A. and the Vulgate, 36 times; with other Egyptian exemplars (A. excepted), 50 times; and in more than one hundred instances it has its own peculiar readings. Scholz, Biblische-Kritische Reise, p. 178.

accustomed to correct in the margins whatever displeased them in the authors whose productions they copied,⁴ which alterations were subsequently introduced into the text. Most of the Egyptian alterations were made in the first two centuries, and consequently they are found in all the manuscripts of that family. A sufficiently large number of new interpolations, some of them very considerable ones, had a later origin. Such is the source of the principal differences observable in the Alexandrine family. This corrupt text was diffused more or less in the West, either in Greek manuscripts or in the Latin versions; and this circumstance accounts for its being constantly used by the Italian and African doctors, as well as by Irenæus in the south of France. When, however, Jerome does cite the writings of any of his Asiatic fellow-countrymen, he gives the purest text which they used, that is, the Constantinopolitan text.⁵

Although Prof. Scholz's system of classing manuscripts seems, at first view, to contradict those of his predecessors in this department of sacred criticism (except Bengel), yet this contradiction is only apparent—not real; for he actually recognises the same facts as other critics; he only denies the importance of some, and explains others in a different way. With respect to the results, however, there is no difference. The grand—the final—result of the principle of families, viz. the certainty, and (in any thing material) the inviolability of the sacred text, is expressed more distinctly by Scholz than by any of his predecessors. His system, moreover, appears generally to offer—more than any other theory or system of recensions—a remarkable character of simplicity and universality. It is less complicated, and it also possesses a greater degree of probability (probability approximating to certainty) than either of the theories noticed in the present section; and it is supported by profoundly learned and laborious researches, the result of which (it must be candidly admitted) shows the great pre-eminence of the Asiatic or Constantinopolitan text over the African or Alexandrine text, and, consequently, the real value, genuineness, and integrity of the present received text of the New Testament.

Having thus given a summary, and, it is hoped, an impartial, view of Professor Scholz's system of classification of manuscripts, it only remains that we offer some specimens in illustration of it.

1. The first vestige of a twofold class of manuscripts is furnished by Jerome, who, in his epistle to Minirius and Alexander, states that he found three different readings in 1 Cor. xv. 51.

(1.) The Asiatic writers, as Theodorus of Heraclea, Diodorus of Tarsus, and Apollonaris, follow the reading given by Theodoret and Chrysostom: ΠΑΡΤΕΡ ΜΕΝ ΟΙ ΚΑΜΗΝΗΣΥΜΕΘΑ, ΠΑΝΤΕ; ΔΕ ΑΛΛΑΓΗΣΟΥΜΕΘΑ; We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed.

(2.) The African writers, as Origen, Didymus, and Acacius, even Jerome himself (in his explanation of Psalm xlv. addressed to Principia), read, with the Greek manuscripts quoted by Rufinus, Pelagius, Augustine, and Ecumenius, — ἡμεῖς μὲν κοιμηθήσομεθα, οὐ τῆς τοῦ ἀλλοτρίου μεθεῖμα; We shall all sleep, but we shall not all be changed. From thislection,

(3.) The Latin manuscripts differed, in reading πάντες μὲν ἀναστήσονται, ὃ πάντες δὲ ἀλλաγησόμεθα; We shall all rise again, but we shall not all be changed.

This variety of reading discovered by Jerome is also evident in manuscripts which are now extant. The Codices B. (Alexandrinus), which, however, omits the word $\mu\epsilon\tau$, D. (Cantabrigiensis) E. (Baueensis B. VI.) and others, which are followed by the received text, agree with the Asiatic writers. The Codices C. (Ephremi), 17 (Regius 55), and other manuscripts and writers of the Alexandrine family, agree with the African writers.

2. The following examples, selected from the fifth chapter

* A striking confirmation of Dr. Scholz's remark on the inaccuracy of the Alexandrian copyists is incidentally given by the geographer Strabo, who died A. D. 25. Relating the migrations of Aristotle's library (whose works had suffered greatly from the errors which had crept into the copies made of them), Strabo says, that Rome contributed to multiply these errors; and that Syria, on the capture of Athens, took possession of Aristotle's library, which he ordered to be transported to Rome. There the grammarian Tyrrannion, who was a follower of the Aristotelian philosophy, having gained over the keeper of the library, took copies of the philosopher's writings. Some booksellers also had copies made by incompetent scribes and not by the collators [αὐτοῦ θαλάσσης, those whose province it was to compare the copies with the original exemplar]. The same thing also happens to books which are copied for sale, both here [that is, at Rome] and at ALEXANDRIA:—Ὅτι καὶ ἐν ταῖς ἀλλὰς τοῖς ἐκ πρῶτον ὑπερβολῶν βιβλίοις, καὶ ἐν ταῖς ἀπὸ τῶν ΑΛΕΞΑΝΔΡΕΙΑ. IX. From the coincidence observed between many Greek manuscripts and the Vulgate, or some other Latin version, a suspicion arose in the minds of several eminent critics, that the Greek text had been altered throughout to the Latin; and it has been asserted that at the council of Florence (held in 1439 with the view of establishing an union between the Greek and Latin churches), a resolution was formed, that the Greeks should alter their manuscripts from the Latin. This has been termed by the learned, Fœdus cum Græcis. The suspicion, concerning the altering of the Greek text, seems to have been first suggested by Erasmus, but it does not appear that he supposed the alterations were made before the fifteenth century: so that the charge of Latinizing the manuscripts did not (at least in his notion of it) extend to the original writers of the manuscript, or, as they are called, the writers a primâ manu; since it affected only the writers a secundâ manu, or subsequent interpolators. The accusation was adopted and extended by Father Simon and Dr. Mill, and especially by Wetstein. Bengel expressed some doubts concerning it; and it was formally questioned by Semler, Griesbach, and Woide. The reasonings of the two last-mentioned critics convinced Michaelis (who had formerly agreed with Erasmus) that the charge of Latinizing was unfounded; and in the fourth edition of his Introduction to the New Testament (the edition translated by Bishop Marsh), with a candour of which there are too few examples, Michaelis totally abandoned his first opinion, and expressed his opinion that the pretended agreement in the Fœdus cum Græcis is a mere conjecture of Erasmus, to which he had recourse as a refuge in a matter of controversy. Carrying the proof to its utmost length, it only shows that the Latin translations and the Greek copies were made from the same exemplars; which rather proves the antiquity of the Latin translations, than the corruption of the Greek copies. It is further worthy of remark, that Jerome corrected the Latin from the Greek; a circumstance which is known in every part of the Western Church. Now, as Michaelis justly observes, when it was known that the learned father had made the Greek text the basis of his alterations in the Latin translation, it is scarcely to be imagined that the transcribers of the Western Church would alter the Greek by the Latin; and it is still less probable that those of the Eastern Church would act in this manner.²

SECTION III.

ON THE DIVISIONS AND MARKS OF DISTINCTION OCCURRING IN MANUSCRIPTS AND PRINTED EDITIONS OF THE SCRIPTURES.

§ I. ON THE DIVISIONS AND MARKS OF DISTINCTION OCCURRING IN THE OLD TESTAMENT.

I. Different appellations given to the Scriptures.—II. General divisions of the canonical books; particularly of the Old Testament.—1. The Law.—2. The Prophets.—3. The Cetubim, or Hagiographa.—III. Modern divisions of the books of the Old Testament.—Chapters and verses.

1. THE collection of writings, which is regarded by Christians as the sole standard of their faith and practice, has been distinguished, at various periods, by different appellations. Thus, it is frequently termed the Scriptures, the Sacred or Holy Scriptures, and sometimes the Canonical Scriptures. This collection is called The Scriptures, as being the most important of all writings; the Holy or Sacred Scriptures, because they were composed by persons divinely inspired; and the Canonical Scriptures, either because they are a rule of faith and practice to those who receive them; or because, when the number and authenticity of these books were ascertained, lists of them were inserted in the ecclesiastical canons or catalogues, in order to distinguish them from such books as were apocryphal or of uncertain authority, and unquestionably not of divine origin. But the most usual appellation is that of the BIBLE—a word which in its primary import simply denotes a book, but which is given to the writings of the prophets and apostles, by way of eminence, as being the Book of Books, infinitely superior in excellence to every unassisted production of the human mind.³

II. The most common and general division of the canonical books is that of the Old and New Testament; the former containing those revelations of the divine will which were communicated to the Hebrews, Israelites, or Jews, before the birth of Christ, and the latter comprising the inspired writings of the evangelists and apostles.

The arrangement of the books containing the Old Testament, which is adopted in our Bibles, is not always regulated by the exact time when the books were respectively written; although the book of Genesis is universally allowed to be the first, and the prophecy of Malachi to be the latest of the inspired writings. The various books contained in the Old Testament were divided by the Jews into three parts or classes—the Law—the Prophets—and the Cetubim, or Hagiographa, that is, the Holy Writings: which division obtained in the time of our Saviour,⁴ and is noticed by Josephus,⁵ though he does not enumerate the several books.

1. The LAW (so called, because it contains precepts for the regulation of life and manners) comprised the Pentateuch, or five books of Moses, which were originally written in one volume, as all the manuscripts are to this day, which are read in the synagogues. It is not known when the writings of the Jewish legislator were divided into five books: but as the titles of Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy, are evidently of Greek origin (for the tradition related by Philo, and adopted by some writers of the Roman Church, that they were given by Moses himself, is too idle to deserve refutation), it is not improbable that these titles were prefixed to the several books by the authors of the Alexandrian or Septuagint Greek version.

⁵ These are the words which I spake unto you, while I was yet with you, that all things might be fulfilled which are written in the LAW, and in the PROPHETS, and in the PSALMS, concerning me. (Luke xxiv. 44.) In which passage by the Psalm is intended the Hagiographa; which division beginning with the Psalm, the whole of it (agreeably to the Jewish manner of quoting) is there called by the name of the book with which it commences. Saint Peter also, when appealing to prophecies in proof of the Gospel, says, "All the prophets from Samuel, and those that follow after, as many as have spoken, have likewise foretold of these days." (Acts iii. 24.) In which passage the apostle plainly includes the books of Saruel in the class of prophets.

2. The PROPHETS, which were thus designated because these books were written by inspired prophetic men, were divided into the former and latter,¹ with regard to the time when they respectively flourished: the former prophets contained the books of Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, and 1 and 2 Kings, the two last being each considered as one book; the latter prophets comprised the writings of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and of the twelve minor prophets, whose books were reckoned as one. The reason why Moses is not included among the prophets, is, because he so far surpassed all those who came after him, in eminence and dignity, that they were not accounted worthy to be placed on a level with him: and the books of Joshua and Judges are reckoned among the prophetic books, because they are generally supposed to have been written by the prophet Samuel.

3. The CETUBIM or HAGIOGRAPHIA, that is, the Holy Writings, comprehended the Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations of Jeremiah, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra and Nehemiah (reckoned as one), and the two books of Chronicles, also reckoned as one book.² This third class or division of the Sacred Books has received its appellation of Cetubim or Holy Writings, because they were not orally delivered, as the law of Moses was; but the Jews affirm that they were composed by men divinely inspired, who, however, had no public mission as prophets: and the Jews conceive that they were dictated not by dreams, visions, or voice, or in other ways, as the oracles of the prophets were, but that they were more immediately revealed to the minds of their authors. It is remarkable that Daniel is excluded from the number of prophets, and that his writings, with the rest of the Hagiographa, were not publicly read in the synagogues as the Law and the Prophets were: this is ascribed to the singular minuteness with which he foretold the coming of the Messiah before the destruction of the city and sanctuary (Dan. ix.), and the apprehension of the Jews, lest the public reading of his predictions should lead any to embrace the doctrines of Jesus Christ.³

The Pentateuch is divided into fifty or fifty-four Paraschioth, or larger sections, according as the Jewish lunar year is simple or intercalary; one of which sections was read in the synagogue every Sabbath-day: this division many of the Jews suppose to have been appointed by Moses, but it is by others attributed, and with greater probability, to Ezra. These paraschioth were further subdivided into smaller sections termed Siderim, or orders. Until the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, the Jews read only the law; but the reading of it being then prohibited, they substituted for it fifty-four Hapthoroth, or sections from the Prophets. Subsequently, however, when the reading of the Law was restored by the Maccabees, the section which had been read from the Law was used for the first, and that from the Prophets, for the second lesson.⁴ These sections were also divided into Pesukim, or verses, which have likewise been ascribed to Ezra; but if not contrived by him, it appears that this subdivision was introduced shortly after his death; it was probably intended for the use of the Targumists or Chaldee interpreters. After the return of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity, when the Hebrew language had ceased to be spoken, and the Chaldee became the vernacular tongue, it was (as we have already remarked)⁵ usual to read the law, first in the original Hebrew, and afterwards to interpret it to the people in the Chaldee dialect. For the purpose of exposition, therefore, these shorter periods were very convenient.

III. The divisions of the Old Testament, which now generally obtain, are four in number: namely, 1. The Pen- tateuch, or five books of Moses;—2. The Historical Books, comprising Joshua to Esther inclusive;—3. The Doctrinal or Poetical Books of Job, Psalms, the Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Solomon;—and, 4. The Prophetical Books of Isaiah, Jeremiah with his Lamentations, Ezekiel, Daniel, and the twelve minor Prophets. These are severally divided into CHAPTERS and VERSES, to facilitate reference, and not primarily with a view to any natural division of the multifarious subjects which they embrace: but by whom these divisions were originally made is a question, concerning which there exists a considerable difference of opinion.

That they are comparatively a modern invention is evident from its being utterly unknown to the ancient Christians, whose Greek Bibles, indeed, then had ΤΙΤΛΑ and ΚΕΦΑΛΑΙΑ (Title and Head); but the intent of these was, rather to point out the sum or contents of the text, than to divide the various books. They also differed greatly from the present chapters, many of them containing only a few verses, and some of them not more than one. The invention of chapters has by some been ascribed to Lanfranc, who was archbishop of Canterbury in the reigns of William the Conqueror and William I.; while others attribute it to Stephen Langton, who was archbishop of the same see in the reigns of John and Henry III. But the real author of this very useful division was cardinal Hugo de Sancto Caro, who flourished about the middle of the thirteenth century, and wrote a celebrated commentary on the Scriptures. Having projected concordance to the Latin Vulgate version, by which any passage might be found, he divided both the Old and New Testaments into chapters, which are the same we now have: these chapters he subdivided into smaller portions, which he distinguished by the letters A, B, C, D, E, F, and G, which are placed in the margin at equal distances from each other, according to the length of the chapters.⁶ The facility of reference thus afforded by Hugo's divisions, having become known to Rabbi Mordecai Nathan (or Isaac Nathan, as he is sometimes called), a celebrated Jewish teacher in the fifteenth century, he undertook a similar concordance for the Hebrew Scriptures; but instead of adopting the marginal letters of Hugo, he marked every fifth verse with a Hebrew numeral, thus, כ 1. ה 5, &c., retaining, however, the cardinal's divisions into chapters. This concordance of Rabbi Nathan was commenced A. D. 1438, and finished in 1445. The introduction of verses into the Hebrew Bible was made by Athias, a Jew of Amsterdam, in his celebrated edition of the Hebrew Bible, printed in 1661, and reprinted in 1667. He marked every verse with the figures in common use, except those which had been previously marked by Nathan with Hebrew letters, in the manner in which they at present appear in Hebrew Bibles. By rejecting these Hebrew numerals, and substituting for them the corresponding figures, all the copies of the Bible in other languages have since been marked.⁸ As, however, the modern divisions and subdivisions are not always made with the strictest regard to the connexion of parts, it is greatly to be wished that all future editions of the Scriptures might be printed after the judicious manner adopted by Mr. Reeves in his equally beautiful and correct editions of the entire Bible; in which the numbers of the verses and chapters are thrown into the margin, and the metrical parts of Scripture are distinguished from the rest by being printed in verses in the usual manner.

§ 2. ON THE DIVISIONS AND MARKS OF DISTINCTION OCCURRING IN THE NEW TESTAMENT.

I. Ancient divisions of ΤΙΤΛΑ and ΚΕΦΑΛΑΙΑ.—Ammonian, Eusebian, and Euthalian sections.—Modern division of chapters.—II. Account of the ancient and modern punctuation of the New Testament.—Ancient ΣΤΙΧΑ and modern verses.—III. Of the titles to each book.—IV. Subscriptions to the different books.

It is evident on inspecting the most ancient manuscripts of the New Testament, that the several books were originally

⁴ Of these divisions we have evident traces in the New Testament; thus, the section (στίχ. 22) of the prophet Isaiah, which the Ethiopian church was reading, was, in all probability, that which related to the sufferings of the Messiah. (Acts viii. 32.) When Saint Paul entered into the synagogue at Antioch in Pisidia, he stood up to preach, after the reading of the Law and the Prophets (Acts xiii. 15); that is, after reading the first lesson out of the Law, and the second lesson out of the Prophets. And in the very discourse which he then delivered, he tells the Jews that the Prophets were read at Jerusalem on every Sabbath-day, that is, in those lessons which were taken out of the Prophets. (Acts xiii. 27.)

⁶ In vol. ii. part iii. chap. i. sect. iv. we have given a table of the Paraschioth or Sections of the Law, together with the Hapthoroth or Sections of the Prophets, as they are read in the different Jewish synagogues for every Sabbath of the year, and also showing the portions corresponding with our modern divisions of chapters and verses.

I. The Jews, we have already seen,² divided their law into parashioth and sidrim, or larger and smaller sections, and the prophets into haphthoroth or sections; and this division most probably suggested to the early Christians the idea of dividing the books of the New Testament into similar sections. The early Christian teachers gave the name of PERICOPÆ to the sections read as lessons by the Jews;³ and Clement of Alexandria applies the same appellation to larger sections of the Gospels and St. Paul's epistles. These pericopæ then were church-lessons or sections of the New Testament, which were read in the assemblies for divine worship after Moses and the prophets. The commencement of each pericope was usually designated by the letter α (αρχή, the beginning), and its close by the letter τ (τέλος, the end).⁴

Subsequently the ancients divided the New Testament into two kinds of chapters, some longer and others shorter; the former were called in Greek πύλαι, and in Latin breves; and the table of contents of each brevis, which was prefixed to the copies of the New Testament, was called breviarium. The shorter chapters were called κεφαλαια, capitula, and the list of them, capitulatio.

This method of dividing is of very great antiquity, certainly prior to the fourth century; for Jerome, who flourished towards the close of that century, expunged a passage from Saint Matthew's Gospel which forms an entire chapter, as being an interpolation.⁵ These divisions were formerly very numerous; but, not being established by any ecclesiastical authority, none of them were ever received by the whole church. Saint Matthew's Gospel, for instance, according to the old breviaria, contained twenty-eight breves; but, according to Jerome, sixty-eight. The same author divides his Gospel into 355 capitula; others, into 74; others, into 88; others, into 117; the Syriac version, into 76; and Erpenius's edition of the Arabic, into 101. The most ancient, and, it appears, the most approved of these divisions, was that of TATIAN (A. D. 172), in his Harmony of the four Gospels, for the πύλαι or breves; and that of AMMONIUS, a learned Christian of Alexandria in the third century, in his Harmony of the Gospels, for the κεφαλαια or capitula. From him they were termed the Ammonian Sections. As these divisions were subsequently adopted, and the use of them was recommended, by EUSEBIUS the celebrated ecclesiastical historian, they are frequently called by his name. According to this division, Saint Matthew contains 68 breves, and 355 capitula; Saint Mark, 48 breves, and 234 capitula; Saint Luke, 83 breves, and 412 capitula; and Saint John, 18 breves, and 231 capitula. All the evangelists together form 216 breves and 1126 capitula. In ancient Greek manuscripts the πύλαι or larger portions are written on the upper or lower margin, and the κεφαλαια or smaller portions are numbered on the side of the margin. They are clearly represented in Erasmus's editions of the Greek Testament, and in Robert Stephens's edition of 1550.

The division of the Acts of the Apostles, and of the Catholic Epistles, into κεφαλαια or capitula, was made by EUTHALIUS, bishop of Sulca, in Egypt, in the fifth century; who published an edition of St. Paul's Epistles, that had been divided into capitula, in one continued series, by some unknown person in the fourth century, who had considered them as one book. This arrangement of the Pauline Epistles is to be found in the Vatican manuscript, and in some others; but it by no means prevails uniformly, for there are many manuscripts extant, in which a fresh enumeration commences with each epistle.⁶

Besides the divisions into chapters and sections above mentioned, the Codex Bezae and other manuscripts were further divided into lessons, called Ἀναγνώματα or Ἀναγνώσεις. Euthalius is said to have divided Saint Paul's Epistles in this manner, as Andrew Bishop of Cassarea in Cappadocia divided the Apocalypse, at the beginning of the sixth century, into twenty-four lessons, which he termed λεξαι (according to the number of elders before the throne of God, Rev. iv. 4.), and seventy-two titles, according to the number of parts, viz. body, soul, and spirit, of which the elders were composed.⁷

The division of πύλαι and κεφαλαια continued to be general both in the eastern and western churches, until cardinal Hugo de Sancto Caro in the thirteenth century introduced the chapters now in use, throughout the western church, for the New Testament as well as the Old: of which an account has already been given.⁸ The Greek or eastern church, however, continued to follow the ancient divisions; nor are any Greek manuscripts known to be extant, in which chapters are found, prior to the fifteenth century, when the Greek fugitives, after the taking of Constantinople, fled into the West of Europe, became transcribers for members of the Latin church, and of course adopted the Latin divisions.

II. Whether any points for marking the sense were used by the apostles, is a question that has been greatly agitated; Pritius, Pfaff, Leusden, and many other eminent critics, maintaining that they were in use before the time of the apostles, while Dr. Grabe, Fabricius, Montfaucon, Hoffmann, John Henry Michaelis, Rogall, John David Michaelis, Moldenhawer, Ernesti, and a host of other critics, maintain that the use of points is posterior to the time of the apostles.⁹ The numerous mistakes of the fathers,¹⁰ or their uncertainty how particular passages were to be read and understood, clearly prove that there was no regular or accustomed system of punctuation in use, in the fourth century. The majority of the points or stops now in use are unquestionably of modern date: for although some full points are to be found in the Codex Alexandrinus, the Codex Vaticanus, and the Codex Bezae (as they also are in inscriptions four hundred years before the Christian era), yet it cannot be shown that our present system of punctuation was generally adopted earlier than the ninth century. In fact, it seems to have been a gradual improvement, commenced by Jerome, and continued by succeeding biblical critics. The punctuation of the manuscripts of the Septuagint, Ernesti observes from Cyril of Jerusalem,¹¹ was unknown in the early part of the fourth century, and consequently (he infers) the punctuation of the New Testament was also unknown. About fifty years afterwards Jerome began to add the comma and colon; and they were then inserted in many more ancient manuscripts. About the middle of the fifth century, Euthalius (then a deacon of the church at Alexandria) published an edition of the four Gospels, and afterwards (when he was bishop of Sulca in Egypt) an edition of the Acts of the Apostles and of all the Apostolical Epistles, in which he divided the New Testament into στίχα (stichoi), or lines regulated by the sense, so that each terminated where some pause was to be made in reading. Of this method of division (which Euthalius de-

The stichoi, however, not only assisted the public reader of the New Testament to determine its sense; they also served to measure the size of books; thus, Josephus's twenty books of Jewish Antiquities contained 60,000 stichoi, though in Ittigius's edition there are only 40,000 broken lines. And according to an ancient written list preserved by Simon, and transcribed by Michaelis, the New Testament contained 18,612 stichoi.²

The verses into which the New Testament is now divided, are much more modern, and are an imitation of those invented for the Old Testament by Rabbi Nathan in the fifteenth century.³ Robert Stephens was their first inventor,⁴ and introduced them in his edition of the New Testament, published in the year 1551. This invention of the learned printer was soon introduced into all the editions of the New Testament; and the very great advantage it affords, for facilitating references to particular passages, has caused it to be retained in the majority of editions and versions of the New Testament, though much to the injury of its interpretation, as many passages are now severed that ought to be united, and vice versa.⁵ From this arrangement, however, Wetstein, Bengel, Boyer, Griesbach, Drs. Burton, and Bloomfield, and other editors of the Greek Testament, have wisely departed, and have printed the text in continued paragraphs, throwing the numbers of Stephens's verses into the margin. Mr. Reeves also has pursued the same method in his beautiful and correct editions of the authorized English version, and of the Greek Testament in 12mo., 1803.

Besides the text in the different books of the New Testament, we meet with titles or inscriptions to each of them, and also with subscriptions at the end, specifying the writer of each book, the time and place, when and where it was written, and the person to whom it was written.

III. It is not known by whom the INSCRIPTIONS or TITLES of the various books of the New Testament were prefixed. In consequence of the very great diversity of titles occurring in manuscripts it is generally admitted that they were not originally written by the apostles, but were subsequently added, in order to distinguish one book from another, when the canon of the New Testament was formed. It is however certain, that these titles are of very great antiquity; for we find them mentioned by Tertullian in the latter part of the second century,⁶ and Justin Martyr, in the early part of the same century, expressly states, that the writings of the four evangelists were in his day termed Gospel.⁷

IV. But the SUBSCRIPTIONS annexed to the epistles are manifestly spurious; for, in the first place, some of them are, beyond all doubt, false, as those of the two Epistles to the Thessalonians, which purport to be written at Athens, whereas they were written from Corinth. In like manner, the subscription to the first epistle to the Corinthians states, that it was written from Philippi, notwithstanding St. Paul in forms them (xvi. 8.) that he will tarry at Ephesus until Pentecost; and notwithstanding he begins his salutations in that epistle, by telling the Corinthian Christians (xvi. 19.) the Churches of Asia salute you; a pretty evident indication that he himself was in Asia at that very time. Again, according to the subscription, the epistle to the Galatians was written from Rome; yet, in the epistle itself, the apostle expresses his surprise (i. 6.) that they were so soon removed from him that called them; whereas his journey to Rome was ten years posterior to the conversion of the Galatians. And what still more conclusively proves the falsehood of this subscription is, the total absence in this epistle of all allusions to his bonds or to his being a prisoner; which Saint Paul has not failed to notice in every one of the four epistles, written from that city and during his imprisonment.⁸ Secondly, The subscriptions are altogether wanting in some ancient manuscripts of the best note, while in others they are greatly varied. And, thirdly, The subscription annexed to the first epistle to Timothy is evidently the production of a writer of the age of Constantine the Great, and could not have been written by the apostle Paul: for it states that epistle to have been written to Timothy from Laodicea, the chief city of Phrygia Pacatiana; whereas the country of Phrygia was not divided into the two provinces of Phrygia Prima, or Pacatiana, and Phrygia Secunda, until the fourth century. According to Dr. Mill, the subscriptions were added by Euthalius bishop of Sulca in Egypt, about the middle of the fifth century. But, whoever was the author of the subscriptions, it is evident that he was either grossly ignorant, or grossly inattentive.

The various subscriptions and titles to the different books are exhibited in Griesbach's and Scholz's Critical Editions of the New Testament.

⁴ He made this division when on a journey from Lyons to Paris, and, as his son Henry tells us (in his preface to the Concordance of the New Testament), he made it inter equitandum, literally, while riding on horseback; but Michaelis rather thinks that the phrase means only, that when he was weary of riding, he amused himself with this work at his inn. CHAPTER III.

ON THE CRITICISM OF THE TEXT OF SCRIPTURE.

Necessity of the Criticism of the Text.

SINCE the editions of the Sacred Text very often differ from each other, and many also contain spurious readings, besides which great numbers of other readings are extant; the exhibition of a correct text becomes a very important object of attention with those who are desirous of understanding the Holy Scriptures:—in other words, the interpreter and the divine stand equally in need of the art of criticism, by the aid of which a proper judgment may be formed of various readings, the spurious may be discerned, and the genuine, or at least the most probable, may be restored. This subject, which involves an inquiry respecting the fact, what the author wrote, has not inaptly been compared by Dr. Jahn to a judicial procedure, in which the critic sits upon the bench, and the charge of corruption in the reading is brought against the text. The witnesses from whose evidence is to be obtained respecting what the author wrote,—or, in other words, the SOURCES of the text Scripture,—are, MANUSCRIPT COPIES, ANCIENT VERSIONS, the EDITIONES PRINCIPES and OTHER EARLY PRINTED EDITIONS, and other BOOKS OF ANTIQUITY, THE AUTHORS OF WHICH QUOTED THE TEXT FROM MANUSCRIPTS. But since these witnesses are often at variance with one another, and very frequently it is impossible to ascertain the truth from their evidence, it further becomes necessary to call in the aid of internal arguments, or those which are drawn from the very nature of the case. Such are,—the facility or the difficulty of a more modern origin, the absence of any sense, or at least of one that is suitable, the agreement or disagreement of a reading, with the series and scope of the discourse, the probability or improbability of any particular word or expression having arisen from the author, and the correspondence or discrepancy of parallel places; lastly, the laws by which, on such evidence, the critic is guided in pronouncing sentence, are the rules of criticism.¹ These topics it is proposed severally to discuss in the following sections.

Form of a SYNAGOGUE ROLL of the Pentateuch.

SECTION I.

ON THE HEBREW MANUSCRIPTS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

- I. Different classes of Hebrew manuscripts.—II. The rolled manuscripts of the Synagogues.—III. The square manuscripts used by the Jews in private life.—IV. Age of Hebrew manuscripts.—V. Of the order in which the Sacred Books are arranged in manuscripts.—VI. Modern families or recensions of Hebrew manuscripts.—VII. Notice of the most ancient manuscripts.—VIII. Brief notice of the manuscripts of the Indian Jews.—IX. Manuscripts of the Samaritan Pentateuch.

ALTHOUGH, as we have already seen,² the Hebrew text of the Old Testament has descended to our times uncorrupted, yet, with all the care which the ancient copyists could bestow, it was impossible to preserve it free from mistakes, arising from the interchanging of the similar letters of the Hebrew Alphabet, and other circumstances incident to the transcription of ancient manuscripts. The rabbins boldly asserted, and, through a credulity rarely to be paralleled, it was implicitly believed, that the Hebrew text was absolutely free from error, and that in all the manuscripts of the Old Testament not a single various reading of importance could be produced. Father Morin was the first person who ventured to impugn this notion in his Exercitationes in utrumque Samaritanorum Pentateuchum, published at Paris in 1631 and he grounded his opinion of the incorrectness of the Hebrew manuscripts on the differences between the Hebrew and the Samaritan texts in the Pentateuch, and on the differences between the Hebrew and the Septuagint in other parts of the Bible. Morinus was soon after followed by Louis Cappel (whose Critica Sacra was published in 1650), who pointed out a great number of errors in the printed Hebrew, and showed how they might be corrected by the ancient versions and the common rules of criticism. He did not, however, advert to the most obvious and effectual means of emendation, namely, a collation of Hebrew manuscripts; and, valuable as his labours unquestionably are, it is certain that he neither used them himself, nor invited others to have recourse to them, in order to correct the sacred text. Cappel was assailed by various opponents, but chiefly by the younger Buxtorf in his Anticritica, published at Basl in 1658, who attempted, but in vain, to refute the principles he had established. In 1657 Bishop Walton, in his Prolegomena to the London Polyglott Bible, declared in favour of the principles asserted by Cappel, acknowledged the necessity of forming a critical apparatus for the purpose of obtaining a more correct text of the Hebrew Bible, and materially contributed to the formation of one by his own exertions. Subsequent biblical critics acceded to the propriety of their arguments, and since the middle of the seventeenth century, the importance and necessity of collating Hebrew manuscripts have been generally acknowledged.³

I. HEBREW MANUSCRIPTS are divided into two CLASSES, viz. Autographs, or those written by the inspired penmen themselves, which have long since perished; and apographs, or copies made from the originals, and multiplied by repeated transcription. These apographs are also divided into the more ancient, which formerly enjoyed the highest authority among the Jews, but have in like manner perished long ago; and into the more modern, which are found dispersed in various public and private libraries. The manuscripts which are still extant, are subdivided into the rolled manuscripts used in the synagogues and into the square manuscripts which are used by private individuals among the Jews.

II. The Pentateuch was read in the Jewish Synagogues from the earliest times; and, though the public reading of it was intermitted during the Babylonish captivity, it was resumed shortly after the return of the Jews. Hence numerous copies were made from time to time; and as they held the books of Moses in the most superstitious veneration, various regulations were made for the guidance of the transcribers, who were obliged to conform to them in copying the ROLLS destined for the use of the synagogue. The date of these regulations is not known, but they are long posterior to the Talmud; and though many of them are the most ridiculous and useless that can be well conceived, yet the religious observance of them which has continued for many centuries, has certainly contributed in a great degree to preserve the purity of the Pentateuch. The following are a few of the principal of these regulations.

The copies of the law must be transcribed from ancient manuscripts of approved character only, with pure ink, on parchment prepared from the hide of a clean animal, for this express purpose, by a Jew, and fastened together by the strings of clean animals; every skin must contain a certain number of columns of prescribed length and breadth, each column comprising a given number of lines and words; no word must be written by heart or with points, or without being first orally pronounced by the copyist; the name of God is not to be written but with the utmost devotion and attention, and previously to writing it, he must wash his pen. The want of a single letter, or the redundancy of a single letter, the writing of prose as verse, or verse as prose, respectively vitiates a manuscript; and when a copy has been completed, it must be examined and corrected within thirty days after the writing has been finished, in order to determine whether it is to be approved or rejected. These rules, it is said, are observed to the present day by the persons who transcribe the sacred writings for the use of the synagogue.¹ The form of one of these rolled manuscripts (from the original among the Harleian MSS. in the British Museum, No. 7519.) is given in the vignette at the head of this section. It is a large double roll, containing the Hebrew Pentateuch; written with very great care on forty brown African skins. These skins are of different breadths, some containing more columns than others. The columns are one hundred and fifty-three in number, each of which contains about sixty-three lines, is about twenty-two inches deep, and generally more than five inches broad. The letters have no points, apices, or flourishes about them. The initial words are not larger than the rest; and a space, equal to about four lines, is left between every two books. Altogether, this is one of the finest specimens of the synagogue-rolls that has been preserved to the present time.

III. THE SQUARE MANUSCRIPTS, which are in private use, are written with black ink, either on vellum or on parchment, or on paper, and of various sizes, folio, quarto, octavo, and duodecimo. Those which are copied on paper are considered as being the most modern; and they frequently have some one of the Targums or Chaldee paraphrases, either subjoined to the text in alternate verses, or placed in parallel columns with the text, or written in the margin of the manuscript. The characters are, for the most part, those which are called the square Chaldee; though a few manuscripts are written with rabbinical characters, but these are invariably of recent date. Biblical critics, who are conversant with the Hebrew manuscripts, have distinguished three sorts of characters, each differing in the beauty of their form. The Spanish character is perfectly square, simple, and elegant: the types of the quarto Hebrew Bibles, printed by Robert Stephen and by Plantin, approach the nearest to this character. The German, on the contrary, is crooked, intricate, and inelegant in every respect; and the Roman character holds a middle place between these two. The pages are usually divided into three columns of various lengths; and the initial letters of the manuscripts are frequently illuminated and ornamented with gold. In many manuscripts the *Masora*² is added; what is called the larger Masora being placed above and below the columns of the text, and the smaller Masora being inserted in the blank spaces between the columns.

IV. As the authority of manuscripts depends greatly on their antiquity, it becomes a point of considerable importance to ascertain their age as exactly as possible. Now this may be effected either by external testimony or by internal marks.

1. External testimony is sometimes afforded by the subscriptions annexed by the transcribers, specifying the time when they copied the manuscripts. But this criterion cannot always be depended upon: for instances have occurred, in which modern copyists have added ancient and false dates in order to enhance the value of their labours. As, however, by far the greater number of manuscripts have no subscriptions or other criteria by which to ascertain their date, it becomes necessary to resort to the evidence of

2. Internal Marks. Of these the following are stated by Dr. Kennicott and M. De Rossi to be the principal:—1. The inelegance or rudeness of the character (Jablonski lays down the simplicity and elegance of the character as a criterion of antiquity);—2. The yellow colour of the vellum;—3. The total absence, or at least the very rare occurrence, of the Masora, and of the Keri and Ketib;—4. The writing of the Pentateuch throughout in one book, without any greater mark of distinction appearing at the beginning of books than at the beginning of sections;—5. The absence of critical emendations and corrections;—6. The absence of the vowel points;—7. Obliterated letters, being written and re-written with ink;—8. The frequent occurrence of the name Jehovah in lieu of Adonai;—9. The infrequency of capital and little letters;—10. The insertion of points to fill up blank spaces;—11. The non-division of some books and psalms;—12. The poetical books not being distinguished from those in prose by dividing them into hemistichs;—13. Readings frequently differing from the Masoretic copies, but agreeing with the Samaritan text, with ancient versions, and with the quotations of the fathers. The conjunction of all, or of several, of these internal marks, is said to afford certain criteria of the antiquity of Hebrew manuscripts. But the opinions of the eminent critics above named have been questioned by Professors Bauer and Tychsen, who have advanced strong reasons to prove that they are uncertain guides in determining the age of manuscripts. The most ancient Hebrew manuscripts are all written without any divisions of words, as is evident not only from ancient Hebrew coins and Palmyrene inscriptions, but also from various passages in the most ancient translations, the authors of which frequently adopted a division of words, altogether different from that of the Masorites. This circumstance is also corroborated by the rabbinical tradition, that the law was formerly one verse and one word. It is impossible to determine the time, when the Hebrews began to divide words in manuscripts: we only know, from the researches of Dr. Kennicott and other eminent Hebrew critics, that all the ancient interpreters used manuscripts written in one continued series; that MSS. of more recent date (the thirteenth century) are still extant in which the same mode of writing appears,—for instance, the MSS. numbered 290. and 293. by Dr. Kennicott; and that some vestiges of the division of words are to be found in the Talmudical writings, and in Jerome.⁴

V. A twofold ORDER of ARRANGEMENT of the sacred books is observable in Hebrew manuscripts, viz. the Talmudical and the Masoretic. Originally, the different books of the Old Testament were not joined together; according to Rabbi Elias Levita (the most learned Jewish writer on the subject), they were first joined together by the members of the great synagogue, who divided them into three parts.—the law, the prophets, and hagiographa, and who placed the prophets and hagiographa in a different order from that assigned by the Talmudists in the book entitled Baba Bathra.

The following is the Talmudical arrangement of the Old Testament: Of the Prophets, Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings (1 and 2), Jeremiah, Isaiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve minor Prophets (in one book). Of the Hagiographa, Ruth, Psalms, Job, Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon, Lamentations, Esther, Chronicles. By the Masorites, the Prophets are placed in the same order, with the exception of Isaiah, who precedes Jeremiah and Ezekiel, because he flourished before them. This arrangement is adopted in the manuscripts of the Spanish Jews, while the Talmudical order is preserved in those of the German and French Jews. In the Hagiographa the Masorites have departed from the arrangement of the Talmudists, and place the books comprised in that division thus:—Psalms, Job, Proverbs, Ruth, the Song of Solomon, Ecclesiastes, Lamentations of Jeremiah, Esther, Daniel, and Ezra. This mode of arrangement obtains in the Spanish manuscripts. But in the German MSS. they are thus disposed: Psalms, Proverbs, Job, the Five Megilloth (or books), Daniel, Ezra, and Chronicles; and the Five Megilloth (or books) are placed in the order in which they are usually read in their synagogues, viz. the Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations of Jeremiah, Ecclesiastes, and Esther.

There are, however, several manuscripts extant, which depart both from the Talmudical and from the Masoretic order, and have an arrangement peculiar to themselves. Thus, in the Codex Norimbergensis l. (No. 198. of Dr. Kennicott's catalogue), which was written A. D. 1291, the books are thus placed: the Pentateuch, Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, the twelve minor Prophets, Ruth, Esther, Psalms, Job, Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon, Lamentations, Proverbs, Daniel, Ezra, and Nehemiah (in one book), and Chronicles. In the Codex, No. 94., written A. D. 1285 (in the university library at Cambridge), and also in No. 102., a manuscript in the British Museum, written early in the fourteenth century, the books of Chronicles precede the Psalms; Job is placed before the Proverbs; Ruth before the Song of Solomon; and Ecclesiastes before the Lamentations. In the Codex, No. 130., a manuscript of the same date (formerly in the library of the Royal Society of London, but now in the British Museum), Chronicles and Ruth precede the Psalms; and in the Codex, No. 96. (in the library of St. John's College, Cambridge), written towards the close of the fourteenth century, and also in many other MSS., Jeremiah takes precedence of Isaiah. In the Codex Regiomontanus 2. (No. 224.), written early in the twelfth century, Jeremiah is placed before Ezekiel, whose book is followed by that of Isaiah: then succeed the twelve minor Prophets. The Hagiographa are thus disposed: Ruth, Psalms, Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon, Lamentations, Daniel, Esther, Ezra, and Nehemiah (in one book), and the books of Chronicles (also in one book). The order pursued in the Codex Ebnerianus 2. is altogether different from the preceding. Samuel follows Jeremiah, who is succeeded by the two books of Kings, and by part of the prophecy of Ezekiel: then comes part of Isaiah. The twelve minor Prophets are written in one continued discourse; and are followed by Ruth, Psalms, Job, Proverbs with Ecclesiastes and the Song of Solomon, Lamentations, Daniel, Esther, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles.

Of the various Hebrew manuscripts which have been preserved, few contain the Old Testament entire: the greater part comprise only particular portions of it, as the Pentateuch, five Megilloth, and Haphtaroth or sections of the prophets which are read on the Sabbath-days; the Prophets or the Hagiographa. Some, indeed, are confined to single books, as the Psalms, the book of Esther, the Song of Solomon, and the Haphtaroth. This diversity in the contents of manuscripts is occasioned, partly by the design of the copyist, who transcribed the whole or part of the sacred writings for particular purposes; and partly by the mutilations caused by the consuming hand of time. Several instances of such mutilations are given in the account of the principal Hebrew MSS. now extant, in p. 219. infra.

VI. As the Hebrew manuscripts which have been in use since the eleventh century have all been corrected according to some particular recension or edition, they have from this circumstance been classed into FAMILIES, according to the country where such recension has obtained. These Families or Recensions are three or four in number, viz.

1. The SPANISH MANUSCRIPTS, which were corrected after the Codex of Hillel, described in page 203. supra.

They follow the Masoretic system with great accuracy, and are on this account highly valued by the Jews, though some Hebrew critics hold them in little estimation. The characters are written with great elegance, and are perfectly square: the ink is pale; the pages are seldom divided into three columns: the Psalms are divided into hemistichs; and the Chaldee paraphrases are not interlined, but written in separate columns, or are inserted in the margin in smaller letters. Professor Tychsen speaks in high terms of the calligraphy of the Spanish manuscripts. As the Spanish monks excelled in that art, he thinks the Jews, who abounded in Spain in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, acquired it from them, and he appeals to manuscripts which he had seen, where the letters are throughout so equal, that the whole has the appearance of print.¹

2. The ORIENTAL MANUSCRIPTS are nearly the same as the Spanish manuscripts, and may be referred to the same class.

3. The GERMAN MANUSCRIPTS are written with less elegance than the Spanish codices: their characters are more rudely formed; the initial letters are generally larger than the rest, and ornamented; the ink is very black. They do not follow the Masoretic notation, and frequently vary from the Masoretic manuscripts, exhibiting important readings that are not to be found in the Spanish manuscripts, but which agree with the Samaritan text of the Pentateuch, and with the ancient versions. The Chaldee paraphrases are inserted in alternate verses. This class of manuscripts is little esteemed by the Jews, but most highly valued by biblical critics.

4. The ITALIAN MANUSCRIPTS hold a middle place between the Spanish and German codices, and sometimes have a nearer affinity to one class than to the other, both in the shape of the Hebrew characters, and also as it respects their adherence to or neglect of the Masoretic system. M. Bruns, the able assistant of Dr. Kennicott in collating Hebrew manuscripts, has given engraved specimens of the Spanish, German, and Italian manuscripts, in his edition of Dr. K.'s Dissertatio Generalis (8vo. Brunswick, 1783); and Professor Tychsen has given fourteen Hebrew alphabets, of various ages and countries, at the end of his Tentamen de variis Codicum Hebræorum Vet. Test. MSS. Generibus. Ancient and unpointed Hebrew manuscripts, written for the use of the synagogues, and those Masoretic Spanish exemplars, which have been transcribed by a learned person, and for a learned person, from some famous and correct copy, are preferred by M. De Rossi to the copies written for private use, or even for the synagogue, from Masoretic exemplars, of which last the number is very great. But M. Bauer pronounces those manuscripts to be the best, whose various readings are most frequently confirmed by the ancient versions, especially by the Alexandrian and Syriac, and also by the Samaritan Pentateuch and version.²

VII. M. De Rossi has divided Hebrew manuscripts into three classes, viz. 1. More Ancient, or those written before the twelfth century;—2. Ancient, or those written in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries;—3. More recent, or those written at the end of the fourteenth, or at the beginning of the fifteenth century. The most recent, or those written since the fifteenth century, which are very numerous, and are those found in the synagogues, he pronounces to be of little or no use, unless it can be proved that they have been transcribed from ancient apographs. The total number of Hebrew manuscripts collated by Dr. Kennicott for his critical edition of the Hebrew Bible is about six hundred and thirty. The total number collated by M. De Rossi for his Collection of Various Readings, is four hundred and seventy-nine manuscripts, besides two hundred and eighty-eight printed editions. The following are the most ancient manuscripts collated by Dr. Kennicott.

The CODEX LAUDIANUS, A. 172. and 162. and numbered 1. in Dr. Kennicott's list of Hebrew manuscripts. Though now in two folio parts, it is evident that they originally formed only one volume: each part consists of quinquernions, or gatherings of five sheets or ten leaves, and at the bottom of every tenth leaf is a catch-word beginning the next leaf, which is the first of the succeeding gathering of ten leaves. But at the end of the first part or volume, there is pasted on, one leaf of the next quinquernion, completing the book of Deuteronomy; so that this volume concludes with five sheets and one leaf over. And the first gathering in the second volume consists of only four sheets and one leaf, which last is likewise pasted on, for want of its fellow-leaf. This manuscript is written on vellum, according to Dr. Kennicott, in the Spanish character, but in the opinion of Dr. Bruns it is in the Italic character, to which M. De Rossi assents. The letters, which are moderately large, are plain, simple, and elegant, but universally unadorned; and they were originally written without points, as is evident from the different colour of the ink in the letters and in the points. Some of the letters, having become obliterated by the lapse of ages, have been written over a second time; and though such places were re-written in the same strong character, yet many of the words were becoming a second time invisible, when collated by Dr. K. This eminent critic assigns it to the tenth century, but De Rossi refers it to the eleventh. The Laudian manuscript begins with Gen. xxvii. 31.: it contains fourteen thousand variations from Vander Hooght's edition of the Hebrew Bible. More than two thousand are found in the Pentateuch, which confirm the Septuagint Greek version in one hundred and nine various readings; the Syriac, in ninety-eight; the Arabic, in eighty-two; the Vulgate or Latin version, in eighty-eight; and the Chaldee Paraphrase, in forty-two: it also agrees with the Samaritan Pentateuch against the printed Hebrew, in seven hundred instances. What renders this manuscript the more valuable is, that it preserves a word of great importance for understanding 2 Sam. xxiii. 3—7., which word is confirmed by the Greek version, and thus recovers to us a prophecy of the Messiah.³

and learned Reuchlin, whose efforts contributed so much towards the revival of literature in the fifteenth century. This manuscript is now preserved in the public library at Carlsruhe, and is the oldest that has a certain date. It is in square folio, and was written in the year of the world 4866, corresponding with 1106 of our æra. It contains the Prophets with the Targum.

3. The CODÆX VIENNÆ (No. 590, of Kennicott) contains the Prophets and Hagiographa. It is written on vellum in folio, and, if the date in its subscription be correct (A. D. 1018 or 1019), it is more ancient than the preceding. Bruns collected two hundred important various readings from this manuscript. The points have been added by a later hand. According to Adler's enumeration, it consists of four hundred and seventy-one leaves, and two columns, each column containing twenty-one lines.

4. The CODÆX CÆSARÆ, in the Malatesta Library at Bologna, (No. 536, of Kennicott), is a folio manuscript written on vellum, in the German character, towards the end of the eleventh century. It contains the Pentateuch, the Haphtaroth or sections of the Prophetical Books, and the Megilloth or five Books of Canticles, or the Song of Solomon, Ruth, the Lamentations of Jeremiah, Ecclesiastes, and Esther. De Rossi pronounces it to be a most ancient and valuable manuscript, and states that in its margin are inserted some various readings of still more ancient manuscripts.¹

5. The CODÆX FLORENTINUS 2. (No. 162, of Kennicott) is written on vellum, in quarto, in a square Spanish character, with points, towards the end of the eleventh, or, at the latest, in the beginning of the twelfth century. It contains the books of Joshua, Judges, and Samuel. Very many of the letters, which were obliterated by time, have been renewed by a later hand.

6. The CODÆX MEDIOLANENSIS 9. (193, of Kennicott) is written on vellum, in octavo, in the German character, towards the close of the twelfth century. It has neither the points nor the Masora. This manuscript comprises the Pentateuch; the beginning of the book of Genesis, and the end of Leviticus and Deuteronomy, have been written by a later hand. Both erasures and alterations occur in this manuscript, and sometimes a worse reading is substituted in place of one that is preferable. Nevertheless it contains many good various readings.

7. The CODÆX NORIMBERGENSIS 4. (201, of Kennicott) is a folio manuscript, written on thin vellum, in the German character, and containing the Prophets and Hagiographa. It is mutilated in various parts. It is of great antiquity, and, from the similarity of its character to that of the Codex Carlsruhensis, both Dr. Kennicott and M. De Rossi assign it to the beginning of the twelfth century.

8. The CODÆX PARISIENSIS 27. (Regius 29. 210, of Kennicott) is a quarto manuscript of the entire Bible, written on vellum, in an elegant Italic character. The initial words are, with few exceptions, of the same size as the rest. The Masora and Keri are both wanting; and the Megilloth precede the books of Chronicles. It is highly valued by Kennicott and De Rossi, who refer it also to the beginning of the twelfth century.

9. Coeval with the preceding is the CODÆX REGIOMONTANUS 2. (224, of Kennicott), written in the Italic character, in small folio. This manuscript contains the Prophets and the Hagiographa, but it is mutilated in various places. The initial letters are larger than the others, and three of the poetical books are written in hemistichs.

10. To the beginning of the twelfth century likewise is to be referred the CODÆX PARISIENSIS 24. (San-Grmanensis 2, No. 366, of Kennicott): it is written on vellum, in large quarto. It is imperfect from Jer. xxix. 19. to xxxviii. 2.; and from Hosea iv. 4. to Amos vi. 12. Isaiah follows Ezekiel according to the Talmudical Canon.²

The following are among the most ancient of the manuscripts in the possession of the late M. De Rossi, and collated by him, viz.

1. The Codex, by him numbered 634., which is in quarto. It contains a fragment of the books of Leviticus and Numbers—from Levit. xxi. 19. to Num. i. 50.; and exhibits every mark of the remotest antiquity. The vellum on which it is written is decayed by age; the character is intermediate, or Italic—approaching that of the German manuscripts. The letters are all of an uniform size; there is no trace of the Masora, or of any Masoretic notes, nor is any space left before the larger sections; thou hast sometimes, as in other very ancient manuscripts, a few points are inserted between the words. M. De Rossi assigns his manuscript to the eighth century.

2. A manuscript of the Pentateuch (No. 503.), in quarto, and on vellum, containing from Gen. xii. 41. to Deut. xv. 12. It is composed of leaves of various ages, the most ancient of which are of the ninth or tenth century. The character is semi-rabbinical, rude, and confessedly very ancient. Points occur, in some of the more ancient leaves, in the writing of the original copyist, but sometimes they are wanting. There are no traces of the Masora or of the Masoretic notes, and sometimes no space at all before the larger sections. It frequently agrees with the Samaritan text and ancient versions.

3. A manuscript of the Pentateuch (No. 10.), with the Targum and Megilloth. It is written in the German character, on vellum, and in quarto, towards the end of the eleventh or in the beginning of the twelfth century. The Masora is absent. The character, which is defaced by time, is rudely formed, and the initial letters are larger than the rest. Coeval with this manuscript is,

4. A manuscript of the book of Job, in quarto, also on vellum, and in the German character. It is one of the most valuable manuscripts of that book. The pages are divided into two columns, the lines being of unequal length.

5. A manuscript of the Hagiographa (No. 379.), the size, character, and date of which correspond with the preceding. It begins with Psal. xlix. 15. and ends with Neh. xl. 4. The Masora and Keri are absent; and the poetical books are divided into hemistichs.

6. A manuscript of the Pentateuch (No. 611.), on vellum, in octavo, and written in the German character, approaching somewhat to the Spanish, towards the close of the eleventh, or in the commencement of the twelfth century. The ink is frequently faded by age; there are no traces of the Masora; the Keri are very rarely to be seen, and the initial letters are larger than the others. There are frequent omissions in the text, which are supplied in the margin.³

Dr. Kennicott states that almost all the Hebrew manuscripts of the Old Testament, at present known to be extant, were written between the years 1000 and 1457, whence he infers that all the manuscripts written before the years 700 or 800 were destroyed by some decree of the Jewish senate, on account of their many differences from the copies then declared genuine. This circumstance is also alleged by Bishop Walton, as the reason why we have so few exemplars of the age of 600 years, and why even the copies of 700 or 800 years are very rare.

VIII. It was long a desideratum with biblical scholars to obtain the Hebrew Scriptures from the Jews who are settled in India and other parts of the east. It was reasonably supposed, that, as these Jews had been for so many ages separated from their brethren in the west, their manuscripts might contain a text derived from the autographs of the sacred writers, by a channel independent of that through which the text of our printed Bibles has been transmitted to us. Dr. Kennicott was very anxious to obtain a copy, or at least a collation of a manuscript from India or China, for his edition of the Hebrew Bible, in the expectation that it would exhibit important variations from the Masoretic editions; but he was unsuccessful in his endeavours to procure it,⁴ and the honour of first bringing an Indian manuscript of the Hebrew Scriptures into Europe was reserved for the late Rev. Dr. Buchanan.

Among the biblical manuscripts brought from India by this learned and pious divine, and which are now deposited in the public library at Cambridge, there is a roll of the Pentateuch, which he procured from the black Jews in Malabar,⁵ who (there is strong reason to believe) are a part of the remains of the first dispersion of that nation by Nebuchadnezzar. The date of this manuscript cannot now be ascertained; but its text is supposed to be derived from those copies which their ancestors brought with them into India. Those Jews, on being interrogated, could give no precise account of it: some replied, that it came originally from ² According to the information collected from various sources, by Professor Bauer, it does not appear that the manuscripts of the Chinese Jews are of any remote antiquity, or are calculated to afford any assistance to biblical critics. Although Jews have resided in China for many centuries, yet they have no ancient manuscripts, those now in use being subsequent to the fifteenth century. Critica Sacra, pp. 405–407. See an account of Hebræo-Chinese manuscripts in Koegler's Notitia S. S. Bibliorum Judæorum in Imperio Sinesis. Edit. 2. Svo. Hafæ ad Salavum, 1805. Brotier, in his edition of Tacitus (vol. iii. p. 567, et seq.), has given the best account that is extant of the Jews in China, a colony of whom settled in that country in the first century of the Christian æra. The reader will find an abridgement of it in Dr. Townley's Illustrations of Biblical Literature, vol. i. pp. 82–89.

Senna in Arabia; others of them said, it was brought from Cashmir. The Cabul Jews, who travel annually into the interior of China, remarked, that in some synagogues the Law is still found written on a roll of leather; not on vellum, but on a soft flexible leather, made of goat-skins, and dyed red. It is evident that the Jews, in the time of Moses, had the art of preparing and dyeing skins; for rams' skins, dyed red, made a part of the covering for the tabernacle (Exod. xxvi. 14.); and it is not improbable, that the very autograph of the Law, written by the hand of Moses, was written on skins so prepared. The ancient rules prescribed to the Jewish scribes direct, that the Law be so written, provided it be done on the skins of clean animals, such as sheep, goat, or calf-skins: therefore this MS., and many others in the hands of the Jews, agree in the same as an ancient practice. The Cabul Jews, above noticed, show that copies of the Law, written on leather skins, are to be found among their people in India and China; and hence we have no doubt, that such are copies of very ancient MSS.* The Cambridge roll, or Indian copy of the Pentateuch, which may also be denominated Malabaric, is written on a roll of goat-skins dyed red, and was discovered by Dr. Buchanan in the record-chest of a synagogue of the black Jews, in the interior of Malayala, in the year 1806. It measures forty-eight feet in length, and in breadth about twenty-two inches, or a Jewish cubit. The book of Leviticus and the greater part of the book of Deuteronomy are wanting. It appears, from calculation, that the original length of the roll was not less than ninety English feet. In its present condition it consists of thirty-seven skins; contains one hundred and seventeen columns of writing perfectly clear and legible; and exhibits (as the subjoined fac-simile of Deut. iv. 1, 2. will show) a noble specimen of the manner and form of the most ancient Hebrew manuscripts among the Jews

The columns are a palm of four inches in breadth, and contain from forty to fifty lines each, which are written without vowel points, and in all other respects according to the rules prescribed to the Jewish scribes or copyists. As some of the skins appear more decayed than others, and the text is evidently not all written by the same hand, Mr. Yeates (from whose collation of this MS. the present account is abridged, and to whom the author is indebted for the preceding fac-simile) is of opinion, that the roll itself comprises the fragments of at least three different rolls, of one common material, viz. dyed goat-skin, and exhibits three different specimens of writing. The old skins have been strengthened by patches of parchment on the back; and in one place four words have been renewed by the same supply. The text is written in the square character, and without the vowel points and accents; and the margin of the columns is every where plain, and free from writing of any sort. He has diligently examined and collated this manuscript with the printed text of Vander Hooght's edition of the Hebrew Bible; and the result of his investigation is, that the amount of variations in the whole does not exceed forty, and that none of them are found to differ from the common reading as to the sense and interpretation of the text, but are merely additions or omissions of a jod or vau letter, expressing such words to be full or deficient, according to the known usage of the Hebrew tongue. But even this small number of readings was considerably reduced, when compared with the text or Athias's edition, printed at Amsterdam in 1661; so that the integrity of the Hebrew text is confirmed by this valuable manuscript so far as it goes, and its testimony on this account is unquestionably important.²

"With respect to the several sorts of skins and handwriting, the answer of some Indian Jews, when interrogated concerning this MS., is worthy of remark. By one account, it was brought from Senna in Arabia; and by another account, it came from Cashmir: which two accounts are cleared up on an examination of the MS., since part of it being composed of brown skins, and the writing very similar to that seen in rolls of Arabian and African extraction, there is a possibility that such part is the fragment of an Arabian or African MS., as those Jews relate: and the other account, viz. that it was brought from Cashmir, may also be equally true; since that part consisting of red skins so well corresponds with their own description of copies found in the synagogues of the eastern Jews. The consideration of this point attaches still greater consequences to the roll itself, which, as it is found to consist of fragments of copies purely oriental, and seemingly unconnected with the Western Jewish copies, we may now conclude the same to be ample specimens of copies in those parts of the world. It is true, indeed, that a great part of the text is wanting, and the whole book of Leviticus; yet, notwithstanding the large deficiencies of the MS., it ought to be a satisfaction to know, that herein are ample specimens of at least three ancient copies of the Pentateuch, whose testimony is found to unite in the integrity and pure conservation of the sacred text, acknowledged by Christians and Jews in these parts of the world."³

The following testimony of Bishop Marsh to the value of the Codex Malabaricus is too valuable to be omitted:—"A manuscript roll of the Hebrew Pentateuch, apparently of some antiquity, and found among the black Jews in the interior of India, must be regarded at least as a literary curiosity, deserving the attention of the learned in general. And as this manuscript appears, on comparison, to have no important deviation from our common printed Hebrew text, it is of still greater value to a theologian, as it affords an additional argument for the integrity of the Pentateuch. The Hebrew manuscripts of the Pentateuch, preserved in the West of Europe, though equally derived, with the Hebrew manuscripts preserved in India, from the autograph of Moses, must have descended from it through very different channels; and therefore the close agreement of the former with the latter is a proof, that they have preserved the original text in great purity, since the circumstances, under which the MS. was found, forbid the explanation of that agreement on the principle of any immediate connection. It is true that, as this manuscript (or rather the three fragments of which this manuscript is composed) was probably written

* Dr. Kennicott quotes from Wolfius, that a certain Jew, named Moses Pereyra, affirmed, he had found MS. copies of the Hebrew text in Malabar; for that the Jews, having escaped from Titus, betook themselves through Persia to the Malabar coast, and arrived there safe in number about eighty persons. Whence Wolfius concludes, that great fidelity is to be attached to the Malabar MSS. The Buchanan MS. may fairly be denominated a Malabar copy, as having been brought from those parts. "Referat Moses Pereyra, se invenisse Manuscripta Exemplaria (Hebraei Textus) Malabarica. Tradit Judaeos, a Tito fugientes, per Persiam se ad oras Malabaricas contulisse, ibique cum octoginta animis salvos advenisse. Unde constat, MSis Malabaricis multum fidei tribuendum esse." much later than the time when the Masoretic text was established by the learned Jews of Tiberias, it may have been wholly derived from the Masoretic text; and in this case it would afford only an argument, that the Masoretic text had preserved its integrity, and would not affect the question, whether the Masoretic text itself were an accurate representative of the Mosaic autograph. But, on the other hand, as the very peculiar circumstances under which the manuscript was found render it at least possible that the influence of the Masora, which was extended to the African and European Hebrew manuscripts by the settlement of the most distinguished Oriental Jews in Africa and Spain, never reached the mountainous district in the south of India; as it is possible that the text of the manuscript in question was derived from manuscripts anterior to the establishment of the Masora, manuscripts even which might have regulated the learned Jews of Tiberias in the formation of their own text, the manuscript appears for these reasons to merit particular attention.¹ Professor Lee, however, states that Bishop Marsh is mistaken in his judgment of this manuscript, which Mr. L. pronounces to be an European Masoretic roll, the errors in which show that it was written by an ignorant scribe, so that its text is of little value.²

IX. Seventeen manuscripts of the SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH are known to be extant, of which Dr. Kennicott has given a minute description. Six of these manuscripts are in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, and one in the Cotton Library in the British Museum: concerning a few of the most valuable of these, the following particulars may not be unacceptable. They are numbered according to Dr. Kennicott's notation.

1. Cod. 127. is preserved in the British Museum. (Bibl. Cotton. Claudius, B. 8.) It is one of the six MSS. procured by Archbishop Usher, by whom it was presented to Sir Robert Cotton. This very valuable manuscript is complete, and was transcribed entirely by one hand, on two hundred and fifty-four pages of vellum. It is in an excellent state of preservation, a leaf of fine paper having been carefully placed between every two leaves of the vellum. This MS. was written A. D. 1362.

2. Cod. 62. is preserved in the Bodleian Library at Oxford; and was also purchased by Archbishop Usher, from whose heirs the curators of that library bought it, with many other MSS. This manuscript is in large quarto, and contains an Arabic version in Samaritan letters, placed in a column parallel to the Samaritan text. Unhappily there are many chasms in it. Dr. Kennicott attributes a high value to this manuscript, which was written about the middle of the thirteenth century.

Cod. 197. is a most valuable manuscript in the Ambrosian Library at Milan, which was collated for Dr. Kennicott by Dr. Branca, who is of opinion that it is certainly not later than the tenth century. It is imperfect in many places; and is very beautifully written on extremely thin vellum, in red characters.

Cod. 363. (No. 1. of the MSS. in the Library of the Oratory at Paris) is the celebrated manuscript bought by Pietro della Valle of the Samaritans, in 1616, and printed by Morinus in 1631-33. It is written throughout by one hand; and though no date is assigned to it, Dr. Kennicott thinks it was written towards the close of the eleventh century. It was collated for Dr. Kennicott by Dr. Bruns, in some select passages.³

SECTION II.

ON THE MANUSCRIPTS OF THE GREEK SCRIPTURES.

§ I. GENERAL OBSERVATIONS ON GREEK MANUSCRIPTS.

1. On what materials written.—II. Form of letters.—III. Abbreviations.—IV. Codices Palimpsesti or Rescripti.

I. THE Greek manuscripts, which have descended to our time, are written either on vellum or on paper; and their external form and condition vary, like the manuscripts of other ancient authors. The vellum is either purple-coloured or of its natural hue, and is either thick or thin. Manuscripts on very thin vellum were always held in the highest esteem. The paper also is either made of cotton, or the common sort manufactured from linen, and is either glazed, or laid (as it is technically termed), that is, of the ordinary roughness. Not more than six manuscript fragments on purple vellum are known to be extant: they are described in the following sections of this chapter. The Codex Claromontanus, of which a brief notice is also given in a subsequent page, is written on very thin vellum. All manuscripts on paper are of a much later date; those on cotton paper being posterior to the ninth century, and those on linen subsequent to the twelfth century; and if the paper be of a very ordinary quality, Wetstein pronounces them to have been written in Italy, in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries.

II. The letters are either capital (which in the time of Jerome were called uncial, i. e. initial) or cursive, i. e. small; the capital letters, again, are of two kinds, either unadorned and simple, and made with straight thin strokes, or thicker, uneven, and angular. Some of them are supported in a sort of base, while others are decorated, or rather burdened, with various tops. As letters of the first kind are generally seen on ancient Greek monuments, while those of the last resemble the paintings of semi-barbarous times, manuscripts written with the former are generally supposed to be as old as the fifth century, and those written with the latter are supposed to be posterior to the ninth century. Greek manuscripts were usually written in capital letters till the seventh century, and mostly without any divisions of words; and capitals were in general use until the eighth century, and some even so late as the ninth: but there is a striking difference in the forms of the letters after the seventh century. Great alterations took place in the eighth, ninth, and tenth centuries: the Greek letters in the manuscripts copied by the Latins in the ninth century are by no means regular; the α , ϵ , and γ , being inflected like the a , e , and y , of the Latin alphabet. Towards the close of the tenth century, small or cursive letters were generally adopted; and Greek manuscripts written in and since the eleventh century are in small letters, and greatly resemble each other, though some few exceptions occur to the contrary. Flourished letters rarely occur in Greek manuscripts of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries.⁴ The fac-similes of the Alexandrian and other manuscripts, given in the subsequent pages of this work, will furnish the reader with a tolerably correct idea of the various styles of Greek writing which obtained at different periods between the sixth and the fourteenth centuries.

The most ancient manuscripts are written without accents, spirits, or any separation of the words; nor was it until after the ninth century that the copyists began to leave spaces between the words. Michaelis, after Wetstein, ascribes the insertion of accents to Euthalius, bishop of Sulca in Egypt, A. D. 458.⁵

III. Nearly the same mode of spelling obtains in ancient manuscripts which prevails in Greek printed books; but, even in the earliest manuscripts, we meet with some words that are abbreviated by putting the first and last letters, and sometimes also the middle letter, for an entire word, and drawing a line over the top: thus $\Theta\epsilon\varsigma$, KC , IC , XC , ΤΣ , ΣHP , IHA , or $\text{I}\Sigma\text{H}\text{A}$, $\text{I}\text{I}\text{N}\text{A}$, $\text{I}\text{H}\text{HP}$, MHP , $\text{OYNO}\Sigma$, $\text{ANO}\Sigma$, IAHM , ΔAD , respectively denote $\Theta\epsilon\varsigma$ God, Κυριος Lord, Ιησους Jesus, Χριστος Christ, Υιος a son, $\Sigma\alpha\text{υ}\alpha\text{το}\rho$ Saviour, Ισραηλ Israel, Πνευμα spirit, Πατηρ father, Μητηρ mother, Ουρανος heaven, Ανδρας man, Ιερουσαλημ Jerusalem, $\Delta\alpha\text{υ}\iota\delta$ David.⁶ At the beginning of a new book, which always commences at the top of a page, the first three, four, or five lines are frequently written in vermilion; and, with the exception of the Alexandrian and Vatican manuscripts, all the most ancient codices now extant have the Eusebian $\kappa\alpha\text{τα}\lambda\iota\alpha\iota$ and $\tau\iota\tau\iota\lambda\iota$, of which we have given an account in page 214. supra.

Very few manuscripts contain the whole either of the Old or of the New Testament. By far the greater part have only the four Gospels, because they were most frequently read in the churches; others comprise only the Acts of the Apostles and the Catholic Epistles; others, again, have the Acts, and St. Paul's Epistles; but a few contain the Apocalypse in connection with other books, and fewer still contain it alone, as this book was seldom read in the churches. Almost all of them, especially the more ancient manuscripts, are imperfect, either from the injuries of time, or from neglect.¹ The books of the New Testament are not always disposed in the same order. Thus, in some of the few manuscripts which contain the whole of the New Testament, we find the several books arranged in the following order:—the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, the Acts of the Apostles, the Catholic Epistles, Apocalypse, and the Epistles of Paul. In others, however, the Gospel of John is placed either immediately after that of Matthew, and is followed by Luke and Mark, or it is placed first, and is succeeded by Matthew, Mark, and Luke. In some, the Acts of the Apostles are followed by the Pauline Epistles, the Catholic Epistles, and the Apocalypse. The Epistle to the Hebrews for the most part follows the Epistle to Philemon; but in many manuscripts it precedes the Epistles written to Timothy, Titus, and Philemon.²

All manuscripts, the most ancient not excepted, have erasures and corrections; which, however, were not always effected so dexterously, but that the original writing may sometimes be seen. Where these alterations have been made by the copyist of the manuscript (à primâ manu, as it is termed), they are preferable to those made by later hands, or à secundâ manu. These erasures were sometimes made by drawing a line through the word, or, what is tenfold worse, by the penknife. But, besides these modes of obliteration, the copyist frequently blotted out the old writing with a sponge, and wrote other words in lieu of it: nor was this practice confined to a single letter or word, as may be seen in the Codex Bezae.³ Authentic instances are on record, in which whole books have been thus obliterated, and other writing has been substituted in the place of the manuscript so blotted out; but where the writing was already faded through age, they preserved their transcriptions without further erasure.

IV. These manuscripts are termed Codices Palimpsesti or Rescripti. Before the invention of paper, the great scarcity of parchment in different places induced many persons to obliterate the works of ancient writers, in order to transcribe their own, or those of some other favourite author in their place: hence, doubtless, the works of many eminent writers have perished, and particularly those of the greatest antiquity; for such, as were comparatively recent, were transcribed, to satisfy the immediate demand; while those, which were already dim with age, were erased.⁴ It was for a long time thought, that this destructive practice was confined to the eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth centuries, and that it chiefly prevailed among the Greeks: it must, in fact, be considered as the consequence of the barbarism which overspread those dark ages of ignorance; but this destructive operation was likewise practised by the Latins, and is also of a more remote date than has usually been supposed.

In general, a Codex Rescriptus is easily known, as it rarely happens that the former writing is so completely erased, as not to exhibit some traces: in a few instances, both writings are legible. Many such manuscripts are preserved in the library of the British Museum. Montfaucon found a manuscript in the Colbert Library, which had been written about the eighth century, and originally contained the works ascribed to St. Dionysius: new matter had been written over it, three or four centuries afterwards, and both continued legible.⁵ Muratori saw in the Ambrosian library a manuscript comprising the works of the venerable Bode, the writing of which was from eight to nine hundred years old, and which had been substituted for another upwards of a thousand years old. Notwithstanding the efforts which had been made to erase the latter, some phrases could be deciphered, which indicated it to be an ancient pontifical.⁶ The indefatigable researches of signor Angelo Mai (for some time the principal keeper of the Vatican library at Rome) have discovered several valuable remains of biblical and classical literature in the Ambrosian library at Milan; and a short account of some of the principal Codices Rescripti of the New Testament, or of parts thereof, will be found in the sequel of this section.

§ 2. ACCOUNT OF GREEK MANUSCRIPTS, CONTAINING THE OLD AND NEW TESTAMENTS.

I. The Alexandrian Manuscript.—II. The Vatican Manuscript.

OF the few manuscripts known to be extant, which contain the Greek Scriptures (that is, the Old Testament, according to the Septuagint version, and the New Testament), there are two which pre-eminently demand the attention of the biblical student for their antiquity and intrinsic value, viz. The Alexandrian manuscript, which is preserved in the British Museum, and the Vatican manuscript, deposited in the library of the Vatican Palace at Rome.

I. THE CODEX ALEXANDRINUS, or Alexandrian Manuscript, which is noted by the letter A. in Wetstein's, Griesbach's, and Scholz's critical editions of the New Testament, consists of four folio volumes; the three first contain the whole of the Old Testament, together with the apocryphal books, and the fourth comprises the New Testament, the first epistle of Clement to the Corinthians, and the apocryphal Psalms ascribed to Solomon. In the New Testament there is wanting the beginning as far as Matt. xxv. 6. εως οραμας ερχεται; likewise from John vi. 50. to viii. 52. and from 2 Cor. iv. 13. to xii. 7. The Psalms are preceded by the epistle of Athanasius to Marcellinus, and followed by a catalogue containing those which are to be used in prayer for each hour, both of the day and of the night; also by fourteen hymns, partly apocryphal, partly biblical, the eleventh of which is the hymn of the Virgin Mary, usually termed the Magnificat (Luke i. 46—55.), and here entitled παιδωνχη Μαρίας της Θεοκυ, or, the prayer of Mary the mother of God: the arguments of Eusebius are annexed to the Psalms, and his canons to the Gospels. This manuscript is now preserved in the British Museum, where it was deposited in 1753. It was sent as a present to King Charles I. from Cyrillus Lucaris, a native of Crete, and patriarch of Constantinople, by Sir Thomas Rowe, ambassador from England to the Grand Seigneur, in the year 1628. Cyrillus brought it with him from Alexandria, where, probably, it was written. In a schedule annexed to it, he gives this account; that it was written, according to tradition, by Thecla, a noble Egyptian lady, about thirteen hundred years ago, a little after the council of Nice. He adds, that the name of Thecla, at the end of the book, was erased; but that this was the case with other books of the Christians, after Christianity was extinguished in Egypt by the Mohammedans: and that recent tradition records the fact of the laceration and erasure of Thecla's name. The proprietor of this manuscript, before it came into the hands of Cyrillus Lucaris, had written an Arabic subscription, expressing that this book was said to have been written with the pen of Thecla the Martyr.

Various disputes have arisen with regard to the place whence it was brought, and where it was written, to its antiquity, and of course to its real value. Some critics have bestowed upon it the highest commendation, whilst it has been equally depreciated by others. Of its most strenuous adversaries, Wetstein seems to have been the principal. The place from which it was sent to England was, without doubt, Alexandria, and hence it has been called the Codex Alexandrinus. As to the place where it was written, there is a considerable difference of opinion. Matthæus Mutis, who was a contemporary, friend, and deacon of Cyrillus, and who afterwards instructed in the Greek language John Rudolph Wetstein, uncle of the celebrated editor of the Greek Testament, bears testimony, in a letter written to Martin Bogdan, a physician in Berne, dated January 14, 1664, that it had been brought from one of the twenty-two monasteries in Mount Athos, which the Turks never destroyed, but allowed to continue upon the payment of tribute. Dr. Woide endeavours to weaken the evidence of Mutis, and to render the testimony of the elder Wetstein suspicious: but Spohn:

² The Codex Cottonianus, for instance, when perfect, contained only the Book of Genesis; the Codex Cæsareus contains only part of the same book, together with a fragment of the Gospel of St. Luke; the Alexandrian manuscript wants the first twenty-four chapters of St. Matthew's Gospel; and the Codex Bezae contains only the four Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles.

shows that the objections of Woide are ungrounded. Allowing their reality, we cannot infer that Cyrillus found this manuscript in Alexandria. Before he went to Alexandria he spent some time on Mount Athos, the repository and manufactory of manuscripts of the New Testament, whence a great number have been brought into the west of Europe, and a still greater number has been sent to Moscow. It is therefore probable, independently of the evidence of Mutis, that Cyrillus procured it there either by purchase or by present, took it with him to Alexandria, and brought it thence on his return to Constantinople. But the question recurs, where was this copy written? The Arabic subscription above cited clearly proves, that it had been in Egypt at some period or other, before it fell into the hands of Cyrillus. This subscription shows that it once belonged to an Egyptian, or that during some time it was preserved in Egypt, where Arabic has been spoken since the seventh century. Besides it is well known that a great number of manuscripts of the Greek Bible have been written in Egypt. Woide has also pointed out a remarkable coincidence between the Codex Alexandrinus and the writings of the Copts. Michaelis alleges another circumstance as a probable argument of its having been written in Egypt. In Ezekiel xxvii. 18, both in the Hebrew and Greek text, the Tyrians are said to have fetched their wine from Chelbon, or, according to Bochart, Chalybon. But as Chalybon, though celebrated for its wine, was unknown to the writer of this manuscript, he has altered it by a fanciful conjecture to οὐκ ἐκ χελβαν, wine from Hebron. This alteration was probably made by an Egyptian copyist, because Egypt was formerly supplied with wine from Hebron. The subscription before mentioned ascribes the writing of it to Thecla, an Egyptian lady of high rank, who could not have been, as Michaelis supposes, the martyress Thecla, placed in the time of St. Paul; but Woide replies, that a distinction must be made between Thecla martyr, and Thecla proto-martyr. With regard to these subscriptions we may observe, with Bishop Marsh, that the true state of the case appears to be as follows:—"Some centuries after the Codex Alexandrinus had been written, and the Greek subscriptions, and perhaps those other parts where it is more defective, already lost, it fell into the hands of a Christian inhabitant of Egypt, who, not finding the usual Greek subscription of the copyist, added in Arabic, his native language, the tradition, either true or false, which had been preserved in the family or families to which the manuscript had belonged, 'Memorant hunc codicem scriptum esse calamo Theclæ martyris.' In the 17th century, when oral tradition respecting this manuscript had probably ceased, it became the property of Cyrillus Lucaris: but whether in Alexandria, or Mount Athos, is of no importance to the present inquiry. On examining the manuscript, he finds that the Greek subscription is lost, but that there is a tradition recorded in Arabic by a former proprietor, which simply related that it was written by one Thecla, a martyress, which is what he means by 'memoria et traditio recens.' Taking therefor upon trust, that one Thecla a martyress was really the copyist, he consults the annals of the church to discover in what age and country a person of this name and character existed; finds that an Egyptian lady of rank, called Thecla, suffered martyrdom between the time of holding the council of Nicea and the close of the fourth century; and concludes, without further ceremony, that she was the very identical copyist. Not satisfied with this discovery, he attempts to account for the loss of the Greek subscription, and ascribes it to the malice of the Saracens; being weak enough to believe that the enemies of Christianity would exert their vengeance on the name of a poor transcriber, and leave the four folio volumes themselves unhurt." Dr. Woide, who transcribed and published this manuscript, and must be better acquainted with it than any other person, asserts, that it was written by two different copyists; for he observed a difference in the ink, and, which is of greater moment, even in the strokes of the letters. The conjecture of Oudin, adopted by Wetstein, that the manuscript was written by an Acœmetis, in the judgment of Michaelis, worthy of attention; and he adds, that this conjecture does not contradict the account that Thecla was the copyist, since there were not only monks but nuns of this order. Mr. Baber, in the prolegomena to his fac-simile edition of the Old Testament from this manuscript, accedes to the opinion of Wetstein, that it was written, not for an individual, but for some church or monastery.²

The antiquity of this manuscript has also been the subject of controversy. Grabe and Schulze think that it might have been written before the end of the fourth century, which, says Michaelis, is the very utmost period that can be allowed, because it contains the epistles of Athanasius. Oudin places it in the tenth century. Wetstein refers it to the fifth, and supposes that it was one of the manuscripts collected at Alexandria in 615, for the Syriac version. Dr. Semler refers it to the seventh century. Montfaucon³ is of opinion, that neither the Codex Alexandrinus, nor any Greek manuscript, can be said with great probability to be much prior to the sixth century. Michaelis apprehends, that this manuscript was written after Arabic was become the native language of the Egyptians, that is, one or rather two centuries after Alexandria was taken by the Saracens, which happened in the year 640, because the transcriber frequently confounds M and B, which is often done in the Arabic; and he concludes, that it is not more ancient than the eighth century. Woide, after a great display of learning, with which he examines the evidence for the antiquity of the Codex Alexandrinus, concludes, that it was written between the middle and the end of the fourth century. It cannot be allowed a greater antiquity, because it has not only the παρα or κεφαλαια majora, but the κεφαλαια minora, or Anthonian sections, accompanied with the references to the Canons of Eusebius. Woide's arguments have been objected to by Spohn.⁴ Some of the principal arguments advanced by those who refer this manuscript to the fourth or fifth centuries, are the following: the epistles of Saint Paul are not divided into chapters like the gospels, though this division took place so early as 396, when to each chapter was prefixed a superscription. The Codex Alexandrinus has the epistles of Clement of Rome; but these were forbidden to be read in the churches, by the council of Laodicea, in 364, and that of Carthage, in 419. Hence Schulze has inferred, that it was written before the year 364; and he produces a new argument for its antiquity, deduced from the last of the fourteen hymns found in it after the psalms, which is superscribed ᾠδὴ δόξης, and is called the grand doxology; for this hymn has not the clause ᾠδὴ εἰς δόξην, ᾠδὴ ἱσχυρῆς, ᾠδὴ ἀθανάτου, ᾠδὴ ἡμῶν, which was used between the years 434 and 446; and therefore the manuscript must have been written before this time. Wetstein thinks that it must have been written before the time of Jerome, because the Greek text of this manuscript was altered from the old Italic. He adds, that the transcriber was ignorant that the Arabs were called Hagarenes, because he has written (1 Chron. v. 20.) αἱ αἰγυπτιαὶ for αἱ αἰγυπτιαὶ. Others allege that αἱ αἰγυπτιαὶ is a mere erratum: because αἱ αἰγυπτιαὶ occurs in the preceding verse. Αἱ αἰγυπτιαὶ in 1 Chron. xxvii. 31, and αἱ αἰγυπτιαὶ in Psal. lxxxii. 7. These arguments, says Michaelis, afford no certainty, because the Codex Alexandrinus must have been copied from a still more ancient manuscript: and if this were faithfully copied, the arguments apply rather to this than to the Alexandrian manuscript itself. It is the handwriting alone, or the formation of the letters, with the want of accents, which can lead to any probable decision. The arguments alleged to prove that it is not so ancient as the fourth century, are the following. Dr. Semler thinks, that the epistle of Athanasius, on the value and excellency of the Psalms, would hardly have been prefixed to them during his life. But it ought to be recollected, that Athanasius had many warm and strenuous advocates. From this epistle Oudin has attempted to deduce an argument, that the manuscript was written in the tenth century. This epistle, he says, is spurious, and could not have been forged during the life of Athanasius, and the tenth century was fertile in spurious productions. Again, the Virgin Mary, in the superscription of the Song of the Blessed Virgin, is styled θεοτοκος, a name which Wetstein says betrays the fifth century. Further, from the probable conjecture, that this manuscript was written by one of the order of the Acœmetæ, Oudin concludes against its antiquity; but Wetstein contents himself with asserting, that it could not have been written before the fifth century, because Alexander, who founded this order, lived about the year 420. From this statement, pursued more at large, Michaelis deduces a reason for paying less regard to the Codex Alexandrinus than many eminent

¹ The Acœmetæ were a class of monks in the ancient church, who flourished, particularly in the East, during the fifth century. They were so called, because they had divine service performed, without interruption, in their churches. They divided themselves into three bodies, each of which officiated in turn, and relieved the others, so that their churches were never silent, either night or day. Wetstein adopts the opinion of Casteln: Oudin, that the Codex Alexandrinus was written by an Acœmet, because it contains a catalogue of the psalms that were to be sung at every hour both of the day and night. critics have done, and for the preference that is due, in many respects, to ancient versions, before any single manuscript, because the antiquity of the former, which is in general greater than that of the latter, can be determined with more precision. Dietelmaier, who has more recently investigated this question, is of opinion that this manuscript was written towards the close of the fourth, or early in the fifth century: and this, which is the most probable opinion, is adopted by Mr. Baber.²

The value of the Alexandrian manuscript has been differently appreciated by different writers. Wetstein is no great admirer of it, nor does Michaelis estimate it highly, either on account of its internal excellence or the value of its readings. The principal charge which has been produced against the Alexandrian manuscript, and which has been strongly urged by Wetstein, is its having been altered from the Latin version. It is incredible, says Michaelis, who once agreed in opinion with Wetstein, but found occasion to alter his sentiments, that a transcriber who lived in Egypt, should have altered the Greek text from a Latin version, because Egypt belonged to the Greek diocese, and Latin was not understood there. On this subject Woide has eminently displayed his critical abilities, and ably defended the Greek manuscripts in general, and the Codex Alexandrinus in particular, from the charge of having been corrupted from the Latin. Griesbach concurs with Woide,³ and both have contributed to confirm Michaelis in his new opinion. If this manuscript has been corrupted from a version, it is more reasonable to suspect the Coptic, the version of the country in which it was written. Between this manuscript and both the Coptic and Syriac versions, there is a remarkable coincidence. Griesbach has observed, that this manuscript follows three different editions: the Byzantine in the Gospels, the Western edition in the Acts of the Apostles, and the Catholic epistles, which form the middle division of this manuscript, and the Alexandrine in the epistles of Saint Paul. The transcriber, if this assertion be true, must have copied the three parts of the Greek Testament from three different manuscripts of three different editions. It is observable, that the readings of the Codex Alexandrinus coincide very frequently not only with the Coptic and the old Syriac, but with the new Syriac and the Ethiopic; and this circumstance favours the hypothesis, that this manuscript was written in Egypt, because the new Syriac version having been collated with Egyptian manuscripts of the Greek Testament, and the Ethiopic version being taken immediately from them, have necessarily the readings of the Alexandrine edition.

The Alexandrian manuscript is written in uncial or capital letters, without any accents or marks of aspiration, but with a few abbreviations nearly similar to those already noticed,⁴ and also with some others which are described by Dr. Woide,⁵ who has likewise explained the various points and spaces occurring in this manuscript.

A fac-simile of the Codex Alexandrinus, containing the New Testament, was published at London in 1786, in folio, by the late Dr. Woide, assistant librarian of the British Museum, with types cast for the purpose, line for line, without intervals between the words, precisely as in the original. The following specimen will convey to the reader an idea of this most precious manuscript.

For this stereotype specimen we are indebted to the Rev. H. H. Baber, one of the librarians of the British Museum, who kindly favoured us with the use of the Alexandrian types, with which he printed a fac-simile edition of the Old Testament from the Codex Alexandrinus at London, 1816—23, in four volumes folio.⁶ For the gratification of the English reader, the following extract is subjoined, comprising the first seven verses of Saint John's Gospel, rendered rather more literally than the idiom of our language will admit, in order to convey an exact idea of the original Greek (above given) of the Alexandrian manuscript.

See also Michaelis's Introduction to the New Testament, vol. ii. part i. pp. 186—209, and Bishop Marsh's notes in part ii. pp. 649—660, and Hug's Introduction to the New Test. vol. i. pp. 269—273. Dr. Lardner has given the table of contents of this manuscript in his Credibility of the Gospel History, part ii. chap. 147. (Works, 8vo. vol. v. pp. 253—256; 4to. vol. iv. pp. 44—46.)

Septuagint, printed in 1590, professes to exhibit the text of this manuscript; and in the preface to that edition it is stated to have been written before the year 387, i. e. towards the close of the fourth century: Montfaucou and Blanchini refer it to the fifth or sixth century, and Dupin to the seventh century. Professor Hug has endeavoured to show that it was written in the early part of the fourth century; but from the omission of the Eusebian κεφαλαια and τιτλοι, Bishop Marsh concludes with great probability that it was written before the close of the fifth century. The Vatican manuscript is written on parchment or vellum, in uncial or capital letters, in three columns on each page, all of which are of the same size, except at the beginning of a book, and without any divisions of chapters, verses, or words, but with accents and spiritus. The shape of the letters, and colour of the ink, prove that it was written throughout by one and the same careful copyist. The abbreviations are few, being confined chiefly to those words which are in general abbreviated, such as Θς, Κς, Ις, Χς, for Θεος, Κυριος, Ιησους, Χριστος, God, Lord, Jesus, Christ. Originally this manuscript contained the entire Greek Bible, including both the Old and New Testaments; in which respect it resembles none so much as the Codex Alexandrinus, though no two manuscripts vary more in their readings. The Old Testament wants the first forty-six chapters of Genesis, and thirty-two psalms, viz. from Psal. cv. to cxxxvii. inclusive; and the New Testament wants the latter part of the epistle to the Hebrews, viz. all after chapter ix. verse 14., and also Saint Paul's other epistles to Timothy, Titus, and Philemon, and the whole Book of Revelation. It appears, however, that this last book, as well as the latter part of the epistle to the Hebrews, has been supplied by a modern hand in the fifteenth century, and, it is said, from some manuscript that had formerly belonged to Cardinal Bessarion. In many places the faded letters have also been retouched by a modern but careful hand: and when the person who made these amendments (whom Michaelis pronounces to have been a man of learning) found various readings in other manuscripts, he has introduced them into the Codex Vaticanus, but has still preserved the original text; and in some few instances he has ventured to erase with a penknife. Various defects, both in orthography and language, indicate that this manuscript was executed by an Egyptian copyist. Instead of σολομων, &c. he has written σολομων, αλημωβι, αλημωβιτι, which occurs only in Coptic or Græco-coptic MSS. He has also written εβαν for εβαν, as may be seen in the celebrated Rosetta inscription; εβαν, εβαν, εβαν, εβαν, and εβαν, as in the inscription of the Theban Memnon; and εβαν and εβαν, as the Alexandrians wrote, according to the testimony of Sextus Empiricus. These peculiarities show that the Codex Vaticanus exhibits the Egyptian text, subsequent to the third century, according to the Alexandrine Recension of Griesbach, though it exhibits many additions (in the Gospel of Saint Matthew for instance) which are not found in other manuscripts of this recension.

It has been supposed that this manuscript was collated by the editors of the Complutensian Polyglott, and even that this edition was almost entirely taken from it; but Bishop Marsh has shown by actual comparison that this was not the case.

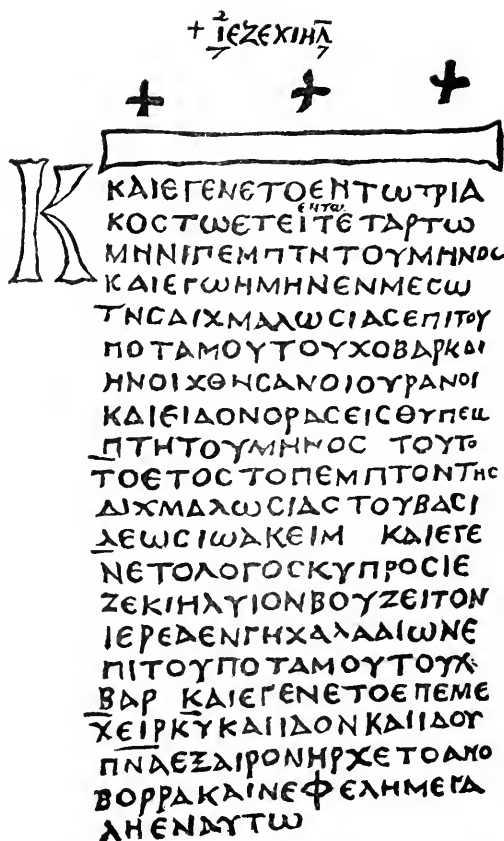

Dr. Scholz made use of the collection of Julius de St. Anastasia, which was executed before the year 1669, and which is now preserved in the royal library at Paris.¹

The Vatican manuscript has been repeatedly collated by various eminent critics, from whose extracts Wetstein collected numerous various readings; but the latest and best collation is that by Professor Birch, of Copenhagen, in 1781. Although the antiquity of the Vatican manuscript is indisputable, it is by no means easy to determine between its comparative value and that of the Alexandrian manuscript; nor is there any absolute and universal standard by which their several excellencies may be estimated. With regard to the Old Testament, if any Greek manuscript were now extant, containing an exact copy of the several books as they were originally translated, such manuscript would be perfect, and, consequently, the most valuable. The nearer any copy comes to this perfection, the more valuable it must be, and vice versa. In its present state the Hebrew text cannot determine fully the value of these MSS. in their relation to one another: and yet, as that text receives great assistance from both, it proves that both deserve our highest regard. It is worthy of remark, that neither of them has the asterisks of Origen, though both of them were transcribed in the fifth century; which, Dr. Kennicott observes,² is no proof that they were not taken either mediately or immediately from the Hexapla. The Vatican and Alexandrian manuscripts differ from each other in the Old Testament chiefly in this;—that, as they contain books, which have been corrected by different persons, upon different principles; and as they differ greatly in some places in their interpolations,—so they contain many words which were either derived from different Greek versions, or else were translated by one or both of the transcribers themselves from the Hebrew text, which was consulted by them at the time of transcribing.

On the ground of its internal excellence, Michaelis preferred the Vatican manuscript (for the New Testament) to the Codex Alexandrinus. If, however, that manuscript be most respectable which comes the nearest to Origen's Hexaplar copy of the Septuagint, the Alexandrian manuscript seems to claim that merit in preference to its rival: but if it be thought a matter of superior honour to approach nearer the old Greek version, uncorrected by Origen, that merit seems to be due to the Vatican.³

The annexed engraving exhibits a specimen of the Vatican manuscript from a fac-simile traced in the year 1704 for Dr. Grabe, editor of the celebrated edition of the Septuagint, which is noticed in a subsequent part of this work. The author has reason to believe that it is the most faithful fac-simile ever executed of this MS. It was made by Signor Zacagni, at that time principal keeper of the Vatican Library, and it is now preserved among Dr. Grabe's manuscripts in the Bodleian Library at Oxford.

This fac-simile has been most carefully and accurately copied, under the direction of the Rev. Dr. Bandinel, the keeper of that noble repository of literature, to whom the author now offers his acknowledgments for his kind assistance on this occasion. The passage represented in our engraving contains the first three verses of the first chapter of the prophet Ezekiel, of which the following is a literal English version:

No fac-simile edition (like that of the Alexandrian manuscript of the New Testament edited by Dr. Woide, and of the Old Testament by the Rev. H. H. Baber) has ever been executed of the precious Vatican manuscript. During the pontificate of Pius VI. the Abate Spoletti contemplated the publication of it, for which purpose he delivered a memorial to the Pope. No public permission was ever given: and though the Pontiff's private judgment was not unfavourable to the undertaking, yet, as his indulgence would have been no security against the vengeance of the inquisition, Spoletti was obliged to abandon his design.¹ It is, however, but just to add, that no obstacles were thrown in the way of the collation of manuscripts in the Vatican for Dr. Holmes's critical edition of the Septuagint version, of which some account will be found in the BIBLIOGRAPHICAL APPENDIX to the second volume.

§ 3. ACCOUNT OF ANCIENT MANUSCRIPTS (ENTIRE OR IN PART) CONTAINING THE SEPTUAGINT OR GREEK VERSION OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

- I. The Codex Cottonianus.—II. The Codex Sarravianus.—III. The Codex Colbertinus.—IV. The Codex Cæsareus, Argentæus, or Argenteo-Purpureus.—V. The Codex Ambrosianus.—VI. The Codex Coislinianus.—VII. The Codex Basiliano-Vaticanus.—VIII. The Codex Turicensis.

It is not precisely known what number of manuscripts of the Greek version of the Old Testament are extant. The highest number of those collated by the late Rev. Dr. Holmes, for his splendid edition of this version, is one hundred and thirty-five. Nine of them are described, as being written in uncial characters, and as having furnished him with the most important of the various readings, with which his first volume is enriched: besides these he has noticed sixty-three others, written in cursive or small characters, and which have likewise furnished him with various lections. Of these manuscripts the following are more particularly worthy of notice, on account of their rarity and value.²

I. THE CODEX COTTONIANUS is not only the most ancient but the most correct manuscript that is extant. It was originally brought from Philippi by two Greek bishops, who presented it to king Henry VIII. whom they informed that tradition reported it to have been the identical copy which had belonged to the celebrated Origen, who lived in the former half of the third century. Queen Elizabeth gave it to Sir John Fortescue, her preceptor in Greek, who, desirous of preserving it for posterity, placed it in the Cottonian library. This precious manuscript was almost destroyed by the calamitous fire which consumed Cotton House at Westminster, in the year 1731. Eighteen fragments are all that now remain, and of these, both the leaves, and consequently the writing in a just proportion, are contracted into a less compass; so that what were large are now small capitals. These fragments are at present deposited in the British Museum.³

In its original state, the Codex Cottonianus contained one hundred and sixty-five leaves, in the quarto size; it is written on vellum, in uncial characters, the line running along the whole width of the page, and each line consisting, in general, of twenty-seven, rarely of thirty letters. These letters are almost every where of the same length, excepting that at the end of a line they are occasionally somewhat less, and in some instances are interlined or written over the line. Like all other very ancient manuscripts, it has no accents or spirits, nor any distinction of words, verses, or chapters. The words are, for the most part, written at full length, with the exception of the well known and frequent abbreviations of KC, KN, OC, ON, for Kυριος and Kυριε, Lord, and Θεος, Θεω, God. Certain consonants, vowels, and diphthongs are also interchanged.⁴ The coherence of the Greek text is very close, except where it is divided by the interposition of the very curious paintings or illuminations with which this manuscript is decorated. These pictures were two hundred and fifty in number, and consist of compositions within square frames, of one or of several figures, in general not exceeding two inches in height; and these frames, which are four inches square, are occasionally divided into two compartments. The heads are perhaps too large, but the attitudes and draperies have considerable merit: and they are by competent judges preferred to the miniatures that adorn the Vienna manuscript, which is noticed in pp. 227, 228: infra. Twenty-one fragments of these illuminations were engraved in 1744, on two large folio plates, at the expense of the society of Antiquaries of London. More fragments must have been preserved than the eighteen which at present remain; because none of those engraved are now to be met with.⁵ On an examination of the Codex Cottonianus, with a view to take a fac-simile of some one of its fragments for this work, they were found in a nearly pulverized and carbonized state, so that no accurate copy could be made. The annexed engraving therefore is copied from that of the Antiquarian Society.⁶ The subject on the right hand is Jacob delivering his son Benjamin to his brethren, that they may go a second time into Egypt, and buy corn for himself and his family. The passage of Genesis, which it is intended to illustrate, is ch. xliii. 13, 14., of which the following is a representation in ordinary Greek characters; the words preserved being in capital letters.

ΚΑΙ ΤΟΝ ΑΔΕΛΦΟΝ ΤΩΝ ΛΑΒΕΤΕ ΚΑΙ ΑΝΑ

The subject on the left hand of the engraving is Joseph's interview with his brethren in his own house, on their return into Egypt. It illustrates Genesis xliii. 30, 31., and is as follows:—

The larger Greek characters at the foot of our fac-simile are copied from the third plate of Mr. Astle's work on the Origin of Writing: they exhibit the first four words of Gen. xiv. 17. of the same size as in the Codex Cottonianus Gene-scus, before the occurrence of the calamitous fire above noticed. The loss of the consumed parts of this precious manuscript would have been irreparable, had not extracts of its various readings been made by different learned men, which have been preserved to the present time. Thus the collations of it by Archbishop Usher and Patrick Young, in the middle of the seventeenth century, are printed in the sixth volume of Bishop Walton's Polyglott Edition of the Bible. Archbishop Usher's autograph collation is deposited in the Bodleian Library, among the other MSS. of that distinguished prelate. The principal various readings, noted by Dr. Gale, towards the close of the same century, are entered in the margin of an Aldine edition of the Greek version, which subsequently belonged to the late Dr. Kennicott. But the most valuable collation is that made in the year 1703, by Dr. Grabe, who was deeply skilled in paleography, and bequeathed by him to the Bodleian Library, whence the Rev. Dr. Owen published it at London, in 1778, in an octavo volume. Dr. Holmes has chiefly followed Grabe's extract of various readings, in his critical edition of the Septuagint, but he has occasionally availed himself of Archbishop Usher's collation.¹

The Codex Cottonianus is the most ancient manuscript of any part of the Old Testament that is extant. It is acknowledged to have been written towards the end of the fourth, or in the beginning of the fifth century; and it seldom agrees with any manuscript or printed edition, except the Codex Alexandrinus, which has been described in pp. 222—224. of the present volume. There are, according to Dr. Holmes, at least twenty instances in which this manuscript expresses the meaning of the original Hebrew more accurately than any other exemplars.

II. III. The Codices SARRAVIANUS (now in the Public Library of the Academy at Leyden), and COLBERTINUS (formerly numbered 3084. among the Colbert MSS., but at present deposited in the Royal Library at Paris), are distinct parts of the same manuscript, and contain the Pentateuch, and the books of Joshua and Judges. The Codex Sarravianus is defective in those very leaves, viz. seven in Exodus, thirteen in Leviticus, and two in Numbers, which are found in the Colbertine manuscript; the writing of which, as well as the texture of the vellum, and other peculiarities, agree so closely with those of the Codex Sarravianus, as to demonstrate their perfect identity. These manuscripts are neatly written on thin vellum, in uncial letters, with which some round characters are intermixed. The contractions or abbreviations, permutations of letters, &c. are the same which are found in the Codex Cottonianus. These two Codices, as they are termed, may be referred to the fifth or sixth century. To some paragraphs of the book of Leviticus titles or heads have been prefixed, evidently by a later hand.

IV. The Codex CÆSAREUS (which is also frequently called the CODEx ARGENTEUS, and CODEx ARGENTEOPURPUREUS, because it is written in silver letters on purple vellum) is preserved in the Imperial Library at Vienna. The letters are beautiful but thick, partly round and partly square. In size, it approximates to the quarto form: it consists of twenty-six leaves only, the first twenty-four of which contain a fragment of the book of Genesis, viz. from chapter iii. 4. to chap. viii. 24.; the two last contain a fragment of St. Luke's Gospel, viz. chapter xxiv. verses 21—49. In Wetstein's critical edition of the Greek New Testament, these two leaves are denoted by the letter N. The first twenty-four leaves are ornamented with forty-eight curious miniature paintings which Lambecius refers to the age of Constantine; but, from the shape of the letters, this manuscript is rather to be assigned to the end of the fifth or the beginning of the sixth century. In these pictures, the divine prescience and providence are represented by a hand proceeding out of a cloud: and they exhibit interesting specimens of the habits, customs, and amusements of those early times.¹ From the occurrence of the words κίβους (kitōus) instead of χιτώνες (chitōnes), and Ἀβιμελὲς (Abimelek) instead of Ἀβιμελὲς (Abimelech), Dr. Holmes is of opinion that this manuscript was written by dictation. Vowels, consonants, &c. are interchanged in the same manner as in the Codex Cottonianus, and similar abbreviations are likewise found in it. In some of its readings the Codex Cæsareus resembles the Alexandrian manuscript. In his letter to the Bishop of Durham, published in 1795, and containing a specimen of his proposed new edition of the Septuagint version with various lections,² Dr. Holmes printed the entire text of this MS. which had been collated and revised for him by Professor Alter, of Vienna; and he also gave an engraved fac-simile of the whole of its seventh page. From this fac-simile the foregoing specimen is copied.

V. The CODEX AMEROSIANUS derives its name from the Ambrosian Library at Milan, where it is preserved: it is probably as old as the seventh century. This manuscript is a large square quarto (by Montfaucon erroneously termed a folio), written in three columns in a round uncial character. The accents and spirits, however, have evidently been added by a later hand.

VI. The CODEX COISLINIANUS originally belonged to M. Seguier, Chancellor of France in the middle of the seventeenth century, a munificent collector of biblical manuscripts, from whom it passed, by hereditary succession, to the Duc de Coislin. From his library it was transferred into that of the monastery of Saint Germain-Des-Prez, and thence into the Royal Library at Paris, where it now is. According to Montfaucon, by whom it is particularly described,³ it is in quarto, and was written in a beautiful round uncial character, in the sixth, or at the latest in the seventh century. But the accents and spirits have been added by a comparatively recent hand. It consists of two hundred and twenty-six leaves of vellum, and formerly contained the octateuch (that is the five books of Moses, and those of Joshua, Judges, and Ruth), the two books of Samuel and the two books of Kings; but it is now considerably mutilated by the injuries of time. The copyist was totally ignorant of Hebrew, as is evident from the following inscription, which he has placed at the beginning of the book of Genesis;—Βαρεσθ παρὰ Εβραίων, σπερ ἔστιν ἑρμηνεύμενος, λόγος ἡμεῶν,—that is, Βαρεσθ in Hebrew, which being interpreted is (or means) the Words of Days, or the history of the days, i. e. the history of the six days' work of creation. This word Βαρεσθ (Barēseth) is no other than the Hebrew word בְּרֵשִׁית (BERESHITH) in the beginning, which is the first word in the book of Genesis. Montfaucon further observed that this manuscript contained readings very similar to those of the Codex Alexandrinus; and his remark is confirmed by Dr. Holmes, so far as respects the Pentateuch.

VII. The CODEX BASILIANO-VATICANUS is the last of the MSS. in uncial characters collated by Dr. H. It formerly belonged to a monastery in Calabria, whence it was transferred by Pietro Memniti, superior of the monks of the order of Saint Basil at Rome, into the library of his monastery; and thence it passed into the papal library of the Vatican, where it is now numbered 2,106. It is written on vellum, in oblong leaning uncial characters; and according to Montfaucon was executed in the ninth century. Dr. Holmes considers it to be a manuscript of considerable value and importance, which, though in many respects it corresponds with the other MSS. collated by him, yet contains some valuable lections which are nowhere else to be found. On this account it is to be regretted that the Codex Basiliano-Vaticanus is imperfect both at the beginning and end.

VIII. The CODEX TURICENSIS is numbered 262 in Dr. Parsons's catalogue of MSS. collated for the book of Psalms, in his continuation of the magnificent edition of the Septuagint commenced by the late Rev. Dr. Holmes. It is a quarto manuscript of the book of Psalms, the writing of which proves it to have been executed at least in the eleventh century, if not much earlier; and consists of two hundred and twenty-two leaves of extremely thin purple vellum; and the silver characters and golden initial letters are in many parts so decayed by the consuming hand of time, as to be with difficulty legible. The portions of the Psalms wanting in this MS. are Psal. i.—xxv.; xxx. 1.—xxxvi. 20.; xli. 5.—xliii. 2.; lviii. 13.—lix. 4.; lxiv. 11. lxxi. 4.; xcii. 3.—xciii. 7.; and xcvi. 12.—xcvii. 8. Several of the ancient ecclesiastical hymns, which form part of this MS., are also mutilated. It is, however, consolatory to know that those portions of the Psalms which are deficient in the Codices Alexandrinus and Vaticanus may be supplied from the Codex Turicensis;¹ and this circumstance, it should seem, occasioned the generally accurate traveller, Mr. Coxe (whose error has been implicitly copied by succeeding writers) to state that the MS. here described once formed part of the Codex Vaticanus.²

§ 4. ACCOUNT OF THE PRINCIPAL MANUSCRIPTS CONTAINING THE NEW TESTAMENT, ENTIRE OR IN PART, WHICH HAVE BEEN USED IN CRITICAL EDITIONS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

The autographs, or manuscripts of the New Testament, which were written either by the apostles themselves, or by amanuenses under their immediate inspection,³ have long since perished; and we have no information whatever concerning their history. The pretended autograph of St. Mark's Gospel at Venice is now known to be nothing more than a copy of the Latin version,⁴ and no existing manuscripts of the New Testament can be traced higher than the fourth century; and most of them are of still later date. Some contain the whole of the New Testament; others comprise particular books or fragments of books; and there are several which contain, not whole books arranged according to their usual order, but detached portions or lessons (αναγνώσεις), appointed to be read on certain days in the public service of the Christian church; from which again whole books have been put together. These are called Lectinaria, and are of two sorts: 1. Evangelisteria, containing lessons from the four Gospels; and, 2. Apostolos, comprising lessons from the Acts and Epistles, and sometimes only the Epistles themselves.⁵ When a manuscript contains both parts, Michaelis says that it is called Apostolic Evangelion. Forty-six Evangelisteria were collated by Griesbach for the four Gospels of his edition of the New Testament; and seven Lectinaria or Apostoli, for the Acts and Epistles.⁶ Some manuscripts, again, have not only the Greek text, but are accompanied with a version; which is either interlined, or in a parallel column; these are called Codices Bilingues. The greatest number is in Greek and Latin; and the Latin version is, in general, one of those which existed before the time of Jerome. As there are extant Syriac-Arabic and Gothic-Latin manuscripts, Michaelis thinks it probable that there formerly existed Greek-Syriac, Greek-Gothic, and other manuscripts of that kind, in which the original and some version were written together. Where a transcriber, instead of copying from one and the same ancient manuscript, selects from several those readings which appear to him to be the best, the manuscript so transcribed is termed a Codex Criticus.

i. Manuscripts written in Uncial or Capital Letters.

I.—A.* The CODEX ALEXANDRINUS. See a description of it among the manuscripts containing the Old and New Testaments in Greek, pp. 222—224. supra. Except in the four Gospels (the copyist of which followed a manuscript of the Constantinopolitan Recension), this manuscript is considered the standard MS. of the Alexandrine Recension.

II.—B. The CODEX VATICANUS. It is described in pp. 224—226. Dr. Scholz refers it to the Alexandrine Recension, except in the Gospel of St. Matthew, in which there are many additions not found in other manuscripts of this family.

III.—C. The CODEX EPHREMI, or CODEX REGIUS, 1905. (at present 9.) is an invaluable Codex Rescriptus, written on vellum, and is of very high antiquity. The first part of this manuscript contains several Greek works of Ephrem the Syrian, written towards the close of the twelfth, or perhaps of the thirteenth century, over some more ancient writings which had been erased, though the traces are still visible, and in most places legible. These more ancient writings appear to have contained the Septuagint version of the Old Testament (considerable fragments of which are still extant), and the entire New Testament. Both were originally written continuously; but they were so completely intermingled, inverted, or transposed, by the unknown later copyists of Ephrem's treatises, as to render these venerable remains of Scripture almost useless.⁸ The chasms in the New Testament are very numerous. They are specified by Wetstein, from whom they have been copied by Michaelis and Griesbach. The text is not divided into columns; the uncial characters are larger than those of the Codex Alexandrinus, without accents, and the words are not divided. There are large initial letters at the beginning of each section; and the text is sometimes divided into articles, not much larger than our verses. A small cross indicates the end of a division; a full point below a letter is equivalent to a comma, and in the middle to a semicolon. The Gospels follow the divisions of Ammonius, and also have the πτελα, à primâ manu; the sections of the epistles sometimes agree with the αναγνώσεις or lessons occurring in the MSS. which are known to have been written in Egypt. The titles and subscriptions to the several books are very brief, without any of the additions which are sometimes found in the Codex Alexandrinus. The Codex Ephremi exhibits the text of the Alexandrine Recension in its greatest purity, and numerous other indications of its Egyptian origin. In this manuscript the disputed verse, John v. 4., is written, not in the text, but as a marginal scholion. Wetstein conjectured, that this was one of the manuscripts that were collated at Alexandria in 616 with the new Syriac version; but of this there is no evidence. From a marginal note to Heb. viii. 7. the same critic also argued, that it was written before the institution of the feast of the Virgin Mary; that is, before the year 542. But his arguments are not considered as wholly decisive by Michaelis, who only asserts its great antiquity in general terms. Bishop Marsh pronounces it to be at least as ancient as the seventh century; Professor Hug considers it to be even older than the Codex Alexandrinus; and Dr. Scholz refers it, with much probability, to the sixth century. The readings of the Codex Ephremi, like those of all other very ancient manuscripts, are in favour of the Latin; but there is no satisfactory evidence that

Dr. Dibdin has described a superb Evangelisterium, and has given fac-similes of its ornaments, in the first volume of his Bibliographical Decameron, pp. xcii—xciv. This precious manuscript is supposed to have been written at the close of the eleventh, or early in the twelfth century. The illuminations are executed with singular beauty and delicacy.

* Introduction to the New Test. vol. ii. part i. p. 164.

† In the following catalogue of Manuscript Letters of the Alphabet, A. to U. and X. denote the references made by Wetstein, Griesbach, and Scholz, in their respective critical editions of the New Testament, to the manuscripts described in this catalogue. The letters V, W, Y, Z, F. and Δ. denote the references made by Scholz alone. Where no authorities are specified for particular manuscripts, in order to avoid the unnecessary multiplication of references, it is proper to state that this catalogue of manuscripts has been drawn up from a careful examination of the Prolegomena of Dr. Mill, Wetstein, Griesbach, and Scholz, from Griesbach's Synbolæ Criticæ, from Hug's Introduction to the New Testament, and from Michaelis's Chapter on "the Manuscripts that have been used in Editions of the Greek Testament," with Bishop Marsh's supplementary Annotations, which collectively form the greater part of the second volume of Michaelis's Introduction to the New Testament.

‡ Catalogus Codicum Manuscriptorum Bibliothecæ Regiæ, tom. ii. p. 2. In pp. 3—5, the compiler of the Catalogue (M. Anicet Mollot) has given an index of the several passages of the Old and New Testament restored to their proper order, with references to the leaves of the manuscripts where they are actually to be found. Montfaucon (Palaographia Græca, pp. 213, 214) has given a fac-simile of this manuscript, which Professor Hug says is not equal in point of elegance to the original manuscript.

It has been corrupted from the Latin version. It has been altered by a critical collator, who, according to Griesbach, must have lived many years after the time when the manuscript was written, and who probably erased many of the ancient readings. Kuster was the first who procured extracts from this manuscript for his edition of Dr. Mill's Greek Testament. Wetstein has collated it with very great accuracy; and the numerous readings he has quoted from it greatly enhance the value of his edition.

IV.—D. The Codex Bezae, also called the Codex Cantabrigiensis, is a Greek and Latin manuscript, containing the four Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles. It is deposited in the public library of the University of Cambridge, to which it was presented by the celebrated Theodore Beza, in the year 1581. Of this manuscript, which is written on vellum, in quarto, without accents or marks of aspiration, or spaces between the words, the following fac-simile will convey an idea.

represents the first three verses of the fifth chapter of Saint Matthew's Gospel, which are copied from Dr. Kipling's fac-simile edition of the Codex Bezae, published at Cambridge in 1793, of which an account is given in the Bibliographical Appendix to the second volume. We have placed the Latin under the Greek, in order to bring the whole within the compass of an octavo page. The following is a literal English version of this fac-simile:—

Matt. V. 1—3.
 AND SEEING THE MULTITUDE SHE WENT UP INTO A MOUNTAIN AND WHEN SHE WAS SET DOWN—CAME TO HER HER DISCIPLES—AND OPENING HIS MOUTH
 HE TAUGHT THEM SAYING

BLESSED ARE THE POOR IN SPIRIT FOR THEIR IS THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN.

† Contracted for SPIRIT. The Greek is ΠΝΙ, ΠΝΕΥΜΑΤΙ; and the Latin SPU, for SPIRITU

Sixty-six leaves of this manuscript are much torn and mutilated, and ten of them have been supplied by a later transcriber.

The Codex Bezae is noted with the letter D. by Wetstein, Griesbach, and Scholz. In the Greek it is defective, from the beginning to Matt. i. 20., and in the Latin to Matt. i. 12. In the Latin it has likewise the following chasms, viz. Matt. vi. 20.—ix. 2.; Matt. xxvii. 1—12.; John i. 16.—ii. 26.; Acts viii. 29.—x. 14.; xxii. 10—20.; and from xxii. 29. to the end. The Gospels are arranged in the usual order of the Latin manuscripts, Matthew, John, Luke, Mark. It has a considerable number of corrections, some of which have been noticed by Dr. Griesbach; and some of the pages, containing Matt. iii. 8—16. John xviii. 13.—xx. 13. and Mark xv. to the end, are written by a later hand, which Wetstein refers to the tenth century, but Griesbach to the twelfth. The Latin version is that which was in use before the time of Jerome, and is usually called the Old Italic or Ante-Hieronymian version. In the margin of the Greek part of the manuscript there are inserted the Anthonian sections, evidently by a later hand; and the words ἀρχαί, τέλει, καὶ διὰ τὸ ἀποστολικόν, are occasionally interspersed, indicating the beginning and end of the ἀντιγραφία, or lessons read in the church. The subjects discussed in the Gospels are sometimes written in the margin, sometimes at the top of the page. But all these notations are manifestly the work of several persons and of different ages. The date of this manuscript has been much contested. Those critics who give it the least antiquity, assign it to the sixth or seventh century. Wetstein supposed it to be of the fifth century. Michaelis was of opinion, that of all the manuscripts now extant, this is the most ancient. Dr. Kipling, the editor of the Cambridge fac-simile, thought it much older than the Alexandrian manuscript, and that it must have been written in the second century. On comparing it with Greek inscriptions of different ages, Bishop Marsh is of opinion that it cannot have been written later than the sixth century, and that it may have been written even two or three centuries earlier; and he finally considers it prior to all the manuscripts extant, except the Codex Vaticanus, and refers it to the fifth century, which, perhaps, is the true date, if an opinion may be hazarded where so much uncertainty prevails.

Wetstein was of opinion, from eleven coincidences which he thought he had discovered, that this was the identical manuscript collated at Alexandria in 616, for the Philoxenian or later Syriac version of the New Testament; but this is a groundless supposition. It is, however, worthy of remark, that many of the readings by which the Codex Bezae is distinguished are found in the Syriac, Coptic, Sahidic, and in the margin of the Philoxenian-Syriac version. As the readings of this manuscript frequently agree with the Latin versions before the time of St. Jerome, and with the Vulgate or present Latin translation, Wetstein was of opinion that the Greek text was altered from the Latin version, or, in other words, that the writer of the Codex Bezae departed from the lections of the Greek manuscript or manuscripts whence he copied, and introduced in their stead, from some Latin version, readings which were warranted by no Greek manuscript. This charge Semler, Michaelis, Griesbach, and Bishop Marsh have endeavoured to refute; and their verdict has been generally received. Matthæi, however, revived the charge of Wetstein, and considered the text as extremely corrupt, and suspected that some Latin monk, who was but indifferently skilled in Greek, wrote in the margin of his New Testament various passages from the Greek and Latin fathers, which seemed to refer to particular passages. He further thought that this monk had noted the differences occurring in some Greek and Latin manuscripts of the New Testament, and added parallel passages of Scripture; and that from this fur-rago either the monk himself, or some other person, manufactured his text (whether foolishly or fraudulently is uncertain), of which the Codex Bezae is a copy. But this suspicion of Matthæi has been little regarded in Germany, where he incurred the antipathy of the most eminent biblical critics, by vilifying the sources of various readings from which he had it not in his power to draw, when he began to publish his edition of the New Testament; giving to the Codex Bezae, the Codex Claromontanus (noticed in pp. 231, 232. infra), and other manuscripts of unquestionable antiquity, the appellation of Editio Scarrilis.¹ Bishop Middleton considers the judgment of Michaelis as approximating very near to the truth, and has given a collation of numerous passages of the received text with the Codex Bezae; and the result of his examination, which does not admit of abridgment, is, that the Codex Bezae, though a most venerable reman of antiquity, is not to be considered, in a critical view, as of much authority. He accounts for the goodness of its readings, considered with regard to the sense, by the natural supposition of the great antiquity of the manuscript, which was the basis of the Codex Bezae; but while its Latinizing is admitted, he contends that we have no reason to infer that its readings, considered in the same light, are therefore faulty. The learned prelate concludes with subscribing to the opinion of Matthæi somewhat modified. He believes that no fraud was intended; but only that the critical possessor of the basis filled its margin with glosses and readings chiefly from the Latin, being a Christian of the Western Church; and that the whole collection of Latin passages was translated into Greek, and substituted in the text by some one who had a high opinion of their value, and who was better skilled in caligraphy than in the Greek and Latin languages.² The arguments and evidences adduced by Bishop Middleton, we believe, are by many, at least in England, considered so conclusive, that, though the antiquity of the manuscript is fully admitted, yet it must be deemed a Latinizing manuscript, and, consequently, is of comparatively little critical value.

At the time Beza presented this manuscript to the university of Cambridge, it had been in his possession about nineteen years; and in his letter to that learned body, he says, that it was found in the monastery of Saint Irenæus at Lyons, where it had lain concealed for a long time. But how it came there, and in what place it was written, are questions concerning which nothing certain is known. The most generally received opinion is, that it was written in the west of Europe.

The Cambridge manuscript has been repeatedly collated by critical editors of the New Testament. Robert Stephens made extracts from it, though with no great accuracy, under the title of Codex β, for his edition of the Greek Testament, of 1550; as Beza also did for his own edition published in 1582. Since it was sent to the university of Cambridge, it has been more accurately collated by Junius, whose extracts were used by Curcellæus and Father Morin. A fourth and more accurate collation of it was made, at the suggestion of Archbishop Usher, and the extracts were inserted in the sixth volume of the London Polyglott, edited by Bishop Walton. Dr. Mill collated it a fifth and sixth time; but his extracts are frequently defective, and sometimes erroneous, appears from comparing them with Wetstein's New Testament, and from a new collation which was made, about the year 1733, by Mr. Dickenson of Saint John's College, which is now preserved in the library of Jesus' College, where it is marked O, 2. Wetstein's extracts are also very incorrect, as appears from comparing them with the manuscript itself.

A splendid fac-simile of the Codex Bezae was published by the Rev. Dr. Kipling at Cambridge, under the patronage and at the expense of the university, in 1793, in 2 vols. atlas folio. Dr. Harwood regulated the text of the Gospels and Acts, in his edition of the Greek Testament, chiefly according to the readings of the Codex Bezae; which was so highly valued by the learned but eccentric divine, Whiston, that in his "Primitive New Testament in English" (8vo. Stamford and London, 1745), he has translated the four Gospels and Acts literally from this manuscript. Dr. A. Clarke, in his Commentary on the New Testament, has paid very particular attention to the readings of the Codex Bezae.

V. THE CODEx CLAROMONTANUS, or REGIUS 2245., is a Greek-Latin manuscript of St. Paul's Epistles found in the monastery of Clermont, in the diocese of Beauvais, and used by Beza, together with the Codex Cantabrigiensis, in preparing his edition of the New Testament. It is noted D. by Wetstein and Griesbach in the second volumes of their respective editions of the Greek Testament. Sabatier supposes it to have been written in the sixth century; Montfaucon places it in the seventh century; Griesbach thinks it was written in the sixth or seventh century, and Hug, in the eighth century. This manuscript is written on vellum in uncial characters, and with accents and marks of aspiration added by another hand, but of great antiquity. As it contains the Epistle to the Hebrews, which has been added by a later hand, it is supposed to have been written in the west of Europe. Dr. Mill contended that the Codex Claromontanus was the second part of the Codex Bezae; but this opinion has been confuted by Wetstein, who has shown that the former is by no means connected with the latter, as appears from the difference of their form, their orthography, and the nature of the vellum on which they are written. Bishop Marsh adds, on the authority of a gentleman who had examined both manuscripts, that the Codex Claromontanus contains only twenty-one lines in each page, while the Cambridge manuscript contains thirty-three lines in a page; the abbreviations in the two manuscripts are also different. The Codex Claromontanus, like other Greek-Latin manuscripts, has been accused of having a Greek text, that has been altered from the Latin; but this charge has been satisfactorily refuted by Dr. Semler. The migrations of this manuscript are somewhat remarkable. From the hands of Beza it went into the Putean library, which derived its name from the family of De Puy. Jacques De Puy, who was librarian to the king of France, and died in 1656, bequeathed it, together with his other manuscripts, to the Royal Library at Paris, where it is now preserved, and at present is marked 107. According to the accounts of Wetstein and Sabatier, thirty-six leaves were cut out of it at the beginning of the last century (it is supposed by John Aymon, a notorious literary thief of that time), and were sold in England; but they were sent back by the earl of Oxford in 1729. The manuscript, therefore, is once more complete, as the covering only is wanting in which the stolen sheets had been enclosed, which is kept in the British Museum, and filled with the letters that passed on the occasion, as a monument of this infamous theft.

VI.—E. The CODEX BASILEENSIS, B. VI. 21. (noted by Dr. Mill, B. 1., and by Bengel Bas α), is a manuscript of the four Gospels, written in uncial letters, in the eighth or (more probably) ninth century. It is mutilated in Luke i. 69.—ii. 4., iii. 4—15., xii. 58.—xiii. 12., xv. 8—20.; and xxiv. 47. to the end of the Gospels; but the chasms in Luke i. 69.—ii. 4., xii. 58.—xiii. 12., and xv. 8—20. have been filled up by a later hand. This manuscript was not used by Erasmus; but it was collated by Samuel Battier for Dr. Mill, who highly valued it; by Iselin, for Bengel's edition of the New Testament; and by Wetstein, who has given its readings in his edition, whence they have been adopted by Griesbach and Scholz.

VII. The CODEX LAUDIANUS 3., as it is cited by Dr. Mill, but noted by the letter E. by Wetstein and * E. by Griesbach in their catalogues of manuscripts of the Acts of the Apostles, derives its appellation from Archbishop Laud, who gave this among many other precious manuscripts to the university of Oxford, in whose noble library it is now preserved. It is a Greek-Latin manuscript of the Acts of the Apostles, in which the Latin text is one of those versions which differ from Jerome's edition, having been altered from the particular Greek text of this manuscript. It is defective from chap. xxvi. 29. to xxviii. 26.

This manuscript is erroneously supposed to have been the identical book used by the venerable Bede in the seventh century, because it has all those irregular readings which, in his Commentaries on the Acts, he says were in his book; and no other manuscript is now found to have them. There is an extraordinary coincidence between it and the old Syriac version of the Acts of the Apostles. Wetstein conjectures, from an edict of a Sardinian prince, Flavius Pancratius, written at the end of this manuscript, and from several other circumstances, that it was written in Sardinia in the seventh century. To this conjecture Michaelis is disposed to accede, though Dr. Woide supposed it to have been written in the East, because its orthography has several properties observable in the Codex Alexandrinus. But as these peculiarities are also found in other very ancient manuscripts, Bishop Marsh considers them as insufficient to warrant the inference, especially when we reflect on the great improbability that a Greek manuscript written in the East should be accompanied with a Latin translation. It will be seen from the annexed fac-simile, which represents the chief part of Acts vii. 2., that this Latin translation, contrary to the usual arrangement of the Greek-Latin manuscripts, occupies the first column of the page. Only one word (or at the utmost, two or three words, and that but seldom) is written in a line, and in uncial or capital letters; and they are so written that each Latin word is always opposite to the correspondent Greek word. Hence it is evident, that the manuscript was written for the use of a person who was not well skilled in both languages, and as the Latin occupies the first column, this circumstance is an additional evidence that it was written in the West of Europe, where Latin only was spoken. For the satisfaction of the English reader, the verse in question is subjoined in common Roman and Greek capitals, with the corresponding literal English in a third column:—

With regard to the date of this manuscript;—Mr. Astle refers it to the beginning of the fifth century; Griesbach to the seventh or eighth; and Mr. Hearne to the eighth century. But from the shape of the letters and other circumstances, Bishop Marsh pronounces it to be less ancient than the Codex Bezae, which was written in the fifth century. Probably the end of the sixth or the former part of the seventh century may be assigned as the date of the Codex Laudianus 3. This manuscript is of great value: Michaelis pronounces it to be indispensable to every man who would examine the important question, whether the Codices Græco-Latini have been corrupted from the Latin, and adds, that it was this manuscript which convinced him that this charge is without foundation.

VIII.—*E., in Griesbach's catalogue of manuscripts of Saint Paul's Epistles, and E. 2. in the second volume of Wetstein's edition of the New Testament, is the Codex SAN GERMANENSIS, a Greek-Latin manuscript of Saint Paul's Epistles, written in the seventh century, in uncial letters, and with accents and marks of aspiration, à primâ manu. It has been generally supposed to be a mere copy of the Codex Claromontanus (described in pp. 231, 232.); but this opinion is questioned by Dr. Semler, in his critical examination of this manuscript, who has produced many examples, from which it appears that if the transcriber of it actually had the Clermont MS. before him, he must at least have selected various readings from other manuscripts. Bishop Marsh, therefore, considers the San-Germanensis as a kind of Codex Electicus, in writing which the Clermont MS. was principally but not at all times consulted. The manuscript now under consideration takes its name from the monastery of St. Germain-des-Prés, in Paris, in whose library it was formerly preserved. Dr. Mill first procured extracts from it, for his edition of the New Testament, where it is noted by the abbreviation Ger. for Germanensis.

According to Montfaucon, there is also extant another more ancient Codex San-Germanensis of Saint Paul's Epistles, which has never been collated. It is a fragment, containing only thirteen leaves; and is supposed to be as ancient as the fifth century.²

IX.—*F., in Wetstein's, Griesbach's, and Scholz's notations of manuscripts, is the Codex BOREELI, so called from its former possessor, John Boreel, who was ambassador at the court of London, in the reign of James I. Shortly after the death of Boreel in 1629, an unknown scholar collated the gospels of Matthew and Mark, and the first ten chapters of Luke's Gospel; which collation was communicated to Wetstein by Isaac Verburgius. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension. After it had been lost for a century, this manuscript was exhibited by Professor Heringa at a meeting of the associates of the third class of the Royal Belgian Institute, on the 26th of April, 1830.³

X.—*F., in Wetstein's and Griesbach's notation of Manuscripts of Saint Paul's Epistles, is the Codex AUGIENSIS, a Greek-Latin manuscript of the Pauline Epistles. It derives its name from the monastery of Augia major, at Rheinau, to which it belonged in the fifteenth century. After passing through various hands, it was purchased by the celebrated critic, Dr. Richard Bentley, in 1718; and in 1787, on the death of the younger Bentley, it was deposited in the library of Trinity College, Cambridge. This manuscript is defective from the beginning to Rom. ii. 8., and the epistle to the Hebrews is found only in the Latin version. Hug assigns it to the latter half of the ninth, or to the tenth century, and Michaelis to the ninth century, which (Bishop Marsh remarks) is the utmost that can be allowed to its antiquity. The Greek text is written in uncial letters without accents, and the Latin in Anglo-Saxon characters: it has been collated by Wetstein. In many respects it coincides with the Codex Boernerianus, and belongs to the Alexandrine Recension. The words Χριστος (Christ), and Ιησους (Jesus), are not abbreviated by XC and IO, as in the common manuscripts, but by XPC and IHC, as in the Codex Bezae.

XI.—*G., in Griesbach's notation of manuscripts of Saint Paul's Epistles, is the Codex BOERNERIANUS, which derives its name from Dr. C. F. Boerner, to whom it formerly belonged; it is now deposited in the royal library at Dresden. It contains St. Paul's Epistles, with the exception of that to the Hebrews, which was formerly rejected by the church of Rome; and it is written in Greek and Latin, the Latin or old Ante-Hieronymian version being interlined between the Greek, and written over the text, of which it is a translation. Semler supposed that the Latin was written since the Greek, but Professor Matthæi, who published a copy of this manuscript, suggests that the uniformity of the handwriting, and similarity in the colour of the ink, evince that both the Greek and Latin texts proceeded from the same transcriber. It frequently agrees with the Codex Claromontanus. The time when this manuscript was written has not been determined with precision. That it is ancient, appears (says Michaelis) from the form of the characters, and the absence of accents and marks of aspiration. It seems to have been written in an age when the transition was making from uncial to small characters; and from the correspondence of the letters r, s, and z, in the Latin version to that form which is found in the Anglo-Saxon alphabet, Bishop Marsh infers, that this manuscript was written in the west of Europe, and probably between the eighth and tenth centuries. Kuster, who first collated this manuscript, supposed it to be British; Doederlein, Irish. The learned reviewer of Matthæi's edition of this manuscript, in the Jena Literary Gazette, decides that it could only be written in Germany or France; because in the margin many passages are noted contra ὁμοκατακλι, apparently because they are contradictory to the opinion of Gottschalk, a celebrated monk, who disputed concerning predestination in the ninth century, but whose tenets excited little attention except in those two countries. The writer in question thinks it probable that this manuscript was written by Johannes Scotus, who lived at the court of Charles the Bald, king of France, and was the most celebrated opponent of Gottschalk. The manuscript, however, could not have been written later than the ninth century; for in the beginning of the tenth, Gottschalk's dispute had lost all its importance. Griesbach and Hug accordingly refer the Codex Boernerianus to the ninth or tenth century. There is a transcript of this MS. in the library of Trinity College, Cambridge, among the books and manuscripts that were left by Dr. Bentley, who probably procured it for his intended edition of the Greek Testament. Professor Matthæi published a copy of this manuscript at Meissen in Saxony, in 1791, in quarto, which was reprinted at the same place in 1818, also in quarto.⁴

XII.—*G. of Griesbach's notation, and G. according to Wetstein's and Dr. Scholz's notations, is the Codex HARLEIANUS 5691, in the British Museum, formerly cited as Codex Wolfii A. Its first possessor was Erasmus Seidel who brought this and the following manuscript from the East. After his death both manuscripts were purchased by La Croze; by whom they were presented to J. C. Wolff, of Hamburg. The latter collated them, and published his collations in the third volume of his Anecdota Græca, p. 48. et seq. Michaelis refers the Codex Harleianus 5684. to the eighth century, but Scholz dates it in the eleventh century. Griesbach thinks it scarcely more ancient than the twelfth century. It is written on vellum, in quarto, with accents and spirits, and has the following chasms, viz. Matt. i. 1. to vi. 6., vii. 25. to viii. 9., viii. 23. to ix. 2., xxviii. 18. to Mark i. 13., Mark i. 32. to ii. 4. and xiv. 19—25. Luke i. 1—13. v. 4. to vii. 3., viii. 46. to ix. 5., xi. 27—41. and xxiv. 41. to the end of Saint Luke's Gospel; John xvii. 5—19., and xix.

Astle on the Origin of Writing, p. 76, 2d edit. (From this work our fac-simile is copied.) The Greek and Latin text of the Codex Laudianus was printed at Oxford in 8vo. in 1715, by the celebrated antiquary, Thomas Hearne.

Another fac-simile of them is given by Bianchini, in his Evangelium Quadruplex, vol. i. in the last of the plates annexed to p. 533.

4—27. The text agrees with that of the Constantinopolitan recension, though it has some readings which are common to the Alexandrine recension.

XIII.—H. The Codex Wolfii B. was also brought from the East by Seidel; it is written on vellum, in quarto, and is of the eleventh century. It contains the four Gospels, which, however, are mutilated in the following passages, viz. Matt. i. 1. to xv. 30., xxv. 3. to xxvi. 3. Mark xv. 41. to xvi. 14., Luke v. 18—33., vi. 8—23., x. 2—19., John ix. 30. to x. 25., xviii. 2—25. and xx. 12—25. It follows the Constantinopolitan family, but it has many readings in common with the Alexandrine recension.

XIV.—*H., in Griesbach's notation of manuscripts of Saint Paul's Epistles, is the Codex Coislinianus, a very beautiful manuscript of the fifth or sixth century, according to Montfaucon; but Griesbach assigns it to the seventh century. It contains fragments of Saint Paul's Epistles, written in uncial characters, with accents; and was formerly kept at mount Athos, where it was applied, as old parchment, to the binding of other books, in the year 1218; as appears in a note of the book to the binding of which it was applied.¹

XV.—I. The Codex Cottonianus (Titus C. XV.), preserved in the Cottonian Library in the British Museum, is a most precious fragment of the four Gospels, written in silver letters on a faded purple ground. It is one of the oldest (if not the most ancient) manuscripts of any part of the New Testament that is extant; and contains,

(1.) Part of Saint Matthew's Gospel, beginning at Chapter XXVI. v. 57. and ending with v. 65. of the same Chapter.

(2.) Part of the same Gospel, beginning at Chapter XXVII v. 26. and ending with v. 34. of the same Chapter.

(3.) Part of Saint John's Gospel, beginning at Chapter XIV v. 2. and ending with v. 10. of the same Chapter.

(4.) Part of the same Gospel, beginning at Chapter XV. v. 15. and ending with v. 22. of the same Chapter.

BUTBYME

The words ΙΗΣΟΥΣ (Jesus), ΘΕΟΣ (God), ΚΥΡΙΟΣ (Lord), ΥΙΟΣ (Son), and ΣΩΤΗΡ (Saviour), are written in letters of gold; the first three with contractions similar to those in the Codex Alexandrinus, and Codex Bezae. This precious fragment is generally acknowledged to have been executed at the end of the fourth, or at the latest in the beginning of the fifth century. Dr. Scholz, however, refers it to the seventh or eighth century.

XVI.—K., in the first volume of Wetstein's, Griesbach's, and Scholz's critical editions of the New Testament, is the Codex Cyprius (Regius 63., formerly 2243., and Colbertinus 5149.), a manuscript of the four Gospels, brought from the Island of Cyprus in the year 1637; and now deposited in the Royal Library at Paris, where it is at present numbered 33. This manuscript was first collated by Father Simon,² whose extracts of various readings were inserted by Dr. Mill in his critical edition of the New Testament.³ Wetstein charged this manuscript with Latinizing, but without sufficient evidence. Michaelis deemed it to be of great value, and expressed a wish for a more accurate collation of it. That wish was not realized until the year 1819, when Dr. J. M. A. Scholz, of Heidelberg, being at Paris, subjected this manuscript to a very rigorous critical examination; the results of which he communicated to the public in his Curæ Criticæ in Historiam Textus Evangeliorum (4to. Heidelbergæ, 1820) from this work the following particulars are abridged.

This manuscript is written on vellum, in an oblong quarto size, and in excellent preservation. The uncial characters are not round, as in most ancient manuscripts, but leaning; they exhibit evident marks of haste, and sometimes of carelessness, in the transcriber, and they present the same abbreviations as occur in the Alexandrine, Vatican, and other manuscripts. In a few instances, accents are absent, but frequently they are incorrectly placed; the spirits (asper and lenis) are often interchanged; and the permutations of vowels and consonants are very numerous. Thus we meet with κεκρυμμενα for κεκρυμμενα (Matt. xiii. 44.); ο.β.η for ο.β.η (Mark iv. 22.); ραββι for ραββι (Matt. xxiii. 7., xxvi. 25. 49., &c.); ακαδεμης for ακαδεμης (Luke iv. 29.); ταυτα for ταυτα (Luke viii. 9.); αδελφον for αδελφον for αδελφον (Matt. xxv. 5.); Ναζαρεθ for Ναζαρεθ (Mark i. 9.), &c. From the confused and irregular manner in which the accents and spirits are placed, Dr. Scholz conjectures that the Codex Cyprius was transcribed from a more ancient copy that was nearly destitute of those distinctions. Some of the permutations are unquestionably errors of the transcriber; but the greater part of them, he is of opinion, must be referred to the orthography and pronunciation which (it is well known) were peculiar to the Alexandrians. To this manuscript are prefixed a Synaxarium,¹ or epitome of the lives of the Saints who are venerated by the Greek church, and a Menologion,² or martyrology, together with the canons of Eusebius: to each of the three last Gospels is also prefixed an index of the κεφαλαια or larger chapters. The numbers of the Ammonian sections and larger chapters,³ are marked in the inner margin; and the numbers of the other chapters, together with the titles, are placed either at the top or at the bottom of the page. The Gospel of St. Matthew comprises 359 Ammonian sections, and 68 chapters; that of St. Mark, 241 sections, and 48 chapters; that of St. Luke, 342 sections, and 83 chapters; and the Gospel of St. John, 232 sections, and 19 chapters. The celebrated passage in John viii. 1—11., concerning the woman who had been taken in adultery, constitutes a distinct chapter. From the occasional notation of certain days, on which particular portions were to be read, as well as from the prefixing of the synaxarion and menologion, Dr. Scholz considers this manuscript as having originally been written, and constantly used, for ecclesiastical purposes. In very many instances it agrees with the Constantinopolitan and Alexandrine recensions; in others, with the Alexandrine alone, and in a few instances with neither.

A considerable difference of opinion prevails, respecting the age of the Codex Cyprius. Montfaucon assigned it to the eighth century; Scholz and Hug, to the ninth century; and Simon, to the tenth century. Specimens of its characters have been given by Montfaucon,³ Blanchini,⁴ and Dr. Scholz;⁵ the annexed fac-simile is copied from that of Dr. S.: it contains part of the first verse of the twenty-eighth chapter of St. Matthew's Gospel, in English thus:

INTHEENDOFTHEABBATH'ASITBEGANTODAWNTOWAR
DS(THIFIRSTDAY)OFTHEWEEKCAMEMARYMAGDALENE.

This manuscript is of considerable importance in a critical point of view, particularly as it affords great weight to the readings of the best and most ancient MSS., ancient versions, and the fathers.⁶

XVII.—L. The CODEX REGIUS 62. (formerly 2861. Stephani.) is a quarto manuscript on vellum, containing the four Gospels, and written in uncial letters, of an oblong form, according to Wetstein in the beginning of the seventh century, but in the opinion of Dr. Scholz, in the eighth century. Griesbach refers it to the eighth or ninth century. The accents are frequently wanting, and are often wrongly placed, even when they are inserted; from which circumstance Griesbach and Scholz think that this manuscript was transcribed from another very ancient one, which had no accents. Each page is divided into two columns, and the words follow, for the most part, without any intervals between them. The iota subscriptum, and postscriptum, are uniformly wanting: the usual abbreviations occur, and the letters ΑΥ and ΟΥ are sometimes written with contractions, as in the Codex Coislinianus I. (a manuscript of the eighth century); and not seldom a letter is dropped in the middle of a word:—Thus, we read in it παρβην for παρβην, αληστει for αληστει, καταρμεις for καταρμεις, &c. &c. Errors in orthography appear in every page, and also permutations of vowels and consonants. This manuscript contains the four Gospels, with the following chasms, viz. Matt. iv. 21.—v. 14 and xxviii. 17. to the end of the Gospel; Mark x. 17—30. and xv. 10—20.; and John xxi. 15. to the end. The τιτλοι and the Ammonian sections with reference to the canons of Eusebius are written in the Codex Regius à primâ manu. This manuscript harmonizes with the Alexandrine or Western Recension. It was collated by Robert Stephens, and by Wetstein, but more accurately by Griesbach, with the exception of Matt. viii.—xviii.; which chapters he states that he examined in a cursory manner. The parts omitted by Griesbach were carefully collated by Dr. Scholz.

XVIII.—M. The CODEX REGIUS 48. (formerly 2243.) is a manuscript of the four Gospels, presented to Louis XIV. by the Abbé François des Camps, Jan. 1, 1706. It is written on vellum, of the tenth century, and has the Eusebian canons, together with synaxaria, summaries of chapters, accents, musical notes, the usual abbreviations and permutations of words similar in sound. The text for the most part agrees with the Alexandrine Recension, but sometimes with the Constantinopolitan, and it has a few readings which are peculiar to K. or the Codex Cyprius. Dr. Scholz has described it in his Biblico-Critical Travels, and collated it throughout.

XIX.—N. The CODEX VINDOBONENSIS, Lambecii 2., in the Imperial Library at Vienna, contains a fragment of Saint Luke's Gospel, viz. ch. xxiv. 21—40. It has already been described in § IV. pp. 227, 228. of this volume. Scholz, after Fleischer, refers it to the seventh century; but it should rather seem to be of the fifth or sixth century.

XX.—O. is a fragment, torn out of some larger manuscript, containing the narrative of the Pharisee and the Publican, in Luke xviii.: it was presented by Anselm Banduri to Montfaucon. Only one reading has been quoted from it by Wetstein, Griesbach, and Scholz, viz. ἡ γὰρ ἔκλειπεν, which has been received into the text by the two last-mentioned editors, as well as by Schott, Vater, Naeb, Goeschen, and Tittmann.

XXI.—P. The CODEX GUELPHERBYTANUS A. contains fragments of the four Gospels, written on vellum in the sixth century, which were erased in the eighth or ninth century, in order to write several works of Isidore of Seville.

XXII.—Q. The CODEX GUELPHERBYTANUS B. is also a palimpsest manuscript of the sixth century, containing fragments of the Gospels of Luke and John, which were erased, in order to make room for some treatises of Isidore of Seville.

XXIII.—R. The CODEX TUBINGENSIS is a single leaf of thick vellum in quarto, written on both sides, in the seventh century. It contains John i. 33—50.

XXIV.—S. The CODEX VATICANUS 351. contains the four Gospels with the canons of Eusebius. It is written on vellum, in folio, by one Michael, a monk, in the year 949. It almost uniformly agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

XXV.—T. The CODEX BORGIANUS I. is a fragment of a Codex Cyprius reads οὐκ ἀνεδέχθη which in later manuscripts is altered to οὐκ ἠδυνήθη, because the celebrated antagonist of Christianity, Porphyry, had used it as a ground of objection. With the Codex Cyprius agree the Cambridge Manuscript, the Codices Regii 14. (33. of Griesbach's notation), and 55. (17. of Griesbach), several of the Moscow manuscripts cited by Matthæi, the Memphitic and Ethiopic versions, together with several of the Anie-Hieronymian versions, and among the fathers, Jerome, Augustine, Cyril, Chrysostom, and Epiphanius. This reading alone proves that the Codex Cyprius has not been altered from the Latin, as Wetstein asserted without any authority.

Greek-Sahidic manuscript of the fifth century, in quarto, containing John vi. 28—67. and vii. 6—8, 31. It was published by Georgi, at Rome, in 1789, with the Sahidic version. Its text follows that of the Alexandrine recension.

XXVI.—U. The CODEX NANIANUS 1., in the library of St. Mark, at Venice, contains the four Gospels with the Eusebian canons. It is nearly entire, and for the most part agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. Dr. Birch, by whom it was first collated, refers it to the tenth or eleventh century; Dr. Scholz, to the tenth century.

XXVII.—V. is a manuscript in the library of the Holy Synod at Moscow, thus noted by Matthæi in his edition of the Greek Testament. It is written on vellum, in octavo, and contains the four Gospels. From Matt. i. to John vii. 38. is in uncial letters, of the eighth century; from John vii. 39. to the end, is the writing of the thirteenth or fourteenth century; it follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

XXVIII.—W. is a fragment annexed to the CODEX REGIUS Parisiensis 314., containing Luke ix. 36—47., and x. 12—22. It is written on vellum, in quarto, in the eighth century, and agrees with the Alexandrine family. It was first collated by Dr. Scholz.

XXIX.—X. The CODEX LANDSHUTENSIS, formerly Ingolstadtensis, is a neatly written manuscript of the tenth century, containing the four Gospels, the text of which almost uniformly agrees with the Alexandrine recension. Dobrowski, who communicated some readings from this manuscript, referred it to the eleventh century: it was, for the first time, collated throughout by Dr. Scholz. To the text of the Gospels of Matthew and John are added commentaries taken from Chrysostom, on John xix. 16. et seq. from Origen and Hesychius of Jerusalem, and on Luke from Titus of Bostra. Many leaves are misplaced by the carelessness of the binder, and there are numerous chasms, which are specified by Dr. Scholz.

XXX.—Y. The CODEX BIBLIOTHECÆ BARBERINIANÆ 225 is a fragment in folio, of the ninth century, written on vellum. It contains John xvi. 4. to xix. 28., and agrees with the Alexandrine family.

XXXI.—Z. is the CODEX RESCRIPTUS of St. Matthew's Gospel, in the library of Trinity College, Dublin. It was discovered by the Rev. Dr. Barrett, senior fellow of that college. While he was examining different books in its library, he met with a very ancient Greek manuscript, on certain leaves of which he observed a two-fold writing, one ancient and the other comparatively recent, transcribed over the former. The original writing on these leaves had been greatly defaced, either by the injuries of time, or by art: on close examination, he found, that this ancient writing consisted of the three following fragments:—The Prophet Isaiah, the Evangelist Saint Matthew, and certain orations of Gregory Nazianzen. The fragment, containing Saint Matthew's Gospel, Dr. Barrett carefully transcribed; and the whole has been accurately engraved in fac-simile by the order and at the expense of the University, thus presenting to the reader a perfect resemblance of the original.¹ The accompanying engraving is copied from Dr. B.'s first plate.

Of the original writing of this manuscript, which Dr. Barrett calls the Codex Vetus, only sixty-four leaves remain, in a very mutilated state: each page contains one column; and the columns in general consist of twenty-one lines, and sometimes (though rarely) of twenty-two or twenty-three; the lines are nearly of equal lengths, and consist, ordinarily, of eighteen or twenty square letters, written on vellum, originally of a purple colour, but without any accents. From these two circumstances, as well as from the division of the text, the orthography, mode of pointing, abbreviations, and from some other considerations, Dr. Barrett, with great probability, fixes its age to the sixth century. This manuscript follows the Alexandrian Recension. The Codex Recens, or later writing (which contains several tracts of some Greek fathers), he attributes to a scribe of the thirteenth century: about which time it became a general practice to erase ancient writings, and insert others in their place.²

XXXII.—The CODEx HARLEIANUS, No. 5598., is a most splendid Evangelistarium, or collection of lessons from the four Gospels, written on vellum in uncial Greek letters, which are gilt on the first leaf, and coloured and ornamented throughout the rest of the book. It consists of seven hundred and forty-eight pages: and, according to an inscription on the last page, was written by one Constantine, a presbyter, A. D. 995. To several of the longer sections, titles are prefixed in larger characters. The passages of the Gospels are noted in the margin, as they occur, by a later hand, and between pages 726. and 729. there are inserted ten leaves of paper, containing the series of Lessons or Extracts from the Gospels, which are supposed to have been written by Dr. Covell, who was chaplain to the British embassy at Constantinople, A. D. 1670—1677, and was a diligent collector of MSS. The annexed fac-simile, from the third page of this precious manuscript, represents the eighteenth verse of the first chapter of Saint John's Gospel.

In ordinary Greek types, with a literal English version in parallel columns, it is as follows:—

ΘΝΟΥΔΕΙΣΕΩ	GDNOMANHATHSE
ΡΑΚΕΠΩΠΟΤΕ	ENATANYTIME
ΟΜΟΝΟΓΕΝΗΣΥΡ	THEONLYBEGOTTENSΝ
ΩΝ ΚΕΙΣΤΟΝ ΚΟΛ	WHOISIN THEBO
ΠΟΝΤΟΥ ΠΡΕΚΕΙ	SOMOF THEFHRRH
ΝΟΣ ΕΞΗΓΗΣΑΤΟ	EHATHMADEHIMKNOWN

The lines of this venerable MS. are not all of equal length, some containing ten, others ten or more letters, in each line. The same contractions of ΘΣ for Θεος (God), ΠΡ for Πατήρ (Father), ΥΣ for υιός (a son), &c. which occur in all the most ancient Greek manuscripts, are also to be seen in this Evangelistarium. This manuscript, which was unknown to Griesbach, was collated by Dr. Scholz, for his edition of the Greek Testament. He numbers it 153, in his catalogue of Evangelistaria.

XXXIII.—The CODEx UFFENBACHIANUS 2. (1. of Bengel's notation, and No. 53. of Wetstein's and Griesbach's catalogues of manuscripts of Saint Paul's Epistles), is a fragment of the Epistle to the Hebrews, consisting of two leaves: it is at present preserved in the public library at Hamburg. Having been very imperfectly described by Maius, Wetstein, and Bengel, Dr. H. P. C. Henke rendered an important service to biblical literature by subjecting it to a minute critical examination, the result of which he published at Helmstadt, in 1800, in a quarto tract, with a fac-simile of the writing.¹ According to this writer, the Codex Uffenbachianus originally consisted of one ternion, or six leaves, of which the four middle ones are lost. It is wholly written in red uncial characters, slightly differing from the square form observable in the most ancient manuscripts. The accents and notes of aspiration are carefully marked, but the iota subscriptum nowhere occurs: nor are any stops or minor marks of distinction to be seen, except the full stop, which is promiscuously placed at the bottom, in the middle, or at the top of a page, to serve as a comma, a colon, or a full point. The note of interrogation occurs only once, viz. in Heb. iii. 17. after the word ῥημι; but there are scarcely any abbreviations besides those which we have already noticed as existing in the Alexandrian and other ancient manuscripts: the annexed fac-simile exhibits the first four verses and part of the fifth verse of the Epistle to the Hebrews.

ii. Manuscripts containing the New Testament or the Four Gospels, written in cursive or ordinary Greek characters, which have been collated and cited by editors of the Greek Testament (and especially by Wetstein and Griesbach), who preceded Dr. Scholz, by whom their notation has been retained, with the exception of Numbers, 12. 87. 98. 100. 107. 111. 112. 122. and 172.

1. The CODEX BASILEENSIS, B. VI. 27. (noted by Bengel Bas, γ.) contains the whole of the New Testament, except the Revelation, and is written on vellum with accents. On account of the subscriptions and pictures which are found in it (one of which appears to be a portrait of the emperor Leo, surnamed the Wise, and his son Constantine Porphyrogenetus), Wetstein conjectures that it was written in their time, that is, in the tenth century. Michaelis and Griesbach have acceded to this opinion. Erasmus, who made use of it for his edition of the Greek Testament, supposed it to be a Latinising manuscript, and his supposition was subsequently adopted by Wetstein; but Michaelis has vindicated it from this charge, and asserts that it is entitled to very great esteem. According to Hug, the text of the Gospels is very different from the text of the other parts of the book. In the Acts and Epistles, according to Dr. Scholz, it agrees with the Constantinopolitan Recension; and in the Gospels, with the Alexandrine Recension.

2. The CODEX BASILEENSIS B. VI. 25. (noted by Bengel Bas, β.) is a manuscript of the fifteenth century, containing the four Gospels. Its text harmonizes with that of the Constantinopolitan Recension. It was used by Erasmus for his edition of the New Testament.

3. The CODEX COSENDONCENSIS formerly belonged to a monastery of Canons Regular of the Blessed Virgin at Cor-sendonck near Turnhout. It is a manuscript of the twelfth century, containing the whole of the New Testament, except the Apocalypse. It was used by Erasmus for his second edition. Wetstein charges it with being altered from the Latin.

4. The CODEX REGIUS 84., formerly 2867. (Stephani, γ.), is a manuscript of the four Gospels, written on vellum in the twelfth century. It was partially collated by Robert Stephens and subsequent editors, and for the first time throughout by Dr. Scholz, who states that its text is composed from the Alexandrine and Constantinopolitan Recensions, but more frequently agrees with the last.

5. The CODEX REGIUS 106., formerly 2871 (Stephani, δ.), contains the Acts, Catholic and Pauline Epistles, and the Gospels with Prologues; it is written on vellum in the twelfth century, and exhibits a mixed text. It was collated throughout by Dr. Scholz. Extracts from it were given by Dr. Mill, Wetstein, and Griesbach.

6. The CODEX REGIUS 112., formerly 3425, and then 2205. (Stephani, ε.), is a manuscript of the eleventh century, written on vellum in 12mo. It contains the Gospel, Acts, and Epistles, with synaxaria,² and the liturgy of Chrysostom. To the Gospels of St. Mark, St. Luke, and St. John, and to the Epistle of St. James and the first Epistle of St. Peter, are prefixed an argument and index of chapters; to the remaining Catholic Epistles and to those of St. Paul, only an argument. This manuscript is pronounced by Michaelis to be of very great importance: it has the following chasms, which were first discovered by Griesbach, viz. Matt. i. 1.—ii. 21.; xxvi. 33.—53.; xxvii. 26.—xxviii. 10.; Mark i. 2. to the end of the chapter; and John xxi. 2. to the end of the Gospel. The various readings from this manuscript given by Kuster and Wetstein are very inaccurate. Matt. xiii. xiv. and xv. were the only three chapters actually collated by Griesbach. It was collated by Dr. Scholz, in the Gospel of St. Matthew, in Mark i.—iv. and John vii. viii. The text is a mixed one.

7. The CODEX REGIUS 71., formerly 2866. (Stephani, ζ.), is a manuscript of the eleventh century, written on vellum, and containing the four Gospels, with prologues, synaxaria, the Eusebian canons, and figures. The text for the most part agrees with that of the Constantinopolitan Recension, though there also are very many Alexandrine readings. Dr. Scholz collated it in Mark i.—vi. and John iii. 8.

8. The CODEX REGIUS 49., formerly 2242. (Stephani, η.), is a manuscript on vellum, of the eleventh century. It is correctly written, in folio, and contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons, and synaxaria: it follows the Alexandrine Recension. Michaelis's account of this manuscript is very perplexed: in this notice we have adopted the numeration of Dr. Scholz, who not only saw it, but collated it expressly for the Gospel of St. John.

9. The CODEX REGIUS 83., formerly 2862. (Stephani, θ.), is a manuscript of the four Gospels, written, according to the subscription, in the year 1168, while Manuel Porphyrogenetus reigned at Constantinople, Amaury at Jerusalem, and William II. in Sicily. It contains the four Gospels, with the Eusebian canons, and synaxaria. The text for the most part agrees with that of the Constantinopolitan Recension. Kuster printed extracts from this manuscript, which were retained in Wetstein's and Griesbach's editions: it was collated by Dr. Scholz in Matt. i.—viii., Mark i.—iv., and John iv.—viii.

10. The CODEX REGIUS 91., formerly 2865. and 2247. (Kuster, Paris, 1), is a manuscript of the four Gospels, of the thirteenth or fourteenth century, according to Griesbach, and of the thirteenth century according to Scholz. This manuscript came from Greece: for the subscription states that it was given in 1439 to the library of the Canons Regular at Verona, by Dorotheus, a Greek by nation, and archbishop of Mitylene, who was present at the synod convened at Florence [in 1438] for the purpose of uniting the Greek and Latin churches. It contains the four Gospels, with the Eusebian canons, and synaxaria. Kuster's collation is by no means accurate: and many remarkable readings were omitted by Wetstein, according to Griesbach, who expresses a wish for its more accurate examination. Dr. Scholz collated it for Mark i.—iv. and John iv.—viii. The text of this manuscript, for the most part, agrees with that of the Constantinopolitan Recension.

11. The CODEX REGIUS 121. and 122., formerly 3424. 2. and 3., is a small octavo manuscript in two volumes, of the twelfth century, according to Dr. Scholz, but of the tenth century in the judgment of Montfaucon. It is neatly executed, and contains the four Gospels with the Eusebian canons. Kuster has printed some readings from this manuscript, which was collated anew by Scholz; who states that its readings, for the most part, follow those of the Constantinopolitan Recension, though there are many readings peculiar to the Alexandrine manuscripts.

12. The CODEX REGIUS 230. is a quarto manuscript on vellum, of the eleventh century, containing the Gospels, with synaxaria, the Eusebian canons, prologues, figures, and commentaries. A very few instances excepted, it agrees with the Constantinopolitan Recension. It was collated for the Gospels of Mark, Luke, and John, by Dr. Scholz, who has substituted this manuscript for No. 12. of Wetstein's notation (* 12 of Griesbach), in the place of three manuscripts in the royal library at Paris, viz. 185.^a (No. 120. infra), 85. (No. 119. infra), and another manuscript, at present unknown, the readings of which and this number had been confounded together by Wetstein.

13. The CODEX REGIUS 50., formerly 2244.^b (Kuster, Paris, 6.), is a quarto manuscript on vellum, of the twelfth century, according to Scholz, of the thirteenth century according to Michaelis, and of the twelfth or thirteenth century according to Griesbach. It contains the four Gospels, with synaxaria, and follows the Alexandrine Recension. It has the following chasms, viz. Matt. i. 1.—ii. 21. xxvi. 33.—53. xxvii. 26.—xxviii. 10., Mark i. 21—45., and John xxi. 2.—25. It was negligently collated by Kuster and Wetstein, and

14. The CODEx REGIUS 70., formerly 3421. and 2396., (Kuster, Paris, 7.), is a manuscript on vellum, very neatly and correctly written in the year 961, as appears from the subscription. It contains the four Gospels, with the Eusebian canons, figures, and the paschal canon; and follows the Constantinopolitan text. It was collated by Scholz in Matt. vii.—xxi., Mark i.—vi., Luke iii. iv. ix. xi., and John iii.—ix.

15. The CODEx REGIUS 61., formerly 2868., and afterwards 2232. (Kuster, Paris, 8.), is a very neat copy of the four Gospels, of the tenth century, with the Eusebian canons, pictures, and synaxaria. Extracts from it were given by Kuster; and Dr. Scholz collated the chief parts of the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and John.

16. The CODEx REGIUS 51., formerly 1881., is a neatly written Greek-Latin manuscript of the four Gospels, of the fourteenth century. It was collated by Wetstein; and Dr. Scholz collated the Gospel of Mark, and select passages from the other Gospels. The text of this manuscript rarely departs from the received text; but it has some Alexandrine readings.

17. The CODEx REGIUS 55., formerly 2053., and afterwards 2244., is a folio manuscript of the sixteenth century, containing the four Gospels with a Latin version. According to Wetstein and Scholz, it was written in France, by George Hermonymus of Sparta, who was Greek professor at Paris, and the preceptor of Budaus and Reuchlin. Wetstein examined this manuscript, but only in a very cursory manner, according to Griesbach, who has given more extracts from it. The Gospel of Mark, and select passages of the other Gospels, were collated by Scholz, who states that this manuscript very rarely departs from the received text.

18. The CODEx REGIUS 47., formerly 2241., was written in the year 1361; it contains the New Testament, with prologues, synaxaria, psalms, and hymns. The Gospels and Acts were collated by Scholz, who examined the remaining books of the New Testament cursorily. Its text closely follows that of the Constantinopolitan recension.

19. The CODEx REGIUS 189., formerly 437., also numbered 1880., is the same manuscript which Wetstein cites as the CODEx REGIUS 1869. It was written on vellum in the twelfth century, and contains the four Gospels, with a catena on John, and scholia on the other Gospels. The text is that of the Constantinopolitan recension, though there are some changes which have been introduced from an Alexandrine copy. This manuscript was collated throughout by Dr. Scholz.

20. The CODEx REGIUS 188., formerly 1883., was brought from the East in 1669. It was written in the twelfth century, and contains the Gospels, with a catena on Matthew, and the commentaries of Victor, a presbyter of Antioch, or of Cyril of Alexandria, on Mark; of Titus of Bostra, and other fathers, on Luke; and of John Chrysostom and other fathers on John. Further, there are scholia written in the outer margin; and at the end of each Gospel are dissertations on various topics by Eusebius Pamphilus, Isidorus Hippolytus of Thebes, Sophronius, archbishop of Jerusalem, and others. A later copyist has supplied some omissions in the text, as in Mark ix. 5. 37. At the end of the Gospel of Mark, it is stated that this Gospel was transcribed from accurate manuscripts, and collated; and nearly the same assertion is made at the close of the Gospels of Luke and John. The text, for the most part, follows the Constantinopolitan recension; but it has many Alexandrine readings, chiefly in those passages which have been altered by a later hand. Dr. Scholz collated the greater part of this manuscript.

21. The CODEx REGIUS 68., formerly 2860. and 1007., contains the four Gospels, which were written in the tenth century on vellum, together with synaxaria, written on paper by a later hand. Wetstein cited this manuscript only on John viii. It was collated by Scholz on Matt i.—xi., the Gospel of Mark, and John iv. v. vii. viii. It belongs to the Constantinopolitan family.

22. The CODEx REGIUS 72., formerly 2244. (incorrectly cited by Wetstein on John viii. as No. 2242.), Colbertinus 2467, is a manuscript on vellum, correctly written in the eleventh century. It contains the four Gospels, which are mutilated in Matt. i.—ii. 2. and John xiv. 22. to xvi. 27. Some leaves are transposed by the carelessness of the bookbinder. Its orthography and text coincide with those of the Alexandrine recension. This manuscript was collated by Wetstein, and also by Scholz, who states that there are traces of readings which were added in the sixteenth century.

23. The CODEx REGIUS 77., formerly 2861^a and 3947, Colbertinus 3947, contains the four Gospels written on vellum in the eleventh century, with a Latin version of Matthew, Mark, and Luke i. 1.—iv. 18., which very rarely differs from the Vulgate. It is mutilated in Matt. i. 1.—xvii. Luke xxiv. 46. to John ii. 20., and in xx. xxi. 21, 25. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension. The chief part of this manuscript was collated by Scholz.

24. The CODEx REGIUS 178., formerly 2244^b, Colbertinus 4112, on vellum, of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels with a commentary, and with synaxaria which appear to have been added by a later hand. It is mutilated from Matt. xxvii. 20. to Mark iv. 22. This manuscript follows the Constantinopolitan recension; nearly the whole of it was collated by Scholz.

25. The CODEx REGIUS 191., formerly 1880^c, Colbertinus 2259, is a folio manuscript on vellum of the tenth century, containing the Gospel with scholia. The text is composed from Constantinopolitan and Alexandrine copies. It has the following chasms, viz. Matt. xxiii. 1.—xxv. 42. Mark i. 1.—vii. 36. Luke viii. 31—41. ix. 44—51. x. 39.—xi. 4. and John xiii. from the middle to the end of that Gospel. Many leaves have been transposed by the error or carelessness of the bookbinder; the whole of this manuscript was collated by Scholz.

26. The CODEx REGIUS 78., formerly 2244. 5., Colbertinus 4078, is a manuscript on vellum of the eleventh century, neatly and correctly written by one Paul, a presbyter, and containing the Gospels, with a commentary and the Eusebian canons. Its text almost always agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension; though there are many Alexandrine readings. It was collated by Wetstein and Scholz.

27. The CODEx REGIUS 115., formerly 2863^d, Colbertinus 6013, in Dr. Mill's notation Colb. 1., is a manuscript of the eleventh century, neatly and correctly written, and containing the Gospels with synaxaria and pictures. John xviii. 3. to the end of that gospel is written on cotton paper, in the fourteenth century. Though this manuscript has not a few peculiar readings, and such as are common to the Alexandrine recension, yet it for the most part follows the Constantinopolitan text. It was collated again both by Wetstein, and by Scholz. Michaelis states that in this manuscript many readings have been erased, and others substituted in their stead.

28. The CODEx REGIUS 379., formerly 3012^e, Colbertinus 4075, (Mill, Colb. 1.) is a manuscript of the tenth century, not very correctly written: it chiefly follows the Alexandrine recension, though it has many readings which are peculiar to the received text and to itself. It contains the Gospels with synaxaria, and it has the following chasms, Matt. vii. 17.—ix. 12. xiv. 33.—xvi. 10. xvi. 70.—xxvii. 48. Luke xx. 19.—xxii. 46. John xii. 40.—xiii. 1., xv. 24.—xvi. 12. xviii. 16—28. xx. 20.—xxi. 5. 18—25. It was collated anew and described by Scholz.

29. The CODEx REGIUS 89., formerly 2860, Colbertinus 4705 (in Mill, Colb. 3.), a manuscript on vellum of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels with scholia, and fragments of the Eusebian canons. Some lost leaves in the Gospels of Mark, Luke, and John, have been added in the fifteenth century. Though it chiefly agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, it has numerous Alexandrine readings which have been added by some corrector. This manuscript was collated by Scholz in Matt. i.—v., and John v.—viii.

30. The CODEx REGIUS 100., formerly 2860^f, Colbertinus 4444 (in Mill, Colb. 4.), is a manuscript written on paper in the sixteenth century, by George Hermonymus of Sparta; it contains the Gospels, and not the first sixteen chapters only of Matthew, as Mill and after him Wetstein and Griesbach have asserted. Its text varies little from that of No. 17, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. Dr. Scholz collated it for select passages of the Gospels.

6083, is a manuscript on vellum, of the thirteenth century. It contains the Gospels, with prayers. Many parts of this manuscript, which were ill written, have been erased. The text is that of the Constantinopolitan family: it was collated by Scholz in select passages.

32. The CODEx REGIUS 116., formerly 2860, Colbertinus 6511, contains the Gospels, written on vellum, in the thirteenth century; but Matt. i. 1.—x. 22. xxiv. 15—30. Luke xxii. 35.—John iv. 20. are wanting. This manuscript was evidently used for ecclesiastical purposes; its text is mixed, but for the most part it follows the Constantinopolitan recension. It was collated by Scholz in select passages.

33. The CODEx REGIUS 14., formerly 1871, Colbertinus 2844 (in Mill, Colb. 8. for the Gospels, Colb. 6. for the Acts, and Colb. 7. for the Epistles), is a manuscript of the eleventh century according to Scholz, and of the eleventh or twelfth according to Griesbach. It contains part of the prophets, and the whole of the New Testament; the extremities of almost all the leaves are torn, and many leaves are transposed by the book binder. It agrees throughout with the Alexandrine recension. This manuscript was collated by Wetstein, Griesbach (in Matt. i.—xviii.), Begtrup, and again throughout by Scholz.

34. The CODEx COISLINIANUS 195., is a manuscript elegantly written on vellum, on Mount Athos, in the eleventh century. It contains the Gospels with a catena, prologues, and figures. The text closely agrees with that of the Constantinopolitan recension. It was cursorily collated by Wetstein and by Scholz.

35. CODEx COISLINIANUS 199., contains the New Testament, written on vellum in the eleventh century: it has been corrected in many places. The text very rarely differs from the textus receptus: it was cursorily collated both by Wetstein and by Scholz.

36. The CODEx COISLINIANUS 20., is a manuscript of the eleventh century on vellum, brought from Mount Athos: it contains the four Gospels with the Eusebian canons, prefaces, and commentaries. The text agrees with that of the Constantinopolitan family; it was cursorily collated by Wetstein and by Scholz.

37. The CODEx COISLINIANUS 21., of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels with scholia, the Eusebian canons, synaxaria, and figures. Its text agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was cursorily collated by Wetstein and Scholz.

38. The CODEx COISLINIANUS 200., (Stephani 9.) is a manuscript of the fourteenth century, according to Scholz, but of the thirteenth century according to Griesbach. It contains the New Testament, except the Epistles of St. Paul, with figures, and is mutilated in Matt. xiv. 15.—xv. 30. xx. 14.—xxi. 27. and Mark xii. 3.—xiii. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension; and was cursorily collated by Wetstein and Scholz.

39. The CODEx COISLINIANUS 23., formerly 315., was written in the eleventh century: according to the subscription it was presented to the monastery of St. Athanasius on Mount Athos in the year 1218. It contains the four Gospels with commentaries, and follows the Constantinopolitan recension; it was cursorily collated by Wetstein and Scholz. This manuscript was presented to Louis IX. king of France, by the Greek emperor Michael Palæologus.

40. The CODEx COISLINIANUS 22., formerly 375., a manuscript of the eleventh century, brought from Mount Athos, contains the four Gospels, with commentaries and the Eusebian canons. It is defective from John xx. 25. to the end. It follows the Constantinopolitan family, and was cursorily collated by Wetstein and Scholz.

41. The CODEx COISLINIANUS 24., formerly 141., contains the Gospels of Matthew and Mark with commentaries, and was written on vellum in the eleventh century. It was collated by Wetstein, and again cursorily by Scholz.

42. The CODEx MEDICÆUS Pithoei is a manuscript of the four Gospels, the readings of which were extracted by Peter Pithou, and written in the margin of his copy of Stephens's edition of 1550. These readings were communicated to Dr. Mill by Mr. Bernard, the purchaser of that copy; and from Mill they have been copied by Wetstein, Griesbach, and Scholz. Amelotte, who professes to have used this manuscript, states that it was preserved in the collect at Troyes in his time (the close of the seventeenth century). Dr. Scholz sought for it in vain in the different libraries of France, and says that it could not be found in the city of Troyes. The readings of this manuscript coincide with those of the Alexandrine recension.

43. The CODEx GRÆCUS 4., in the Library of the Arsenal at Paris, formerly called the Codex San-Maglorianus, is a manuscript of the eleventh or twelfth century, in two volumes 4to.: the first contains the Gospels with the Eusebian canons; the second, the Acts and Epistles. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension; Amelotte and Simon both used this manuscript; which, from the subscription to the second Epistle to Timothy, appears to have been written at Ephesus. It was collated for select chapters by Scholz.

44. The CODEx MISSYANUS, now in the British Museum (No. 4949 of the additional manuscripts), is a manuscript of the four Gospels, of the eleventh century, which Cæsar de Missy procured from Mount Athos, and collated for Wetstein, to whom he communicated its readings. Like all other manuscripts brought from that mountain, it agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

45. The CODEx BAROCCIANUS 31., now in the Bodleian library at Oxford (in Mill, Bodl. 1.) is a manuscript of the four Gospels on vellum, of the fourteenth century, with the Eusebian canons and figures. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. It was collated by Dr. Mill, and afterwards in select passages by Griesbach.

46. The CODEx BAROCCIANUS 29., (in Mill, Bodl. 2.) was written in the fifteenth century. It contains the four Gospels, with synaxaria, the Eusebian canons, and figures. It was collated by Dr. Mill, and was afterwards examined by Griesbach for readings on Mark xii. which, he asserts, had been neglected by Dr. Mill.

47. The CODEx BODLEIANUS (in Mill, Bodl. 6.) is a manuscript of the fifteenth century, containing the four Gospels. Archbishop Usher was the first who procured extracts from this manuscript, which were inserted in the sixth volume of Bishop Walton's Polyglott, whence they were taken by Mill and by subsequent editors of the Greek Testament. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

48. The CODEx BODLEIANUS (in Mill, Bodl. 7.) is a manuscript of the thirteenth century, containing the Gospels with scholia, and the Eusebian canons. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated by Mill.

49. The CODEx BODLEIANUS, Roe. 1. contains the four Gospels with the Eusebian canons, which were collated by Mill. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

50. The CODEx BODLEIANUS, LAUDIANUS, D. 122. (in Mill, Laud. 1.), contains the Gospels with commentaries: it was written in the eleventh century, and follows the Constantinopolitan recension. It was collated by Dr. Mill, and more accurately by Griesbach on Mark iv.—vii. and Luke viii. ix. This manuscript is defective from Matt. i. 1. to ix. 36. xii. 3—24. and xxv. 20—31. and John v. 18. to the end. Mark xiv. 40. to the end has been added by a later hand.

51. The CODEx BODLEIANUS, LAUDIANUS, C. 715., 63 (in Mill, Laud. 2.), of the thirteenth century, contains the Acts, Epistles, and Gospels, with synaxaria and prologues. It has many readings in common with the Complutensian Polyglott, and for the most part agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. It was collated by Mill and Griesbach.

52. The CODEx BODLEIANUS, LAUDIANUS, C. 28. (in Mill, Laud. 5.) was written in the year 1286, and contains the Gospels. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated first by Mill, and afterwards more accurately by Griesbach, on Mark iii. Luke iv. v. vi. and John v. 1—5. vii. 53.—viii. 19.

53. The CODEx² SELDENI 1., written in the fourteenth century, contains the Gospels: it follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated by Mill.

54. The CODEx SELDENI 2., written in 1338, contains the Gospels with synaxaria, and follows the Constantinopolitan recension. It was collated by Mill.

55. The CODEx SELDENI 3., written in the fifteenth century, also contains the Gospels with synaxaria. It was collated by Mill, and follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

56. The CODEx LINCOLNIENSIS 1., belonging to Lincoln college, Oxford, was written in 1502. It contains the Gospels, and follows the Constantinopolitan recension. It was collated by Bishop Walton and Dr. Mill.

57. The CODEx MAGDALENSIS L., belonging to Magdalen College, Oxford, contains the Gospels, Acts, Epistles, Psalms, and Hymns. It was written in the eleventh century, and is defective in Mark i. 1—11, the Epistles to the Romans, and 1 and 2 Corinthians. It was collated by Bishop Walton, Hammond, and Mill, and follows the Constantinopolitan family.

58. The CODEx NOV. COLL. L., in the library of New College, Oxford, is of the fifteenth or sixteenth century, and contains the Gospels, Acts, and Epistles. It was collated by Walton, and Mill. Dr. Scholz has not indicated with what recension this and the two following manuscripts agree.

59. The CODEx GONVILLI ET CAII is a manuscript of the four Gospels belonging to Cains College, Cambridge. It was collated by Walton, carefully examined by Mill, and inspected by Wetstein.

60. The CODEx CANTABRIGIENSIS, Dd. 9. 69. formerly Mori L., contains the Gospels very neatly written on paper, in 1297, and the Apocalypse in a more modern hand. It has the Ammonian sections, without reference to the Eusebian canons: and was collated by Dr. Mill.

61. The CODEx MONTFORTIANUS or MONTFORTII, also called DUBLINENSIS, is a manuscript containing the whole of the New Testament, preserved in the library of Trinity College, Dublin, to which it was presented by Archbishop Usher. It derives its name of Montfortianus from having belonged to Dr. Montfort, previously to coming into Usher's possession. It has acquired much celebrity as being supposed to be the only manuscript that has the much-contested clause in 1 John v. 7, 8, of which the following is a fac-simile:

ὁ αὐτὸς ἰσχυρὸς ὁ μαρτυρῶν
 ροῦν ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ, πᾶρ, λόγος, καὶ πᾶς ἅγιος, καὶ οὗτοι οἱ τρεῖς, ἐν ᾗ οἱ: καὶ πρὸς τὸν οἱ μαρτυ-ροῦν ἐν τῇ γῇ, πᾶς, ὕδωρ, καὶ αἷμα, καὶ τιν μαρτυρίαν: τῶν θένων λαμβάνομεν, ἡ μαρτυρία τοῦ θύ μόνον ἐστίν, ὅτι αὐτὴ ἐστὶν ἡ μαρτυρία τὸν Θεοῦ, ὅτι μεμαρτυρήκε περὶ τοῦ υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ.

In English, literally thus, for there are three that bear witness in heaven, father, word, and holy spirit, And these three are one: and there are three that bear witness on earth, spirit, water, and blood: if we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater, for this is the witness of God, which he hath testified of his son.

The CODEx MONTFORTIANUS is the same manuscript which was cited by Erasmus under the title of Codex Britannicus, who inserted the disputed passage in the third edition of his Greek Testament on its authority. It is written in small Greek characters on thick glazed paper, in duodecimo, and without folios. Dr. A. Clarke (to whom we are indebted for the preceding fac-simile)¹ is of opinion that it was most probably written in the thirteenth century, from the similarity of its writing to that of other manuscripts of the same time. He has no doubt but that it existed before the invention of printing, and is inclined to think it the work of an unknown bold critic, who formed a text from one or more manuscripts in conjunction with the Latin Vulgate, and who was by no means sparing of his own conjectural emendations, as it possesses various readings which exist in no manuscript yet discovered. But how far the writer has in any place faithfully copied the text of any particular ancient manuscript, is more than can be determined. In the early part of the last century, Mr. Martin claimed for this manuscript so early a date as the eleventh century. But Bishop Marsh, after Griesbach, contends that it is at least as modern as the fifteenth or sixteenth century. The Codex Montfortianus, he observes, "made its appearance about the year 1520: and that the manuscript had just been written, when it first appeared, is highly probable, because it appeared at a critical juncture, and its appearance answered a particular purpose."²

² "Erasmus had published two editions of the Greek Testament, one in 1516, the other in 1519, both of which were without the words that begin with καὶ οὗτοι, and end with ἐν ᾗ οἱ, in the disputed clause in 1 John v. 7, 8. This omission, as it was called by those who paid more deference to the Latin translation than to the Greek original, exposed Erasmus to much censure, though, in fact, the complaint was for non-addition. Erasmus, therefore, very properly answered, 'Addendi de meo, quod Græcis deest, provincianum non suscepim.' He promised, however, that though he could not insert in a Greek edition what he had never found in a Greek manuscript, he would insert the passage in his next edition, if in the mean time a Greek MS. could be discovered which had the passage. In less than a year after that declaration, Erasmus was informed that there was a Greek MS. in England which contained the passage. At the same time a copy of the passage, as contained in that MS., was communicated to Erasmus; and Erasmus, as he had promised, inserted that copy in his next edition, which was published in 1522."

But, whether written for the occasion or not, it could not have been written very long before the fifteenth century; for this manuscript has the Latin chapters, though the κεφαλαια of Eusebius are likewise noted. Now the Latin chapters were foreign to the usage of the Greek Church, before the introduction of printed editions, in which the Latin chapters were adopted, as well for the Greek as for the Latin Testament. Whatever Greek manuscripts therefore were written with Latin chapters, were written in the West of Europe, where the Latin chapters were in use. They were written by the Greeks, or by the descendants of those Greeks, who fled into the West of Europe, after the taking of Constantinople, and who then began to divide their manuscripts according to the usage of the country, in which they fixed their abode.³ The Dublin manuscript, therefore, if not written for the purpose to which it was applied in the third edition of Erasmus,⁴ could hardly have been written more than fifty years before. And how widely those critics have erred in their conjectures, who have supposed that it was written so early as the twelfth century, appears from the fact that the Latin chapters were not invented till the 13th century.⁵ But the influence of the Church of Rome in the composition of the Dublin manuscript, is most conspicuous in the text of that manuscript, which is a servile imitation of the Latin Vulgate. It will be sufficient to mention how it follows the Vulgate at the place in question. It not only agrees with the Vulgate, in the insertion of the seventh verse: it follows the Vulgate also at the end of the sixth verse, having χριστος, where all other Greek manuscripts have πνευμα: and in the eighth verse it omits the final clause which had never been omitted in the Greek manuscripts, and was not omitted even in the Latin manuscripts before the thirteenth century.⁶ Such is the character of that solitary manuscript, which is opposed to the united evidence of all former manuscripts, including the Codex Vaticanus, and the Codex Alexandrinus.⁷ Upon the whole, it does not appear that the date of the Codex Montfortianus can be earlier than the close of the fifteenth century. The uncollated parts of this manuscript were collated by the late Rev. Dr. Barrett,

³ "There are three Greek manuscripts with the Latin chapters in the University Library at Cambridge, marked Hh. 6. 12. Kk. 5. 35. and Ll. 2. 13. That which is marked Ll. 2. 13., and is evidently the oldest of the three, was written at Paris by Jerom of Sparta, for the use and at the expense of a person called Bodet, as appears from the subscription to it. Now Jerom of Sparta died at the beginning of the sixteenth century."

of Trinity College, Dublin, with Wetstein's edition of the Greek Testament; beginning with Rom. ii. and ending with the Apocalypse, including also a collation of the Acts of the Apostles, from chap. xxii. 27. to chap. xxviii. 2. This collation, comprising thirty-five pages, forms the third part of his fac-simile edition of the Codex Rescriptus of St. Matthew's Gospel.

62. The CODEx CANTABRIGIENSIS K. k. 5. 35., formerly belonging to Henry Googe, is a manuscript of the Gospels, written on paper in the fifteenth century. Its readings were first printed in the London Polyglott, whence they were copied by Mill, Wetstein, Griesbach, and Scholz. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

63. The CODEx USSERI 1., now in Trinity College, Dublin, where it is marked D. 20., is a folio manuscript on vellum, containing the four Gospels with commentaries. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. Some extracts from this manuscript were given in Bishop Fell's edition of the New Testament, in the Gospels of Luke and John. It was collated for Dr. Mill on all the Gospels by Richard Bulkley. Wetstein suspected that this manuscript is the same as the preceding, which Griesbach remarks is scarcely probable.

64. The CODEx USSERI 2., also in Trinity College, Dublin (F. 1.), formerly belonged to a Dr. Goad. It is a manuscript on vellum, in 8vo. containing the Gospels, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. Mill and Wetstein conjectured that this is the same manuscript which Bishop Walton quotes in the sixth volume of the London Polyglott by the abbreviation Em. as belonging either to Emanuel College, Cambridge, or perhaps to some fellow of that College. This, however, is far from being certain. Wetstein, Griesbach, and Scholz, have severally omitted the readings of the manuscript Em. Henry Dodwell gave extracts from this manuscript to Bishop Fell; and Richard Bulkley, to Dr. Mill.

65. The CODEx HARLEIANUS 5776., formerly cited as COVELLIANUS 1., is one of five manuscripts, brought from the East by Dr. John Covell: it contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons and prologues, and was collated by Dr. Mill. Griesbach merely says that it is not very ancient. Scholz refers it to the thirteenth century.

66. The CODEx THOMÆ GALE, contains the Gospels with synaxaria, part of the Eusebian canons and scholia. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated by Mill. No age has been assigned to this manuscript.

67. The CODEx HUNTINGTONIANUS 2., now in the Bodleian Library, is a manuscript of the eleventh century, which was brought from the East by Dr. Robert Huntington. It contains the Gospels, and is imperfect from John vi. 64. to the end. This manuscript was collated by Dr. Mill.

68. The CODEx WHELERI 1., now belonging to Lincoln College, Oxford, was brought from the East by Sir George Wheler. It contains the Gospels with the Eusebian canons, and was collated by Dr. Mill. Michaelis states that it was written in the year 1502.

69. The CODEx LEICESTRENSIS derives its name from being the property of the Corporation of Leicester: it is a manuscript of the whole New Testament, written by a modern hand, partly on paper, and partly on vellum, chiefly the former, and is referred by Wetstein and Griesbach to the fourteenth century. It is noted by Dr. Mill by the letter L., in the first part of Wetstein's New Testament, Codex 69.; in the second, 37.; in the third, 31.; and in the fourth, 14.; and by Griesbach, 69. The book of Acts is inserted between the epistle to the Hebrews and that of Saint James. This manuscript is defective from the beginning as far as Matt. xviii. 15., and has also the following chasms, viz. Acts x. 45.—xiv. 7. Jude 7. to the end of that Epistle, and it concludes with part of Rev. xix. It has many peculiar readings; and in those which are not confined to it, this manuscript chiefly agrees with D. or the Codex Cantabrigiensis: it also harmonizes in a very eminent manner with the old Syriac version; and, what further proves its value, several readings, which Dr. Mill found in it alone, have been confirmed by other manuscripts that belong to totally different countries. The Codex Leicestrensis was first collated by him, and afterwards more accurately by Mr. Jackson, the learned editor of Novatian's works, whose extracts were used by Wetstein. There is another and still more accurate transcript of Mr. J.'s collation in his copy of Mill's edition of the Greek Testament, which is now preserved in the library of Jesus College, Cambridge, where it is marked O, e, 1.²

70. The CODEx CANTABRIGIENSIS 11. 2. 13., now in the library of the University of Cambridge, formerly belonged to a Mr. Bunckle, and afterwards to Bishop More. It contains the Gospels, and was written in the fifteenth century, at Paris, by George Hermonymus, of Sparta, from whom we have a few other manuscripts of the Greek Testament. It was collated by Mill, and perhaps by Wetstein.

71. The CODEx EPHESIUS (so called because it had formerly belonged to a bishop of Ephesus) is now in the archiepiscopal library at Lambeth, to which it was presented by Thomas Traherne, together with a collection of its various readings³ which were printed by Mill. It was written in 1166, and contains the Gospels with scholia. For the most part it agrees with the Constantinopolitan family.

72. The CODEx HARLEIANUS 5647., formerly cited as JOHNSONII (from T. Johnson, a bookseller, who lent it to Wetstein for collation before it was sent into England), is a very elegantly written manuscript on vellum, of the eleventh century, which contains the four Gospels, with a catena on Matthew, and various readings on Matthew and Luke. It frequently agrees with the Alexandrine recension.

73. The CODEx WAKII 1., which formerly belonged to Dr. Wake, archbishop of Canterbury, is now in the library of Christ's College, Oxford. It contains the Gospels, written in the eleventh century, with the Eusebian canons.

74. The CODEx WAKII 2., also belonging to Christ's College, Oxford, is a manuscript, containing the Gospels, written on Mount Athos, in the thirteenth century. It is imperfect in Matt. i. 1—14. v. 30.—vi. 1. Both this and the preceding manuscript were collated by the Rev. John Walker, for Wetstein.

75. The CODEx GENEVENSI 19., written in the eleventh century, contains the Gospels with prologues, the Eusebian canons, and figures. The text agrees with the Constantinopolitan family: it has a few readings in common with other manuscripts, especially No. 6. (see p. 238. supra.) Wetstein says that he saw it in the year 1714. Scholz collated it in some select passages; and Professor Cellérier, of Geneva, also specially collated Matt. i.—xviii., and Mark i.—v. for his critical edition of the Greek Testament.

76. The CODEx CÆSAREUS VINDOBONENSIS (in Lambecius's catalogue 28.) contains the Gospels, Acts, and Epistles, with prologues, synaxaria, and figures. It was written in the eleventh century, and was collated by Gerard Von Maestricht, and most accurately by Alter.

77. The CODEx CÆSAREUS VINDOBONENSIS (in Lambecius 29., and in Nessel's catalogue 114.), is a manuscript of the eleventh century, very neatly and correctly written, containing the Gospels, with commentaries, the Eusebian canons, prologues, figures, paintings, and synaxaria, which last have been added by a more recent hand. It was collated by Alter.

78. The CODEx CARPZOVIANUS was formerly in the possession of John Gottlob Carpzov, of Leipzig, on the death of whose grandson, at Helmstadt, it was purchased by Nicholas signior Jancovich, of Vadass, in Hungary, whither it was taken. It contains the Gospels, written in the twelfth century according to Griesbach; and almost always agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. Dr. Boerner collated it for Kuster's edition of Mill's Greek Testament; and Scholz collated it in select passages for his edition.

79. The CODEx GEORGI DOUZÆ (by whom it was brought from Constantinople) was seen by Gomer at Leyden, on the eighth chapter of Saint John's Gospel. Scholz conjectures that it is the Codex Lugdunensis Batavorum 74. It contains the Gospels with a Latin version, and is imperfect.

¹ In a critique on the second edition of this work, in the Eclectic Review for January, 1822 (vol. xvii. N. S. p. 83.), it is stated, that when the writer of that article made inquiry respecting the Codex Leicestrensis, it was no longer to be found in the Library of the Town Hall at Leicester. Anxious, for the interest of sacred literature, to ascertain the real fact, the author of the present work requested Mr. Combe (an eminent bookseller at that place, to whom he thus gladly makes his acknowledgments), to make the requisite investigation. The result of Mr. Combe's critical researches is, that the Codex Leicestrensis is still carefully preserved. Mr. C. further collated the author's account of it (which had been drawn up from the notices of Wetstein and Michaelis) with the manuscript itself, and this collation has enabled him to make the description above given more complete as well as more correct. Note to the third edition.

³ Traherne's or Traheron's Manuscript Collection of Various Readings, from the Codex Ephesus, is now in the British Museum, among the Burney MSS. No. 24.

80. The CODEX GRÆVII formerly belonged to the celebrated critic John George Grævius, and afterwards to the Rev. John Van der Hagen. It contains the Gospels, written in the twelfth century. According to Wetstein, who saw it, this manuscript was collated by Bynæus in 1691.

81. Certain Greek manuscripts, which are mentioned in a revision of the Latin Bible, written in the thirteenth century.

82. Certain Greek manuscripts cited by Laurentius Valla in his remarks on the Latin New Testament. As he has given no description of them, and has not distinguished the readings of one manuscript from those of another, it is impossible at present to ascertain them: Bishop Marsh, who is followed by Dr. Lotze in his edition of Wetstein's Prolegomena, supposes that they are still preserved in some of the libraries of Italy. The various readings extracted by Valla are such as are generally found in manuscripts of the least antiquity and the least value.

83. The CODEX MONACENSIS 518. (Augustanus 1. of Bengel's, Wetstein's, and Griesbach's notation), is a neatly and accurately written manuscript, of the eleventh century, containing the Gospels, with synaxaria. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension. This manuscript is described by Ignatius Hardt in his catalogue of Greek MSS. at Munich: it was collated in select passages by Scholz.

84. The CODEX MONACENSIS 568. (Augustanus 2. in Bengel, Wetstein, and Griesbach), is a manuscript of the twelfth century, also described by Hardt, and collated in select passages by Scholz. It contains the Gospels of Matthew and Mark, and is imperfect in Matt. i. 1—18. xiii. 10—27. xiii. 42.—xiv. 3. xviii. 25.—xix. 9. xxi. 33.—xxii. 1., and in Mark vii. 13. to the end. It follows the Constantinopolitan text.

85. The CODEX MONACENSIS 569. (Augustanus 3.) contains only some loose leaves of the four Gospels, on vellum, written in the thirteenth century; it follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and is described by Hardt. Dr. Scholz collated it anew for his edition.

86. The CODEX POSONIENSIS, also called Byzantinus, because it formerly belonged to the Emperor Alexius Comnenus, was written at least before the year 1153. It contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons and prologues, and was collated by Bengel.

87. The CODEX TREVIRENSIS formerly belonged to Cardinal Cusa; it contains the Gospel of St. John with a catena, written in the twelfth century. Cordier (or Corderius) printed it in his catena of Greek Fathers on that Gospel. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated by Scholz, who has numbered it 87., in the place of the Codex Mosquensis (Matthæi v.) which he has numbered 250., infra.

88. The Manuscript cited by Joachim Camerarius, in his Annotations on the New Testament, as being ancient. It contains the Gospels. Wetstein says that it is like those which he has described under the numbers 63., 72., and 80. (See pp. 242, 243. supra.)

89. The CODEX GOTTINGENSIS, formerly called Gehlianus, from its possessor, A. G. Gehle, was written in 1106, and contains the Gospels, the text of which agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. It was collated by Gehle in 1729, and again by Matthæi, who numbers it 20.

90. The CODEX JOANNIS FABRI, Daventriensis, was written by John Faber, a Dominican monk, of Deventer, who in the sixteenth century copied it from a manuscript written in the year 1293. It contains the four Gospels, Pauline Epistles, Acts, and Catholic Epistles. The Epistle of Jude is written twice, and from two different copies. Faber collated this manuscript with a very ancient copy which had belonged to John Wessel of Groningen, to whom it had been presented by Pope Sixtus IV. Faber's manuscript was collated by Griesbach.

91. The CODEX PERRONIANUS, which formerly belonged to Cardinal Perron, contains the four Gospels, which Montfaucon refers to the tenth century. He communicated the extracts which were inserted by Dr. Mill.

92. The CODEX ANDRÆÆ FAESCHII 1. derives its name from Andrew Faesch, secretary of the republic of Basle, its proprietor. It contains the Gospel of Mark with the commentary of Victor, and a commentary on the Catholic Epistles. It was collated by Wetstein, who has not specified its age.

93. The CODEX GRAVII contains the Gospels. It is cited by Vossius on the genealogy of Christ, recorded in Luke iii.

94. The CODEX ANDRÆÆ FAESCHII 2. contains the Gospels of Mark and Luke, with a commentary. It was collated by Wetstein.

95. The CODEX LINCOLNIENSIS 2. is a manuscript of the tenth or eleventh century, containing Luke xi. 2.—xxiv. 53., and the Gospel of John (with the exception of three leaves), with a commentary extracted from the writings of the fathers. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension. This manuscript was collated by Dr. Mill, and on John v.—vii. by the late learned Professor Nicoll for Scholz.

96. The CODEX BODLEIANUS, A. 3. 37., was written by John Trithemius, abbot of Spanheim, in the fifteenth century. It contains the Gospel of John, the text of which appears to coincide with that of the Alexandrine recension. It was collated by Walton and Mill, and again, on John iii. and iv., by Griesbach.

97. The CODEX HIRSACIENSIS, a manuscript of St. John's Gospel, written in 1500 by one Nicholas, a monk of Hirsau, who seems to have copied it from Trithemius's manuscript (No. 96.), with which it agrees. Scholz asserts that Michaelis and Griesbach (who followed him) are in error, when they designate this manuscript as the Codex Giessensis et Uffenbachianus, because it never belonged to the library of the university at Giessen, or to Uffenbach's library. Dr. S., however, appears himself to be mistaken. Bengel, who made use of this manuscript, expressly says that it was communicated to him by Z. C. von Uffenbach; and a manuscript has been discovered by Professor Schulze, in the university library at Giessen, which had formerly belonged to Uffenbach, and had been collated by Maius, whose extracts are likewise preserved in that library. The identity, therefore, of the two manuscripts seems to be sufficiently ascertained. Bishop Marsh, likewise, compared the extracts from the Codex Giessensis with Wetstein's quotations from the Codex Hirsacianus, and found that their readings are not contradictory to each other.¹

98. The CODEX BIBLIOTHECÆ BODLEIANÆ, E. D. Clarkii 4., is a manuscript brought from the East by the Rev. Dr. E. D. Clarke: it contains the four Gospels, with figures, and seldom departs from the received text. Scholz, who collated it in Matt. vi. ix. x., and Luke iv. v. vi., has numbered this manuscript 98., in place of the Tübingen fragment which Griesbach has noted with the letter R.

99. The CODEX LIPSISSENSIS, in the library of St. Paul (No. 18. of Matthæi's notation), is a manuscript of the sixteenth century collated by Matthæi, and containing Matt. iv. 8.—v. 27. vi. 2.—xv. 30. and Luke i. 1—13., with fragments of synaxaria. Scholz has substituted this manuscript in place of the Codex Rutgersii, used by Daniel Heinsius in his Exercitationes Sacre, which is noticed infra, under No. 155.

100. The CODEX ECBESWALDIANUS is a manuscript which formerly belonged to Baron Paul, of Eubeswald. It was used by Wagenseil; a reading has been taken from it in John viii. 6. Scholz is of opinion that it is, most probably, the same manuscript on vellum which is now preserved in the university library, at Pesth in Hungary. He describes it as containing the Gospels, written in the tenth century, with index of chapters, the Eusebian canons, synaxaria, and scholia, added by a later hand on paper. The text follows the Constantinopolitan recension. Some later hand has also added numerous corrections.

101. The CODEX UFFENBACHIANUS 3. contains the Gospel of St. John, written in the sixteenth century. Its text agrees with that of the Constantinopolitan recension, and almost uniformly with that of the printed editions. Bengel thought that it was transcribed from some Basle edition of the New Testament.

102. The CODEX MEDICÆUS is an unknown manuscript, from which some unknown person wrote extracts in the margin of Plantin's edition of 1591. These extracts were printed by Wetstein. This manuscript contains fragments from Matt. xxiv. to Mark viii. 1.

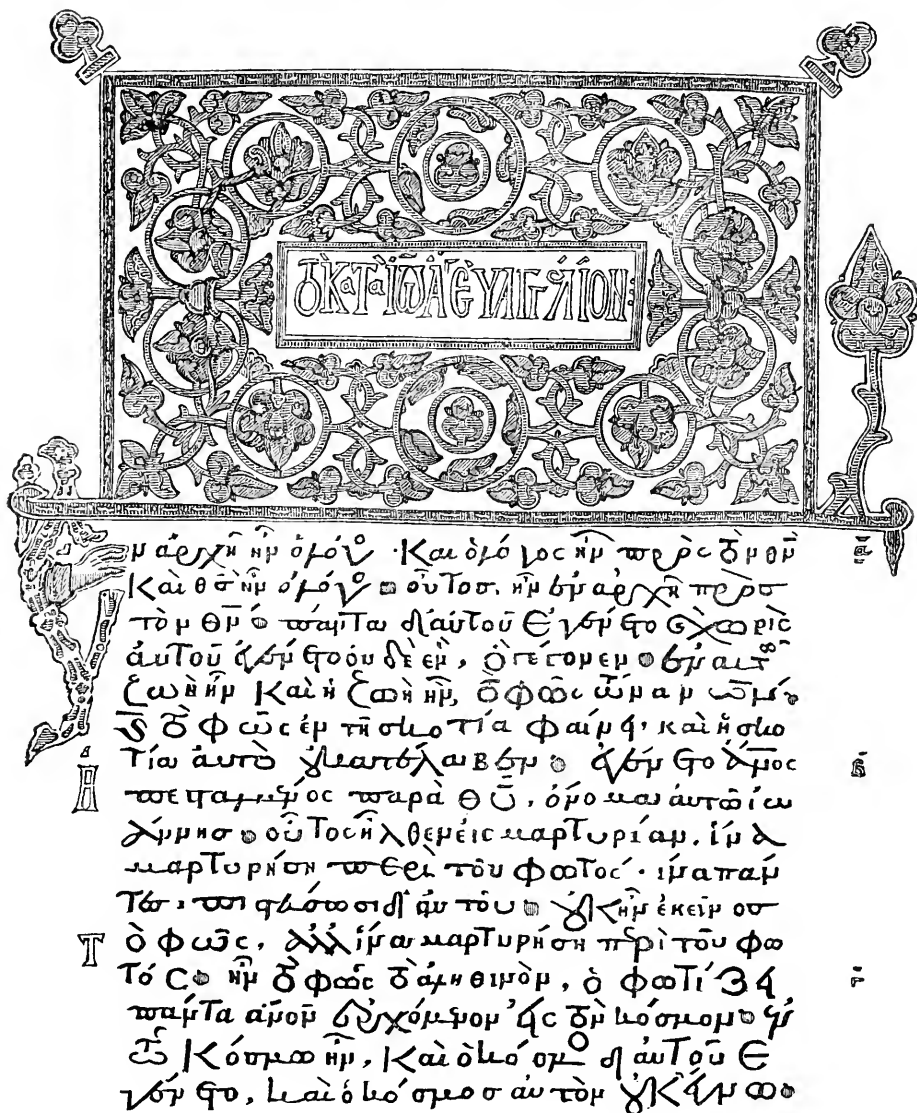

103. The CODEX REGIUS 193, is a folio manuscript of the eleventh century, which formerly belonged to Cardinal Mazarine. Scholz is of opinion that this is the same manuscript from which Emeric Bigot communicated a few extracts to Courcelles or Curcellaus. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and was cursorily collated by Scholz.

104. The CODEX VIGNERI is a manuscript of the tenth century, containing the four Gospels. It was collated by Bigot, whose extracts were printed by Wetstein.

105. The CODEx EBNERIANUS is a very neat manuscript of the New Testament in quarto, formerly in the possession of Hieronymus Ebner von Eschenbach of Nuremberg, from whom its appellation is derived: it is now the property of the University of Oxford, and is deposited among the other precious manuscripts preserved in the Bodleian library. The Codex Ebnerianus contains 425 leaves of vellum, and was written in the twelfth century. The whole of the New Testament is comprised in this volume, excepting the Book of Revelation: each page contains 27 lines, at equal distances, excepting those in which the different books commence, or which are decorated with illuminations. At the beginning of the manuscript there has been added a table of the order of reading the four Gospels, yearly; which is followed by three other tables of lessons for particular days and seasons of the ecclesiastical year, and a menology of the Greek church. All these additions (as appears from a note appended) were written A. M. 6999, corresponding with the year 1391 of our computation, by one Joasaph, a calligraphist. The book is bound in mazy silver covers, in the centre of which the Redeemer of the world is represented sitting on a throne, and in the act of pronouncing a blessing. Above his head is the following inscription, in square letters, exhibiting the style in which the capitals are written:—ΔΕΟΠΑΤΑ ΕΛΕΗΣΟΝ ΤΟΝ ΔΟΥΛΟΝ ΣΟΥ ΕΛΑΧΙΣΤΟΝ ΙΕΡΟΝΥΜΟΝ ΙΟΥΛΙΑΝΟΝ ΚΑΙ ΤΗΝ ΟΙΚΙΑΝ ΑΥΤΟΥ. "Lord, bless the least of thy servants, Hieronymus Gulielmus, and his family." Of the style of writing adopted in the body of the manuscript the annexed engraving will afford a correct idea, and at the same time exemplify the abbreviations frequent in Greek manuscripts of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries.

This fac-simile comprises the first ten verses of the first chapter of Saint John's Gospel: the abbreviations, though very numerous, being uniformly the same, do not interpose any material difficulty to the easy perusal of the manuscript. Wetstein, though he has admitted it into his catalogue, has made use of it only in the eighteenth chapter of Saint John's Gospel; Scholz, who has briefly noticed this manuscript, did not examine it. Michaelis has classed it among the uncollated manuscripts of the New Testament.¹ It is to be hoped that some learned member of the University of Oxford will publish a collation of all the various readings which may be found in this manuscript.

106. The CODEx WINCHELSEANUS derives its name from its owner, an Earl of Winchelsea. This manuscript contains the four Gospels, and was written in the tenth century; its text for the most part agrees with that of the Alexandrine recension. It was collated by J. Jackson, whose extracts

—131., where the Codex Ebnerianus is minutely described and illustrated with thirteen plates of illuminations, &c., which are very curious in an antiquarian point of view. Our fac-simile is copied from one of De Murr's plates.

Cæsar de Missy communicated to Wetstein, by whom they were printed.

107. The CODEx BIBLIOTHECÆ BOBLEIANÆ, E. D. Clarkii 6., contains the Gospels, which are written by different hands: it rarely departs from the received or Constantinopolitan text. It was collated by Scholz, in Matt. vi. ix. x., Mark v. vi., Luke iv. v. vi., and John v. vi. Dr. S. has substituted this manuscript for No. 107. of Wetstein's and Griesbach's notation, it being the same which they have numbered 201.

108. The CODEx PAIRRHASII formerly belonged to Aulus Parrhasius: it is now in the imperial library at Vienne. It is in two volumes, folio, written in the eleventh century, and (in Scholz's opinion) at Constantinople. This manuscript contains the Gospels with a commentary, the Eusebian canons and figures, and follows the Constantinopolitan recension. It has been collated by Alter, Birch, and Scholz.

109. The CODEx 5116 in the British Museum, formerly cited as Meadii I. and Askewii, is a manuscript in three volumes; of which 5116 contains the Gospels; 5115, the Acts, and Catholic Epistles; and 5117, the Epistles of Saint Paul. Scholz says that this manuscript was written in 1326.

110. The CODEx RAVIANUS, now in the royal library at Berlin, formerly belonged to John Rave of Upsal. It contains the New Testament in two volumes, written in the sixteenth century; the principal part of which is copied from the Complutensian edition, and the remainder from Robert Stephens's third edition. It was collated and minutely described by Wetstein, Griesbach, and Pappelbaum.

111. The CODEx BIBLIOTHECÆ BOBLEIANÆ, E. D. Clarkii 7., contains the four Gospels. It is imperfect from John xx. 25. to the end; and was collated by Scholz on Matt. vi. ix. x., Mark v. vi., Luke iv. v. vi., and John v. vi. Dr. S. has substituted this manuscript for the collection of Veleian readings (of which an account is given below), which Wetstein and Griesbach had severally numbered 111.

112. The CODEx BIBLIOTHECÆ BOBLEIANÆ, E. D. Clarkii 10., contains the Gospels with the Eusebian canons: it follows the Constantinopolitan recension, though there are some Alexandrine readings, and many errors. This manuscript was collated on Matt. v. ix. x., Mark v. vi., Luke iv. v., and John v. vi., by Dr. Scholz, who has substituted it under this number for the Barberini Readings, or collation of twenty-two Roman manuscripts, ten of which contained the Gospels, made by John Matthew Caryophilus, which was published by Pierre Poussines (Petrus Possinus) at the end of a Greek catena on St. Mark, printed in 1673. Dr. Mill inserted these extracts among his various readings; but as it was not known for a long time what had become of the Barberini manuscripts, and as the readings of the Barberini collation are for the most part in favour of the Latin Vulgate version, Wetstein, Semler, and other Protestant divines, accused Poussines of a literary fraud. Of this, however, he was acquitted by Isaac Vossius, who found the manuscript of Caryophilus in the Barberini library; and the imputation against the veracity of that eminent Greek scholar has been completely destroyed by M. Birch, a learned Danish divine, who recognised in the Vatican library six of the manuscripts from which Caryophilus had made extracts. These six manuscripts will be found in this catalogue, under the letters B. (pp. 224—226.) and S. (p. 235.) supra, and under the numbers 127. 129. 141. and 144. The remainder, Scholz thinks, may be found among the Vatican manuscripts, numbered 159—168. infra.

113. The CODEx HARLEIANUS, 1810., a manuscript of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels, with prologues, Eusebian canons, figures, pictures, and synaxaria, added by a later hand. It was collated by Griesbach in select passages, and follows the Alexandrine recension.

114. The CODEx HARLEIANUS 5540. contains the four Gospels, written in the twelfth century, with marginal notes of a later date, many of which have nearly disappeared. It follows the Alexandrine recension, and was collated by Griesbach in select passages.

115. The CODEx HARLEIANUS 5559., a manuscript of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels: it is defective in Matt. i. 1.—viii. 10. Mark v. 23—36. Luke i. 78.—ii. 10. v. 4—15. and John xi. 2.—xxi. 25. It has a mixed text, according to Dr. Scholz; but Griesbach, by whom it was collated in Matt. viii.—xi., considers its numerous peculiar readings as nothing more than bold conjectures.

116. The CODEx HARLEIANUS 5567., a manuscript of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons, and synaxaria, and for the most part follows the Alexandrine recension, according to Scholz. Griesbach, however, attaches but little value to it. He collated the whole, except the last chapters of St. John's Gospel.

117. The CODEx HARLEIANUS 5731. was formerly the property of the celebrated critic Dr. Bentley: it was written in the fourteenth century by an illiterate transcriber, and it contains the Gospels, with fragments of a lectionary, the Eusebian canons, and synaxaria. Griesbach, who collated it in some select passages, states that it has many readings peculiar to itself.

118. The CODEx BOBLEIANUS, Marshii 24. (which formerly belonged to Archbishop Marsh, of Armagh), is a codex rescriptus of the thirteenth century, containing the four Gospels; but the original writing can no longer be traced, so as to determine upon what treatise the Gospels were written. It is defective in Matt. i. 1.—vi. 3. Luke xiii. 35.—xiv. 20. xviii. 8.—xix. 9. and John xvi. 25.—xxi. 25. These chasms have been supplied by a later hand. Griesbach, who collated it in select passages, considered it as having an eclectic text, but Scholz states that it for the most part agrees with the Alexandrine recension.

119. The CODEx REGIUS, 85. (formerly 2865^b.) contains the four Gospels, which were written about the twelfth century: its readings are intermingled by Wetstein with those of the manuscript No. 12. (p. 233. supra.) It seldom varies from the received text. It was partially collated by Griesbach.

120. The CODEx REGIUS 158^a. (of Robert Stephens's notation) is a manuscript of the thirteenth century, which originally contained the Gospels: its readings are also intermingled by Wetstein with those of the manuscript No. 12. It rarely departs from the received text. The Gospel of St. Mark is lost, and there are other chasms.

121. The CODEx GENEVEFENSIS, which formerly belonged to the library of St. Geneviève at Paris, contains the four Gospels, with synaxaria, written in the year 1284. It is defective in Matt. v. 21.—viii. 21., and follows the Constantinopolitan recension. Scholz states that it is not known where this manuscript is now preserved: he could not find it either in the library of St. Geneviève or in the Royal Library at Paris.

122. The CODEx MEERMANNIANUS 116. derives its name from its former possessor, M. Meerman, at the sale of whose library it was purchased by a private individual, but has since been deposited in the Library of the University of Leyden. It was written towards the close of the twelfth century, and contains the four Gospels, Acts, and all the Epistles; but it is defective in Acts i. 1—14. xxi. 11.—xxii. 28. Rom. i.—vii. 13. 1 John iv. 20. to the end; the second and third Epistles of John, and the Epistle of Jude. This manuscript was first collated by Dr. Dermout, in his Collectanea Critica in Novum Testamentum; and the various readings discovered by him are incorporated by Dr. Schulz in his third edition of the first volume of Griesbach's Greek Testament, where it is numbered 216.² As the manuscript which Griesbach had numbered 122. is the same which he had previously numbered 97. (p. 213. supra), Dr. Scholz has substituted the Codex Meermannianus in its place.

¹ John Louise de la Cerda inserted in his Adversaria Sacra, which appeared at Lyons in 1696, a collation of sixteen manuscripts, which had been made by Pedro Fazienda, Marquis of Velez. From these manuscripts the marquis inserted various readings in his copy of the Greek Testament, but without specifying what manuscripts in particular, or even how many, in general, were in favour of each quoted reading. The remarkable agreement between the Veleian Readings and those of the Vulgate, excited the suspicions of Mariana (who communicated them to De la Cerda) that Velez had made use only of interpolated manuscripts, that had been corrected agreeably to the Latin Vulgate, subsequently to the council of Florence. However this may be, the collation of Velez will never be of any utility in the criticism of the New Testament, unless the identical manuscripts, which he made use of, should hereafter be discovered in any Spanish library. But this discovery must be considered as hopeless after the laborious and careful researches made by Bishop Marsh, relative to the collation of Velez, who (he has proved to demonstration) did not collate one single Greek or Latin manuscript, but took his various lessons from Robert Stephens's edition of the Latin Vulgate, published at Paris in 1540: that the object which the marquis had in view, in framing this collection of readings, was to support, not the Vulgate in general, but the text of this edition in particular, wherever it varied from the text of Stephens's Greek Testament printed in 1550; and that with this view he translated into Greek the readings of the former, which varied from the latter, except where Stephens's Greek margin supplied him with the readings which he wanted, where he had only to transcribe, and not to translate. Michaelis, vol. ii. part i. pp. 351—354. part ii. pp. 324, 325. Mr. (now Bishop) Marsh's Letters to Archbishop Travis, p. 67. and the Appendix to that work (pp. 253—341), in which a minute detail of the Veleian Readings is given, as also in Christian Benedict Michaelis's Tractatus Criticus de Variis Lectionibus Novi Testamenti, §§ 87—89. (pp. 96—101.) 4to. Halle: Magdeburgicæ, 1749.

123. The CODEX CÆSAREUS VINDOBONENSIS (Lambecii 3C.), of the eleventh century, contains the four Gospels, with prologues, the Eusebian canons and figures. Some emendations have been inserted by another hand. It was collated by Alter and Birch, and frequently agrees with the Alexandrine recension.

124. The CODEX CÆSAREUS VINDOBONENSIS (Lambecii 31.) is a manuscript of the four Gospels, written in the eleventh or twelfth century: it has been collated by Treschow, Birch, and Alter. It is of very great importance, and agrees with the Codex Cantabrigiensis in not less than eighty unusual readings; with the Codex Ephreimi upwards of thirty-five; with the Codex Regius 2861. or Stephanian, in fifty; with the Codex Basilensis in more than fifty, and has several which are found in that manuscript alone; with the Codex Regius 2244. in sixty unusual readings; and with the Codex Colbertinus 2841. in twenty-two.¹ chiefly follows the Alexandrine recension.

125. The CODEX CÆSAREUS (Kollarii 6.), in the imperial library at Vienna, is a manuscript of the tenth century, containing the Gospels. Its text frequently coincides with that of the Alexandrine recension: it was collated by Treschow, Birch, and Alter.

126. The CODEX GUELPHERBYTANUS XVI. 16. is a manuscript of the four Gospels, of the eleventh century, with the Eusebian canons, κρηταια, prologues, and portraits of each evangelist. Heusinger, by whom its existence was first announced to the learned, supposed it to have been written in the tenth century. But Michaelis, Griesbach, and Scholz, after Knittel (by whom it has been copiously described),¹ refer it to the eleventh century. Knittel states that a modern hand, later than Erasmus's edition of the Greek Testament, has officiously corrected the text in several places. He further adds, that the text seems occasionally Latinized, and that the copyist has frequently omitted part of the text, which omissions are specified by Knittel; but at other times he has repeated those almost immediately preceding, and has sometimes committed manifest mistakes in writing. This manuscript also has many remarkable readings; and occasionally there is an uncial letter in the midst of a word, for instance in Matt. xv. 1. προερχονται, and 22. ἡμετερις. This occurrence of an uncial letter Knittel considers as a proof that the original of this manuscript must have been an ancient codex. The liturgical notices which are interspersed, together with a summary of the ecclesiastical calendar with which the manuscript terminates, are written in a hand evidently different from that which wrote the prefaces and Gospels. The conclusion of the Gospel of Saint Matthew, xxviii. 18—20., is written in a cruciform manner, thus:—

 κυνισαν αυτην οι δε ε-διαστασαν.
 και προσεβαθον ο ιησους, ελαλουν αυτοις, λεγων· Εδωθη μοι πασα εξουσια εν

In English, thus:—

 of the world. Amen. † † †

Knittel conjectures that this cruciform mode of writing may have been a prolific source of various readings, on account of the frequent disruption of the words. Dr. Scholz states that this manuscript follows the Alexandrine recension.

127. The CODEX VATICANUS 349., of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons: there are emendations by a later hand. The whole of this manuscript was collated by Birch; its text frequently agrees with that of the Alexandrine recension.²

128. The CODEX VATICANUS 356., of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels, with prologues. It was inspected by Birch; and its text appears to harmonize with that of the Constantinopolitan recension.

129. The CODEX VATICANUS 358., which formerly belonged to Cardinal Nicholas de Cusa, contains the four Gospels, with scholia, written in the twelfth century. It appears to coincide with the Constantinopolitan recension.

130. The CODEX VATICANUS 359. contains the four Gospels, with the Latin version, written in the thirteenth century, by a Latin copyist. It frequently agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, but for the most part it follows the Alexandrine family.

131. The CODEX VATICANUS 360. formerly belonged to Aldus Manutius, the son of Paul: it contains the Gospels, Acts, and Epistles, with the Eusebian canons, written in the eleventh century. Aldus appears to have consulted it for his edition of the New Testament, as it frequently agrees in its peculiar readings with this manuscript, which for the most part harmonizes with the Constantinopolitan recension, though it has numerous readings peculiar to itself.

132. The CODEX VATICANUS 361., of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons and figures.

133. The CODEX VATICANUS 363. of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels, Acts, and Epistles, with synaxaria.

134. The CODEX VATICANUS 364., also of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons and figures.

135. The CODEX VATICANUS 365. contains the Gospels, with figures, written on vellum, in the eleventh century. The first twenty-six leaves have been supplied by a later hand, on paper.

136. The CODEX VATICANUS 665., of the thirteenth century, contains the Gospels of Matthew and Mark, with the commentary of Euthymius.

137. The CODEX VATICANUS 756., of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels, with a commentary.

138. The CODEX VATICANUS 757., of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels, with a commentary: it was collated in select passages by Birch and Scholz.

139. The CODEX VATICANUS 758., of the twelfth century, * The Codices Vaticani Nos. 127—137 were wholly or partially collated by Birch.

contains the Gospels of Luke and John, with a commentary. It was collated in select passages by Birch and Scholz.

140. The CODEx VATICANUS 1158, contains the four Gospels, splendidly written on vellum in the twelfth century, with the Eusebian canons and figures. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and was partially collated by Scholz.

141. The CODEx VATICANUS 1160, of the thirteenth century, contains the New Testament, with synaxaria; it follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages by Scholz.

142. The CODEx VATICANUS 1210, contains the Gospels, Acts, Epistles, and Psalms. Numerous readings are written on the margin: in the Gospels it for the most part follows the Constantinopolitan recension. This and the following manuscripts, Nos. 143, 144, 116—157, 159—162, 161—171, 173—175, 177—180, and 182—197, were collated wholly or in part by Drs. Birch and Scholz.

143. The CODEx VATICANUS 1229, of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels, with a commentary. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

144. The CODEx VATICANUS 1251, of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons. It appears to follow the Constantinopolitan recension.

145. The CODEx VATICANUS 1518, of the thirteenth century, contains the Gospels of Luke and John: it is defective in Luke iv. 15.—v. 36., and in John i. 1—26. The seventeenth chapter of Luke, to the twenty-first, inclusive, has been added by another hand. Numerous emendations occur in the text, and various readings in the margin.

146. The CODEx PALATINO-VATICANUS 1 5., of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels of Matthew and Mark, with a commentary. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

147. The CODEx PALATINO-VATICANUS 89, of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels, with synaxaria. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

148. The CODEx PALATINO-VATICANUS 136, of the thirteenth century, contains the Gospels, with scholia on the beginning of St. Matthew. It follows the Constantinopolitan family, but it has some Alexandrine readings.

149. The CODEx PALATINO-VATICANUS 171, of the fourteenth century, contains the New Testament adapted to ecclesiastical use: it follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

150. The CODEx PALATINO-VATICANUS 189, of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons, and synaxaria: it follows the Constantinopolitan family.

151. The CODEx PALATINO-VATICANUS 220, of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons, and scholia: it has a mixed text.

152. The CODEx PALATINO-VATICANUS 227, of the thirteenth century, contains the Gospels, with figures, and prologues. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

153. The CODEx PALATINO-VATICANUS 229, of the thirteenth century, contains the Gospels, with prologues, and synaxaria: it has a mixed text, but chiefly agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

154. The CODEx ALEXANDRINO-VATICANUS 28, was written in 1442, and, according to the opinion of Scholz, in Italy. It contains the Gospels, with the commentary of Theophylact, and follows the Alexandrine recension.

155. The CODEx ALEXANDRINO-VATICANUS 79, of the fourteenth century, contains the Gospels, to which are prefixed some readings from Saint Paul's Epistles. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension. Scholz is of opinion that this was the manuscript which Wetstein had formerly numbered 99., and which was also consulted by Daniel Heinsius for his Exercitationes Sacrae.

156. The CODEx ALEXANDRINO-VATICANUS 189, of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels, the text of which follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

157. The CODEx URBINO-VATICANUS 2, appears to have been written for the use of John II. emperor of the East, who succeeded Alexius in the empire in 1118. It contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons, figures, p. n. n. n., a chronicle of the life of Christ, the Chronicle of Hippolytus, and a preface from Chrysostom. Scholz states that it was transcribed from, and collated with, some very ancient Jerusalem manuscripts, preserved in a monastery of the Holy Mountain [Athos]. It sometimes agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, but it has very numerous Alexandrine readings.

158. The CODEx PHILIPPI VATICANUS 53, contains the Gospels, written in the eleventh century, with the Eusebian canons. There are various readings inserted in the margin.

159. The CODEx BARBERINIANUS 8, contains the four Gospels, written in the eleventh century: its text follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

160. The CODEx BARBERINIANUS 9, written in the year 1123, contains the four Gospels, with synaxaria: it agrees with the Constantinopolitan text.

161. The CODEx BARBERINIANUS 10, of the tenth century, contains the Gospels: it is imperfect in John xvi. 4.—xxi. 25.

162. The CODEx BARBERINIANUS 11, written in the year 1163, contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons, and figures.

163. The CODEx BARBERINIANUS 12, written in Syria in the eleventh century, contains only the sections of the Gospels usually read in churches, together with fragments of the Eusebian canons. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

164. The CODEx BARBERINIANUS 13, written in 1010, contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons and synaxaria. It chiefly follows the Constantinopolitan recension; but it has many Alexandrine readings.

165. The CODEx BARBERINIANUS 14, formerly belonged to Eugenia, the daughter of John Pontanus, by whom it was presented to the Barberini Library. It was written by a Roman monk in the year 1197, with the Latin version, Eusebian canons, and synaxaria. It follows the Constantinopolitan family.

166. The CODEx BARBERINIANUS 115, of the thirteenth century, contains Luke ix. 33.—xxiv. 24., and John. It mostly agrees with the Alexandrine recension, but frequently, also, with the Constantinopolitan family.

167. The CODEx BARBERINIANUS 203, of the fourteenth century, contains the Gospels, which follow the Constantinopolitan text.

168. The CODEx BARBERINIANUS 211, of the thirteenth century, contains the four Gospels, with the commentary of Theophylact. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

169. The CODEx VALLICELLIANUS B. 133, belongs to the library of Santa Maria in Vallicella, a library at Rome belonging to the fathers of the oratory of San Filippo Neri: it contains the Gospels, written in the eleventh century, with prologues, figures, and synaxaria.

170. The CODEx VALLICELLIANUS C. 61, of the thirteenth century, contains the Gospels, with synaxaria. The last chapters of Saint Luke, and many chapters of Saint John, have been written by a later hand. It follows the Constantinopolitan family.

171. The CODEx VALLICELLIANUS C. 73, contains the Gospels, written in the fourteenth century. Its text follows the Alexandrine recension.

172. The CODEx VALLICELLIANUS F. 90, of the twelfth century, according to Birch and Griesbach, contains the Gospels; but Scholz states that it now contains only the Pentateuch, with which the Gospels were formerly bound. It is not known where the Gospels are now to be found.

173. The CODEx VATICANUS 1983, (formerly S. Basilii 22.), written, according to Scholz, in the thirteenth century for the use of some church in Asia Minor, contains the Gospels, with synaxaria, and the Eusebian canons. It is defective in John xiii. 1.—xxi. 25., and almost every where agrees with the Constantinopolitan family.

174. The CODEx VATICANUS 2002, (formerly S. Basil. 41.) was written in the year 1063, and contains the Gospels. It is defective in Matt. i. 1.—ii. 1. and John i. 1—27. and viii. 47.—xxi. 25.

175. The CODEx VATICANUS 2020, (formerly S. Basil. 119.), of the twelfth century, contains the New Testament, with scholia on the Acts. It is defective in Matt. i. 1.—iv. 17. Some various readings have been added in the margin. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, but it frequently has Alexandrine readings.

• The Codices Barberiniani derive their name from the library founded in the Barberini Palace at Rome, by the cardinal Francis Barberini in the seventeenth century.

1 The Codices Palatino-Vaticani are so called, because they were presented to the Vatican Library, during the pontificate of Urban VIII., by Maximilian, Elector of Bavaria: they formerly belonged to the Electors-Palatine.

2 The Codices Alexandrino-Vaticani formerly belonged to Alexandra Christina, Queen of Sweden, who abdicated her throne, and went to reside at Rome, where she embraced the Romish faith. Pope Alexander XII. presented them to the Vatican Library.

3 The Urbino-Vatican Library at Rome is a collection of books, removed from Urbino to Rome, by Pope Clement VII., who added them to the Vatican Library.

176. The CODEx VATICANUS 2113. (formerly S. Basil. 152.), of the thirteenth century, contains the Gospels, accommodated to ecclesiastical use. It is imperfect in Matt. i. 10. —x. 13. and John i. 1—29.

177. The CODEx VATICANUS, formerly Basil. 163., contains the Gospels, written in the eleventh century. It is imperfect in John i. 1—29.

178. The CODEx ANGELICUS A. 1. 5., in the library of the monastery of the Augustinians at Rome, contains the Gospels with the Eusebian canons, written in the twelfth century: it follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and is imperfect in John xxi. 17. to the end.

179. The CODEx ANGELICUS A. 4. 11. contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons, written on vellum, in the twelfth century. Some leaves have been added, by a later hand, on paper, in which the chasms occurring in it have been supplied. This manuscript is accommodated to ecclesiastical use, and mostly follows the Alexandrine recension.

180. The manuscript in the library of the College of the PROPAGANDA at Rome, formerly Borgiae 2., contains the Gospels, written in the eleventh century, to which are added the Acts, Epistles, Apocalypse, and some apocryphal books which bear the date of the year 1384. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

181. The manuscript belonging to Francis Cardinal de ZELADA contains the Gospels, with scholia, written in the eleventh century. Its text follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

182. The CODEx LAURENTIANUS VI. 11., of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels. The Constantinopolitan recension is followed by all the Codices Laurentiani, No. 182—198.

183. The CODEx LAURENTIANUS VI. 14., of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels, with figures, Eusebian canons, and synaxaria.

184. The CODEx LAURENTIANUS VI. 15., of the thirteenth century, contains the Gospels, with prologues.

185. The CODEx LAURENTIANUS VI. 16., written by one Basiliius in the twelfth century, contains the Gospels with prologues and synaxaria.

186. The CODEx LAURENTIANUS VI. 18., written in the twelfth century by Leontius a calligrapher, contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons, prologues, and commentaries.

187. The CODEx LAURENTIANUS VI. 23., of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels, with figures and paintings.

188. The CODEx LAURENTIANUS VI. 25., of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels, with synaxaria.

189. The CODEx LAURENTIANUS VI. 27., of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels, Acts, and Epistles, with prologues and synaxaria.

190. The CODEx LAURENTIANUS VI. 28., written in the month of July, 1385, contains the Gospels.

191. The CODEx LAURENTIANUS VI. 29., of the thirteenth century, contains the Gospels, with prologues.

192. The CODEx LAURENTIANUS VI. 30., also of the thirteenth century, contains the Gospels, with prologues.

193. The CODEx LAURENTIANUS VI. 32., written in the eleventh century, contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons and figures. It has been adapted to ecclesiastical use.

194. The CODEx LAURENTIANUS VI. 33., of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels, with a figure of St. John the apostle, and with commentaries.

195. The CODEx LAURENTIANUS VI. 34., of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels, with prologues, commentaries, and synaxaria.

196. The CODEx LAURENTIANUS VIII. 12., of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels, written in red letters, with a catena and figures.

197. The CODEx LAURENTIANUS VIII. 14., of the eleventh century, contains the Epistles of St. James, and fragments of the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Mark, with commentaries.

198. The CODEx LAURENTIANUS 256., of the thirteenth century, contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons.

199. The CODEx 5., formerly belonging to the monks of the Benedictine order of Santa Maria, contains the Gospels, written in the twelfth century, with figures, Eusebian canons, scholia, and iambic verses. It agrees with the manuscripts of the Constantinopolitan family. Dr. Birch collated this manuscript, and also those numbered 200—202. 204—208. 211—214.

200 The CODEx 6., formerly belonging to the same monks, of the tenth century, contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons, prologues, fragments of an oration against the Arians by Gregory the Theologian, and synaxaria. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

201. The CODEx 701., formerly belonging to the friars-preachers of Saint Mark, was written in the year 1359. It contains the New Testament, and, according to Dr. Scholz, it is undoubtedly the same manuscript from which Weiststein quoted some various readings out of Lamy's treatise De Eru-ditione Apostolorum, and which he numbered 107., referring it to the fourteenth century.

202. The CODEx 705., formerly belonging to the friars-preachers of Saint Mark, contains the Gospels, with synaxaria, written in the twelfth century.

203. The CODEx 707., formerly belonging to the friars-preachers of Saint Mark, of the fifteenth century, contains the New Testament written in modern Greek. Dr. Scholz states that he does not know where the MSS. Nos. 199—203. are at present to be found.

204. The CODEx BONONIENSIS 610., belonging to the canons regular, contains the Gospels, Acts, and Epistles, written in the eleventh century.

205. The CODEx VENETUS 5. (in the library of Saint Mark at Venice) formerly belonged to Cardinal Bessarion. It contains the Old and New Testaments, written in the fifteenth century, and it is allied to the manuscripts of the Alexandrine family.

206. The CODEx VENETUS 6., written partly on vellum and partly on paper, contains the whole of the New Testament, written in the fifteenth century.

207. The CODEx VENETUS 8., of the tenth century, contains the Gospels, with synaxaria. It is imperfect in the beginning of Saint Matthew.

208. The CODEx VENETIANUS 9., of the tenth century, contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons. Its text is allied to that of the MSS. of the Alexandrine recension.

209. The CODEx VENETIANUS 10., of the fifteenth century, contains the New Testament, in the following order, viz. the Acts of the Apostles, Catholic Epistles, the Epistles of Saint Paul, Gospels, and Apocalypse, with prolegomena. In the Gospels, the text follows the Alexandrine recension; and in the Acts and Epistles it chiefly agrees with the Constantinopolitan family. This manuscript was collated throughout by Birch and Engelbreth: its readings will be found in Dr. Schulz's third edition of Griesbach's Revision of the Greek Testament, and also in Dr. Scholz's critical edition.

210. The CODEx VENETIANUS 27., of the tenth century, contains the Gospels, with a catena.

211. The CODEx VENETIANUS 539., of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels, with an Arabic version. There are chasms in the beginning of Saint Matthew and Saint John.

212, 213. The CODICES VENETIANI 510. and 542., of the eleventh century, contain the Gospels.

214. The CODEx VENETIANUS 543., of the fourteenth century, contains the Gospels, with synaxaria. It appears to agree with the text of the Constantinopolitan recension.

215. The CODEx VENETIANUS 544., of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels, with commentaries on the writings of the fathers, to which are prefixed the canons of Eusebius and his epistle to Carpianus. It was collated on Matt. xxiv., Mark iv., Luke iv., and John v. Its text for the most part agrees with that of the Constantinopolitan recension.

216. The CODEx CANONICI, brought from Coreyra into the library of Saint Mark at Venice, contains the Gospels. Its date is not specified by Scholz.

217. The CODEx III. in Class I. of Saint Mark's library, written in the twelfth or thirteenth century, contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons and synaxaria. It was collated for the same portions of the Gospels as No. 215. Its text agrees partly with the Alexandrine and partly with the Constantinopolitan recension.

218. The CODEx CÆSAREO-VINDOBONENSIS 23. (Lambecii 1.) was brought by Busbeck from Constantinople. It was written in the thirteenth century, and contains the Old and New Testament. Birch examined this manuscript only in those places where manuscripts usually depart from the received text. It is imperfect in Rev. xii. 5.—xiv. 8. v. 7.—xvii. 2. xviii. 10.—xix. 15. and xx. 8. to the end. Dr. Treschow, by whom this manuscript has been minutely described, states that it was written by four different hands. From this manuscript Prof. Alter printed his edition of the Greek Testament, which appeared at Vienna in 1786—87, in two vols 8vo. He has deviated from it only where the copyist has committed manifest errata, which he has corrected from Robert Stephens's edition of 1546. The text of this manuscript frequently agrees with the MSS. of the Alexandrine family, but for the most part with those of the Constantinopolitan recension.

219. The CODEX CÆSAREO-VINDOBONENSIS 321. (Lambecii 32.), of the thirteenth century, contains the Gospels, with prologues. It chiefly agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated by Alter.

220. The CODEX CÆSAREO-VINDOBONENSIS 337. (Lambecii 33.) contains the Gospels, written in very small characters in the fourteenth century. Its text for the most part agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. It was also collated by Alter.

221. The CODEX CÆSAREO-VINDOBONENSIS CXVII. 29. (Lambecii 38.) contains the four Gospels, written in the eleventh century, with Chrysostom's commentaries on St. Matthew and St. John, with the commentary of Victor on St. Mark, and of Titus of Bostra on St. Luke. It is defective in Matt. i. 1—11. As the transcriber of this manuscript seems rather to have designed the writing of a commentary than a correct text, it is difficult to refer it to any recension, from the liberty he has taken of making arbitrary additions to or omissions in the text.

222. The CODEX CÆSAREO-VINDOBONENSIS (Nessel. 180. Lambecii 39.), of the fourteenth century, contains sections of the Gospels, with commentaries. It is imperfect both at the beginning and end; and for the most part agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

223. The CODEX CÆSAREO-VINDOBONENSIS 301 (Lambecii 40.), of the fourteenth century, contains fragments of the Gospels of St. Matthew, St. Luke, and St. John, with a catena. Scholz states it to be of little value in a critical point of view: it was collated by Alter.

224. The CODEX CÆSAREUS 8. in Kollarus's Catalogue, and 30. in Forlosia's Auctarium, came from Naples to Vicana. It contains the Gospel of St. Matthew, the text of which chiefly agrees with that of the Constantinopolitan recension: it was collated by Alter.

225. The CODEX CÆSAREUS 9. of Kollarus and 31. of Forlosia, contains the Gospels, with synaxaria. It exhibits a mixed text, agreeing partly with the Constantinopolitan recension, and partly with the Alexandrine recension. It was collated by Alter, and was written in the year 1192.

226. The CODEX ESCURIALENSIS χ IV. 17., of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels, Acts of the Apostles, and Epistles, with figures: it exhibits a mixed text, and has been corrected by some one after a copy of later date. This and the seven following manuscripts (227—233.) were collated in select passages by Dr. Moldenhawer.

227. The CODEX ESCURIALENSIS χ III. 15., of the thirteenth century, contains the Gospels, with figures: some of its leaves have been misplaced by the bookbinder. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan family.

228. The CODEX ESCURIALENSIS χ IV. 12. contains the Gospels, Acts of the Apostles, and the Epistles, with the Eusebian canons, written in the fourteenth century.

229. The CODEX ESCURIALENSIS χ IV. 21., written in the year 1140 by Basilus Argyropylus, a notary: it contains the Gospels, with a figure of Saint Mark, and is imperfect in Mark xvi. 15—20. and John i. 1—11. Many alterations of the ancient writing (which are evidently of the fourteenth century) are written partly in the text and partly in the margin; but nearly half the readings and notes in the margin have perished through the carelessness of the bookbinder. Its text agrees partly with the Alexandrine and partly with the Constantinopolitan recension.

230. The CODEX ESCURIALENSIS ϕ III. 5., written in 1014, contains the Gospels, with synaxaria. Its text agrees partly with the Alexandrine and partly with the Constantinopolitan recension.

231. The CODEX ESCURIALENSIS ϕ III. 6., of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels, with scholia, figures, and synaxaria. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

232. The CODEX ESCURIALENSIS ϕ III. 7., of the thirteenth century, contains the Gospels, with synaxaria. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

233. The CODEX ESCURIALENSIS η II. 8. contains the Gospels, with a catena, written in the twelfth century. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

234. The CODEX HAVNIENSIS I. in the Royal library at Copenhagen was written in 1278, and contains the Acts of the Apostles, the Epistles of St. Paul, the catholic Epistles, and the Gospels, with synaxaria. The text of the Gospels for the most part agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

235. The CODEX HAVNIENSIS 2. was written in 1314, and contains the Gospels adapted to ecclesiastical use. It appears chiefly to agree with the Alexandrine recension.

236. The readings of a manuscript which are written in the margin of Dr. Mill's edition of the New Testament, written partly by himself and partly by Hearne, the editor of the Codex Laudianus. It is not known from what manuscript these readings were derived. Griesbach has given a copious extract of their various readings in his Synbolæ Criticæ, vol. i. pp. 217—301.

237. The CODEX S. SYNODI 42. in the library of the Holy Synod at Moscow (n. of Matthæi's notation), contains the Gospel, with scholia and figures, written in the tenth century. It agrees for the most part with the Constantinopolitan recension.

238. The CODEX S. SYNODI 48. (c. of Matthæi), of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels of Matthew and Mark, with commentaries and a catena. It agrees for the most part with the Constantinopolitan recension.

239. The CODEX S. SYNODI 47. (g. of Matthæi) contains Mark xvi. 2—8., Luke, and John i. 1.—xxi. 23., with commentaries. It agrees almost always with the Constantinopolitan recension.

240. The CODEX S. SYNODI 49., of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels, with the commentary of Euthymius Zigabenus. It is defective in Mark viii. 12—34. xiv. 17—54., and Luke xv. 32.—xvi. 8. It follows the Constantinopolitan family.

241. The CODEX DRESDENSIS formerly belonged to Matthæi, who has noted it by the letter k in his edition of the New Testament. It is very beautifully and carefully written in the eleventh century, and contains the New Testament, with synaxaria. It chiefly agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

242. The CODEX S. SYNODI 350. (l. of Matthæi), of the twelfth century, contains the New Testament, with figures, the Eusebian canons, paintings, and prologues, besides psalms and odes. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

243. The CODEX BIBLIOTHECÆ TYPOGRAPH. SYNODI 13. (m. of Matthæi), written in the fourteenth century, contains the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Luke, with the commentary of Theophylact. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

244. The CODEX BIBLIOTHECÆ TYPOGRAPH. SYNODI 1. (n. of Matthæi), contains the Gospels, with figures, and the commentaries of Euthymius Zigabenus. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

245. The CODEX SYNOD. 263. (o. of Matthæi), written in 1199, contains the Gospels, and follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

246. The CODEX SYNOD. 261. (p. of Matthæi), of the fourteenth century, contains the Gospels. It is defective in Matt. xii. 41.—xiii. 55., and in John xvii. 24.—xviii. 20. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and has some various readings in the margin.

247. The CODEX SYNOD. 373. (q. of Matthæi), of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels, with synaxaria. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

248. The CODEX SYNOD. 264. (r. of Matthæi), written in 1275, contains the Gospels, and for the most part agrees with the Constantinopolitan family.

249. The CODEX SYNOD. 94. (s. of Matthæi), written in the eleventh century, contains the Gospel of St. John, with a catena. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

250. The CODEX SYNOD. (not numbered), preserved in a small wooden box (v. of Matthæi), contains John vii. 39. to the end of that Gospel, written in cursive Greek characters in the thirteenth century.

251. The CODEX BIBLIOTHECÆ TABULARII MOSCUENSIS (x. of Matthæi), of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons and figures: it contains a mixed text, from both families of manuscripts.

252. The CODEX DRESDENSIS formerly belonged to Matthæi, who has noted it with the letter z.: it is of the eleventh century, and contains the Gospels. This manuscript has corrections and double readings, which have been added by the same hand from another manuscript. Its text, for the most part, agrees with that of the Constantinopolitan recension.

253. The CODEX OF NICEPHORUS, Archbishop of Cherson (10. of Matthaei), of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels, with scholia. It has many readings in common with the Constantinopolitan family, but more which agree with the Alexandrine recension.

254. The CODEX MATTHAEII of the eleventh century (11. of Matthaei), contains the Gospels of Saint Luke and Saint John with figures and scholia. Its text for the most part agrees with the Constantinopolitan family.

255. The CODEX SYNOD. 139. (12. of Matthaei), of the thirteenth century, contains commentaries extracted from Chrysostom and others on the Gospels, with fragments of the sacred text, which for the most part follows the Constantinopolitan family.

256. The CODEX BIBLIOTHECAE TYPOGRAPH. 3. (14. of Matthaei), of the ninth century, contains scholia on Mark and Luke, together with fragments of the sacred text, which for the most part agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

257. The CODEX BIBLIOTH. SYNOD. 120. (15. of Matthaei) contains fragments of John i. and xx., written in capital letters in the eighth century, with scholia. Its text mostly agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

258. The CODEX DRESDENSIS (17. of Matthaei), of the thirteenth century, contains the Gospels incorrectly written by an illiterate scribe, together with figures. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

259. The CODEX S. SYNODI 45. (a. of Matthaei) contains the Gospels written in the eleventh century, with synaxaria, the Eusebian canons, and commentaries. Its text for the most part agrees with the Alexandrine family.

The preceding manuscripts, Nos. 236—259., were collated and described by Matthaei. Dr. Scholz, however, has omitted those which he has marked α, β, γ, δ, ε, ζ, η, θ, ι, κ, λ, μ, ν, ξ, ο, π, ρ, σ, τ, υ, φ, χ, ψ, ω, because they appear to contain only some works of Chrysostom.

iii. Manuscripts containing the New Testament and the Gospels, which, for the first time, were collated by Dr. Scholz.

260. The CODEX REGIUS 51. formerly 2243. (in the royal library at Paris),¹ contains the four Gospels, with figures, correctly written in the twelfth century. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension. The greater part of this manuscript was collated.

261. The CODEX REGIUS 52. is written on vellum in the twelfth century; but the beginning, comprising Matt. i. 1—11., has been supplied on paper by some one in the fourteenth century. It contains the Gospels adapted to ecclesiastical use. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan family, and is imperfect from Luke xxiv. 39. to the end of that Gospel. It was collated by Scholz on Matt. xi.—xiii., Mark v.—vii., Luke i.—v., and John v.—viii.

262. The CODEX REGIUS 53., of the tenth century, contains the Gospels, with synaxaria and the Eusebian canons. It chiefly agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated throughout.

263. The CODEX REGIUS 61., formerly 2251. and also 2864. was written in the twelfth century, and probably in Asia Minor. It contains the Gospels, Acts of the Apostles, and the Epistles, with figures. It has only the beginning of the Eusebian canons, but the numbers of the Ammonian sections are written in the margin. In the Gospels this manuscript follows the Constantinopolitan recension. It was collated on Matt. viii.—xiv., Mark i.—iv., and John ii.—v.

264. The CODEX REGIUS 65. (formerly 2862.) was written in the thirteenth century, and (it should seem from the form of the letters) in Egypt. It contains the Gospels, and was collated by Scholz on Matt. xviii.—xxiv. Mark iii.—v. and John iv.—viii.; in other passages he only cursorily examined this manuscript, the text of which is mixed.

265. The CODEX REGIUS 66. (formerly 2858.), of the tenth century, contains the Gospels, the text of which is composed of the Constantinopolitan and Alexandrine families. The following portions were collated; viz. the whole Gospel of St. Matthew, Mark i.—v., Luke xxii.—xxiv., and John v.—viii. The remainder was cursorily examined.

266. The CODEX REGIUS 67. (formerly 877. and 2863.), of the tenth century, contains the Gospels, with synaxaria; it follows the Constantinopolitan recension. It was collated on Matt. i.—xi., Mark ii.—v., and John v.—ix. The remainder was cursorily examined.

267. The CODEX REGIUS 69. (formerly 3012., Colbertinus 4631.) contains the Gospels, written in the tenth century, and adapted to ecclesiastical use. It is imperfect in Matt. i. 1—8., Mark i. 1—7., Luke i. 1—8. xxiv. 50., and John i. 12. It follows the Constantinopolitan family, and was collated on Matt. ii.—x. and John vii. viii. The remainder was cursorily examined.

268. The CODEX REGIUS 73. (formerly 531^a, afterwards 2859.), of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons, synaxaria, and figures. It was collated on Matt. xxvi., Mark i.—iv., and John iv.—viii., and it follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

269. The CODEX REGIUS 74. (formerly 171., and afterwards 1042. and 2858.), of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels, with pictures. The Gospel of St. Matthew was collated, and also Mark i.—iv. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

270. The CODEX REGIUS 75. (formerly 2868.), of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels, with synaxaria. It chiefly follows the Constantinopolitan recension, but it also has many Egyptian readings. Most of this manuscript was collated by Scholz.

271. The CODEX REGIUS 75^a, of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons and figures. In Matthew, Luke, and John, it almost entirely follows the Constantinopolitan recension; but in Mark it has a mixed text. The chief part of this manuscript was collated.

272. The CODEX REGIUS 76. (formerly 2865.) contains the Gospels, written in the eleventh century. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated on Matt. vi.—xi., Mark i.—iii., John v.—viii. The remainder was cursorily examined.

273. The CODEX REGIUS 79. (formerly 4480., Colbertinus 3012.) was written, partly on vellum in the twelfth, and partly on cotton paper in the fourteenth century. It contains the Gospels, with an epitome of the evangelical annals, a scholium on Luke vi., the Eusebian canons, the commentaries of Severianus on Luke vii. 37., a table of the parables contained in the Gospels, and a fragment of a synaxarion. The text chiefly follows the Constantinopolitan recension, but it has some Alexandrine readings. This manuscript was collated in select passages.

274. The CODEX REGIUS 79^a, very elegantly and correctly written on vellum in the tenth century, contains the Gospels, with figures, synaxaria, and the Eusebian canons. It is imperfect in Mark i. 1—17., John i. 1—20., Mark vi. 21—54. and John iii. 18.—iv. 1., vii. 23—42., ix. 10—27., and xviii. 12—29., which passages have been supplied on paper by a later hand. It mostly agrees with the Constantinopolitan family.

275. The CODEX REGIUS 80. (formerly 538. and 2242^b.) contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons, prologues, and a portion of a synaxarion, written in the eleventh century. Scholz collated it for the Gospel of St. Matthew, and on Mark i. ii. and John iii.—viii. The remainder was cursorily examined: it agrees with the Constantinopolitan family.

276. The CODEX REGIUS 81., of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons and figures, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan family. It was collated for the Gospel of St. Matthew, and on Mark i.—vi., Luke iv. and xxii., and John v. and viii.

277. The CODEX REGIUS 81. A., of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons and figures. Some passages, which had been omitted, have been supplied by a later hand. Its text mostly follows the Constantinopolitan recension. The chief part of this manuscript was collated by Scholz.

278. The CODEX REGIUS 82. (formerly 3012.) contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons, figures, and synaxaria, written in the twelfth century. From some Armenian inscriptions, Dr. Scholz conjectures that it was originally executed in Asia Minor, whence it migrated to an Armenian monastery. Matt. xiii. 43.—xvii. 5. have been supplied by a later hand. Its text follows the Constantinopolitan family: it was collated in select passages.

279. The CODEX REGIUS 86. (formerly 2860., Colbertinus 6051.) was presented to Louis XIV. in the year 1686, by Joseph Georgirene, Archbishop of Samos. It was written in the twelfth century, and contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons, synaxaria, and figures. It follows the Con stantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

280. The CODEX REGIUS 87., of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels, with a portion of a synaxarion, and prologues. It is imperfect in Mark viii. 3.—xv. 36.; and was collated on Matt. vi.—xii., Mark i.—v., Luke iv. v., and John iv.—viii. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

281. The CODEX REGIUS 88. (formerly 2860., Colbertinus 4766.) contains the Gospels, written in the twelfth century, with figures and the Eusebian canons. It follows the Constantinopolitan family. This manuscript is imperfect in Matt. xxviii. 11. to the end, and Luke i. i.—ix. It was collated on Matt. vii.—x., Mark i.—v., and John vi.—viii.

282. The CODEX REGIUS 90. (formerly 2860.³, Colbertinus 6015.), written in the year 1176, contains the Gospels, which for the most part agree with the Constantinopolitan family. It was collated in select passages.

283. The CODEX REGIUS 92. (formerly 3012., Colbertinus 4714.), of the fourteenth century, contains the Gospels. The text follows the Constantinopolitan family. This manuscript was collated in select passages.

284. The CODEX REGIUS 93. (formerly 2862.²), of the thirteenth century, contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons, figures, and synaxaria. The chief part of this manuscript was collated. It follows the Constantinopolitan family.

285. The CODEX REGIUS 95. (formerly 2835.³), written in the fourteenth century, contains the Gospels, with figures, and follows the Constantinopolitan family. The greater part of it was collated.

286. The CODEX REGIUS 96. (formerly 3011^{a, b}, Colbertinus 4556.), written in the year 1432, contains the Gospels, with the paschal canon from 1432 to 1502. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

287. The CODEX REGIUS 98. (formerly 2861., Colbertinus 4916.), contains the Gospels, written in the fifteenth century. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan family, and was collated in select passages.

288. The CODEX REGIUS 99. (formerly 2861.³, Colbertinus 4885.) contains Saint Luke's Gospel, written in the sixteenth century. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan family, and was collated in select passages.

289. The CODEX REGIUS 100. A., dated February 15, 1625, by one Luke, who calls himself αρχιδιакон, a chief priest, [archbishop?], contains the Gospels, which agree with the Constantinopolitan family. It was collated in select passages.

290. The CODEX REGIUS 108^a, of the thirteenth century, contains the Gospels, with synaxaria. It was collated in select passages, and follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

291. The CODEX REGIUS 113. (formerly 2868², Colbertinus 6162.), of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels, with synaxaria. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

292. The CODEX REGIUS 114., of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels, with synaxaria and figures. It is imperfect in Matt. i. 1.—vii. 14., and in John xix. 14. to the end. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

293. The CODEX REGIUS 117., written in November, 1373, contains the Gospels, with figures and synaxaria; and follows the Constantinopolitan recension. It was collated on Matt. v.—x., Mark ii.—vi., Luke ii., and John v.—viii.

294. The CODEX REGIUS 118. (formerly Colbertinus 6629.), of the thirteenth century, contains the Gospels, with figures. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and is imperfect in Matt. i. 18. to xii. 25. This manuscript was presented to Louis XIV. by Joseph Georgirene, Archbishop of Samos. It was collated in select passages.

295. The CODEX REGIUS 120. (formerly 3426.), of the thirteenth century, contains the Gospels: it agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and is imperfect in Matt. i. 1.—xi. It was collated in select passages.

296. The CODEX REGIUS 123., of the sixteenth century, contains the Gospels. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

297. The CODEX REGIUS 140. a., of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels, with figures and synaxaria. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan family, and was collated in select passages.

298. The CODEX REGIUS 175^a, formerly belonged to the public library of the Jesuits at Lyons. It was written in the twelfth century, and contains the Gospels, with figures and synaxaria. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

299. The CODEX REGIUS 177. (formerly 2242.) was written in the eleventh century, and Dr. Scholz conjectures, from some scholia, by a follower of Theodore of Mopsueste. It contains the Gospels, with prologues, the Eusebian canons, figures, scholia, and fragments of various writers, concerning some particular passages. The text for the most part agrees with the Constantinopolitan family; but in the Gospels of Saint Mark and Saint Luke there are many peculiar readings, as well as readings which commonly occur in manuscripts of the Alexandrine recension. The whole of this manuscript was collated.

300. The CODEX REGIUS 186. (formerly 750., also 1882.), of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke, collated with ancient copies from Jerusalem, deposited on the holy mountain [Athos?]; together with the Eusebian canons, synaxaria, a catena, additional observations on some select passages, and Theophylact's commentaries written in the outer margin by a later hand. The text follows both the Alexandrine and the Constantinopolitan recensions. It has a few peculiar readings. The whole of this manuscript was collated.

301. The CODEX REGIUS 187. (formerly 537. also 1879.), of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels, with a catena from the writings of the fathers. It for the most part follows the Constantinopolitan recension, but it also has not a few readings peculiar to the Alexandrine family. This manuscript was collated throughout.

302. The CODEX REGIUS 193. (formerly 1893.), of the sixteenth century, contains a fragment of Saint Matthew and Saint Luke, with a commentary. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

303. The CODEX REGIUS 194. A. contains John i.—iv., of the eleventh century, with Theophylact's commentary on the Gospels, and iambic verses on Matthew and Mark, written on cotton paper in 1255. The text follows the Constantinopolitan recension. Select passages of this manuscript were collated.

304. The CODEX REGIUS 194.,

338. The CODEx TAURINENSIS 335. b. I. 3., of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons and figures. It follows the Constantinopolitan family, but has some Alexandrine readings. It was collated in select passages.

339. The CODEx TAURINENSIS 302. c. II. 5., of the thirteenth century, contains the Gospels, Acts, and Epistles, with prologues, the Eusebian canons, synaxaria, and other pieces. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

340. The CODEx TAURINENSIS 344. b. I. 13., of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels, many passages of which have been corrected by a later hand. This manuscript agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

341. The CODEx TAURINENSIS 350. b. I. 21. was written in the year 1296, and contains the Gospels, with a synaxarium. It follows the Constantinopolitan family, and was collated in select passages.

342. The CODEx TAURINENSIS 149. b. II. 3., of the thirteenth century, contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons; it agrees with the Constantinopolitan family, and was collated in select passages.

343. The CODEx AMBROSIANUS 13. (in the Ambrosian library at Milan),² of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons and figures, adapted to ecclesiastical use. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan family, and was collated in select passages.

344. The CODEx AMBROSIANUS 16. contains the Gospels, with synaxaria on vellum, written in the twelfth century. Luke xiii. 21.—xvi. 23. xxii. 12—23. xxi. 12. and xxiii. 45—50. have been written on paper, in the fourteenth century. It is imperfect in John xxi. 12. to the end. This manuscript agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension; the latter part, in particular, with the textus receptus. It was collated in select passages.

345. The CODEx AMBROSIANUS 17., of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels, with synaxaria. It is imperfect in Matt. i. 1—11. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

346. The CODEx AMBROSIANUS 23., an incorrectly written manuscript of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels, the text of which agrees with the Alexandrine family. It is imperfect in John iii. 6.—vii. 52. The entire manuscript was collated.

347. The CODEx AMBROSIANUS 35., of the twelfth century, correctly written by Constantinus Chrysographus, contains the Gospels, with prologues, fitted to ecclesiastical use. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

348. The CODEx AMBROSIANUS B. 56., written in 1023, contains the Gospels, with synaxaria, and the Eusebian canons. It agrees very often with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

349. The CODEx AMBROSIANUS 61., written in 1322, contains the Gospels, with synaxaria, and the Eusebian canons. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

² The manuscripts in the Ambrosian library are described at length by Dr. Scholz in his Biblisch-Kritische Reise, pp. 70—94.

350. The CODEx AMBROSIANUS B. 62. contains the Gospels, with figures and synaxaria, written on vellum in the eleventh century. The first four leaves are written on paper in the sixteenth century. It is imperfect in John xxi. 9. to the end. It follows the Alexandrine recension, but often agrees with the Constantinopolitan family. It was collated in select passages.

351. The CODEx AMBROSIANUS 70. is of the eleventh century. Latin words, written in the fifteenth century, are occasionally interspersed among the Greek text. It mostly agrees with the received text, but it also has many peculiar readings. It was collated in select passages.

352. The CODEx AMBROSIANUS B. 93., brought from Calabria in 1607, contains the Gospels, written in the twelfth century. It is imperfect in Matt. i. 1—17. Mark i. 1—15. xvi. 13. to the end, Luke i. 1—7. xxiv. 43. to the end, and John i. 1—10. and xxi. 3. to the end. The faded letters have been restored by a later hand. Indices of lessons, written in the fourteenth century, have been added in the margin. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and has been collated in select passages.

353. The CODEx AMBROSIANUS M. 93. of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels, with the same commentary as No. 181. It is imperfect in John xxi. 24, 25., and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. The greater part of this manuscript was collated.

354. The CODEx VENETUS 29. contains the Gospel of Matthew with Theophylact's Commentary, written in the eleventh century. It was collated on Matthew xxiv., and for the most part agrees with the Alexandrine codices.

355. The CODEx VENETUS 541., of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels, preceded by the Eusebian canons and the Epistle to Carpius. It was collated for Matt. xxiv., Mark iv., Luke iv., and John v. It almost always agrees with the Constantinopolitan family.

356. The CODEx VENETUS 515. contains a catena on St. Luke's Gospel, written in the sixteenth century, ascribed to Titus of Bostra; but the text of Luke is rarely cited.

357. The CODEx VENETUS 28. contains Luke and John, with a catena, written in the eleventh century. Dr. Scholz has given readings from it on Luke i. and John v. Its text agrees with that of the Constantinopolitan recension.

358. The CODEx MUTINENSIS 9. (H. A. 9.), of the fourteenth century, contains the Gospels. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan family, and was collated in Matt. vi., Mark iv. v. x., Luke v., and John v. vii. viii.

359. The CODEx MUTINENSIS 242. (MS. III. B. 16.), of the fourteenth century, contains the Gospels. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan family, and was collated on the same chapters as No. 358.

360. The CODEx PARMENSIS (formerly De Rossi 1.), in the library of the Duke of Parma, contains the Gospels, written in the eleventh century. It agrees chiefly with the Constantinopolitan family, but it has numerous Alexandrine readings. This and the following manuscript were collated by De Rossi and Scholz.

361. The CODEx PARMENSIS (formerly De Rossi 2.), of the thirteenth century, contains the Gospels. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan family, but it has numerous Alexandrine readings.

362. The CODEx FLORENTINUS, in the library of Santa Maria at Florence, contains the Gospel of Saint Luke, with a catena, of the thirteenth century. This manuscript is cited by Lamy, in his treatise De Eruditione Apostolorum, p. 239. Dr. Scholz does not know where it now is deposited.

363. The CODEx FLORENTINUS LAURENTIANUS VI. 13. contains the Gospels, Acts, and Epistles, written in the thirteenth century. It follows the Constantinopolitan family, and was collated in select passages.

364. The CODEx LAURENTIANUS VI. 21., Dr. Scholz conjectures, from the form of the letters, was written in Sclavonia in the thirteenth century. A few leaves have been added at the beginning and end, which were written in the fourteenth century. It contains the Gospels, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan family. This manuscript was collated in select passages.

365. The CODEx LAURENTIANUS VI. 36., of the thirteenth century, contains the Gospels, Acts, Epistles, and Psalms. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan family, and was collated in select passages.

366. The CODEx LAURENTIANUS 2607. (formerly belonging to the library of Santa Maria) contains the Gospel of Saint Matthew, with a catena. It is imperfect in the beginning; occasionally, annotations are written in the margin by a later hand.

367. The CODEx LAURENTIANUS 2708. (also formerly belonging to the same monastery), written in 1332, contains the New Testament, with prologues and synaxaria. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

368. The CODEx RICHARDIANUS 84., of the fifteenth century, contains the Gospel of Saint John, the Apocalypse, and Epistles, together with Plato's Epistle to Dionysius incorrectly written. The text of St. John's Gospel agrees with the Constantinopolitan MSS. It was collated in select passages.

369. The CODEx RICHARDIANUS 90., of the twelfth century, contains Mark vi. 25.—ix. 45. x. 17. xvi. 9., and a grammar of the Greek language, together with the Fables of Phædrus. The text of these fragments for the most part agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was cursorily collated.

370. The CODEx RICHARDIANUS (K. I. 11.), of the fourteenth century, contains the Gospels, with Theophylact's commentary. It is imperfect at the beginning and end. This manuscript is stated by Scholz to have been described by Lamy in his treatise De Eruditione Apostolorum, p. 232. cf. seq. It is not known where it is now deposited.

371. The CODEx VATICANUS 1159., of the tenth century, contains the Gospels with the Eusebian canons and figures. It follows the Constantinopolitan family, and was collated in select passages.

372. The CODEx VATICANUS 1161., very beautifully written in the fifteenth century, contains the Gospels. It is imperfect from John iii. 1. to the end. It agrees with the Alexandrine family, and was collated in select passages.

373. The CODEx VATICANUS 1423. formerly belonged to Cardinal Sirlet. It was written in the fifteenth century, and contains the Gospels, with a catena. The end of John is wanting. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan family, and was collated in select passages.

374. The CODEx VATICANUS 1415., written in the twelfth century, contains the Gospels with the commentary of Peter of Laodicea. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan family, and was collated in select passages.

375. The CODEx VATICANUS 1533., of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

376. The CODEx VATICANUS 1539., of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels collated with ancient copies at Jerusalem. It follows the Constantinopolitan family, and was also collated in select passages.

377. The CODEx VATICANUS 1618., of the fifteenth century, contains Matthew, with a catena, Mark, Luke, and John, with questions and answers. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan family, and was collated in select passages.

378. The CODEx VATICANUS 1658., of the fourteenth century, contains fragments of Saint Matthew's Gospel, with the homilies of Chrysostom, and numerous passages from the prophets. The text seldom departs from the received text. It was collated in select passages.

379. The CODEx VATICANUS 1769., of the fifteenth century, contains the Gospels, with a perpetual commentary. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

380. The CODEx VATICANUS 2139., of the fifteenth century, contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

381. The CODEx PALATINO-VATICANUS 20., of the fourteenth century, contains the Gospel of Saint Luke, with a catena. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan family, and was collated in select passages.

382. The CODEx VATICANUS 2070. (formerly Basil. 109.), correctly written in the thirteenth century, contains fragments of the Gospels, the leaves of which have been greatly misplaced by the carelessness of the bookbinder. Its text agrees with the Alexandrine family. The greater part of this manuscript was collated by Dr. Scholz.

383, 384, 385., { are three manuscripts belonging to the COLLEGE AT Rome, written in the sixteenth century. They severally contain the Gospels with a commentary; 385., { follow the Constantinopolitan recension; and were collated in select passages.

386. The CODEx VATICANO-OTTOBONIANUS 66., of the fifteenth century, contains the New Testament with synaxaria. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. This and the following manuscripts, Nos. 387. to 397. inclusive, were collated by Dr. Scholz in select passages.

387. The CODEx VATICANO-OTTOBONIANUS 204., of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

388. The CODEx VATICANO-OTTOBONIANUS 212., of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels, with figures. It exhibits a mixed text, which often agrees with the Alexandrine recension.

389. The CODEx VATICANO-OTTOBONIANUS 297., of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

390. The CODEx VATICANO-OTTOBONIANUS 381. was written in 1252, and contains the Acts, Epistles, Gospels, and Apocalypse, with scholia, synaxaria, and the Eusebian canons. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan text.

391. The CODEx VATICANO-OTTOBONIANUS 432., written in the eleventh century, was presented by the abbot Abachus Andriani, of mount Athos, to Pope Benedict XIII., who commanded it to be deposited in the Vatican Library. It contains the Gospels, with prologues and commentaries. It is imperfect in Matt. i. 1—8. Luke i. 1—80. and John vii. 53.—viii. 11., which passages were added in another handwriting in the fifteenth century. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

392. The CODEx BARBERINIANUS 225., of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels, with the commentary of Theophylact, to which is prefixed the fragment of St. John's Gospel, noticed in page 118. § XXX. under the letter Y. This manuscript agrees with the Constantinopolitan family.

393. The CODEx VALLICELLIANUS E. 22., of the sixteenth century, contains the Catholic and Pauline epistles, together with the Gospels. It follows the Constantinopolitan family.

394. The CODEx VALLICELLIANUS F. 17., written by one Michael, a monk, and dated July 14, 1330, contains the Gospels, Acts, and Epistles. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan family.

395. The CODEx CASANATENSIS A. R. V. 33., of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels, with figures. Corrections and readings are written in the margin. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension, but has some Alexandrine readings.

396. The CODEx GHIGIANUS R. IV. 6., of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels. It is imperfect in Matt. i. 1.—xxiii. 27., and agrees with the Constantinopolitan family.

397. The CODEx VALLICELLIANUS C. 4., of the fifteenth century, contains the Gospel of St. John, with a catena. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan family.

398. The CODEx TAURINENSIS 92. c. IV. 6., of the thirteenth century, contains select passages of the Gospels, with a catena. It was cursorily collated, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan family.

399. The CODEx TAURINENSIS 109. c. IV. 29., of the fifteenth century, contains a commentary on the Gospels, but the text is not always given. It was cursorily collated, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan family.

400. The CODEx BEROLINENSIS BIBLIOTHECÆ (formerly Diezii 10.), of the fifteenth century, contains Matt. xii. 29.—xiii. 2., the Acts, and Epistles. It is mutilated, and has been damaged both by fire and water. It was described by Aurisillus in 1802; and was again described and collated by G. T. Pappelbaum in 1815.

401. The CODEx NEAPOLITANUS 1. C. 24., of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels of Matthew and Luke, Mark vi. 1.—xvi. to the end, and John i. 1.—xii. 1. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension. This and the nine following manuscripts, to No. 417. inclusive, were collated in select passages.

402. The CODEx NEAPOLITANUS 1. C. 28., of the fifteenth century, contains the Gospels, with prologues and figures. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan family.

403. The CODEx NEAPOLITANUS 1. C. 29., of the twelfth century, contains Matt. xii. 23.—xix. 12. xxviii., Mark complete, Luke i. 1—5. xxi. 36. to the end, and John i. 1.—xviii. 36., with synaxaria. It follows the Constantinopolitan family.

404. A manuscript belonging to the abate Scotti, of Naples, contains the Gospels, with prologues. It was written in the eleventh century, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan family.

405. The CODEx VENETIANÆ BIBLIOTHECÆ, Class I. No. 10. (formerly Nanius 3.), of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons. The leaves have been so misplaced by the bookbinder that scarcely two or four consecutive pages of the same Gospel are to be found. The text of this manuscript for the most part agrees with the Alexandrine recension, but it contains some Alexandrine readings.¹

406. The CODEx VENETIANUS, Class I. No. 11. (formerly Nanius 4.), of the eleventh century, contains the Gospels. It is imperfect in Mark iv. 41.—v. 14. and Luke iii. 16.—iv. 4.; and for the most part agrees with the Alexandrine recension.

407. The CODEx VENETIANUS, Class I. No. 12. (formerly Nanius 5.), of the eleventh century, contains Luke v. 30. to the end, and John i. 1.—ix. It chiefly follows the Constantinopolitan recension, but has some readings which differ from it.

408. The CODEx VENETIANUS S. MARCI BIBLIOTHECÆ, Class I. No. 14., Nanius 7., formerly belonged to the monastery of Saint John, near the Jordan. It is of the twelfth century, and contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons. It has some peculiar readings, but for the most part agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

409. The CODEx VENETIANUS S. MARCI, Class I. No. 15. (formerly Nanius 8.), of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons and synaxaria. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan family, but has some peculiar readings.

410. In the CODEx VENETIANUS S. MARCI, Class I. No. 17. (formerly Nanius 10.), which is written on cotton paper, of the fourteenth century, the early pages (which are on vellum), with the Eusebian canons, are copied from another more ancient manuscript of the twelfth century. The rest of the manuscript was written by one Joasaph, a monk, in the thirteenth century. It contains the Gospels, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

411. The CODEx VENETIANUS BIBLIOTHECÆ NANIÆ 11., of the fourteenth century, contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons, and synaxaria.

412. The CODEx VENETIANUS S. MARCI, Class I. No. 19. (formerly Nanius 12.), written in 1301 by Theodore Hagiopeitritus, a calligrapher, contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons and synaxaria. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan family.

413. The CODEx VENETIANUS S. MARCI, Class I. No. 20. (formerly Nanius 13.), at one time belonging to the monastery of Saint Catherine on Mount Sinai. It was elegantly written in 1302 by one Theodore, and contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons, figures, and synaxaria. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan family.

414. The CODEx VENETIANUS S. MARCI, Class I. No. 21. (formerly Nanius 14.), written in the fourteenth century, by one Philip, a monk, contains the Gospels, with synaxaria. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan family.

415. The CODEx VENETIANUS S. MARCI, Class I. No. 22. (formerly Nanius 15.), written in January, 1356, contains the Gospels, with synaxaria and figures. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan family.

416. The CODEx VENETIANUS S. MARCI, Class I. No. 24. (formerly Nanius 17.), written in the fourteenth century, contains the Gospels. It is imperfect in Matt. i. 1.—xxv. 35., and John xviii. 7. to the end. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

417. The CODEx VENETIANUS S. MARCI, Class I. No. 25. (formerly Nanius 18.), of the fourteenth century, contains the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke. It is imperfect in the beginning and end. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan family.

418. The CODEx VENETIANUS BIBLIOTHECÆ NANIÆ 21 contains the Gospels of Matthew and Mark. It is imperfect at the end.

419. A manuscript formerly belonging to the monastery of Saint Michael at Venice, of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels. It is imperfect in John xxi. 7. to the end.

420. The CODEx MESSANENSIS I. of the fourteenth century, was written by different copyists. It contains the Gospels, with critical notes selected from other manuscripts. It was inspected by Dr. Münster. This manuscript is noted 237. in Dr. Schulz's third edition of Griesbach's Greek Testament.

421. The CODEx SYRACUSANUS in the Landolini library, of the twelfth century, contains the Gospels and Acts of the Apostles, with the Eusebian canons and prolegomena. It has a mixed text, and was also inspected by Dr. Mûnter. Scholz has noted it 238. in his edition of Griesbach's Greek Testament.

422. The CODEx REGIUS MONACENSIS 210. (in the royal library at Munich) was written for ecclesiastical use in the eleventh century by one Joseph, a monk. It contains the Gospels, with prolegomena and synaxaria; but the Gospel of John appears to have been written by another and later hand. It follows the Constantinopolitan text, but the copyist has transferred into the text a few scholia which were written in the margin; for instance, in Mark i. 10. τὸ θεὸς after πνεῦμα. This manuscript was collated in select passages by Dr. Scholz.

423. The CODEx MONACENSIS 36., of the fifteenth century, contains the Gospel of Matthew, with the catena of Nicetas. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan family, and was collated in select passages.

424. The CODEx MONACENSIS 83., of the fifteenth century, besides other works, contains the Gospel of Saint Luke, with the commentary of Titus of Bostra, and of other writers cited by him. It follows the Constantinopolitan family, and was collated in select passages.

425. The CODEx MONACENSIS 37., of the fifteenth century, contains the Gospel of John, with the most copious of all the catenae of Nicetas which Dr. Scholz has met with. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

426. The CODEx MONACENSIS 473., of the fourteenth century, contains Luke vi. 17.—xi. 26., with the catena of Nicetas. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

427. The CODEx MONACENSIS 465., of the twelfth or thirteenth century, contains the Gospels of Luke and Mark, with the commentary of Theophylact. It seldom deviates from the received text, and was collated in select passages.

428. The CODEx MONACENSIS 381., of the thirteenth century, contains the Gospels, with commentaries and figures. From the subscription it appears that the Gospel of St. Matthew was collated with some ancient manuscripts of Jerusalem preserved on the Holy Mountain (Athos?). From actual collation, Dr. Scholz ascertained that this manuscript is either a transcript of No. 300. (Codex Regius 186.), or of the copy whence that was transcribed. Its readings coincide for the most part with those of No. 300. The chief part of it was collated by Scholz.

429. The CODEx MONACENSIS 208., of the tenth century, contains questions with their solutions, taken from various interpreters, on the Gospels of Matthew and John, with the text, which was written in 979. It further contains Luke i. 1.—ii. 39., with a catena. This manuscript seldom departs from the received text. It was collated in select passages.

430. The CODEx MONACENSIS 437., of the eleventh century, contains the Gospel of John, with the catena of Nicetas. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

431. The CODEx MOLSHEMIENSIS formerly belonged to the College of Jesuits at Molsheim, in Alsace. It was written in the twelfth century, and contains the Gospels, Acts, and Epistles, with prologues and the Eusebian canons. Goldhagen inserted fifty-two various readings from it in his edition of the New Testament printed at Mayence in 1753. Dr. Scholz states that he found very few various readings in this manuscript on the Acts and Epistles, and scarcely any on the Gospels, so that no judgment can be formed concerning its text.

432. The CODEx MONACENSIS 99., of the sixteenth century, contains (besides other treatises on various subjects) the Gospel of Mark, with the commentary of Victor of Antioch. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

433. The CODEx BEROLINENSIS is a quarto manuscript, on vellum, of the twelfth century, preserved in the Royal Library at Berlin. It contains the following fragments; viz. Matt. i. 1—21. vi. 12—32. and xxii. 6. to the end of that Gospel; Mark i. 1—5. 29. ix. 21.—xiii. 12. Luke viii. 27. to the end of the Gospel; John i. 1.—ix. 21. and xx. 15. to the end of the Gospel. The various readings comprised in this manuscript were published by M. Pappelbaum, archdeacon of Berlin, in his description of it; whence they have been inserted by Dr. Dermout in his Collectanea Critica in Novum Testamentum,¹ and by Dr. Scholz (who numbers it 239.) in his third edition of Griesbach's Greek Testament. It has a mixed text.

434. The CODEx CÆSAREO-VINDOBONENSIS 71. (Lambecii 42. formerly 279.), of the fourteenth century, contains the Gospel of Luke, with a catalogue. It very seldom deviates from the received text. It was collated in select passages.

435. The CODEx BIBLIOTHECÆ LUGDUNO-BATAVENSIS, Gronovii 131., now in the University library at Leyden, contains the Gospels neatly written. It is imperfect in Matt. i. 20.—ii. 13. and xxii. 4—19. John x. 14. to the end of that Gospel is written by a later hand. Neither Dermout, who first collated this manuscript, nor Dr. Scholz, has specified its age. The latter states that its text for the most agrees with the Alexandrine family.

436. The CODEx MEERMANNIANUS 117. comprises the four Gospels written in the eleventh century. They are arranged conformably to the Liturgy of the Greek church. On the sale of the Meermann library by auction in 1824 this manuscript was purchased by an English bookseller. It is not known who is the present possessor of it.

437. The CODEx BIBLIOTHECÆ IMPERIALIS PETROPOLITANÆ (in the Imperial library at Petersburg) was written in the eleventh century, by Michael Cerularius, formerly patriarch of Constantinople.

438. The CODEx 5112 in the BRITISH MUSEUM (formerly Askew 621.) contains the Gospels, in two volumes, quarto. It was written about the eleventh century.

439. The CODEx 5107. in the British Museum (formerly Askew 622.) contains the Gospels written in 1159 on mount Athos, by the monk Nephon.

440. The CODEx CANTABRIGIENSIS Mm. 6. 9. or 2423. contains the Gospels, Acts, and Epistles. The text is composed from both families. It was collated by Dr. Scholz on Matt. vi. ix. x., Mark v. vi., and Luke iv.

441. The CODEx CANTABRIGIENSIS † 2622. contains the Old and New Testaments with notes.

442. The CODEx CANTABRIGIENSIS † 2537. 2538. contains the New Testament.

443. The CODEx CANTABRIGIENSIS, formerly Askew 624., contains the Gospels. It was brought from mount Athos.

444. The CODEx HARLEIANUS 5796., in the British Museum, contains the New Testament, except the Apocalypse, neatly and carefully written in the fifteenth century. After the Acts are placed the Catholic Epistles, and then those of Saint Paul. A table of lessons is subjoined to the Gospels, and there is another at the end of the book. This and the five following manuscripts (445—449.) all agree with the Constantinopolitan family, and were collated on Mark v.

445. The CODEx HARLEIANUS 5736. was written in 1506, as appears from the subscription. This manuscript was not known to Griesbach.

446. The CODEx HARLEIANUS 5777., of the fifteenth century, contains the Gospels, with synaxaria. It is imperfect in Matt. i. 1—17., Mark i. 7—9., Luke i. 1—18., and John i. 1—22. Scholz states, that it is written by a clear but not very skillful or learned hand.

447. The CODEx HARLEIANUS 5781., of the fifteenth century, contains the Gospels, with the Eusebian canons, and synaxaria.

448. The CODEx HARLEIANUS 5790. contains the Gospels, most beautifully illuminated: it was written, as appears from the inscription at the end of the volume, by one John, a priest at Rome, and it is dated April 25th, 1478.

449. The CODEx 4950⁴⁹⁵¹ in the British Museum, which formerly belonged to Cæsar de Missy, contains the Gospels, clearly and accurately written, probably in the fourteenth century.

450. The MANUSCRIPT belonging to the library of the great monastery of the Greeks at Jerusalem, numbered 1., contains the first three Gospels, with an Arabic version neatly written in 1043, to which are prefixed synaxaria and the Eusebian canons. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan family, and was collated in select passages.

451. Is the manuscript, No. 2., in the same library, written in the twelfth century, and containing the Gospels; which agree with the Constantinopolitan family, and were collated in select passages.

452—455. Are manuscripts in the same library, numbered 3—6., all of which were written in the fourteenth century, and contain the Gospels. They agree with the Constantinopolitan family, and were also collated in select passages.

456. Is a manuscript in the same library, No. 7., containing the Gospels. To the text of Saint Matthew is annexed a commentary, neatly written in the thirteenth century. It was collated in select passages.

457. Is a manuscript belonging to the Greek monastery of Saint Saba (which is two miles distant from Jerusalem), No. 2., written in the thirteenth century. It contains the Gospels, Acts, and Epistles, to which are prefixed synaxaria. This and the nine following manuscripts (Nos. 458—466.) all agree with the Constantinopolitan recension, and were severally collated in select passages.

458. Is a manuscript belonging to the same library, No. 3., and contains the Gospels written in 1278.

459. and 460. Are manuscripts belonging to the same library, Nos. 7. and 8., of the twelfth century, and contain the Gospels.

461. Is a manuscript in the same library, No. 9., neatly written in 135, by one Nicholas, a monk, and contains the Gospels.

462. and 463. Are manuscripts in the same library, Nos. 10. and 11., of the fourteenth century, which contain the Gospels.

464. Is a manuscript in the same library, No. 12., of the eleventh century, and contains the Gospels.

465. Is a manuscript in the same library, No. 19., of the thirteenth century, and contains the Gospels.

466. Is also a manuscript in the same library, of the thirteenth century: it contains the New Testament.

467. Is a manuscript belonging to the library of a monastery in the isle of Patmos. It is of the eleventh century, and contains the Gospels; agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

468. Is a manuscript in the same library, of the twelfth century. It contains the Gospels with a commentary; agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

469. Is also a manuscript belonging to the same library, of the fourteenth century. It contains the Gospels; agrees with the Constantinopolitan family, and was collated in select passages.

iv. *Evangelisteria (or Lessons from the Gospels appointed to be read in Divine Service) which have been collated by the Editors of the Greek Testament (especially by Wetstein and Griesbach,) who preceded Dr. Scholz, by whom their Notation has been retained.*¹

1. The CODEX REGIUS 278. (formerly Colbertinus 700.) is written in uncial letters, in the eighth century: it is imperfect. This evangelisterium was cursorily collated by Wetstein and Scholz: it agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

2. The CODEX REGIUS 280., formerly Colbertinus 2215., of the eighth century, according to Montfaucon and Scholz, but Wetstein does not think it earlier than the ninth century. It was written in uncial characters. It is imperfect, agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was cursorily collated by Wetstein and Scholz.

3. The CODEX OXONIENSIS Wheleri 3., of the tenth century, is in uncial characters. It was collated by Dr. Mill, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

4. The CODEX CANTABRIGIENSIS Dd. 8. 49. formerly belonged to Dr. More, bishop of Ely. It was written in the tenth century, in uncial characters. Bishop Marsh thinks it was brought from the East. This evangelisterium was collated by Dr. Mill.

5. The CODEX BODLEIANUS 3. was written in the year 995, in uncial letters. It was collated by Mill and Wetstein.

6. The CODEX BIBLIOTHECÆ LUGDUNO-BATAVÆ, formerly Scaligeri 243., is a Greek-Arabic manuscript, written in uncial letters, in the tenth century. Besides an evangelisterium, it contains lessons from the Acts of the Apostles, Epistles, and Psalms. Wetstein states that it has some peculiar readings, and that it agrees with the Egyptian version. Dr. Dermout, who is the most recent describer and collator of this manuscript, states that he found numerous valuable readings which Wetstein had omitted.² The following are the portions of the Gospels which are comprised in this manuscript:—Matt. xx. 17—22. 26.—xxiv. 28. 35.—xxv. 45. xxvi. 3—14. 17. to the end. Mark xi. 1—11. xiv. 26.—xv. 46. xvi. Luke vii. 11—17. ix. 28—35. xix. 25—48. xx. 27—38. xxii. 4.—xxiii. 49. 53.—xxiv. 35. John i. 9—14. ii. 12—25. v. 19—30. (verses 19. to 29. occur twice.) xii. 1.—xx. 31. (xii. 17—19. occur twice.)

² Collectanea Critica in Nov. Test. p. 16.

7. The CODEX REGIUS 301. (formerly Colbertinus 614.) was written by one George, a presbyter of the Greek church, in 1205. It was cursorily collated by Wetstein and Scholz, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

8. The CODEX REGIUS 312. (formerly Colbertinus 648.) was written in the fourteenth century by one Cosmas, a monk. It was cursorily collated by Wetstein and Scholz, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

9. The CODEX REGIUS 307. (Colbertinus 681.), of the thirteenth century, agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. It was cursorily collated by Wetstein and Scholz. Wetstein states that this manuscript and No. 10. are both imperfect.

10. The CODEX REGIUS 287. (Colbertinus 721.), of the eleventh century, agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was cursorily collated by Wetstein and Scholz.

11. The CODEX REGIUS 309. (Colbertinus 1265.), of the thirteenth century, is imperfect in the beginning and end. It was cursorily collated by Wetstein and Scholz, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

12. The CODEX REGIUS 310. (Colbertinus 824.), of the thirteenth century, appears to have been written for the use of the church of Constantinople. It is imperfect in the beginning and end, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. It was cursorily collated by Wetstein and Scholz.

13. The CODEX COISLINIANUS 31. is substituted by Dr. Scholz for the Colbertinus 1211., which Wetstein (and after him Griesbach) had numbered 13., because that manuscript, which is now the Codex Regius 1982., does not contain an evangelisterium. The Codex Coislinianus 31. is very neatly written in gold uncial characters, as far as the seventh leaf; thence to the twenty-second it is written with vermilion; and the rest of the manuscript is written with ink, and ornamented with figures. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated by Scholz.

14. The CODEX REGIUS 315. (Colbertinus 1282.), of the fifteenth century, was cursorily collated by Wetstein and Scholz. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

15. The CODEX REGIUS 302. (Colbertinus 1824.), of the thirteenth century, is defective in the beginning and end. It was cursorily collated by Scholz, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

16. The CODEX REGIUS 297. (Colbertinus 2465.), of the twelfth century, is very imperfect. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated by Wetstein and Scholz.

17. The CODEX REGIUS 279. (formerly Colbertinus), of the twelfth century, is imperfect at the end. It follows the Constantinopolitan text, but has some Alexandrine readings; and was cursorily collated by Scholz.

18. The CODEX LAUDIANUS D. 121. (Bodl. 4. of Dr. Mill's notation) is of the twelfth or thirteenth century according to Griesbach, but of the thirteenth century according to Scholz. It is written in large and elegant characters, in two columns, the initial letters and titles being gilt. It is imperfect in the beginning and end, and some leaves are also lost out of the middle of the volume. Scholz states that its text for the most part agrees with the Alexandrine family: it was collated by Mill, and more accurately by Griesbach, who discovered numerous readings which had been overlooked by Mill.

19. The CODEX BODLEIANUS 5. originally belonged to Parthenius, patriarch of Constantinople, by whom it was given to Heneage Finch, Earl of Winchelsea, ambassador to the Porte in 1661. It was presented to the university of Oxford by Edward Hyde, Earl of Clarendon, chancellor of that university. It is very neatly written in the thirteenth century, and for the most part agrees with the Alexandrine recension, and was collated by Mill and Griesbach.

20. The CODEX LAUDIANUS 4. of Dr. Mill, in the Bodleian library marked Laud. C. 79., was written in the year 1047. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated first by Mill, and afterwards by Griesbach, who states that he found scarcely any readings which had not been noticed by Mill and Wetstein.

21. The CODEX SELDENI 4. of Mill, in the Bodleian library 3386., noted Arch. Seld. B. 56., though characterized by Mill as ancient, cannot be dated earlier than the thirteenth century. A few fragments only of this manuscript now remain. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated by Mill and Griesbach.

22. The CODEX SELDENI 5. of Mill, in the Bodleian library 3384., noted Arch. Seld. B. 54., is of the twelfth century. The chief part of this manuscript consists of homilies of the fathers, especially of Gregory Nazianzen; to which are annexed some fragments of an evangelistarium. This manuscript was collated by Mill and Wetstein, and subsequently by Griesbach, who collated many readings of which they had taken no notice.

23. The CODEx MEADII, which successively was the property of Dr. Askew, and of M. d'Eon, by whom it was sent into France, was seen by Wetstein, who, however, has not specified its date.

24. The CODEx MONACENSIS 333. (Augustanus 4. of Bengel), of the tenth century, is correctly written, and is imperfect in John i. 1—14. Luke xxiv. 23—35., and Matt. xviii. 14—30. It was inspected by Bengel, and minutely examined by Scholz.

25. The CODEx HARLEIANUS 5650. in the British Museum, of the twelfth century, is a codex rescriptus, but very few traces of the ancient writing are legible.

25^b. According to Griesbach is part of the same manuscript, written by another hand, in a smaller and more elegant character, and containing lessons concerning the resurrection of Christ. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated by Griesbach.

26. The CODEx BODLEIANUS 3390. noted sup. Seld. 2. was written, or rather re-written, in the fifteenth century; but almost every vestige of the more ancient writing (which seems to have been of the ninth or tenth century) has disappeared. Some lessons are added from the Acts and Epistles. The text of this manuscript is mixed: it was collated by Griesbach, who has described it at great length.

27. The CODEx BODLEIANUS 3391. noted sup. Seld. 3. is of the thirteenth or fourteenth century according to Griesbach, but of the fourteenth century according to Scholz. It was written in large characters by some illiterate monk over a more ancient evangelistarium, in uncial letters of the ninth century. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was first collated and described by Griesbach.

28. The CODEx MARSHI 22., now in the Bodleian library, was written in the thirteenth century by two different hands, neither of whom was very careful or accurate. It is imperfect at the end, and has a mixed text. Both this and the following manuscript were collated and minutely described by Griesbach.

29. The CODEx MARSHI 23., also in the Bodleian library, was elegantly written in the thirteenth century, but the letters have become so faint as to be legible with difficulty. It is imperfect at the end, and follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

30. The CODEx BODLEIANUS 296., now marked Cromwelli 117., from Oliver Cromwell, to whom it formerly belonged, and with the rest of whose manuscripts it came into the Bodleian library, was written in the year 1225. It contains Greek liturgies and forms of public prayers. At page 149 commence sections of the Gospels and Epistles. Scholz has not stated with what recension its text coincides: but as it was written in Greece, we may conclude that it follows the Constantinopolitan family.

31. The CODEx NORIMBERGENSIS is of the twelfth century: it was collated by Doederlein. Michaelis states that its readings have a great conformity with those of the Codices Cantabrigiensis, Stephani, Basileensis, and Leicestrensis.

32. The CODEx GOTHANUS, now in the library of the Duke of Saxe-Gotha, was written by a careless and illiterate Greek scribe. This manuscript was collated and described in a treatise published at Leipzig in 1791. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

33. Is an EVANGELISTERIUM, belonging to Cardinal Alessandro Albani, written in the ninth century, in uncial characters. It was edited in 1788 by Stefano Antonio Morcelli, at Rome, and belongs to the Constantinopolitan recension.

34. The CODEx MONACENSIS 229., formerly Evangelistarium Mannhemense 19., is in three volumes quarto, which were written in uncial characters in the ninth century, and, in Dr. Scholz's opinion, founded on internal evidence, for the use of some monastery on mount Athos. After a careful collation, he found very few readings different from the received text.

35. The CODEx VATICANUS 331. was written in the year 919, by one Michael, a monk: it follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated by Birch.

36. The CODEx VATICANUS 1067. contains lessons from the Gospels, very correctly written in uncial characters, in the tenth century.

37. A manuscript numbered 287., in the library of the college of the Propaganda, at Rome, contains sections from the Gospels and Epistles, written in the eleventh century. It agrees for the most part with the Alexandrine family, and was collated by Dr. Birch.

38. and 39. The CODICES, Florentinus 1. and 2., were collated by Birch.

40. The CODEx ESCURIALENSIS 1. is an evangelistarium, supposed by Moldenhawer (by whom this and the other manuscripts in the Escorial were collated for Birch) to be written in the tenth century. It is in uncial characters.

41. The CODEx ESCURIALENSIS X. III. 12., written in the tenth century, in uncial characters, agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

42. The CODEx ESCURIALENSIS X. III. 13., of the tenth century, contains an evangelistarium written in uncial characters in the tenth century. It is imperfect in the beginning; follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

43. The CODEx ESCURIALENSIS X. III. 16., of the eleventh century, was written for the use of some church in Constantinople. It is imperfect in the beginning.

44. The CODEx HAUNIENSIS 3., of the fifteenth century, contains an imperfect evangelistarium. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

45. The CODEx VINDOBONENSIS, Lambecii 15., among the Greek law MSS., is a fragment of an evangelistarium, consisting of six leaves, and written in uncial characters in the eighth century.

46. The CODEx CÆSAREUS or VINDOBONENSIS (Kollarii 7., Forlosia 23.) contains fragments of an evangelistarium, written on purple vellum in the ninth century.

47. A manuscript in the LIBRARY OF THE HOLY SYNOD at Moscow, numbered 23. (h. of Matthæi's notation), is in uncial characters, written in the eighth century. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan family. This and the ten evangelisteria following (to No. 57. inclusive) were collated by Matthæi for his critical edition of the Greek Testament.

48. A manuscript in the LIBRARY OF THE HOLY SYNOD, No. 44. (c. of Matthæi), was written in 1056 by one Peter, a monk: it subsequently belonged to Nicephorus, metropolitan of the island of Crete, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan text.

49. Is a manuscript in the library connected with the PRINTING OFFICE of the Holy Synod, No. 11. (f. of Matthæi.) The former part of it is of the tenth century; the latter part is of a later date. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

50. Is a very ancient manuscript, probably of the eighth century, in the same library, No. 12. (h. of Matthæi): it is written in uncial characters, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

51. Is a manuscript in the same library, No. 9. (t. of Matthæi): it is of the sixteenth century, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. It contains part of an evangelistarium.

52. A manuscript in the LIBRARY OF THE HOLY SYNOD, No. 266. (z. of Matthæi), written in the fourteenth century, contains lessons from other parts of the New Testament, besides an evangelistarium or lessons from the Gospels.

53. A manuscript in the same library, No. 267. (x. of Matthæi), of the fifteenth century, contains an euchologium, or collection of Greek prayers, and lessons from the New Testament.

54. A manuscript in the same library, No. 268. (y. of Matthæi), written in 1470, also contains an euchologium, and lessons from the New Testament.

55. Is a manuscript in the library connected with the PRINTING OFFICE of the Holy Synod, No. 47. (w. of Matthæi): it was transcribed by an ignorant and very careless copyist from a more ancient manuscript, and contains an euchologium, with lessons from the New Testament.

56. Is a manuscript in the same library, No. 9. (16. of Matthæi), of the fifteenth century. It contains fragments of ecclesiastical lessons from the New Testament.

57. Is a manuscript in the LIBRARY AT DRESDEN, No. 256. (19. of Matthæi), of the fifteenth century. It formerly belonged to Count Bruhl, and contains an euchologium, in which are many lessons from the New Testament.

v. Evangelisteria, first collated by Dr. Scholz for his critical Edition of the New Testament.

58. The CODEx REGIUS 50. a., of the fifteenth century, was written for the use of some church in Greece. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was cursorily collated by Scholz.

59. The CODEx REGIUS 100. A., of the seventeenth century, agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was cursorily collated.

60. The CODEx REGIUS 375 (formerly 2572^{a. 3.}, Colbertinus 4954.) was written in 1022. It contains lessons from the New Testament, and agrees with the Alexandrine recension. The whole of this manuscript was collated.

61. The CODEx REGIUS 182. contains fragments of the Gospels, viz. Matt. xxvi. 67. to the end, and John xix. 10—20. It is written in uncial characters, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

62. The CODEx REGIUS 194. A., of the thirteenth century, agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was cursorily collated.

63. The CODEx REGIUS 277., formerly 2493., was brought from the East into the royal library at Paris. It was written in the ninth century in uncial characters, and is mutilated at the beginning and end. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

64. The CODEx REGIUS 281. was also brought from Constantinople; it is written in uncial letters of the ninth century, and many of the leaves are torn. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, but has a few Alexandrine readings. Very many sections of it were collated.

65. and 66. The CODICES REGII 282. and 283. are both palimpsest manuscripts, the more ancient writing of which appears to have been an evangelisterium written in uncial characters in the ninth century. Over this an ecclesiastical office was written in the thirteenth century: its text agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. The ecclesiastical office in No. 293. is imperfect at the end. Dr. Scholz states that he collated these two manuscripts with great labour, but discovered very few readings different from those of the received text.

67. The CODEx REGIUS 284., of the eleventh century, is written in uncial letters: it very rarely departs from the received text.

68. The CODEx REGIUS 285., formerly 1884^{a. 5.} (Colbertinus 3006.), of the eleventh century, is imperfect at the beginning and end. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan family, and was cursorily collated by Scholz.

69. The CODEx REGIUS 286., of the eleventh century, is imperfect at the end. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was cursorily collated.

70. The CODEx REGIUS 288., of the eleventh century, on vellum, was brought from the East in 1669. A few leaves at the beginning and end have been written by a later hand. This manuscript was cursorily collated.

71. The CODEx REGIUS 289., formerly 2466^{a. 5.} (Colbertinus 4123.), written in 1066, is partly on vellum and partly on cotton paper. It agrees with the Alexandrine recension, and was collated in select passages.

72. The CODEx REGIUS 290., written in 1257, follows the Constantinopolitan recension. Three leaves annexed to this manuscript, and containing John v. 1—11. vi. 61—69. and vii. 1—15., are written in uncial characters, of the ninth century. The text of these fragments also corresponds with the Constantinopolitan recension.

73. The CODEx REGIUS 291., of the twelfth century, is imperfect. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and was cursorily collated.

74, 75, 76, and 77. The CODICES REGII, 292 (formerly 2466.) 293, 295, and 296., are all of the twelfth century, and agree with the Constantinopolitan recension: they were cursorily collated by Dr. Scholz.

78. The CODEx REGIUS 298., formerly 2466^{a. 5.} (Colbertinus 4123.) is written on vellum, in the twelfth century: a few chasms are supplied on cotton paper. This manuscript for the most part agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, but it has some peculiar readings.

79. and 80. The CODICES REGII 299. and 300. (formerly 2467.) are both of the twelfth century: they follow the Constantinopolitan family, and were cursorily collated.

81. The CODEx REGIUS 305., on vellum, Dr. Scholz thinks was written in Egypt; but it has supplements added on paper, of the fifteenth century. Its text for the most part agrees with the Alexandrine recension, and the greater part of it was collated

82. The CODEx REGIUS 276., of the fifteenth century, on paper, contains lessons from the prophets, as well as from the New Testament. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and was cursorily collated.

83. The CODEx REGIUS 294., of the eleventh century, contains lessons from the New Testament. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was cursorily collated.

84. and 85. The CODICES REGII 32. a. and 33. a. are both of the twelfth century, and contain lessons from the Old and New Testaments. They agree with the Constantinopolitan recension, and were cursorily collated.

86. The CODEx REGIUS 311., formerly 1884. and 548., was written in 1336, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. The chief part of this manuscript was collated by Dr. Scholz. At the end is placed the section concerning the adulterous woman, with obelisks before each line, but without any indication of the holiday on which it was read.

87, 88, and 89. The CODICES REGII 313, 314. (formerly 2466. Colbertinus 3715.) and 316. (formerly 2464. and 4266.) are respectively of the fourteenth century. They agree with the Constantinopolitan recension, and were cursorily collated. Numbers 88. and 89. are both imperfect.

90. The CODEx REGIUS 317. (formerly 2494^{a. 3.}, Colbertinus 638.) was written in 1533. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and was cursorily collated.

91. The CODEx REGIUS 318. (formerly 2468^{a. 4.}, Colbertinus 3017.) was written in the eleventh century. The subscription and other additions, which were made by Leontius, a monk, in the isle of Cyprus, may be seen in Montfaucon's Palaographia Græca, p. 89. This manuscript agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was cursorily collated.

92. The CODEx REGIUS 324. (No. 35. of the Lectonaria collated by Scholz) contains lessons from the New Testament, with fragments of the liturgy of Basil. Its text agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was cursorily collated.

93. The CODEx REGIUS 326. (No. 36. of the Lectonaria collated by Scholz), of the fourteenth century, contains lessons from the New Testament; the text of which agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was cursorily collated. This manuscript also contains the liturgies of Chrysostom and Basil.

94. The CODEx REGIUS 330., of the thirteenth century, contains lessons from the New Testament, together with an enchologium. It follows the Constantinopolitan family, and was cursorily collated.

95. The CODEx REGIUS 374., of the fourteenth century, agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

96. The CODEx REGIUS 115^{a.}, of the twelfth century, agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was cursorily collated. It is imperfect at the beginning and end.

97. The CODEx REGIUS 376. (No. 32. of the Lectonaria collated by Scholz) almost always agrees with the received text in the sections relating to the passion of Jesus Christ.

98. The CODEx REGIUS 377. (formerly 3011.) is of the thirteenth century. Part of this manuscript is rewritten, and the ancient writing appears to exhibit sections of the Gospels. The text very seldom departs from the received text: it was cursorily collated.

99. The CODEx REGIUS 380., formerly 3012^{a. 3.} (Colbertinus 4691.), of the fifteenth century, was cursorily collated.

100. The CODEx REGIUS 381., formerly 3012^{a. 5.} (Colbertinus 4588.), was written in 1550, by one Michael Maurice, as appears from the subscription. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

101. The CODEx REGIUS 303. is of the thirteenth century. Dr. Scholz has not indicated what recension it follows.

102. The CODEx AMBROSIANUS 62., in the Ambrosian library at Milan, was written on paper in 1381. it contains an evangelisterium, with a commentary, and other lessons. At the beginning and end, respectively, there are two leaves of vellum. This manuscript agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

103. The CODEx AMBROSIANUS 67., of the thirteenth century, agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. It was collated in select passages.

104. The CODEx AMBROSIANUS 72., of the twelfth century, contains an evangelisterium and other lessons from the New Testament. It is imperfect at the beginning and end, and was collated in select passages.

105. The CODEx AMBROSIANUS 81., of the thirteenth century, is well and correctly written on vellum, with the exception of the first nineteen leaves, which are written on paper, in the sixteenth century. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan family, and was collated in select passages.

106. The CODEx AMBROSIANUS 91., of the thirteenth century, agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

107, 108, 109, and 110. The CODICES VENETIANI 518—551. are all of the thirteenth century. Dr. Scholz has not specified to what recension they belong.

111. The CODEx MUTINENSIS 27. is an evangelisterium, written in uncial characters in the tenth century. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan family, and was collated in select passages.

112. The CODEx LAURENTIANUS 2742. (No. 48. of the Lectionaria cited by Scholz) contains lessons from the New Testament, neatly written in the thirteenth century. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

113. Of the CODEx LAURENTIANUS VI. 2. the former part, as far as the two hundred and thirteenth leaf, was written in the twelfth century, and the latter part, to the end, in the fourteenth century. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan family, and was collated in select passages.

114. The CODEx LAURENTIANUS VI. 7., of the twelfth century, agrees with the Constantinopolitan family.

115. The CODEx LAURENTIANUS VI. 21., elegantly written in uncial characters in the eleventh century, agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. It was cursorily collated.

116. The CODEx LAURENTIANUS VI. 31., elegantly written in uncial characters, in the tenth century, agrees with the Constantinopolitan family, and was cursorily collated.

117. The CODEx LAURENTIANUS 244., beautifully written with gold cursive letters, in the twelfth century, with illuminations, follows the Constantinopolitan recension. It was cursorily collated.¹

118. The CODEx LAURENTIANUS (not numbered) is elegantly written in uncial characters, in the twelfth century. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan family, and was collated in select passages.¹

119, 120, and 121. The CODICES VATICANI 1155, 1256, and 1157. are all of the thirteenth century, and agree with the Constantinopolitan family. They were collated in select passages.

122. The CODEx VATICANUS 1163., written in 1175, agrees with the Constantinopolitan family. It was collated in select passages.

123. The CODEx VATICANUS 1522., very correctly written in uncial characters, in the eleventh century, without any points, was collated in select passages.

124. The CODEx VATICANUS 1988. (Basil. 27.), of the thirteenth century, is imperfect at the beginning and end. It was collated in select passages.

125. The CODEx VATICANUS 2017. (Basil. 56.) is of the twelfth century.

126. The CODEx VATICANUS 2041. (Basil. 80.), of the twelfth century, agrees with the Constantinopolitan family. It was collated in select passages.

127. The CODEx VATICANUS 2063. (Basil. 102.), of the ninth century, is in uncial characters: it is imperfect in the beginning. The leaves at the commencement of the second part (a menologium) are of the fourteenth century. This evangelisterium agrees with the Constantinopolitan family, and was collated in select passages.

128. The CODEx VATICANUS 2133., of the fourteenth century, agrees with the Constantinopolitan family, and was collated in select passages.

129. The CODEx ALEXANDRINO-VATICANUS 12., which formerly belonged to Christina, Queen of Sweden, was written by two different hands. The first forty leaves are of the thirteenth century: the hundred and eight following leaves were written by another hand, in the same century; and the seventy-one leaves following to the end (Dr. Scholz thinks) were added in the fifteenth century. The first forty leaves exhibit the Alexandrine text, and appear to have been written in France. The remainder agrees with the Constantinopolitan text. This evangelisterium was collated in select passages.

130. The CODEx VATICANO-OTTOBONIANUS 2. is beautifully written in uncial letters of the ninth century. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

131. The CODEx VATICANO-OTTOBONIANUS 175., of the fourteenth century, contains part of an evangelisterium. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

132. The CODEx VATICANO-OTTOBONIANUS 326., written in silver characters, in the fifteenth century, agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

133. The CODEx VATICANO-OTTOBONIANUS 416. is a lectionarium of the fourteenth century.

134. The CODEx BARBERINIANUS 15., of the thirteenth century, agrees with the Constantinopolitan family. The first eight and last three leaves are written on paper; the remainder on vellum. This manuscript agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

135. The CODEx BARBERINIANUS 16. is a palimpsest manuscript of the sixth century, in uncial letters.

136. Is the later writing of the twelfth century, superadded to the more ancient writing of the same manuscript. Both these manuscripts contain lessons from the Gospels.

137. The CODEx VALLICELLIANUS D. 63., of the twelfth century, is imperfect in the beginning. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan family, and was collated in select passages.

138. The CODEx NEAPOLITANUS I. B. 14., of the fifteenth century, was presented to the church of Saint Peter and Saint Paul at Naples, by Christopher Palæologus, May 7th, 1581.

139. The CODEx VENETIANUS 12. is an evangelisterium of the tenth century.

140. The CODEx VENETIANUS 626. is an evangelisterium of the thirteenth century.

141. The CODEx BIBLIOTHECÆ NANIANÆ 2. at Venice, is of the eleventh century.

142. The CODEx BIBLIOTHECÆ NANIANÆ 16. is of the fourteenth century, and imperfect.

143. Is an evangelisterium, formerly belonging to the monastery of St. Michael, Venice, and numbered 29.: it is imperfect.

144. The CODEx BIBLIOTHECÆ MALATESTIANÆ CÆSENATIS XXVII. 4. is written in uncial letters of the tenth or (as Dr. Scholz thinks) of the twelfth century.

145. The CODEx BIBLIOTHECÆ MALATESTIANÆ CÆSENATIS XXIX. 2. is of the twelfth century. Scholz has not indicated to what class of recensions Nos. 143—145. belong.

146. The CODEx CANTABRIGIENSIS Dd. VIII. 23. is neatly written in the eleventh century, for the use of the church at Constantinople.

147. The CODEx HARLEIANUS 2970. is an evangelisterium of the eleventh century, with pictures of the four evangelists, and elegant ornaments of a gold and purple colour.

148. The CODEx HARLEIANUS 2994. is of the eleventh century.

149. The CODEx HARLEIANUS 5538. is of the fourteenth century.

150. The CODEx HARLEIANUS 5598. is a splendid evangelisterium in uncial letters, written in 995. See it more fully described in pp. 237, 238. supra.

151. The CODEx HARLEIANUS 5785. is beautifully written in cursive letters, of the tenth century. It has pictures and ornaments prefixed to the different sections; and the initial letter of each section is gilt.

152. The CODEx HARLEIANUS 5787., of the eleventh century, is in uncial letters, not unlike those in No. 150. It is defective in the beginning and in various other parts.

153. The CODEx MEERMANNIANUS 117. is of the eleventh century.

154. The CODEx MONACENSIS 326. (formerly Mannhemensis 20.), written in small and neat characters in the thirteenth century, contains that part of a synaxarion which exhibits the sections which are to be read during Lent and at Easter, and part of a menologium from September to December. Dr. Scholz is of opinion that this manuscript was written for the use of the Constantinopolitan church

155. The CODEx CÆSAREO-VINDOBONENSIS, Nessel. Theol. 309. Lambecii 41., is a codex rescriptus of the tenth century for the more ancient writing. The later writing, which is of the fourteenth or fifteenth century, is a commentary on the Gospel of Saint Matthew.

156. The CODEx ROMANO-VALLICELLIANUS D. 4. I. is an evangelistarium, which is fully described by Blanchini in his Evangeliarium Quadruplex, part i. pp. 537, et seq. Dr. Scholz does not know where it is now preserved.

157. The CODEx BIBLIOTHECÆ BODLEIANÆ Clarkii 8. is imperfect at the beginning and end.

158. Is a manuscript belonging to the library of the great monastery of the Greeks at Jerusalem. It was written in the fourteenth century.

159. Is a manuscript belonging to the Library of the Virgin, Παναγίας Παναγίας, erected by Saint Melana. It was written in the thirteenth century, and not in the eighth, as the recluses imagine.

160. Is a manuscript in the LIBRARY OF THE MONASTERY OF SAINT SABA, numbered 4., and written in the same monastery in the fourteenth century. It contains lessons from the whole of the New Testament.

161. and 162. Are manuscripts in the same library, numbered 5. and 6., both of the fourteenth century. No. 161. contains lessons from the New Testament and sections of the Gospels; No. 162. is an evangelistarium.

163. Is a manuscript in the same library, numbered 13., of the thirteenth century. This and the eight following manuscripts were written for the use of some monastery in Palestine.

164. Is a manuscript in the same library, numbered 14., written in the fourteenth century.

165. Is a manuscript in the same library, numbered 17., written in the fifteenth century.

166. Is a manuscript in the same library, numbered 21., of the thirteenth century.

167. Is a manuscript in the same library, numbered 22., of the fourteenth century.

168, 169, and 170. Are manuscripts in the same library, numbered 23—25., and all of the thirteenth century.

171. Is a manuscript in the same library, written in 1059.

172. Is a manuscript in the library of a monastery in the isle of Patmos, written in uncial letters, and (according to Scholz) in the fourth century.

173. Is a manuscript in the same library, of the ninth century, and in uncial letters.

174. and 175. Are manuscripts in the same library, of the tenth century, both of which are written in uncial letters.

176. Is a manuscript in the same library, of the twelfth century.

177. Is a manuscript in the same library, of the thirteenth century.

178. Is a manuscript in the same library, of the fourteenth century.

179. (Lectinary 55.) The CODEx S. SIMEONIS in the Library of the Cathedral of Triers, in Germany, is written on vellum in uncial letters, and (Dr. Scholz thinks) in the tenth century. In the beginning it has some sections of the gospels, and at the end there are some lessons taken from the epistles of Peter and the first epistle of John; but in the middle it contains lessons from the Old Testament. This manuscript has many readings in common with the Alexandrine recension; but for the most part it agrees with the Constantinopolitan text. This manuscript derives its name from a St. Simeon, by whom it is said to have been written, and who (it is further reported) brought it to Triers, in the eleventh century. Scholz collated this manuscript in select passages, and the whole of it was published by B. Mar. Steininger, in a quarto volume, intitled: Codex Sancti Simeonis, exhibens Lectionarium Ecclesiæ Græcæ DCCC annorum velutale insigne. Augustæ Trevirorum, 1834.

180. The CODEx CÆSAREO-VINDOBONENSIS THEOLOGICUS GRÆCUS, No. CCIX., is a Codex Rescriptus, on vellum, and contains a Greek Commentary on the Gospel of Matthew. The ancient writing contains sections from the Gospels, written (Dr. Scholz conjectures) in the ninth century. The initial letters of the sections from the gospels, as well as the indexes of the lessons from the Acts and Epistles are written with red ink. This manuscript for the most part agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. It was collated by Scholz in some select passages; but Dr. Stephen Francis Ladislaus Endlicher communicated to him a copious collection of various readings from it, which (when he understood its value) he has printed in the second volume of his critical edition of the New Testament, pp. lv—lxiii.

181. The CODEx VARIANUS 1., in the Library of Christ's College, Oxford, is described in page 274*. No. 26., infra, among the manuscripts collated for the Apocalypse.

§ 5. MANUSCRIPTS CONTAINING THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES AND THE CATHOLIC EPISTLES; WHICH, WITH THE EXCEPTION OF THE MANUSCRIPT NOTED BY THE LETTER H., AND OF THOSE NUMBERED 56., AND 58., HAVE BEEN COLLATED AND CITED BY EDITORS OF THE GREEK TESTAMENT WHO PRECEDED DR. SCHOLZ, BY WHOM THEIR NOTATION HAS BEEN RETAINED.

i. Manuscripts written in Uncial or Capital Letters.

I.—A. of Scholz, and A* of Griesbach:—the CODEx ALEXANDRINUS in the British Museum. (It is noted A. in the Catalogue of Manuscripts containing the Gospels, which are described in the preceding pages, and also A. among those containing the epistles of Saint Paul, of which a catalogue is given in pp. 268* et seq. infra.) This manuscript is the standard of the Alexandrine Text. See an account of it in pp. 222—224. supra.

II.—B. The CODEx VATICANUS 1209. (Gospels, B. Pauline Epistles, B.) It agrees with the manuscripts of the Alexandrine recension, and is described in pp. 224—226.

III.—C. of Scholz, and *C. of Griesbach:—The CODEx EPHREMI, or CODEx RECIUS PARISIENSIS 1905. [at present 9.] (Gospels, C. Pauline Epistles, C.) It is described in pp. 229, 230. supra, and agrees with the Alexandrine recension. This manuscript is mutilated in Acts iv. 3.—v. 34.; x. 43.—xiii. 1.; xvi. 36.—xx. 10.; xxi. 31.—xxii. 20.; xxiii. 18.—xxiv. 14.; xxvi. 20.—xxvii. 16.; xxviii. 5. to the end of the Acts; James iv. 3. to the end; 1 Peter iv. 5. to the end; 1 John iv. 3. to the end.

IV.—D. of Scholz, and *D. of Griesbach:—the CODEx BEZÆ or CANTABRIGIENSIS. (Gospels, D.) Of the Catholic Epistles, which this Greek and Latin manuscript formerly contained, only 3 John 11—15. remains in Latin. It is imperfect in Acts viii. 29.—x. 14.; xxi. 2—10; xxii. 10—20 and from 29. to the end. It agrees with the Alexandrine recension, but has also many readings peculiar to itself. See it described in pp. 230, 231. supra.

V.—E. of Scholz, and *E. of Griesbach. The CODEx LAUDIANUS 3. which is described in pp. 232, 233. It follows the Alexandrine recension.

VI.—F. The CODEx COISLINIANUS 1., in the Royal Library at Paris, contains the Octateuch according to the Septuagint version; but has Acts ix. 24, 25. written in the margin, and in the same handwriting as the rest of the manuscript. Michaelis refers it to the eighth, and Wetstein to the seventh, century. But Montfaucon, who has minutely described it in his Catalogus Bibliothecæ Coislinianæ (pp. 1—32.), says that it was written in the sixth, or, at the latest, in the seventh century.

VII.—G. (Paul. Ep. I.) The CODEx BIBLIOTHECÆ ANGELICÆ, A. 2. 15. at Rome, formerly belonged to Cardinal Passionei. It is written on vellum in quarto, according to Montfaucon in the ninth century, but Blanchini assigns it to the eighth or even to the seventh century. Scholz however refers it to the ninth or tenth century. This manuscript contains the Acts of the Apostles beginning with chap. viii. 10., the Catholic Epistles, and those of Saint Paul, as far as Heb. xiii. 10. Blanchini gave several readings from it, which Wetstein printed in his edition of the Greek Testament; but Dr. Scholz collated it throughout. It chiefly follows the Constantinopolitan recension, but has many readings which agree with the Alexandrine farly.

VIII.—H. (Paul. Ep. 179.) The CODEx MUTINENSIS BIBLIOTHECÆ 196., (Ms. II. g. 3.) at Modena, is a folio manuscript on vellum, of the highest character; containing the Acts of the Apostles written in Uncial Letters in the ninth century, but mutilated from chap. i. 1. to v. 28. (which chasm has been supplied in cursive or ordinary Greek characters in the eleventh century), and also the epistles of Saint Paul written in cursive Greek characters with a commentary, in the twelfth century. The text of this manuscript agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension: it was collated throughout, for the first time, by Dr. Scholz.

ii. Manuscripts written in cursive or ordinary Greek Characters.

1. (Gosp. 1. Paul. Ep. 1.) The CODEx BASILEENSIS B. VI. 27. (described in p. 238.) of the tenth century: its text for the most part agrees with the Alexandrine recension.¹

2. (Paul. Ep. 1.) The CODEx BASILEENSIS B. IX. (B. 2. of Dr. Mill's Notation, and the Codex Amerbachii of Wetstein) formerly belonged to the celebrated printer Amerbach, of Basle. It was used by Erasmus for his edition. No date is given to this manuscript by Scholz, but Wetstein says that it is more ancient than the Codex Basileensis B. VI. 25. (see p. 238. No. 2.), which is of the fifteenth century. Its text seldom varies from that of the Constantinopolitan recension.

3. (Gosp. 3. Paul. Ep. 3.) The CODEx FORLOSIANUS 15. in the Imperial Library at Vienna, formerly the CODEx CORSEDOENCENSIS: it is described in page 238. No. 3., and follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

4. (Paul. Ep. 4.) The CODEx BASILEENSIS B. X. 20. (P. 3. of Dr. Mill's Notation) is an elegantly written manuscript on vellum, of the fifteenth century, containing the Acts of the Apostles and all the Epistles, not in the same order as in the Greek manuscripts, but according to the Latin arrangement, St. Paul's epistles being preceded by the Acts and followed by the Catholic Epistles. Wetstein classes it among the Latinising Manuscripts: it chiefly agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

5. (Gosp. 5. Paul. Ep. 5.) The CODEx REGIUS 106., described in p. 238. No. 5., for the most part agrees with B. or the Codex Vaticanus, that is with the Alexandrine recension.

6. (Gosp. 6. Paul. Ep. 6.) The CODEx REGIUS 112., described in p. 238. No. 6. follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

7. (Paul. Ep. 9.) The CODEx REGIUS 102., formerly 2870. (Stephani c.) is written on vellum, and, in the opinions of Griesbach and Scholz, in the tenth century: it contains the Constantinopolitan text.

8. (Paul. Ep. 10.) The *CODEx STEPHANI *a, according to Michaelis, undoubtedly contained the Acts of the Apostles and the Epistles, being quoted in these books nearly four hundred times by Stephens, as we are assured by Dr. Mill. It is not known what has become of this manuscript.

9. (Paul. Ep. 11.) The *CODEx STEPHANI *γ. Bishop Marsh has discovered this manuscript in the University Library at Cambridge, where it is marked Kk. 6. 4. It is written on vellum in the eleventh century, contains the Acts and the Epistles, and follows the Constantinopolitan recension. Bishop Marsh has proved that this is the identical manuscript which once belonged to Vatablus, the learned and intimate friend of Robert Stephens, who collated it for his celebrated critical edition of the New Testament printed at Paris in the year 1546.

10. (Paul. Ep. 12. Apoc. 2.) The CODEx REGIUS 237., formerly 2869. (Stephani a), is neatly and correctly written on vellum in quarto, in the tenth century, and contains the Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypse, with prologues, scholia, and the treatise of Dorotheus Bishop of Tyre concerning the twelve apostles and seventy-two disciples. The text for the most part follows the Constantinopolitan recension. This manuscript was discovered by father Le Long. Some various readings were taken from it by Robert Stephens: it was collated anew by Wetstein and by Scholz.

11. (Paul. Ep. 110.) The CODEx REGIUS 103., formerly 2872., is written on vellum in 8vo., of the tenth century; and contains the Acts and Epistles with scholia and prologues: it is imperfect in Acts ii. from v. 20. to v. 31., and has the Constantinopolitan text.

12. (Paul. Ep. 16. Apoc. 4.) The CODEx REGIUS 219., formerly 1886., is referred to the tenth century by Montfaucon, and to the eleventh by Scholz. It is written on vellum, and contains the Acts and Epistles with the commentary of Oecumenius, and the Apocalypse with that of Arethas. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated by Griesbach and by Scholz.

13. (Gosp. 33. Paul. Ep. 17.) The CODEx REGIUS 14., described in page 240. No. 33., follows the Alexandrine recension. It was collated for the Acts by Scholz.

14. (Gosp. 35. Paul. Ep. 18. Apoc. 17.) The CODEx COISLINIANUS 199., described in page 240. No. 35., has the Constantinopolitan text.

15. The CODEx COISLINIANUS 25. contains the Acts of the Apostles and the Catholic Epistles: it was written on vellum in the eleventh century, and was collated by Wetstein.

16. (Paul. Ep. 19.) The CODEx COISLINIANUS 26. formerly belonged to the monastery of St. Athanasius on Mount Athos: it contains the Acts of the Apostles and the epistles, with commentaries, written in the eleventh century, on vellum; and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

17. (Paul. Ep. 21. Apoc. 19.) The CODEx COISLINIANUS 205. contains the Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypse, with the following chasms according to Michaelis: 1 Cor. xvi. 17.—2 Cor. i. 7.; Heb. xiii. 15. to the end of the epistle; and Rev. i.—ii. 5., though the last chasm has been filled up by a modern hand. It was written in the eleventh century, and follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

18. (Paul. Ep. 22. Apoc. 18.) The CODEx COISLINIANUS 202. contains the Acts, Catholic Epistles with scholia, and the Apocalypse with the commentary of Andreas, and the Pauline Epistles with prologues. The first twenty-six folios are written on vellum, of the eleventh century, the remainder on cotton paper of the thirteenth century. Its text is that of the Constantinopolitan recension: it was collated by Wetstein.

19. (Gosp. 38. Apoc. 23.) The CODEx COISLINIANUS 200., described in page 240. No. 38., follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

20. (Paul. Ep. 25.) The CODEx WESTMONASTERIENSIS 935. is a manuscript of the Acts and Epistles preserved among the Royal Manuscripts in the British Museum, in which collection it is noted I. B. I. It is of the fourteenth century, and has the Constantinopolitan text. It was collated by Wetstein.

21. (Paul. Ep. 26.) The CODEx CANTABRIGIENSIS Dd. XI. 90., formerly 495., contains the Acts and Epistles of St. Paul, written on vellum in the twelfth century. The first eleven chapters of the Acts are wanting; likewise xiv. 13.—xv. 10.; Rom. xi. 22—33.; the first three chapters of 1 Cor.; 1 Tim. i. and iii.; Titus i. 1—8. and ii. 1. to the end; with the epistles to Philemon and the Hebrews. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

22. (Gosp. 109. Paul. Ep. 75.) The Codex 5115. in the British Museum, described in page 245. No. 109., contains the Acts of the Apostles and the Catholic Epistles, written on vellum, according to Scholz of the ninth century: but it should seem that this is a mistake, and that the date of 1326, which he assigned to it in the prolegomena to the first volume of his edition of the New Testament, is the true date.² It follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

23. (Paul. Ep. 28. Apoc. 6.) The CODEx BAROCCIANUS 3. in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, written on vellum, of the twelfth or thirteenth century, contains the Acts of the Apostles from ch. xi. 13., the Catholic Epistles except 1 Pet. iii. 7—23., and those of St. Paul, with the Apocalypse, the three last chapters of which are wanting. It has scholia on the epistles and the Commentary of Arethas on the Apocalypse. It has the Constantinopolitan text.

24. (Paul. Ep. 29.) The CODEx COLLEGI CHRISTI CANTABRIGIENSIS 2. (Cant. 2. of Dr. Mill's Notation) is a manuscript written on vellum in the eleventh or twelfth century, in quarto, not in octavo as Scholz after Michaelis has erroneously stated. It contains the Acts, Epistles of

² See Bp. Marsh's Translation of Michaelis, vol. ii. part i. p. 310

Saint Paul, the Epistle to the Hebrews, and the Catholic Epistles; with the following chasms, viz. Acts i. 1—10.; xviii. 20.—xx. 14.; James v. 14. to the end of the epistle; 1 Pet. i. 1.—iii. and 2 Pet. i. 1—2. iii. Its text is that of the Constantinopolitan recension.

25. (Paul. Ep. 31. Apoc. 7.) The CODEx HARLEIANUS 5537., formerly Covellianus 2., is a manuscript of the Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypse, written in the year 1087. It is imperfect from 1 John v. 14. to 2 John 6. This manuscript, which was collated and described by Griesbach, for the most part agrees with the Alexandrine recension.

26. (Paul. Ep. 32.) The CODEx HARLEIANUS 5557., formerly Covellianus 3., contains the Acts of the Apostles beginning with chap. i. 11., and all the Epistles. It was written in the twelfth century, and was collated by Dr. Mill: it agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

27. (Paul. Ep. 33.) The CODEx HARLEIANUS 5620., formerly Covellianus 4., contains the Acts and Epistles written on paper in a very small hand, in the fifteenth century. Griesbach says that it frequently agrees with the Codex Laudianus 2. (described in page 240. No. 51.), and with the Complutensian edition of the New Testament. Its text follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

28. (Paul. Ep. 34. Apoc. 8.) The CODEx HARLEIANUS 5778., formerly called Covellianus Sinaiticus, because Dr. Covell brought it from Mount Sinai, contains the Acts, Epistles, and Revelation, written in the twelfth century. It has been mutilated and rendered illegible in very many passages by the dampness of the place where it was formerly kept. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

29. (Paul. Ep. 35.) The CODEx GENEVENSI 20., on vellum of the eleventh or twelfth century, was cursorily collated by Scholz. It contains the Acts and Epistles, and follows the Constantinopolitan recension, though it has some Alexandrine readings.

30. (Paul. Ep. 36. Apoc. 9.) The CODEx BODLEIANUS 131., formerly Huntingtonianus 1., was brought from the east by Dr. Robert Huntington. It contains the Acts, Epistles, and Revelation, and was written in the thirteenth century, according to Griesbach and Scholz; but Dr. Mill considered it to be seven hundred years old, or about the tenth century. This manuscript is defective as far as Acts xv. 19.: it follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

31. (Gosp. 69. Paul. Ep. 37. Apoc. 14.) The CODEx LEICESTRENSIS, described in page 242. No. 69., is of the fourteenth century: it has the Alexandrine text.

32. (Gosp. 51. Paul. Ep. 38.) The CODEx BODLEIANUS, LAUDIANUS C. 715., described in page 240. No. 51., is of the thirteenth, and appears to have the Constantinopolitan text.

33. (Paul. Ep. 39.) The CODEx LINCOLNIENSIS is a manuscript of the eleventh century on vellum, belonging to Lincoln College, Oxford: it contains the Acts and Epistles, and is imperfect in 2 Pet. i. 1—15.

34. (Gosp. 61. Paul. Ep. 40.) The CODEx MONTFORTIANUS, in Trinity College, Dublin, described in pp. 241, 242. No. 61. is of the fifteenth century, and appears to follow the Constantinopolitan text.

35. (Gosp. 57. Paul. Ep. 41.) The CODEx MAGDALENSIS 1., described in page 241. No. 57., is of the eleventh century.

36. The CODEx NOVI COLLEGII, Oxon. N. 2. as noted in the London Polyglott and in Dr. Mill's Index, but N. 1. in his various readings, is a manuscript of the thirteenth century, containing the Acts and the Catholic Epistles, with a Catenæ: it agrees with the Alexandrine text.

37. (Paul. Ep. 43.) The CODEx NOVI COLLEGII, Oxon., No. 1. in the London Polyglott and Nov. 2. or N. 2. in Mill, is also of the thirteenth century, and contains the Acts and Epistles with a Commentary. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

38. (Paul. Ep. 44.) The CODEx LUGDUNO-BATAVUS 77. in the University Library at Leyden, is cited by Mill as PETAVIANUS 1. from the name of its former possessor Paul Petau, a senator of the Parliament of Paris: it is written on vellum, of the thirteenth century, and contains the Acts and Epistles entire. Various readings from this manuscript were printed by Dr. Mill: it was collated anew by Wet-stein, and more recently and accurately by Dr. Dermout, who has printed its principal various readings in his Collectanea Critica in Novum Testamentum, Lugduni Batavorum, 1825. 8vo.

39. (Paul. Ep. 45. Apoc. 11.) The CODEx PETAVIANUS 2. contains the Acts, Epistles, and Revelations, but it wants 1 Cor. iii. 16.—x. 13., the entire epistle of James except the last four verses, 3 John 9. to the end, and the epistle of Jude. No date has been assigned to this manuscript, which for the most part follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

40. (Paul. Ep. 46. Apoc. 46.) The CODEx ALEXANDRINO-VATICANUS 179., formerly noted PETAVIANUS 3., is of the eleventh century, and contains the Acts, Epistles, and Revelation. On the death of Petau it was purchased by Christina Queen of Sweden, after whose decease it passed, with the rest of her books, into the Vatican Library. The end of the epistle to Titus, Philemon, and the Revelation, have been added by a later hand. This manuscript frequently agrees with the Constantinopolitan text, but it has very many Alexandrine readings.

41. (Gosp. 175. Paul. Ep. 194. Apoc. 20.) The CODEx VATICANUS 2080., described in page 247. No. 175., agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, but it also has many Alexandrine readings.

42. (Paul. Ep. 48. Apoc. 13.) The CODEx BIBLIOTHECÆ GYMNASII FRANCOFURTENSIS AD VIADRUM (Frankfort on the Oder), formerly SEIDELIANUS (it having been brought from the east by Andrew Erasmus Seidel), is of the eleventh century, and contains the Acts, Epistles, and Revelation: it is imperfect from Acts ii. 3—34.; 2 Pet. i. 1.—ii.; 1 John v. 11. to the end; and Apoc. xviii. 3—13. The leaf containing Acts xxvii. 19—34. was written by a later hand. For the most part this manuscript agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, though it has some peculiar readings. It has been twice collated, first inaccurately by Nicholas Westermann, who communicated his extracts to Wetstein, and again minutely by Henry Middeldorff, who printed the various readings which he discovered in E. F. C. Rosenmüller's Commentationes Theologicae, vol. ii. part ii. pp. 167, et seq. These readings are inserted by Scholz in his critical edition of the Greek Testament.

43. (Gosp. 76. Paul. Ep. 49.) The CODEx CÆSAREUS VINDOBONENSIS, of the eleventh century. See it noticed in p. 242. No. 76.

44. (Gosp. 82. Paul. Ep. 51. Apoc. 5.) The manuscripts cited by LAURENTIUS VALLA. See a notice of them in p. 243. No. 82.

45. (Paul. Ep. 52. Apoc. 16.) The CODEx UFFENBACHIANUS 2. (of Bengel, 1. of Wetstein), written on paper in the fifteenth century, contains the Catholic Epistles, the Revelation of St. John, and the Acts of the Apostles: it was collated by Bengel and by Wetstein, and the former has observed that it harmonizes with the Cod. Covell. 2. (No. 25. supra); consequently it agrees with the text of the Alexandrine recension.

46. (Paul. Ep. 55.) The CODEx MONACENSIS 375., formerly AUGUSTANUS 6., was written on vellum in the eleventh century. It contains the Acts and Epistles with a commentary, and for the most part agrees with the received text, though it has some peculiar readings, a few of which harmonize with the Alexandrine recension. This manuscript was collated by Scholz for Acts iii.—xx. and 1 Cor. i. 1—3.

47. (Gosp. 90. Paul. Ep. 14.) The CODEx WOLFII, formerly JOANNIS FABRI Daventriensis. See p. 243. No. 90.

48. (Gosp. 105. Paul. Ep. 24.) The CODEx EBNERIANUS, now in the Bodleian Library. See a description of it in pp. 244. with a fac-simile. Scholz collated it for the Epistles only on 1 John v. 7.

49. (Gosp. 92.) The CODEx ANDRÆ FAESCHII 1. contains a commentary on the Catholic Epistles. See p. 243. No. 92.

50. (Paul. Ep. 8.) CODEx STEPHANI ζ, is now unknown: it is cited five times only in the Acts and Catholic Epistles: what is cited in the Gospels as Stephani ζ, formerly Regius 2242., and afterwards 49., contains only the four Gospels.

51. (Paul. Ep. 133. Ap. 52.) The CODEx REGIUS 56., formerly 2248., is a manuscript of the twelfth century, on vellum, containing the Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypse: it wants a few verses towards the end, and follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

52. (Paul. Ep. 50.) The CODEx RHODIENSIS, derives its name from the island of Rhodes, whence it was brought. It is said to have been principally used in the edition of the Complutensian Polyglott, and is often quoted by Stunica as a very ancient manuscript, but by Erasmus it was supposed to be Latinised. It is not known where this manuscript now is, nor can any conjecture be offered as to its age.

53. (Paul. Ep. 36.) The CODEx CANTABRIGIENSIS 3., (in the London Polyglott Codex Em.) is a manuscript of the twelfth century, belonging to Emanuel College, Cambridge. Besides the epistles of St. Paul it has fragments of the Catholic Epistles, viz. 2 Pet. ii. 4.—iii. 18. and 1 John i. 1.—iii. 20. It has likewise the two following chapters, viz. 1 Cor. xi. 7.—xv. 56. and from Heb. xi. 27. to the end of the epistle.

54. (Gosp. 43. Paul. Ep. 129.) The CODEx GRÆCUS 4., in the Library of the Arsenal at Paris (see page 240. No. 43.), of the eleventh or twelfth century, follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages by Scholz.

55. Another copy of the Epistle of Jude contained in Cod. 47.

56. (Paul. Ep. 227.) The CODEx CLARKII 4., in the Bodleian Library, at Oxford, contains the Acts and Epistles, with prologues, and appears to follow the Constantinopolitan text. Scholz collated it in some select passages, and has put this Manuscript in the place of four Medicean MSS. the readings of which (written in the margin of Raphaeleng's edition of 1591, by some unknown Dutchman) Wetstein had noted with this number. In the judgment of Professor Birch, of Copenhagen, these four Medicean Manuscripts appear to be those numbered 84. 87. 88. and 89. p. 264*. infra.

57. (Gosp. 234. Paul. Ep. 72.) The CODEx HAVNIENSIS 1. (described in page 249. No. 234.) was written in 1278.

58. (Paul. Ep. 224.) CODEx CLARKII 9., in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, contains the Acts, Epistles, and Catholic Epistles, and mostly agrees with the textus receptus. It was collated by Scholz in Acts v., viii. Wetstein has erroneously numbered 58. the manuscript already described at No. 22. page 261*.

59. (Paul. Ep. 62.) The CODEx HARLEIANUS 5588., in the British Museum, of the thirteenth century, contains the Acts and Epistles. Its text is of a mixed character: it was collated by Griesbach, in Acts xi. xii. and xiii. and in the first epistle of Peter.

60. (Paul. Ep. 63. Apoc. 29.) The CODEx HARLEIANUS 5613., was written A. D. 1407 on paper: it contains the Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypse. Griesbach collated Acts i.—viii., the epistle to the Romans, the first to the Corinthians, and the third chapter of the second, and the epistle to the Ephesians. According to Scholz, this manuscript agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

61. (Paul. Ep. 61.) An unknown manuscript, the readings of which marked Hal. are written in the margin of a copy of Dr. Mill's Critical Edition of the New Testament, preserved in the Bodleian Library. Griesbach transcribed them, and inserted them in his Symbolæ Criticæ, vol. i. pp. 247—304.

62. (Paul. Ep. 65.) The CODEx REGIUS 60. (formerly 1886., Colbertinus 871.) was written in the fourteenth century according to Scholz, or according to Griesbach in the fourteenth or fifteenth century. He collated it in 1 John v., and some select passages of the same epistle: and it was cursorily examined by Scholz.

63. (Paul. Ep. 68.) The CODEx CÆSAREUS LAMBECHII 35., in the Imperial Library at Vienna, contains the Acts and Epistles, written in the twelfth century according to Treschow, in the thirteenth according to Griesbach, and in the fourteenth according to Scholz. Alter has given extracts from it in his edition of the Greek Testament, vol. ii. pp. 741—788. Michaelis states that its readings are not important, and that he has found many of them in the Complutensian Polyglott.

64. (Paul. Ep. 69.) The CODEx CÆSAREUS VINDOBONENSIS, Nesselii Theol. 303. Lambecii 36. was written in the twelfth century according to Scholz, or according to Griesbach in the twelfth or thirteenth century. It was brought by Busbeck from Constantinople, and contains the Acts and Epistles with a synaxarium and prologues. Its readings were published by Treschow, Birch, and Alter.

65. (Gosp. 218. Paul. Ep. 57. Apoc. 33.) The CODEx CÆSAREO-VINDOBONENSIS 23. (Lambecii 1.) See it described in pp. 218, 219. No. 218.

66. (Paul. Ep. 67. Apoc. 64.) The CODEx CÆSAREO-VINDOBONENSIS, 302. (Lambecii 34.) is a manuscript of the eleventh or twelfth century, containing the Acts, Epistles, and the Apocalypse. Three distinct emendators of this manuscript may be traced. It was described by A. C. Hwiid, who gave minute extracts from it in the Acts of the Apostles in his "Libellus Criticus de indole Codicis Lambecii XXXIV. Havniæ, 1785. 8vo." Extracts from this manuscript are given in Alter's Greek Testament, vol. ii. pp. 415—558. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

67. (Paul. Ep. 70.) The CODEx CÆSAREO-VINDOBONENSIS theologicus 221. (Lambecii 37.), written in 1331, and brought from Constantinople by Busbeck, contains the Acts and Epistles. Complete extracts from it are printed by Alter, vol. ii. pp. 689—740.

68. (Paul. Ep. 73.) The CODEx UPSALIENSIS, Sparwenfeldianus 42., consists of two parts. The first contains the Acts, Epistle to the Romans, and 1 Cor. to xv. 38., written in the twelfth century. The second part, containing 1 Cor. xiii. 6. to the end, and the rest of St. Paul's Epistles, together with the Catholic Epistles, appears to have been written in the eleventh century. The portion comprised in 1 Cor. xiii. 6. to xv. 38. is twice transcribed, and from different copies which have discrepant readings.

69. (Paul. Ep. 74. Apoc. 30.) The CODEx GUELPHERBYTANUS XVI. 7. appears to have been written in the twelfth or thirteenth century by two different copyists. It contains the Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypse, with marginal readings, and follows the Constantinopolitan recension, but it also has many readings peculiar to itself.

70. (Gosp. 131. Paul. Ep. 77. Apoc. 66.) The CODEx VATICANUS 360., of the eleventh century, is described in page 246. No. 131.: it appears to have the Constantinopolitan text, and was collated by Birch and by Scholz in select passages.

71. (Gosp. 133. Paul. Ep. 78.) The CODEx VATICANUS 363., of the eleventh century, also appears to have the Constantinopolitan text: it was collated in select passages by Birch and by Scholz.

72. (Paul. Ep. 79. Apoc. 37.) The CODEx VATICANUS 366., of the twelfth century, contains the Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypse. It appears to have the Constantinopolitan text, and was collated by Birch and Scholz.

73. (Paul. Ep. 80.) The CODEx VATICANUS 367., of the eleventh century, follows the Alexandrine recension. It was collated by Birch, and in select passages by Scholz.

74. The CODEx VATICANUS 760., of the twelfth century, contains the Acts with a catena: this and the three following manuscripts were collated in select passages by Scholz.

75. (Gosp. 141. Paul. Ep. 86. Apoc. 40.) The CODEx VATICANUS 1160., of the thirteenth century, agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

76. (Gosp. 142. Paul. Ep. 87.) The CODEx VATICANUS 1210., of the eleventh century, is briefly described in page 247. No. 142.

77. (Gosp. 149. Paul. Ep. 88. Apoc. 25.) The CODEx PALATINO-VATICANUS 171. is a manuscript of the fourteenth century.

78. (Paul. Ep. 89.) The CODEx ALEXANDRINO-VATICANUS 20., of the twelfth century, contains the Acts and Catholic Epistles, Rom. i. 2. Cor. Gal. and Eph. i. 1—9. It is imperfect from 2 Cor. xi. 15. to xii. 1. Scholz states that it is a manuscript of good character, agreeing with the Constantinopolitan recension. This and the two following manuscripts were collated in select passages by Birch and by Scholz.

79. (Paul. Ep. 90.) The CODEx URBINO-VATICANUS 3., of the eleventh century, contains the Acts and Epistles.

80. (Paul. 91. Ap. 42.) The CODEx PIO-VATICANUS 50., of the twelfth century, contains the Acts and Epistles. It frequently agrees with the Alexandrine recension.

81. The CODEx BARBERINUS 377., of the eleventh century, contains the Acts and the Catholic Epistles, and follows the Alexandrine recension. It was collated in select passages by Birch.

82. (Gosp. 180. Paul. Ep. 92. Apoc. 44.) The manuscript in the Library of the College of the PROPAGANDA, No. 250., (formerly Borgiæ 4.), written towards the close of the thirteenth century, agrees with the Constantinopolitan text: it was collated in select passages by Scholz.

83. (Paul. Ep. 93.) The CODEx BIBLIOTHECÆ BORBONICÆ REGIÆ NEAPOLITANÆ 1. B. 12. (formerly 223.), of the tenth century, mostly agrees with the Alexandrine recension; but it has many readings in common with the Constantinopolitan text. It was collated in select passages by Birch and Scholz.

84. (Paul. Ep. 94.) The CODEx LAURENTIANUS IV. 1., of the tenth century, contains the Acts and Epistles, with the commentary of Chrysostom on the Acts, and of Nicetas on the Epistles. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension: this and the eight following manuscripts were collated in select passages by Birch and by Scholz.

85. (Paul. Ep. 95.) The CODEx LAURENTIANUS IV. 5., of the thirteenth century, contains the Acts and Epistles, with the commentary of Theophylact.

86. (Paul. Ep. 96.) The CODEx LAURENTIANUS IV. 20., of the eleventh century, contains the Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypse: it appears to agree with the Constantinopolitan recension.

87. (Paul. Ep. 97.) The CODEx LAURENTIANUS IV. 29., of the tenth century, contains the Acts and Epistles, with scholia, prologues, and an interlinear Latin version of the Epistles, evidently written by a later hand, and for the use of learners. The text agrees with that of the Constantinopolitan recension.

88. (Paul. Ep. 98.) The CODEx LAURENTIANUS IV. 31., of the eleventh century, contains the Acts and Epistles, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

89. (Paul. Ep. 99. Apoc. 45.) The CODEx LAURENTIANUS IV. 32., written A. D. 1093, contains the Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypse, with a prologue and the treatise of Dorotheus on the seventy disciples and on the twelve apostles: it agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

90. (Gosp. 197.) The CODEx LAURENTIANUS VIII. 14., described in page 248. No. 197., agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

92. (Gosp. 204. Paul. Ep. 105.) The CODEx BONONENSIS 640., noticed in p. 248. No. 204., coincides with the Constantinopolitan text.

93. (Gosp. 205. Paul. Ep. 106. Apoc. 88.) The CODEx VENETUS 5., noticed in page 248. No. 205., was written in the fifteenth century; it is a transcript of No. 95. in the Gospels; but in the Acts both manuscripts differ. This MS. was collated by Rink, who has given the results of his examination in his Lucubratio Critica in Acta Apostolorum, Epistolæ Catholicas et Paulinas. (Basileæ, 1830. 8vo.) It mostly agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

94. (Gosp. 206. Paul. Ep. 207.) The CODEx VENETUS 6., noticed in p. 248. No. 206., is also a transcript of No. 95., and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. It was collated by Rink.

95. (Gosp. 209. Paul. Ep. 108. Apoc. 46.) The CODEx VENETIANUS 10., of the fourteenth or fifteenth century, is described in p. 248. No. 209. It agrees chiefly with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was also collated by Rink.

96. (Paul. Ep. 109.) The CODEx VENETIANUS 11., which formerly belonged to the monastery of St. Michael de Troyana (in Sicily) is written on vellum in the eleventh century.

It contains the Acts and Epistles, with a Latin and Arabic version, and is imperfect in Acts i. 1—12. xxv. 21.—xxvi. 18. and in the Epistle to Philemon. This manuscript mostly agrees with the Alexandrine recension, but it has many peculiar readings in common with No. 142. p. 266*. infra. It was collated anew by Rink.

97. (Paul. Ep. 241.) The CODEx GUDIANUS, gr. 104. 2., in the Wolfenbützel Library, is a manuscript on vellum of the twelfth century, and contains the Acts and Epistles with marginal scholia extracted from Chrysostom and Oecumenius. At the end there are some prayers and dialogues. It is imperfect from Acts xvi. 39. to xviii. 18. and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

98. (Paul. Ep. 113.) The CODEx MOSQUENSIS noted by Matthæi a. of the tenth or eleventh century, consists of three parts: 1. Ecclesiastical lessons from the Acts, with various readings in the margin, and scholia; 2. The text of all the Epistles, also with various readings in the margin, and scholia; and 3. Lessons from the Acts and Epistles for every day in the whole year. When this manuscript is quoted among the various readings, its three parts are distinguished by a¹. a². (or a. only), and a³. This manuscript agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, as also do the following Nos. 99. to 106. All the Moscow manuscripts were collated by Matthæi.

99. (Paul. Ep. 114.) The CODEx S. SYNODI MOSQUENSIS 5. (in the library of the Holy Synod at Moscow), by Matthæi noted c., is a manuscript on paper, written (but not accurately) in the month of April A. D. 1445, by Theognostus, metropolitan of Perga and Attalia: it contains the Acts and Epistles with prologue and synaxarion, and various orations of the Greek Fathers.

100. (Paul. Ep. 115.) The CODEx S. SYNODI 334. (d. of Matthæi), of the eleventh century, on vellum, contains the Acts and Epistles, with a catena and scholia.

101. (Paul. Ep. 116.) The CODEx S. SYNODI 333. (f. of Matthæi), written on cotton paper in the thirteenth century, contains the Acts with scholia, and the Epistles with a prologue. Bishop Marsh, after Matthæi, states that it has many remarkable readings, but in the Epistles of Saint Paul, which were written by a different copyist, they are of less value.

102. (Paul. Ep. 117.) The CODEx S. SYNODI 98. (g. of Matthæi), which formerly belonged to the monastery of St. Dionysius on mount Athos, contains all the Epistles with a catena, written on vellum in the ninth century; the text, in uncial letters; and the catena, in small letters. It is imperfect from Rom. x. 18. to the end, and from 1 Cor. i. 1. to vi. 13., and in viii. 7—12.

103. (Paul. Ep. 118.) The CODEx S. SYNODI 193. (h. of Matthæi), on vellum, of the tenth century, contains fragments of the Acts and Epistles with scholia.

104. (Gosp. 241. Paul. Ep. 120. Apoc. 47.) The CODEx DRESDENSIS (k. of Matthæi), is described in page 249. No. 241.

105. (Gosp. 242. Paul. Ep. 121. Apoc. 48.) The CODEx S. SYNODI, (l. of Matthæi), is described in page 249. No. 242.¹

106. (Paul. Ep. 122.) The CODEx S. SYNODI 328. (m. of Matthæi), contains the Acts and Epistles, written on vellum in the eleventh century, with a prologue, synaxarion, and the Psalms.

107. The CODEx DRESDENSIS 252. follows the Constantinopolitan recension. It is noted 19. by Matthæi by whom it was collated, and who has described the MSS. nos. 98—107. in the prefaces to his Critical Edition of the New Testament.

108. (Gosp. 226. Paul. Ep. 228.) The CODEx ESCURIALENSIS χ. IV. 17. described in page 249. No. 226., and 109. (Gosp. 228. Paul. Ep. 229.) The CODEx ESCURIALENSIS χ. IV. 12. described in page 249. No. 228., both agree with the Constantinopolitan recension, and were collated by Moldenhaur.

¹ Scholz (Nov. Test. vol. i. Proleg. p. lxxvi.) states that this manuscript agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension; but in vol. ii. Proleg. p. xiii. he says that its text for the most part agrees with the Alexandrine recension. But this last statement must be a mistake, as he says in p. xxviii that it agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

ii. Manuscripts first collated by Dr. Scholz, for his Critical Edition of the New Testament.

110. The CODEx CANTABRIGIENSIS 2622., contains the Old and New Testaments. [Though indicated by Scholz as a manuscript, this is a copy of the Greek Septuagint and New Testament, printed at Basil by John Hervag, in 1545, with a Latin Preface by Melancthon, and manuscript notes in the margin.]

111. (Gosp. 440. Paul. Ep. 221.) The CODEx CANTABRIGIENSIS, Mm. 6. 9. See it noticed in page 255. No. 440.

112. The CODEx CANTABRIGIENSIS 2068. contains the Acts and Epistles. [This manuscript, which is enumerated by Scholz as being for the first time collated by him, is also marked Kk. vi. 4. in the University Library; and as it has the name of Vatablus written both at the beginning and end of the manuscript, it consequently is the same manuscript which has been noticed in page 261*. No. 9.]

113. (Gosp. 18. Paul. Ep. 132. Apoc. 51.) The CODEx REGIUS 47. (described in page 239. No. 18.) closely follows the Alexandrine recension: Dr. Scholz collated it throughout for the Acts, and cursorily for the Epistles.

114. (Paul. Ep. 134.) The CODEx REGIUS 57., formerly 1253., on vellum, was written in the thirteenth century: it contains the Acts and Epistles with prologues, synaxarion, the Book of Ecclesiastes, the apocryphal book of Wisdom, the Proverbs, and Song of Solomon, and fragments of prayers for the use of the Greek Church. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and was cursorily collated.

115. (Paul. Ep. 135.) The CODEx REGIUS 58., formerly 2293. (Colbertinus 5107.), written on vellum in the thirteenth century, contains the Acts and Epistles: it is imperfect from Acts i. 1. to xiv. 27. This manuscript does not appear to have been used in the service of the church, as no lessons are indicated: its text is of a mixed character. It was collated throughout by Scholz.

116. (Paul. Ep. 36. Apoc. 53.) The CODEx REGIUS 59., formerly Tellerianus, was written on paper in the sixteenth century: it contains the Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypse, with prologues, and with scholia on the Catholic Epistles. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

117. (Gosp. 263. Paul. Ep. 137.) The CODEx REGIUS 61.: it is described in page 250. No. 263., and was collated by Scholz in the former part of the Acts and in select passages of the Catholic Epistles.

118. (Paul. Ep. 138. Apoc. 55.) The CODEx REGIUS 101., formerly 2869³ (Colbertinus 4785.), written on cotton paper in the thirteenth century, contains the Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypse, with prologues and scholia, and an ecominium on St. Paul, compiled from various passages of Chrysostom's writings. It is imperfect in Acts xix. 18. to xxii. 17. and follows the Constantinopolitan recension. Dr. Scholz collated it for 1 Tim. and 2 Thess., for the principal part of the Acts and Catholic Epistles, and in select passages of the remainder of the Epistles and the Apocalypse.

119. (Paul. Ep. 139. Apoc. 56.) The CODEx REGIUS 102. A., written on vellum in the tenth century (but the Apocalypse in the thirteenth century), contains the Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypse, with prologues and an index of ecclesiastical lessons. It is imperfect from 2 Cor. i. 8. to ii. 4. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

120. (Paul. Ep. 141.) The CODEx REGIUS 103. A., written on vellum in the eleventh century, contains the Acts and Epistles with prologues. There are numerous chasms in this manuscript; part of which, containing Acts v. 38. to vi. 7. vii. 6. to 16. and 32. to x. 25. &c., is written on cotton paper in the thirteenth century. The text mostly agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension: the chief part of this manuscript was collated.

121. (Paul. Ep. 142.) The CODEx REGIUS 104., formerly

“Kk. VI. 4. 2068.

“Codex est Græcus in 4to. minore, manu vetusta, in membranis scriptus, fine mutilus, in quo continentur Actus Apostolorum et Epistolæ Catholice et Pauline.”

2869. (Colbertinus 6123.), written on cotton paper in the thirteenth century, contains the Acts and Epistles, with an index of lessons and synaxarion. It chiefly agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension: the chief part of it was collated.

122. The CODEx REGIUS 105. formerly 2571². (Colbertinus 5259.), is correctly written on vellum, in the eleventh century. It contains various fragments of the Acts and Epistles, most of which were collated, and it seldom differs from the Constantinopolitan recension.

123. (Paul. Ep. 141.) The CODEx REGIUS 106. A., on cotton paper, and written in the fourteenth century, contains the Acts and Epistles, with prologues, scholia, and some hymns of the Greek Church. It is imperfect from 1 Pet. i. 9. to ii. 7., and follows the Constantinopolitan recension. The chief part of this manuscript was collated.

124. (Paul. Ep. 149. Apoc. 57.) The CODEx REGIUS 124. (formerly Colbertinus), is elegantly written on vellum, in the sixteenth century, contains the Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypse: it agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was cursorily collated.

125. (Paul. Ep. 150.) The CODEx REGIUS 125. was brought directly from Constantinople to the Royal Library at Paris: it rarely deviates from the Constantinopolitan recension: it was written on vellum in the fourteenth century, and contains the Acts and Epistles. Dr. Scholz collated it cursorily.

126. (Paul. Ep. 153.) The CODEx REGIUS 216., formerly 705. (and Medicæus 1855.), was elegantly written on vellum in the tenth century, and, Dr. Scholz thinks, at Constantinople. It contains the Acts and Epistles, with prologues and scholia extracted from the commentaries of Chrysostom, Ammonius, Apollinaris, Didymus, Isidore, Origen, and others. Some parts of these scholia are written in uncial letters; others, especially the scholia on the Epistle to the Hebrews, have been added in the sixteenth century. The text of this manuscript mostly agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension: the chief part of it was collated by Scholz.

127. (Paul. Ep. 154.) The CODEx REGIUS 217. in vellum, of the eleventh century, contains the Acts with a catena thereon, and the Epistles, with Theophylact's commentary on those of St. Paul, and scholia on the Catholic Epistles. The greater part of this manuscript was collated by Dr. Scholz: its text mostly agrees with the Alexandrine recension.

128. (Paul. Ep. 155.) The CODEx REGIUS 218. (formerly Colbertinus), written on vellum in the eleventh century, contains the Acts and Epistles with a catena, and follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

129. (Paul. Ep. 156.) The CODEx REGIUS 220., formerly Colbertinus, written in the thirteenth century on vellum, contains the Acts and Epistles with a commentary; but the text is frequently omitted. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was cursorily collated.

130. The CODEx REGIUS 221., which was brought from the East into the Royal Library at Paris, contains the Acts and Catholic Epistles with a catena, written on vellum in the twelfth century. It is imperfect in Acts xx. 38. to xxii. 3.; 2 Pet. i. 11. to the end; 1 John iv. 11. to the end; 2 John; 3 John; and Jude 1—8. The text mostly agrees with that of the Constantinopolitan recension, and was cursorily collated.

131. (Paul. Ep. 158.) The CODEx REGIUS 223., formerly 2246. and also 505. (formerly Codex Boistallerianus) is written on vellum in folio. The first part, containing the Epistles of St. Paul with a prologue and catena, was written A. D. 1045 by the Reader and Calligrapher Theopemptus; and the second part, containing the Acts and Catholic Epistles, was written in the thirteenth century. It mostly agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension: the chief part of it was collated.

132. (Gosp. 330. Paul. Ep. 131.) The CODEx COISLIANUS 195. See it described in page 252. No. 330.

133. (Paul. Ep. 166.) The CODEx TAURINENSIS 285. c. I. 40., written on paper in the thirteenth century, contains the Acts and Epistles, with figures and prologues. It mostly agrees with the received text, but it has many Alexandrine readings. It was accurately collated by Dr. Scholz.

134. (Paul. Ep. 167.) The CODEx TAURINENSIS 315. (now 19.) c. II. 17., written in the eleventh century on vellum, contains the Acts and Epistles with prologues. It is imperfect in Acts i. ii. The text follows the Constantinopolitan recension. Dr. Scholz collated this manuscript in Acts iii.—vii. Rom. x. and some other select passages.

135. (Gosp. 339. Paul. Ep. 170. Apoc. 83.) The CODEx TAURINENSIS 302. c. II. 5., described in page 252. No. 339., agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

136. (Paul. Ep. 169.) The CODEx TAURINENSIS 328. c. II., 31., written on vellum in the thirteenth century, contains the Acts and Epistles; and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. It is imperfect in the Epistle to the Hebrews.

137. (Paul. Ep. 176.) The CODEx AMBROSIANUS 97., written on vellum in the eleventh century, was purchased on the Island of Corcyra: it contains the Acts and Epistles with prologues, and an index of ecclesiastical lessons. The text agrees generally with that of the Alexandrine recension, out frequently also with that of the Constantinopolitan recension. Dr. Scholz collated nearly the whole of this manuscript in the Acts and Catholic Epistles.

138. (Paul. Ep. 173.) The CODEx AMBROSIANUS 102., which formerly belonged to J. V. Penelli, is written on paper in the fourteenth century, and contains all the Epistles. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was cursorily collated.

139. (Paul. Ep. 174.) The CODEx AMBROSIANUS 104., written on paper A. D. 1434, contains the Acts and Epistles: it was cursorily collated, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

140. (Paul. Ep. 215. Apoc. 74.) The CODEx VENETUS 546. is written, partly on vellum in the eleventh century, and partly on paper: it contains the Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypse, with a catena on the Epistles, and a commentary on the Apocalypse. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

141. (Gosp. 189. Paul. Ep. 239.) The CODEx LAURENTIANUS VI. 27. of the twelfth century, agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

142. (Paul. Ep. 178.) The CODEx MUTINENSIS 243. (Ms. III. B. 17.) on vellum of the twelfth century, contains the Acts and Epistles, and follows the Constantinopolitan recension. In the Acts it agrees with No. 96. (page 264* supra): Dr. Scholz collated it in select passages.

143. The CODEx LAURENTIANUS VI. 5., besides other portions of the New Testament, contains the Catholic Epistles. This and the six following manuscripts agree with the Constantinopolitan recension.

144. (Gosp. 363. Paul. Ep. 180.) The CODEx LAURENTIANUS VI. 13. is described in page 253. No. 363.

145. (Gosp. 365. Paul. Ep. 181.) The CODEx LAURENTIANUS VI. 36., both written in the thirteenth century, were collated in select passages.

146. (Gosp. 367. Paul. Ep. 182.) The CODEx LAURENTIANUS 2708., written in the fourteenth century, was collated in select passages.

147. (Paul. Ep. 183.) The CODEx LAURENTIANUS IV. 30., written in the twelfth century, contains the Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypse, with prologues: it was cursorily collated, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

148. (Paul. Ep. 184.) The CODEx LAURENTIANUS 2574., written on vellum A. D. 974, Indiction XII. by one Theophylact, a presbyter and doctor of law, contains the Acts and Epistles with prologues: it agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

149. The CODEx LAURENTIANUS 176., written on vellum in the thirteenth century, contains the Catholic Epistles with the Latin version.

150. (Gosp. 368. Paul. Ep. 230. Apoc. 84.) The CODEx RICHARDIANUS 84., a very incorrectly written manuscript of the fifteenth century, agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages. There are numerous corrections of the copyist's blunders.

151. (Gosp. 386. Paul. Ep. 199. Apoc. 71.) The CODEx VATICANO-OTTOBONIANUS 66. is described in pp. 253, 254. No. 386.

152. (Gosp. 442. Paul. Ep. 223.) The CODEx CANTABRIGIENSIS 2537, 2538. Dr. Scholz has not indicated its age, nor to what class of recensions it belongs.

153. (Gosp. 444. Paul. Ep. 240.) The CODEx HARLEIANUS 5796. is described in page 255. No. 444.

154. (Paul. Ep. 187.) The CODEx VATICANUS 1270., written on vellum in the fifteenth century, contains the Acts, the Catholic Epistles, Romans, and 1 Corinthians; and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. It was collated in select passages.

155. (Paul. Ep. 188.) The CODEx VATICANUS 1430., written in the twelfth century on vellum, contains all the Epistles, with a commentary written by a different hand. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

156. (Paul. Ep. 190.) The CODEx VATICANUS 1650. was written on vellum in the month of January, A. D. 1073, at the command of Nicholas archbishop of Calabria, by one Theodore, a clergyman. It contains the Acts and Epistles, with a commentary on the Epistles of St. Paul. This manuscript is imperfect in Acts i. 1. to v. 4.: it agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

157. (Paul. Ep. 191.) The CODEx VATICANUS 1714. on vellum, written in the twelfth century, contains fragments of the Acts and Epistles in the following order:—1 Cor. i. 1—28., heads and arguments; the Epistle of Jude; Rom. viii. 2—32.; James iii. 1. iv. 11.; Rom. vi. 22. et seq.; Acts xxv. 8. to xxvi. 23.; Rom. xiv. 20. to xv. 23.; James iv. 11. to the end; Rom. xiii. 4. to xiv. 20.; 1 Cor. i. 28. to iii. 12.; Acts xxiv. 11. to xxv. 7.: Rom. xi. 31. to xiii. 4.; Acts xviii. 14. to xix. 9.; 3 John. This manuscript for the most part agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension: it was collated in select passages.

158. The CODEx VATICANUS 1761., written on vellum in the eleventh century, contains the Acts and Epistles, with prologues. It was collated in select passages, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

159. The CODEx VATICANUS 1968. (Basil. 7.), written on vellum in the eleventh century, contains the Acts, Epistle of James, and the first Epistle of Peter, with scholia; the authors of which are named. It is imperfect in Acts i. 1. to v. 29., and vi. 14. to vii. 11. Its text partakes of both the Alexandrine and Constantinopolitan recensions. The whole of this manuscript was cursorily collated.

160. (Paul. Ep. 193. Apoc. 24.) The CODEx VATICANUS 2062. (Basil. 101.), written on vellum in the eleventh century, contains the Acts, Apocalypse, and Epistles, with scholia, the authors of which are named. It is imperfect from Acts i. 1. to xxviii. 19. and in Heb. ii. 1. to the end. The text seldom deviates from the received reading. Dr. Scholz collated it throughout.

161. (Paul. Ep. 198. Apoc. 69.) The CODEx VATICANO-OTTOBONIANUS 258., preserved in the Vatican Library, was written on paper in the thirteenth century. It contains the Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypse, with the Latin Version; and is imperfect in Acts i. 1., ii. 27. and the last chapter of the Apocalypse. This manuscript was written by different hands, and the close of it is evidently of the fourteenth century. The text is mixed; that is, composed of both the Alexandrine and the Constantinopolitan recensions. The greater part of it was collated by Dr. Scholz.

162. (Paul. Ep. 200.) The CODEx VATICANO-OTTOBONIANUS 298., written in the fifteenth century on vellum, is in very small quarto or octavo, and contains the Acts and Apostolic Epistles in Greek and Latin. It has the disputed clause in 1 John v. 7, 8., but in a form which renders it of no value or authority in determining the genuine reading of that clause.¹ The following fac-simile of it is copied from the tracing made by the Rev. Dr. Wiseman, vice-president of the English College at Rome, for the late Rt. Rev. Dr. Burgess, bishop of Salisbury, by whose liberal permission it appears in this work.

Each page contains two columns, the Latin on the left and the Greek on the right; the Latin is in square or Gothic characters. The manuscript seems not to have been finished; for, at the beginning of one or two of the Epistles, the space for the first large letter, occupying the breadth of two lines, is left blank, as well as the top line, evidently showing that the antiquarians intended to fill it up at leisure in a more ornamental style, as is the case in other books. The Codex Ottobonianus has no title. The text begins at once with Primum quidem sermonem. After the Acts come the Epistle of St. James and the other lesser ones; last those of St. Paul. The ink is faded: it is, in fact, become brown, so as to appear much more ancient; in some letters it is completely scaled off, so that it was with the greatest difficulty that Dr. Wiseman could catch the traces of the several letters.¹ This manuscript has been altered in many places, in order to make it harmonize with the Latin Vulgate: on this account, as well as its late date, it can be of little value in sacred criticism, except where it corroborates the readings of MSS. of better authority and of earlier date. The transpositions of words in it are innumerable. Its text mostly agrees with that of the Constantinopolitan recension; but there are many Alexandrine readings which have been introduced by a later hand. The greatest part of this manuscript was collated by Dr. Scholz. The specimens of its readings, printed by Dr. S. in his Biblico-Critical Travels, are given by Dr. Dermout in his Collectanea Critica in Novum Testamentum.

163. (Paul. Ep. 201.) The CODEx VATICANO-OTTOBO-NIANUS 325., in octavo, written on paper in the fourteenth century, contains the Acts and Epistles: it is imperfect for Acts iv. 19. to v. 1., and follows the Alexandrine recension. The chief part of this manuscript was collated.

164. (Gosp. 390. Paul. Ep. 203. Apoc. 71.) The CODEx VATICANO-OTTOBO-NIANUS 381. (described in page 254. No. 390.) was collated in select passages.

165. The CODEx VATICANO-OTTOBO-NIANUS 417., written on paper in the fourteenth century, contains the Catholic Epistles, besides various treatises of Ephrem the Syrian, and other ecclesiastical writers. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

166. (Paul. Ep. 203. Apoc. 22.) The CODEx VALLI-CELLIANUS B. 86., written on vellum in the thirteenth century, contains the Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypse. The text is mixed, from both the Alexandrine and Constantinopolitan recensions. It was collated in select passages by Scholz.

167. (Gosp. 393. Paul. Ep. 185.) The CODEx VALLI-CELLIANUS E. 22., described in page 254. No. 393., agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension: it was collated in select passages.

168. (Paul. Ep. 205.) The CODEx VALLI-CELLIANUS F. 13., written on paper in the fourteenth century, contains the Acts and Epistles, and was collated in select passages. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

169. (Paul. Ep. 206.) The CODEx GHIGIANUS R. V. 29., on vellum, was written A. D. 1344, at Constantinople: it contains the Acts and Epistles, which agree with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

170. (Gosp. 394. Paul. Ep. 186.) The CODEx VALLI-

CELLIANUS F. 17., described in page 254. No. 394., has the Constantinopolitan text: it was collated in select passages.

171. and 172. Two manuscripts belonging to the College at Rome, which agree with the Constantinopolitan recension: they were written in the sixteenth century, and were collated in select passages.

173. (Paul. Ep. 211.) Is a manuscript on vellum, of the eleventh century, in the Royal Bourbon Library at Naples, which is not numbered. It contains the Acts and Epistles with prologues, an index of chapters, lessons, &c. &c.; and agrees partly with the Alexandrine and partly with the Constantinopolitan recension. It was collated in select passages.

174. (Paul. Ep. 212.) The CODEx NEAPOLITANUS I. C. 26., written on paper in the fifteenth century, contains the Acts and Epistles, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

175. (Paul. Ep. 216.) The CODEx MESSANENSIS II. in the monastery of St. Basil, is written on vellum in the twelfth century. It contains the Acts and Epistles. Dr. Scholz has not indicated what recension this manuscript follows.

176. (Gosp. 421. Paul. Ep. 218.) The CODEx SYRACUSANUS in the Landolini Library: it is described in pp. 254, 255. No. 421.

177. (Gosp. 122. Paul. Ep. 219.) The CODEx LUGDUNENSIS-BATAVUS, formerly Meermannianus 116., of the latter part of the twelfth century, is described in page 245. No. 122.: it agrees for the most part with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated by Dr. Dermout.

178. (Paul. Ep. 242. Apoc. 87.) The manuscript formerly known as the CODEx MEERMANNIANUS 118., now belonging to Sir Thomas Philipps, Bart. of Middlehill, in the county of Worcester, is written on vellum, of the eleventh century: it contains the Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypse, and is imperfect at the beginning and end.

179. (Paul. Ep. 128. Apoc. 82.) The CODEx REGIUM MONACENSIS 211. was written in the eleventh century, on vellum, and for ecclesiastical use. It contains the Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypse, with prolegomena, subscriptions, the homily of Dorotheus, bishop of Tyre, on the seventy disciples, fragments of the canons of Eusebius, and scholia on St. Paul's Epistles, which are written by a later hand. The text so closely agrees with the received text, as to present scarcely any various readings in the Acts and Epistles.

180. (Gosp. 431. Ep. Paul. 238.) The CODEx MOLSHEMIENSIS, now deposited in the Library of the Great Seminary at Strasburg, is described in p. 255. No. 431. To the information there given, it may now be added, that the Jesuit Adam Contzen selected some readings from it in his Commentary on the Gospels, and that its various readings in the Acts and Epistles, were communicated to Dr. Scholz by Dr. Arendt, who accurately collated the entire manuscript and published a description of it in 1833, together with various readings on the Gospels, in the Ephemeris published every three months by Drev, Herbst, Hirscher, and Möhler. In the Acts and Catholic Epistles it for the most part agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, but it has also many peculiar readings.

181. (Gosp. 400. Paul. Ep. 220.) The CODEx BEROLINENSIS (formerly Diez 10.), is described in p. 254. No. 400. It is imperfect in Acts i. 11.—ii. 17. Rom. i. 1—27. 1 Cor. xiv. 12.—xv. 46. 2 Cor. i. 1—8. and v. 4.—19. 1 Tim. iv. 1. to the end, 2 Tim., Titus, Philemon, and Hebr. i. 1—9.

182. (Paul. Ep. 243.) A manuscript on vellum, of the twelfth century, belonging to the library of a monastery in the island of Patmos: it contains the Acts and Epistles, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. Another manuscript of the thirteenth century, on vellum, is preserved in the same library, and contains the Acts and Epistles.

* Scholz, Reise, p. 105.

183. (Paul. Ep. 231.) A manuscript (No. 8.) in the great Greek monastery at Jerusalem, written on vellum in the fourteenth century, contains the Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypse. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated by Scholz in select passages.

184. (Paul. Ep. 232. Apoc. 85.) Another manuscript (No. 9.) in the same library, on vellum, written in the thirteenth century, contains the Acts and Epistles, with a commentary, and the Apocalypse. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was also collated in select passages.

185. (Paul. Ep. 233.) A manuscript (No. 1.) in the library of the Greek monastery of St. Saba, written on vellum in the eleventh century: it contains the Acts and Epistles, which agree with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

186. (Gosp. 457. Paul. Ep. 234.) A manuscript in the same library (No. 2.) written on vellum in the thirteenth century, contains the Acts and Epistles, preceded by a synaxarium and menology. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

187. (Gosp. 462. Paul. Ep. 235.) A manuscript in the same library (No. 10.), of the fourteenth century, on vellum: it contains the New Testament, and was collated in select passages. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

188. (Paul. Ep. 236.) A manuscript in the same library (No. 15.), written on vellum in the twelfth century, contains the Acts and Epistles, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. It was collated in select passages.

189. (Gosp. 465. Paul. Ep. 237.) A manuscript of the same library (No. 20.) written on vellum in the thirteenth century, contains the New Testament: it agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

190. (Paul. Ep. 244. Apoc. 27.) The CODEX WAKIANUS 2., belonging to Christ's College, Oxford, was written on vellum in the eleventh century. It contains the Catholic Epistles (with the exception of the Epistle of St. James and the first Epistle of St. Peter), the Apocalypse, all the Epistles of St. Paul, and the Gospels as far as Luke vi. 42. The text agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. Dr. Scholz collated it on 1 John and on Acts xviii.—xx.

191. (Paul. Ep. 245.) The CODEX WAKIANUS 3., belonging to the same college, on vellum, was written in the twelfth century, in small but neat characters. It formerly belonged to the monastery of St. Saba at Jerusalem, and was brought into England from Constantinople, in 1731. It contains the Acts and Epistles, with a catena from the Fathers. A subscription in a later hand at the end states that this manuscript was written in A. D. 1312. Its text nearly agrees with manuscripts belonging to the Constantinopolitan family.

192. The CODEX WAKIANUS 4., in the same library, written in the eleventh century on vellum, contains the Acts and Epistles, and frequently agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. It is imperfect from Acts xii. 4. to xxiii. 32.

§ 6. MANUSCRIPTS CONTAINING THE EPISTLES OF SAINT PAUL.

i. Manuscripts written in Uncial or Capital Letters, collated by Editors who preceded Dr. Scholz.

I.—A. (Gospels, A. Acts, A.) The CODEX ALEXANDRINUS in the British Museum, described in pp. 222—224. supra. It is imperfect from 2 Cor. iv. 13. to xii. 7. and is the type of the Alexandrine recension or text.

II.—B. (Gosp. B. Acts, B.) The CODEX VATICANUS 1209., described in pp. 224—226., agrees with the Alexandrine text. It ends with Heb. ix. 14.; the remainder of that epistle and the Apocalypse being added by a very recent hand. The epistles to Timothy, Titus, and Philemon are also wanting.

* In the Prolegomena to the first Vol. of his Edition of the New Testament, p. xcvi. Dr. Scholz states that this manuscript is numbered 19.

III.—C. (Gosp. C. Acts, C.) The CODEX EPHREMI, or CODEX REGIUS PARISIENSIS 1905. (at present 9.), is described in pp. 229, 230. It is imperfect in Rom. ii. 5. to iii. 21.: ix. 6. to x. 14.; xi. 31. to xiii. 10.; 1 Cor. vii. 18. to ix. 6. xiii. 8. to xv. 40.; 2 Cor. x. 9. to Gal. i. 20.; Eph. i. to ii. 18.; iv. 17. to Phil. i. 22. and iii. 5. to the end; 1 Thess. ii. 9. to Heb. ii. 4.; vii. 26. to ix. 15.; x. 24. to xi. 15.; 1 Tim. i. to iii. 9. and v. 20. to the end. This manuscript agrees with the Alexandrine recension.

IV.—D. The CODEX CLAROMONTANUS, or CODEX REGIUS 107. (formerly 2245.), is a Greek-Latin manuscript, described in pp. 231, 232. Dr. Scholz thinks it of the seventh or eighth century. It is imperfect in Rom. i. 1—7. Two leaves containing 1 Cor. xiv. 13—22. have been added by a different but tolerably ancient hand, and the Epistle to the Hebrews is written by a still more recent hand. Vestiges of alterations by five different correctors may be distinguished, the two earliest of which (one Greek, the other Latin), Dr. Scholz refers to the ninth century: the remainder are by Greek hands. This manuscript agrees with the Alexandrine text.

V.—E. The CODEX PETROPOLITANUS, formerly called CORBEIENSIS and afterwards SAN-GERMANENSIS, is written on vellum, according to Dr. Scholz in the eleventh century, but according to Prof. Matthæi in the fifteenth century. Griesbach refers it to the tenth or eleventh century. Wetstein, Griesbach, and Scholz, consider this Greek-Latin manuscript of Saint Paul's Epistles as a transcript of the Codex Claromontanus: but Dr. Semler has questioned this opinion, and has adduced examples, from which it appears that if the copyist, who wrote the former, actually had the latter before his eyes, he must at least have selected various readings from other manuscripts. Bishop Marsh considers this manuscript "as a kind of Codex Eclecticus, in the writing of which the Claromontanus was principally, but not at all times consulted." It is imperfect from 1 Tim. i. 1. to vi. 15. and in Heb. xii. 8. to the end; and follows the Alexandrine recension.

VI.—F. The CODEX AUGIENSIS, now in Trinity College Library, at Cambridge, is a Greek-Latin manuscript of St. Paul's Epistles, most probably of the tenth century. It is described in page 233., and is imperfect from Rom. i. 1. to iii. 8., and the (Greek) Epistle to the Hebrews is wanting. It follows the Alexandrine recension.

VII.—G. The CODEX DRESDENSIS, formerly the CODEX BOERNERIANUS, is also a Greek-Latin manuscript of Saint Paul's Epistles: it is described in page 233., and follows the Alexandrine recension. This manuscript is imperfect from Rom. i. 1. to 5. and ii. 16. to 25.; 1 Cor. iii. 8. to 16.; vi. 7. to 14.; Col. ii. 2. to 8.; and Philemon 21. to 25.

VIII.—H. The CODEX COISBINIANUS 202., of the seventh century, according to Griesbach and Scholz, is described in page 234. It contains the following fragments of Saint Paul's Epistles, viz. 1 Cor. x. 23—39. and xi. 9—16. Gal. i. 4—10. and ii. 9—14.: 1 Tim. iii. 7—13.; Tit. i. 1—5., and 15. to ii. 5., and iii. 13. to the end; Heb. ii. 11—16.; iii. 13—18.; and iv. xii. 15. It agrees with the Alexandrine family.

IX.—I. (Acts, G.) The CODEX BIBLIOTHECÆ ANGELICÆ A. 2. 15. at Rome, described in page 260., is of the ninth or tenth century. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and is imperfect from Heb. x. 10. to the end of that epistle.

ii. Manuscripts written in small Greek Letters.

1. (Gosp. 1. Acts 1.) The CODEX BASILENSIS B. VI 57. See it described in page 238.

2. (Acts 2.) The CODEX BASILENSIS B. IX. See it described in page 261*. No. 2.

3. (Acts 3.) The CODEX FORLOSNIANUS 15., formerly Corsendonensis: it is described in page 238. No. 3.

4. (Acts 4.) The CODEX BASILENSIS B. X. 20.. it is described in page 261*. No. 4.

5. (Gosp. 5. Acts 5.) The CODEX REGIUS 106., described in page 238. No. 5., mostly agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

6. (Gosp. 6. Acts 6.) The CODEX REGIUS 112., described in page 238. No. 6. In the Epistles, this manuscript has a mixed text: it was cursorily collated by Wetstein and by Scholz.

* Michaelis's Introd. to the New Testament, vol. ii. part ii. p. 783

7. The CODEx BASILEENSIS B. VI. 17. is a quarto manuscript on vellum, containing the Epistles of St. Paul as far as Heb. xii. 18., with annotations and glosses collected from the ancient fathers of the church. Scholz states that it follows the Constantinopolitan recension; but neither he nor Griesbach has indicated its age.

8. (Acts 50.) The CODEx STEPHANI ζ is now unknown.

9. (Acts 7.) The CODEx REGIUS 102. (STEPHANI ι), noticed in page 261*. No. 7., follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

10. (Acts 8.) The CODEx STEPHANI α is now unknown.

11. (Acts 9.) The CODEx STEPHANI ι'. See a notice of it in page 261*. No. 9. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

12. (Acts 10. Apoc. 2.) The CODEx REGIUS 237. (STEPHANI α), described in page 261*. No. 10., follows the Constantinopolitan recension. It was collated by Scholz.

13. The readings of certain Greek Manuscripts cited by Jacobus Faber, Stapulensis (Jacques Le Fevre d'Étaples) in his commentary on Saint Paul's Epistles, published at Paris in 1512.

14. (Gosp. 90. Acts 47.) The CODEx JOANNIS FABRI, Daventrionensis, (afterwards the CODEx WOLFFI): it is described in page 243. No. 90. In the epistles Scholz states it to be of the fifteenth century; but in the prolegomena to the first volume of his edition of the New Testament (p. lviii.) he refers it (after Michaelis) to the sixteenth century. It mostly agrees with the Alexandrine recension.

15. The CODEx AMANDI was cited by Erasmus, who supposed it to be a Latinizing manuscript: it derives its name from Amandus, who lived at Louvain, and who once had it in his possession. Nothing further is known concerning it.

16. (Acts 12. Apoc. 4.) The CODEx REGIUS 219. follows the Constantinopolitan recension: it is described in page 261*. No. 12.

17. (Gosp. 33. Acts 13.) The CODEx REGIUS 14., described in page 240. No. 33., follows the Alexandrine recension.

18. (Gosp. 35. Acts 14. Apoc. 17.) The CODEx COISLINIANUS 199., described in page 240. No. 35., follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

19. (Acts 16.) The CODEx COISLINIANUS 26., described in page 261*. No. 16., follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

20. The CODEx COISLINIANUS 27. (formerly 247.) is a manuscript written on vellum in the tenth century. It was brought from mount Athos, and contains the Epistles of Paul with a catena and prologue. This manuscript has been badly preserved, and is very defective: it follows the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated by Wetstein.

22. (Acts 18. Apoc. 18.) The CODEx COISLINIANUS 205.: it is described in page 261*. No. 18.

23. The CODEx COISLINIANUS 28., formerly 253., was brought from mount Athos, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. It is written on vellum, in the eleventh century, and contains St. Paul's Epistles with a commentary. This manuscript was cursorily collated by Wetstein and Scholz.

24. (Gosp. 105. Acts 48.) The CODEx BODLEIANUS, formerly EBNERIANUS: it is described in page 244.

25. (Acts 20.) The CODEx WESTMONASTERIENSIS 935. (now I. B. I. in the British Museum), is described in page 261*. No. 20.

26. (Acts 21.) The CODEx CANTABRIGIENSIS DD. XI. 90. is described in page 261*. No. 21.

27. The CODEx CANTABRIGIENSIS Ff. 1. 30. (formerly 496.), according to Scholz was written in the eleventh and fourteenth centuries. The epistles to the Romans and Corinthians are wanting. This manuscript was collated by Wetstein in 1716.

28. (Acts 23. Apoc. 6.) The CODEx BAROCCIANUS 3.

29. (Acts 24.) The CODEx COLLEGII CHRISTI CANTABRIGIÆ 2.: it is described in pp. 261*, 262*. No. 24.

30. The CODEx COLLEGII EMMANUELIS CANTABRIGIÆ I. 2. 33. is a neatly written but not ancient manuscript of all the epistles. "It has many chasms, for the catholic epistles begin with 2 Pet. i.,—and is not legible before 2 Peter ii. 4. It is likewise defective from 1 John iii. 20. as far as the end of the third epistle: that of St. Jude also is wanting; and it has likewise the two following chasms, 1 Cor. xi. 7.—xv. 56., and from Heb. xi. 27. to the end of the epistle." The readings of this manuscript were first published in Bishop Walton's edition of the Polyglott Bible, where it is cited as Cod. Em.: and the same readings (but it should seem with additions) were given by Dr. Mill, who refers to it as Cod. Cant. 3.

32. (Acts 25. Apoc. 7.) The CODEx HARLEIANUS 5537.: it is described in page 262*. No. 25.

33. (Acts 27.) The CODEx HARLEIANUS 5620.: it is described in page 262*. No. 27.

34. (Acts 28. Apoc. 8.) The CODEx HARLEIANUS 5778.: it is described in page 262*. No. 28.

35. (Acts 29.) The CODEx GENEVENSI 20., described in page 262*. No. 29., was collated by Scholz for the Epistle to the Romans, and cursorily for the remaining epistles: it almost always agrees with the received text.

36. (Acts 30. Apoc. 9.) The CODEx BODLEIANUS 131.: it is described in page 262*. No. 30.

37. (Gosp. 69. Acts 31. Apoc. 14.) The CODEx LEICES TRENSIS: it is described in page 242. No. 69.

38. (Gosp. 51. Acts 32.) The CODEx BODLEIANUS, LAUDIANUS C. 715.: it is described in page 210. No. 51.

39. (Acts 33.) The CODEx LINCOLNIENSIS: it is described in page 262*. No. 33.

40. (Gosp. 61. Acts 34.) The CODEx MONTFORTIANUS: it is described in pages 241, 242. No. 61.

41. (Gosp. 57. Acts 35.) The CODEx MAGDALENSIS 1.: it is described in page 241. No. 57.

42. The CODEx MAGDALENSIS 2., belonging to Magdalen College, Oxford, contains the Epistles to the Romans and Corinthians, with the scholia of Oecumenius. Extracts from it were first printed in Bishop Walton's Polyglott, from which they were copied by Mill and Wetstein.

43. (Acts 37.) The CODEx NOVI COLLEGII, OXON.: it is described in page 262*. No. 37.

45. (Acts 39. Apoc. 11.) The CODEx PETAVIANUS 2.: it is described in page 262*. No. 39.

46. (Acts 40. Apoc. 12.) The CODEx ALEXANDRINO-VATICANUS 179.: it is described in page 262*. No. 40.

47. The CODEx BODLEIANUS ROE 16., formerly Roe 2., is written on vellum, of the eleventh or twelfth century: it contains St. Paul's Epistles, with scholia. It was brought from Turkey in 1628, by Sir Thomas Roe, who presented it to the Bodleian Library.

48. (Acts 42. Apoc. 13.) The CODEx BIBLIOTHECÆ GYMNASII FRANCOFURTENSIS AD VIADRUM, formerly SEIDELIANUS: it is described in page 262*. No. 42.

49. (Gosp. 76. Acts 43.) The CODEx CÆSAREUS VINDOBONENSIS (in Lambecius's Catalogue 28.) is described in page 242. No. 76.

50. (Acts 52.) The CODEx RHODIENSIS: it is noticed in page 263*. No. 52.

51. (Acts 44. Apoc. 5.) The CODICES LAURENTII VALÆ: see a notice of them in page 243. No. 82.

52. (Acts 45. Apoc. 16.) The CODEx UFFENBACHIANUS 2.: it is described in page 262*. No. 45.

53. The CODEx UFFENBACHIANUS 2. (1. of Bengel) is a fragment of St. Paul's Epistle to the Hebrews, written in uncial letters: it is described in pp. 237, 238., and for the most part agrees with the Alexandrine recension.

54. The CODEx MONACENSIS 412. (Augustanus 5. of Ben-gei), contains Rom. vii. 7. to xvi. 24. with a catena, which Scholz considers to be very valuable. It is written on vellum, of the twelfth century, and seldom deviates from the received text.

* Michaelis's Introduction to the New Testament, vol. ii. part i. p. 243. and part ii. p. 723.

55. (Acts 46.) The CODEx MONACENSIS 375., formerly Augustanus 6.: it is described in page 262*. No. 46.

56. The CODEx TIGURINUS, preserved in the public Library at Zurich, is a manuscript of the Epistles of Saint Paul, written by the justly celebrated Reformer, Ulrich Zuingli (or Zwingli) in 1516, for his own private exercise in the Greek language. Wetstein is of opinion that it is a transcript of Erasmus's first edition of the New Testament.

57. (Gosp. 218. Acts 65. Apoc. 33.) The CODEx CÆSAREO-VINDOBONENSIS 23. (Lambecii 1.): it is described in pp. 248, 249. No. 218.

58. The CODEx VATICANUS 165., formerly Cryptoferracensis, contains the Epistles of St. Paul, written in the twelfth century. It was inspected by Zacagni, who was keeper of the Vatican Library at the close of the seventeenth and in the former part of the eighteenth century. Though it is included in Wetstein's Catalogue of Manuscripts of St. Paul's Epistles, Michaelis observes that Wetstein has not quoted it.

59. The CODEx COISLINIANUS 204. (formerly 143.), written on vellum in the eleventh century, contains a catena on St. Paul's Epistles with the text, which agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

60. Certain manuscripts mentioned in the "Correctorium Bibliorum Latinorum."

61. (Acts 61.) The CODEx Ital., an unknown manuscript cited in the margin of a copy of Dr. Mill's edition of the New Testament, now preserved in the Bodleian Library at Oxford. Its readings were transcribed by Griesbach.

62. (Acts 59.) The CODEx HARLEIANUS 5588., described in page 263*. No. 59.: in the Epistles it follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

63. (Acts 60. Apoc. 29.) The CODEx HARLEIANUS 5613.: it is described in page 263*. No. 60. Griesbach states that although the text of this manuscript in St. Paul's Epistles seldom departs from the common text, yet it does not so agree with any manuscript, that it can be said to be nearly allied to it. He adds, however, that it has some readings peculiar to itself, and others which are not unworthy of notice.

64. The manuscript thus numbered by Griesbach and Scholz, consists of two quarto leaves on vellum, written in red uncial characters, in the tenth century according to Scholz, but in the tenth or eleventh century according to Griesbach. These leaves are found in the Codex Harleianus 5613.: one of them has been folded in two at the beginning of the volume, and the other at the end of it, by some former bookbinder. From the shape of the letters, the size of the pages, and the colour of the ink, there is no doubt whatever but that (as Griesbach conjectured) this manuscript originally formed part of the Codex Uffenbachianus 2., described in pp. 237, 238., where an accurate facsimile of it is given. The first of these two fragments contains 1 Cor. xv. 52. to 2 Cor. i. 15.; and the second, 2 Cor. x. 13. to xii. 5. This most valuable fragment was carefully collated by Griesbach.

65. (Acts 62.) The CODEx REGIUS 60., described in page 263*. No. 62., follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

66. The CODEx HARLEIANUS 5552. contains the text of Saint Paul's Epistles and of the Catholic Epistles, with a catena. The text is a transcript of Erasmus's first edition written on vellum in the sixteenth century, in the margin of which are some various readings which were extracted by Griesbach.

67. (Acts 66. Apoc. 34.) The CODEx CÆSAREO-VINDOBONENSIS 23. (Lambecii 34.): it is described in page 263*. No. 66.

68—70. The CODICES LAMBECHII 35. (Acts 63.), 36. (Acts 64.) and 37. (Acts 65.) are described in page 263*. Nos. 63, 64, 67.: they all agree with the Constantinopolitan recension.

71. The CODEx CÆSAREUS, Forlosiæ 19. or Kollarii 10., is written on vellum, in the twelfth century. It contains St. Paul's Epistles with a commentary, and the catechetical discourses of Cyril of Jerusalem. It wants the Epistles to Philemon and Titus, and also Rom. i. 1—9. This manuscript was collated by Birch and Alter.

72. (Gosp. 234. Acts 57.) The CODEx HAVNIENSIS 1.: it is described in page 249. No. 234.

74. (Acts 69.) The CODEx GUELPHERTYANUS XVI. 7.: it is described in page 263*. No. 69.

75. (Gosp. 109. Acts 22.) The Codex 5115. in the British Museum: it is described in page 245. No. 109., and in page 261*. No. 22.

76. The CODEx BIBLIOTHECÆ PAULINÆ is a manuscript of the thirteenth century, containing the Epistles to the Romans and Galatians, and fragments of the first Epistle to the Corinthians and of that to the Ephesians, with the scholia of Theophylact. This manuscript was collated by Matthæi, who has noted it with the letter s.

77. (Gosp. 131. Acts 70. Apoc. 66.) The CODEx VATICANUS 360.: it is described in page 246. No. 131. This and the following manuscripts 78—82. and 85—105. were collated with more or less minuteness by Drs. Birch and Scholz: the latter states that they all agree with the Constantinopolitan recension, except No. 85., which has many Alexandrine readings.

78. (Gosp. 133. Acts 71.) The CODEx VATICANUS 363. is of the eleventh century.

79. (Acts 72. Apoc. 37.) The CODEx VATICANUS 366., of the twelfth century.

80. (Acts 73.) The CODEx VATICANUS 367.: it is of the eleventh century.

81. The CODEx VATICANUS 761., on vellum, was written in the twelfth century: it contains St. Paul's Epistles, with the commentaries of Oecumenius.

82. The CODEx VATICANUS 762., also on vellum, and written in the twelfth century, contains the Epistle to the Romans, and both the Epistles to the Corinthians, with a catena.

83. The CODEx VATICANUS 765., written on vellum in the eleventh century; and,

84. The CODEx VATICANUS 766., written on vellum in the twelfth century, severally contain the Epistles of Saint Paul with a commentary.

85. (Apoc. 39.) The CODEx VATICANUS 1136., written on vellum in the thirteenth century, contains the Apocalypse with a Latin version, and also the following Epistles, viz. Romans, 1 and 2 Corinthians to 2 Thess., and ends with 1 Tim. vi. 1. There are many Alexandrine readings in this manuscript, though its text generally agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

86. (Gosp. 141. Acts 75. Apoc. 40.) The CODEx VATICANUS 1160.: it is noticed in page 247. No. 141.

88. (Gosp. 149. Acts 75. Apoc. 25.) The CODEx PALATINO-VATICANUS 171. See page 247. No. 149.

89. (Acts 78.) The CODEx ALEXANDRINO-VATICANUS 29.: it is described in page 263*. No. 78.

90. (Acts 79.) The CODEx URBINO-VATICANUS 3. is of the eleventh century.

91. (Acts 80. Apoc. 42.) The CODEx PIO-VATICANUS 50. is of the twelfth century.

92. (Acts 82. Apoc. 44.) The manuscript in the Library of the College of the Propaganda No. 250.: it was written towards the close of the thirteenth century.

93. (Acts 83.) The CODEx BIBLIOTHECÆ BORBONICÆ REGIÆ NEAPOLITANÆ 1. B. 12.: it is described in page 264*. No. 83.

94—99. (Acts 84—89.) The CODICES LAURENTIANI IV 1., 5., 20., 29., 31., and 32.: they are described in page 264*. Nos. 84—89. The Codices Laurentiani are in the Bibliotheca Laurentiana at Florence.

100. The CODEx LAURENTIANUS X. 4. contains St. Paul's Epistles, written on vellum in the tenth century, with scholia added in the fourteenth century.

101, 102. The CODICES LAURENTIANI X. 6. and 7. contain St. Paul's Epistles, written on vellum in the eleventh century, with commentaries. A synaxarion and life of Paul are prefixed to the Cod. Laur. X. 7.

103. The CODEX LAURENTIANUS X. 19. contains Saint Paul's Epistles, written on vellum in the thirteenth century, with a catena and synaxarion.

104. (Gosp. 201. Acts 91.) The CODEX LAURENTIANUS 701.

105. (Gosp. 201. Acts 92.) The CODEX BONONIENSIS 610.

106—108. (Gosp. 205, 206, 209. Acts 93, 94, 95.) The CODICES VENETI 5, 6, and 10.

109. (Acts 96.) The CODEX VENETUS or VENETIANUS 11.: it is described in page 261*. No. 96.

110—112. The CODICES VENETI 33—35. contain the Epistles of St. Paul with commentaries: they are all written on vellum in the eleventh century. The Cod. Venet. 35. is imperfect in Rom. 1 Cor. 2 Cor. i. 20. 1 Thess. iv. 13. to 2 Thess. ii. 14. and Heb. x. 25. to the end of that epistle. The Venetian manuscripts were collated by G. F. Rinck, who has given the results of his researches in his Iacubratio Critica in Acta Apostolorum, Epistolae Catholicae et Paulinas. Basilæ, 1830. 8vo.

114—118. (Acts 99—103.) The CODICES S. SYNODI MOSQUENSIS 5, 334, 333, 98, and 193.: they are described in page 261*. Nos. 99—103.

119. The CODEX S. SYNODI MOSQUENSIS 292., by Matthæi noted i., contains the two Epistles to the Corinthians, with Theophylact's commentary, written on vellum in the twelfth century. This manuscript was brought from mount Athos, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

120. (Gosp. 241. Acts 104. Apoc. 47.) The CODEX DRESDENSIS: it is described in page 219. No. 241.

121. (Gosp. 242. Acts 105. Apoc. 48.) The CODEX S. SYNODI MOSQUENSIS 380.: it is described in page 249. No. 242.

122. (Acts 106.) The CODEX S. SYNODI 328.: it is described in page 264*. No. 106.

123. The CODEX S. SYNODI 99. (n. of Matthæi) formerly belonged to the Monastery of Athanasius on mount Athos. It is written on vellum, of the tenth century, and contains St. Paul's Epistles with a commentary; and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

124. The CODEX S. SYNODI 250. (q. of Matthæi) was also brought from mount Athos. It is written on paper, of the fourteenth century, and contains the Epistle to the Romans, with the commentaries of Theophylact, and some other writings. It is imperfect from xiv. 1. to the end, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

iii. Manuscripts containing the Epistles of Saint Paul, which for the first time were collated by Dr. Scholz.

125. The CODEX MONACENSIS 504. (Reisser, 5. formerly Augustanus 8.) is written on paper, and dated A. D. 1387, in the tenth indiction, and on the first day of February: it contains the Epistles of St. Paul (except that to Philemon, which is wanting) with the commentaries of Theophylact, whose text the writer has evidently followed.

126. The CODEX MONACENSIS 455. (Reisser, 5. Hoeschellii 35. formerly Augustanus 8.) is written on paper, and is dated on the 17th of February, in the twelfth indiction, and, Scholz conjectures, in the year 1389. Its contents are the same as those of No. 123., but with the addition of some homilies of Chrysostom. Both these manuscripts are evidently transcribed from the same copy.

127. The CODEX MONACENSIS 110. formerly belonged to the Jesuits' College at Munich. It is written on paper, in the sixteenth century, and contains Rom. vii. 7.—ix. 21. with a catena. Scholz has ascertained by actual collation that this manuscript is beyond all doubt a copy of No. 54. The Codex Monacensis 412. (see pp. 269*, 270*. No. 54.) It has the received text.

129. The CODEX MONACENSIS 35., written on paper in the sixteenth century, contains St. Paul's Epistles with a catena. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

130. (Gosp. 43. Acts 54.) The CODEX GRÆCUS 4., in the Library of the Arsenal at Paris. It is described in page 240. No. 43., and follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

131. (Gosp. 330. Acts 132.) The CODEX COISLINIANUS 196. described in page 252. No. 330., follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

132. (Gosp. 18. Acts 113. Apoc. 51.) The CODEX REGIUS 47., described in page 239., No. 18., follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

133. (Acts 51. Apoc. 52.) The CODEX REGIUS 56., is described in page 263*. No. 51. This and the three following manuscripts were cursorily examined by Dr. Scholz.

134. (Acts 114.) The CODEX REGIUS 57. is described in page 265*. No. 114.

135. (Acts 115.) The CODEX REGIUS 58., described in page 265*. No. 115. is imperfect from 2 Tim. ii. to the end, and wants the Epistle to Titus and to the Hebrews.

136. (Acts 116. Apoc. 53.) The CODEX REGIUS 59. is described in page 265*. No. 116.

137. (Gosp. 263. Acts 117. Apoc. 51.) The CODEX REGIUS 61., described in page 250. No. 263. It is imperfect in Philemon, verse 21—25. In St. Paul's Epistles this manuscript frequently agrees with the Alexandrine recension, but most commonly with the received text.

138. (Acts 118. Apoc. 55.) The CODEX REGIUS 101.

139. (Acts 119. Apoc. 56.) The CODEX REGIUS 102. A.

140. (Acts 11.) The CODEX REGIUS 103. is described in page 261*. No. 11. This and the following manuscripts to No. 156. inclusive, were cursorily collated by Scholz.

142. (Acts 121.) The CODEX REGIUS 104.

143. (Acts 122.) The CODEX REGIUS 105.

144. (Acts 123.) The CODEX REGIUS 106. A.

145. The CODEX REGIUS 108., formerly ^{2864.}₃₃ (Colbertinus 3790.) is written on vellum in the sixteenth century; contains the Epistles to the Philippians, Colossians, Thessalonians, and Timothy, with prologues. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

146. The CODEX REGIUS 109. (formerly Colbertinus), written on vellum in the sixteenth century, contains the Epistle to the Romans with a prologue and argument, and also the first Epistle to the Corinthians. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

147. The CODEX REGIUS 110. (formerly Colbertinus), written on vellum in the year 1511, contains the two Epistles to the Corinthians. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

148. The CODEX REGIUS 111. (formerly Colbertinus), written on vellum in the sixteenth century, contains the Epistles to Titus, Philemon, and the Hebrews; and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

149, 150. (Acts 121, 125.) The CODICES REGII 124. and 125. are described in page 265*. Nos. 124, 125.

151. The CODEX REGIUS 126., written on vellum in the sixteenth century, contains St. Paul's Epistles, the text of which follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

152. (Apoc. 60.) The CODEX REGIUS 136^a. contains the Epistle to the Hebrews, and the Apocalypse, written on vellum, but in what century Scholz has not mentioned. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

153—156. (Acts 126—129.) The CODICES REGII 216—218, 220., are described in page 265*. Nos. 126—129.

157. The CODEX REGIUS 222., formerly 1886. (Colbertinus 3002.), was brought from Constantinople in 1676. It contains St. Paul's Epistles, written on vellum in the eleventh century, with prologues and commentaries. This manuscript is imperfect from Rom. i. 1. to ii. 29., iii. 26. to iv. 8., ix. 11—22., 1 Cor. xv. 22—43., and Col. i. 1—6. It most frequently agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, but it often agrees with the Alexandrine recen sion. The chief part of this manuscript was collated by Scholz.

158. (Acts 131.) The CODEx REGIUS 223. is described in page 265*. No. 131.

159. The CODEx REGIUS 224. (formerly 22452.), most elegantly written on vellum in the eleventh century, contains St. Paul's Epistles, with prologues and a catena, and the Apocalypse with the commentary of Aretas, bishop of Cæsarea in Cappadocia. This manuscript seldom departs from the received text: it was collated in select passages by Dr. Scholz.

160. The CODEx REGIUS 225., a manuscript on paper, written in the sixteenth century, contains fragments of Saint Paul's Epistles with the commentary of Theophylact. This and the three following manuscripts agree with the Constantinopolitan recension, and were cursorily examined by Scholz.

161. The CODEx REGIUS 226., also on paper, and written in the sixteenth century, contains the Epistle to the Romans with a commentary.

162. The CODEx REGIUS 227. (formerly Bigotianus), contains a catena on 1 Cor. xvi.: it is written on paper, of the sixteenth century.

163. The CODEx REGIUS 238. (formerly 2219.), contains Heb. i.—viii. with a catena, written on vellum in the thirteenth century.

164. The CODEx REGIUS 849. (formerly Medicæus), written on paper in the sixteenth century, contains Theodoret's commentary on St. Paul's Epistles, with the text in the margin.

165. The CODEx TAURINENSIS 284. c. I. 39., written on paper in the sixteenth century, contains 1 and 2 Timothy, Titus, Philemon, and Hebrews. This and the five following Turin Manuscripts agree with the Constantinopolitan recension, and were collated in some select passages.

166. (Acts 133.) The CODEx TAURINENSIS 285. c. I. 40. It is described in pp. 265*, 266*. No. 133.

167. (Acts 134.) The CODEx TAURINENSIS 315. c. II. 17. It is described in page 266*. No. 134.

168. The CODEx TAURINENSIS 325. c. II. 38. contains St. Paul's Epistles with a commentary and prologues, written on vellum in the thirteenth century. It is imperfect from Rom. i. to iii. 19.

169. (Acts 136.) The CODEx TAURINENSIS 328. c. II. 31. It is described in page 266*. No. 136.

170. (Gosp. 339. Acts 135. Apoc. 83.) The CODEx TAURINENSIS 302. c. II. 5. It is described in page 252. No. 339.

171. The CODEx AMBROSIANUS 6., at Milan, contains St. Paul's Epistles with a commentary, written on vellum in the thirteenth century; excepting that the Epistle to the Romans, 1 Cor. and 2 Cor. i. to v. 19. have been written by a later hand on cotton paper. It is imperfect from Heb. iv. 7. to the end, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. Dr. Scholz collated it in select passages.

172. The CODEx AMBROSIANUS 15., written on vellum in the twelfth century, contains St. Paul's Epistles with brief commentaries extracted from the larger work of Chrysostom on the same epistles. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was cursorily collated by Scholz.

173. (Acts 138.) The CODEx AMBROSIANUS 102. } These manuscripts

174. (Acts 139.) The CODEx AMBROSIANUS 101. } are described in

175. The CODEx AMBROSIANUS 125. was brought from Thessaly. It is on paper, written in the twelfth century, and contains St. Paul's Epistles with a perpetual commentary. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

176. (Acts 137.) The CODEx AMBROSIANUS 97., described in page 266*. No. 137., was collated by Scholz in most of St. Paul's Epistles.

177. The CODEx MUTINENSIS 14. (Ms. II. A. 14.), written on vellum in the sixteenth century, contains Saint Paul's Epistles. Its text agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. The whole of this and the two following manuscripts were collated.

178. (Acts 142.) The CODEx MUTINENSIS 243. (Ms. III. B. 17.), noticed in page 266*. No. 142. In the Epistles the text for the most part agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension; but there are many errors.

179. (Acts H.) The CODEx MUTINENSIS 196. (Ms. II. g. 3.), is described in page 260*, 261*. No. VIII. It mostly agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. The whole of this manuscript was collated.

180. (Gosp. 363. Acts 144.) The CODEx LAURENTIANUS VI. 13. is described in page 253. No. 363.

181. (Gosp. 365. Acts 145.) The } These manuscripts

194. (Gosp. 175. Acts 41. Apoc. 20.) The CODEx VATICANUS 2080., described in page 247. No. 175., agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension: it was cursorily collated.

195. The CODEx VATICANO-OTTOBONIANUS 31., preserved in the Vatican Library, written on vellum in the tenth century, contains the Epistles of St. Paul with a commentary, in which the names of Oecumenius, Theodoret, and others are inserted. It is imperfect in the Epistle to the Romans, and in the chief part of the first Epistle to the Corinthians.

196. The CODEx VATICANO-OTTOBONIANUS 61., written on paper in the fifteenth century, contains the Epistles of St. Paul with a commentary. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was cursorily examined.

197. (Apoc. 78.) The CODEx VATICANO-OTTOBONIANUS 176., also written on paper in the sixteenth century, and agreeing with the Constantinopolitan recension, contains St. Paul's Epistles and the Apocalypse: it was cursorily examined.

198. (Acts 161. Apoc. 69.) The CODEx VATICANO-OTTOBONIANUS 258., is described in page 266*. No. 161. In the epistles its text agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension: it was cursorily collated.

199. (Gosp. 386. Acts 151.) The CODEx VATICANO-OTTOBONIANUS 66. is described in pp. 253, 254. No. 386.

200. (Acts 162.) The CODEx VATICANO-OTTOBONIANUS 298., described in page 266*. No. 162., was cursorily examined by Dr. Scholz on the Pauline Epistles.

201. (Acts 163.) The CODEx VATICANO-OTTOBONIANUS 325., described in page 267*. No. 163., sometimes follows the Alexandrine and sometimes the Constantinopolitan recension. It was collated in select passages.

202. The CODEx VATICANO-OTTOBONIANUS 356., written on paper in the fifteenth century, contains the Epistle to the Romans with a catena. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was cursorily examined by Scholz.

209, 210. (Acts 171, 172.) Two manuscripts belonging to the College at Rome, of the sixteenth century. They agree with the Constantinopolitan recension, and were cursorily examined.

211. (Acts 173.) A manuscript in the Royal Bourbon Library at Naples: it is described in page 267*. No. 173., and was collated in select passages.

212. (Acts 174.) The CODIX NEAPOLITANUS I. C. 26., of the fifteenth century, agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

213. The CODIX BARBERINIANUS 29., written (as appears from the subscription) in 1338, contains St. Paul's Epistles with prologues and scholia. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was cursorily examined.

214. The CODIX CÆSAREUS VINDOBONENSIS Theologicus 167. (Lambecii 46.) written on cotton paper in the fifteenth century, contains the Epistle to the Romans with a catena, and the first Epistle to the Corinthians with the commentaries of Chrysostom and Theodoret, and some other pieces. The text follows the readings of the commentaries, and was cursorily examined.

215. (Acts 140.) The CODIX VENETUS 546., described in page 266*. No. 140., was cursorily collated.

216. (Acts 175.) The CODIX MESSANENSIS II. is described in page 267*. No. 175.

217. A manuscript in the Royal Library at Palermo, written on vellum in the fifteenth century, contains Saint Paul's Epistles. It is imperfect in Rom. and 1 Cor., also in 2 Cor. i. 1. to iv. 18., Heb. ii. 9. to the end, and 2 Tim. i. 8. to ii. 14.

218. (Gosp. 421. Acts 176.) The CODIX SYRACUSANUS is described in pp. 254, 255. No. 421.

219. (Gosp. 122. Acts 177.) The CODIX LUGDUNENSIS-BATAVUS (formerly Meermannianus 116.), is described in page 245. No. 122., and mostly agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. It is imperfect from Rom. i. 1. to vii. 13. and 1 Cor. ii. 7. to xiv. 23.

220. (Gosp. 400. Acts 181.) The CODIX BEROLINENSIS BIBLIOTHECÆ (formerly Diezii 10.), described in page 254. No. 400., agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

221. (Gosp. 440. Acts 111.) The CODIX CANTABRIGIENSIS Mm. 6. 9.: it is described in page 255. No. 440.

222, 223. (Gosp. 441, 442. Acts 110, 152.) The CODICES CANTABRIGIENSIS † 2262. and 2537, 2538, contain the entire New Testament. Scholz has not stated with what recensions they agree.

224. (Acts 58.) The CODIX CLARKII 9. in the Bodleian Library, described in page 263*. No. 58., is imperfect after Heb. xiii. 7. It was collated for the first Epistle to the Corinthians, and very seldom differs from the received text.

225. (Acts 112.) The CODIX CANTABRIGIENSIS 2068. is described in page 265*. No. 112. and note.

226. The CODIX CANTABRIGIENSIS 1152. contains the Epistles of St. Paul.

§ 7. MANUSCRIPTS CONTAINING THE APOCALYPSE, OR REVELATION OF SAINT JOHN.

i. Manuscripts written in Uncial or Capital Letters collated by Editors who preceded Dr. Scholz.

I.—A. (Gosp. A.) The CODIX ALEXANDRINUS: it is described in pp. 222—224.

II.—B. The CODIX VATICANUS, formerly belonging to the Monks of St. Basil at Rome, No. 105., contains the Apocalypse with the Homilies of Basil (surnamed the Great) and of Gregory of Nazianzum. This manuscript was, by the order of Cardinal Quirini, collated with Morinus's edition printed at Paris in 1628. Griesbach has remarked, either that there are very numerous lacunæ in this manuscript, or it was inaccurately collated.

III.—C. (Gosp. C.) The CODIX EPHREMI, described in pp. 229, 230. It is imperfect in Rev. iii. 20. to v. 14.; vii. 14. to ix. 16.; xvi. 14. to xix. 2.; and xix. 10. to the end. It was collated anew by Dr. Scholz.

ii. Manuscripts written in Cursive or the ordinary Greek small Characters.

1. The CODIX REUCHLINI or CAPNIONIS contains the Apocalypse with the commentary of Andreas Cæsariensis. This manuscript was followed by Erasmus in his first edition of the Greek Testament. He highly extolled its antiquity, and frequently cites it in his notes. It is not known what has become of this manuscript.

2. (Acts 10. Paul. Ep. 12.) The CODEx REGIUS 237., described in page 261*. No. 10. Its text for the most part agrees with the Alexandrine and Vatican Manuscripts (A. and B.), and frequently also with Nos. 9. and 36. infra. It was collated by Wetstein and Scholz.

3. The CODEx STEPHANI is now unknown.

4. (Acts 12. Paul. Ep. 16.) The CODEx REGIUS 219., described in page 261*. No. 12., was collated in select passages by Scholz.

5. The manuscripts collated by Laurentius Valla: see a notice of them in page 243. No. 82.

6. (Acts 23. Paul. Ep. 28.) The CODEx BAROCCIANUS 3., described in page 261*. No. 23. Chap. xvii. 10. to xviii. 7. and the last three chapters of the Apocalypse are wanting.

7. (Acts 25. Paul. Ep. 31.) The } These manuscripts
CODEx HARLEIANUS 5537. } are described in

8. (Acts 28. Paul. Ep. 34.) The } page 262*. Nos.
CODEx HARLEIANUS 5778. } 25. and 28.

9. (Acts 30. Paul. Ep. 36.) The CODEx BODLEIANUS 131. is described in page 262*. No. 30.

10. (Gosp. 60.) The CODEx CANTABRIGIENSIS Dd. 9. 69. is described in page 241. No. 60.

11. (Acts 39. Paul. Ep. 45.) The CODEx PETAVIANUS 2. is described in page 262*. No. 39.

12. (Acts 40. Paul. Ep. 46.) The CODEx ALEXANDRINO-VATICANUS 179., described in page 262*. No. 40., is imperfect in Rev. xvii. 9—14. It mostly agrees with the Alexandrine recension, and was collated anew by Birch (for chapters i. and ii.) and by Scholz.

14. (Gosp. 69. Acts 31. Paul. Ep. 37.) The CODEx LEICESTRENSIS (described in page 242. No. 69.) wants the two last chapters of the Apocalypse.

15. (Gosp. E.) The CODEx BASILEENSIS B. VI. 21. (described in page 232.) contains a fragment of chapters iii. and iv., which Griesbach says are written in a later hand.

16. (Acts 45. Paul. Ep. 5.) The CODEx UFFENBACHIANUS 2. is described in page 262*. No. 45.

17. (Gosp. 35. Acts 14. Paul. Ep. 18.) The CODEx COISLINIANUS 199. is described in page 240. No. 35. It was collated in select passages by Scholz.

18. (Acts 18. Paul. Ep. 22.) The CODEx COISLINIANUS 202. is described in page 261*. No. 18. It was collated in select passages by Scholz.

19. (Acts 17. Paul. Ep. 21.) The CODEx COISLINIANUS 205., described in page 261*. No. 17. was collated in select passages by Scholz.

20. (Gosp. 175. Acts 41. Paul. Ep. 194.) The CODEx VATICANUS 2080. is described in page 247. No. 175.

21. The CODEx VALLICELIANUS D. 20., written on paper in the fourteenth century, contains the Apocalypse with the commentary of Andreas: it was collated in select passages by Scholz, and agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

22. (Acts 166. Paul. Ep. 203.) The CODEx VALLICELIANUS B. 86. is described in page 267*. No. 166. Scholz has substituted these two Vallicellian manuscripts in lieu of two French manuscripts cited by Dr. Bentley in his Specimen of Rev. xxii., which he (Dr. S.) has no doubt exist among some of the manuscripts specified in the following numbers.

23. (Gosp. 38. Acts 19.) The CODEx COISLINIANUS 200., described in page 240. No. 38., was cursorily collated by Scholz, who has substituted this manuscript for the readings in the first three chapters, extracted from one or more Medicean manuscripts at Florence, and inserted in the margin of Rapheleng's edition, which manuscripts (he is of opinion) are also concealed among the following numbers.

24. (Acts 160. Paul. Ep. 193.) The CODEx VATICANUS 2062., described in page 266*. No. 160., was collated by Scholz. The last two verses of Rev. xxii. are cited by Blanchini. The text of this manuscript mostly agrees with the Codices 6. 7. and 8.

25. (Gosp. 149. Acts 77. Paul. Ep. 88.) The CODEx PALATINO-VATICANUS 171. is a manuscript of the fourteenth century, from which Wetstein cited some readings taken from Amelotte's notes to his French Version of the Apocalypse. This manuscript was collated anew by Dr. Birch (for ch. i. to iii. 9.) and by Scholz.

26. (Lectionary 57.) The CODEx WAKIANUS I. in the Library of Christ's College, Oxford, is a manuscript written on vellum, in a bold round hand, in the eleventh century, which was brought to England from Constantinople in the year 1731. It contains the Apocalypse, and lessons taken from the Gospels, Acts, and Epistles, and seldom departs from the ordinary Greek text. Abbreviations frequently occur, and there is also a frequent confusion of vowels. This and the two following manuscripts were collated, in the Apocalypse, by Caspar Wetstein.

27. (Acts 190. Paul. Ep. 244.) The CODEx WAKIANUS 2., in the same library, is described in page 268*. No. 190.

28. The CODEx BAROCCIANUS 48., in the Bodleian Library, besides other writings, contains the Apocalypse from the beginning to chap. xvii. 6.

29. (Acts 60. Paul. Ep. 63.) The CODEx HARLEIANUS 5613., described in page 263*. No. 60., ends with Rev. xxii. 2.

30. (Acts 69. Paul. Ep. 74.) The CODEx GUELPHERBYTANUS XVI. 7. is described in page 263*. No. 69. Knittel first edited the readings of this manuscript of the Apocalypse in his Beyträgen zur Kritik über Johanns Offenbarung [Contributions for a Criticism on the Revelation of John.]

31. The CODEx HARLEIANUS 5678. formerly belonged to a Jesuit College at Agen: it is written on paper, in the fifteenth century, and contains the Apocalypse with the works attributed to Dionysius the Areopagite. The readings of this manuscript were communicated to Griesbach by Dr. Paulus.

32. The CODEx DRESDENSIS (formerly Loescherianus) contains the Apocalypse written on vellum, according to Matthæi, in the fifteenth century, though others refer it to the twelfth or thirteenth century. Scholz states that it is a manuscript of the highest character, having been written by a learned and accurate Greek. These four manuscripts, 29—32., almost always agree with each other, and with Cod. 9., 14., and some others.

33. (Gosp. 218. Acts 65. Paul. Ep. 57.) The CODEx CÆSAREO-VINDOBONENSIS 23. (Lambecii 1.), described in page 248. No. 218., is imperfect from chap. xx. 7. to the end.

34. (Acts 66. Paul. Ep. 67.) The CODEx CÆSAREO-VINDOBONENSIS 302. (Lambecii 34.), described in page 263*. No. 66., is imperfect in chap. xv. 6. to xvii. 3.; xviii. 10. to xix. 9.; and xx. 8. to the end.

35. The CODEx CÆSAREO-VINDOBONENSIS 307. (Lambecii 248.), written on vellum in the fourteenth century, besides other pieces, contains the Apocalypse with the commentary of Andreas Cretensis.

36. The CODEx VIENNENSIS (Forlosiæ 29. and Kollarii 26.) ends with chap. xix. 20. It is written on vellum, of the fourteenth century, and also has the commentary of Andreas Cretensis. The MSS. 33. to 36. were first collated by Alter: the readings of 37. to 46. were published by Dr. Birch; and Nos. 38. to 44. were further collated by Scholz.

38. The CODEx VATICANUS 579., written on cotton paper, in the thirteenth century, contains the Apocalypse with some writings of the fathers: it mostly agrees with the Alexandrine recension.

39. (Paul. Ep. 85.) The CODEx VATICANUS 1136., described in page 270*. No. 85., is imperfect in chap. i. 1. to v. 7., and vi. 18. to xiii. 11.

40. (Gosp. 111. Acts 75. Paul. Ep. 86.) The CODEx VATICANUS 1160. is described in page 247. No. 141.

41. The CODEx ALEXANDRINO-VATICANUS 68., written on paper in the fourteenth century, contains the Apocalypse, to which are prefixed some extracts from Oecumenius and Andreas on that book.

42. (Acts 80. Paul. Ep. 91.) The CODEx PIO-VATICANUS 50. is a manuscript of the twelfth century.

43. The CODEx BARBERINIANUS 23., written on vellum in the fourteenth century, contains Rev. xiv. 17. to xviii. 20. with a commentary, and the Pentateuch, Joshua, and Judges, with a catena. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

44. (Acts 82. Paul. Ep. 92.) The CODEx BORGIÆ 4. is written on vellum, of the thirteenth century.

45. (Acts 89. Paul. Ep. 99.) The CODEx LAURENTIANUS IV. 32. is described in page 264*. No. 89.

46. (Gosp. 209. Acts 95. Paul. Ep. 108.) The CODEx VENETIANUS 10., described in page 248. No. 209., appears (according to Scholz) to be a copy of No. 88. (the Codex Venetus or Venetianus 5.)

47. (Gosp. 211. Acts 104. Paul. Ep. 120.) The CODEx DRESDENSIS (k. of Matthæi) is described in page 249. No. 241.

48. (Gosp. 242. Acts 105. Paul. Ep. 121.) The CODEx S. SYNODI MOSQUENSIS (l. of Matthæi) is described in page 249. No. 242., with which compare page 264*. note 1.

49. The CODEx S. SYNODI 67. (o. of Matthæi), written on paper in the fourteenth century, contains the Apocalypse with the commentaries of Andreas and Gregory of Nazianzum. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

50. The CODEx S. SYNODI 206. (p. of Matthæi), written partly on paper and partly on vellum in the twelfth century, contains the Apocalypse and some lives of the saints.

50². A manuscript in the Library of the Synod at Moscow, written on vellum in the tenth century, contains the Apocalypse. The MSS. 47. to 50². were all collated by Matthæi.

iii. Manuscripts collated for the first time by Dr. Scholz.

51. (Gosp. 18. Acts 113. Paul. Ep. 132.) The CODEx REGIUS 47. is described in page 239. No. 18. The text of the Apocalypse very often differs from the Alexandrine recension. The whole was collated by Scholz.

52. (Acts 51. Paul. Ep. 133.) The CODEx REGIUS 56., described in page 263*. No. 51., is mutilated in chap. xxii. 17—21. This and the following manuscripts, to No. 67. inclusive, were cursorily collated.

53. (Acts 116. Paul. Ep. 137.) The CODEx REGIUS 59. is described in page 265*. No. 116.

54. (Gosp. 263. Acts 117. Paul. Ep. 137.) The CODEx REGIUS 61. is described in page 250. No. 263.

56. (Acts 119. Paul. Ep. 139.) The CODEx REGIUS 102. A. is described in page 265*. No. 119.

57. (Acts 124. Paul. Ep. 149.) The CODEx REGIUS 124. is described in page 265*. No. 124.

58. The CODEx REGIUS 19., formerly Colbertinus, written on paper in the sixteenth century, contains the Apocalypse, Job, and Justin's Exhortation to the Greeks: it agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

59. The CODEx REGIUS 99., written on paper in the sixteenth century, contains the Apocalypse with a commentary: it follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

60. (Paul. Ep. 152.) The CODEx REGIUS 136., is described in page 271*. No. 152.

61. The CODEx REGIUS 191., written on cotton paper in the thirteenth century, contains the Apocalypse (imperfect), besides various treatises of Basil, Theodoret, and Maximus. It follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

62, 63. The CODEx REGIUS 239. and 240. and the Cod. Reg. 241. (formerly Thuanens, afterwards Colbertinus) are both written on paper in the sixteenth century: they contain Andreas's commentary on the Apocalypse, and agree with the Constantinopolitan recension.

64. (Paul. Ep. 159.) The CODEx REGIUS 221. is described in page 272*. No. 159.

65. A Manuscript (No. 25.) belonging to the university of Moscow (formerly Coislinius 229.) written on vellum, contains Rev. xvi. 20. to the end, besides some other pieces: it agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

67. The CODEx VATICANUS 1743., written on vellum in the year 1302, contains the Apocalypse with Andreas's commentary: it agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

68. The CODEx VATICANUS 1904., written on vellum in the eleventh century, contains Rev. vii. 17. to viii. 12. and xx. 1. to the end, with some other passages which are misplaced by the bookbinder, the commentary of Aretas, and various fragments of heathen and Christian writers. The text agrees with that of the Codex Alexandrinus. Nearly the whole of it was collated.

69. (Acts 161. Paul. Ep. 198.) The CODEx VATICANO-OTTOBONIANUS 258. is described in page 266*. No. 161. It is imperfect at the end. In the Apocalypse this manuscript mostly agrees with the Alexandrine recension: nearly the whole of it was collated.

70. (Gosp. 336. Acts 151. Paul. Ep. 199.) The CODEx VATICANO-OTTOBONIANUS 66. is described in pp. 253, 254. No. 386.

71. (Gosp. 390. Acts 164. Paul. Ep. 203.) The CODEx VATICANO-OTTOBONIANUS 381. is described in page 254. No. 390.

72. The CODEx GHIGIANUS R. IV. 8., written on paper in the sixteenth century, contains the Apocalypse with the commentary of Aretas. Its text agrees with that of the Alexandrine Manuscript.

73. The manuscript numbered 398. in the Corsini Library, written on paper in the sixteenth century, contains the Apocalypse with the commentary of Andreas: it mostly agrees with the text of recent manuscripts.

74. (Acts 140. Paul. Ep. 215.) The CODEx VENETUS 546. is described in page 266*. No. 140.

75. (Acts 86. Paul. Ep. 96.) The CODEx LAURENTIANUS IV. 20. is described in page 264*. No. 86.

76. (Acts 147. Paul. Ep. 183.) The CODEx LAURENTIANUS IV. 30. is described in page 266*. No. 147.

77. The CODEx LAURENTIANUS VII. 9., written on paper in the sixteenth century, with the commentary of Aretas, agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was cursorily collated.

78. (Paul. Ep. 197.) The CODEx OTTOBONIANUS 176. is described in page 272*. No. 197.

79. The CODEx MONACENSIS 248., written on paper in the sixteenth century, contains the Apocalypse with the commentary of Andreas. It was collated by Frederic Sylburgius for his edition of the Apocalypse with that commentary and the Latin version of Theodore Peltanus printed at Heidelberg in 1596. Its text does not vary from that of Andreas.

80. The CODEx MONACENSIS 544. (Augustanus 7. of Bengel) formerly belonged to the Greek Emperor Manuel is written on cotton paper, in the fourteenth century, and contains the text of the Apocalypse with Andreas's commentary. Scholz collated it in select passages.

81. The CODEX MONACENSIS 23., on paper, written in the sixteenth century, also contains the Apocalypse with Andreas's Commentary, in addition to the works of Gregory bishop of Nyssa. This manuscript was consulted by Plattanus for his edition of Andreas, printed at Ingoldstadt in 1547. 4to.

82. (Acts 179. Paul. Ep. 128.) The CODEX MONACENSIS 211. is described in page 267*. No. 179. In the Apocalypse the text of this manuscript agrees with Cod. 2. Nearly the whole of it was collated.

83. (Gosp. 339. Acts 135. Paul. Ep. 170.) The CODEX TAURINENSIS 302. c. II. 5. is described in page 252. No. 339. Its text very seldom differs from that of the Cod. Alexandrinus and Cod. Ephremi.

84. (Gosp. 368. Acts 150. Paul. Ep. 232.) The CODEX RICHARDIANUS 84., described in page 266*. No. 150., was cursorily collated.

85. (Acts 184. Paul. Ep. 231.) A manuscript, No. 9., in the great Greek Monastery at Jerusalem: it is described in page 268*. No. 184.

86. The manuscript numbered 10. in the Greek monastery of St. Saba, contains the New Testament written on vellum in the fourteenth century.

86*. Another manuscript numbered 20., in the same library, contains the New Testament written on vellum in the thirteenth century: it was cursorily collated by Scholz.

87 (Acts 178. Paul. Ep. 242.) The CODEX MEERMANIANUS 118.: it is described in page 267*. No. 178.

88. (Gosp. 205. Acts 93. Paul. Ep. 106.) The CODEX VENETUS 5. is described in page 264*. No. 93

§ 8. MANUSCRIPTS CONTAINING LECTIONARIES OR LESSONS FROM THE ACTS AND EPISTLES.

i. Manuscripts cited by preceding Editors of the New Testament.

1. (Evangelisterium 6. Paul. Ep. 1.) The CODEX BIBLIOTHECÆ LUGDUNO-BATAVÆ 243., described in page 256. No. 6., agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

2. The CODEX COTTONIANUS, Vespasian. B. XVIII. contains portions from the Gospels, Acts, and Epistles, appointed to be read on holydays: this manuscript is referred to the eleventh century.

3. Of Griesbach's Notation is the Lectionarium Bodleianum 5., cited by Dr. Mill on Heb. x. 22, 23. But Scholz has designated with this number a manuscript formerly in the Library of Trinity Hall, Cambridge, (for it is now lost). It was written on vellum in the eleventh century, and contained lessons from 1 Pet. and 1 John, the readings of which were communicated to Mill by Dr. John Batteley.

4. The CODEX LAURENTIANUS, formerly belonging to St. Mark's Library at Florence, contains lessons from the Acts and Epistles, written in the eleventh century.

5. (6. of Griesbach's Notation.) The CODEX GOTTINGENSIS 2., in the University Library at Gottingen, formerly belonged to Cæsar de Missy, contains lessons from the Acts and Epistles, written on vellum in the fifteenth century. This lectionary was collated by Matthæi, who cited it by the letter V.

*5. Of Griesbach's Notation, is the CODEX BODLEIANUS 296., described in page 257. No. 30., and containing fragments of a lectionary.

6. (*4. of Griesbach's Notation.) The CODEX HARLEIANUS 5731., (Gosp. 117.) described in page 245. No. 117., also contains fragments of a lectionary, which very seldom

* Those manuscripts which are not specified as being written in uncial letters, are to be understood as being written in cursive or ordinary Greek characters deviates from the received text. It was collated by Griesbach.

7. (Evangelist. 37.) A manuscript, No. 287. in the Library of the Propaganda at Rome, described in page 257. No. 37.

8. (Evangelist. 44.) The CODEX HAUNIENSIS 3. was written in the fifteenth century: it follows the Constantinopolitan recension.

9, 10. (Evangelist. 84, 85.) The CODICES REGII 32^a. and 33^a., are noticed in page 258. No. 84. They were both cursorily collated by Scholz.

11. The CODEX REGIUS 104^a. is a manuscript of the twelfth century, well written by some one in a monastery in Palestine: it contains lessons from the Acts of the Apostles, the Epistles, and the Apocalypse, with Arabic notes inserted in the margin. It mostly agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

12. (Evangelist. 60.) The CODEX REGIUS 375. is described in page 258. No. 60.: it abounds with errors.

13. The CODEX MOSQUENSIS S. SYNODI 4. (b. of Matthæi) contains lessons from the Acts and Epistles written in the tenth century: it was renovated by a monk named Joakim, A. M. 7033. (A. D. 1525). This and the following Lectionaries to 20. inclusive follow the Constantinopolitan recension, and were collated by Matthæi.

14. The CODEX S. SYNODI 291. (e. of Matthæi), written on vellum in the twelfth century, was brought from mount Athos.

15. The CODEX MOSQUENSIS TYPOGRAPHÆI SYNOD. 31., (z. of Matthæi) contains lessons from the New Testament, written on vellum in the year 1176.

16—20. The EVANGELISTERIA 52—56., described in page 257. Nos. 52—56.

ii. Manuscripts of Lectionaries collated for the first time by Dr. Scholz.

21. The CODEX REGIUS 294. (Evangelist. 63.), written in the eleventh century, agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

22. The CODEX REGIUS 304., written on vellum in the thirteenth century, was brought from Constantinople into the Royal Library at Paris. It contains lessons taken from the Acts and Epistles, and for the most part agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, though it has many Alexandrine readings. This manuscript was cursorily collated.

23. The CODEX REGIUS 306., written on vellum in the twelfth century, is mutilated at the beginning and end. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was cursorily collated.

24. The CODEX REGIUS 308., written on vellum in the thirteenth century, contains lessons from the Old Testament and three portions from the first Epistle of St. John. The text agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. This manuscript is imperfect.

25. The CODEX REGIUS 319., (formerly Colbertinus 1365.) is inelegantly written on vellum in the eleventh century. Sometimes the Latin interpretation is written over the Greek words. The text for the most part agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, but it has some Alexandrine readings: it was collated in select passages.

26. The CODEX REGIUS 320., formerly 2469., written on vellum in the twelfth century, is imperfect: it agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was cursorily collated.

27. The CODEX REGIUS 321., formerly 2470^a, (Colbertinus 1571.), an imperfect lectionary written on vellum in the thirteenth century: it agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in 1 John and some other passages.

28. The CODEx BODLEIANUS 3390. (Evangelist. 26.) is described in page 257. No. 26.

29. The CODEx REGIUS 330. (Evangelist. 94.) is described in page 258. No. 91. To the euchologium which is appended to this lectionary there are added some lessons from the Gospels and Epistles, especially that to the Hebrews, and part of the Greek Ecclesiastical Office, written by a later hand in the fifteenth century.

30. The CODEx REGIUS 373., written on vellum (but with a few leaves at the end on cotton paper) in the thirteenth century, is imperfect at the beginning and end. The text agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was collated in select passages.

32. The CODEx REGIUS 376. (Gosp. 324. Evangelist. 97.) is described in page 252. No. 324. In the lessons from the Acts and Epistles the text very rarely differs from the received text: it was collated in 1 and 2 Tim., and cursorily examined for the remainder.

33. The CODEx REGIUS 382., formerly 3015. (Colbertinus 4149.), written on vellum in the thirteenth century, for the most part agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. The chief part of this manuscript was cursorily collated.

34. The CODEx REGIUS 383., formerly 3012. (Colbertinus 3855.), written on paper in the fourteenth century, frequently agrees with the Constantinopolitan, but more frequently with the Alexandrine recension. It was cursorily collated.

37. The CODEx RICHARDIANUS 81. (Gosp. 368. Acts 150.) is described in page 253. No. 368.

38. The CODEx VATICANUS 1528., written on vellum in the sixteenth century, agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension, and was cursorily examined.

39. The CODEx VATICANO-OTTOBONIANUS 416. (Evangelist. 133.), written on paper in the fourteenth century, was collated in select passages: it agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

40. The CODEx BARBERINIANUS 18., is a Codex Rescriptus, very correctly executed on vellum in the tenth century. The ancient writing contains lessons from the Acts and Epistles, and is in many places so obliterated as to be illegible: the more modern writing (of the fourteenth century) contains lessons from the Old Testament, and at the end there are some taken from the Catholic or General Epistles. The text throughout agrees with that of the Constantinopolitan recension.

41. A CODEx BARBERINIANUS (not numbered), written on vellum in the eleventh century. The first hundred and eleven folios are wanting. This manuscript agrees with the Constantinopolitan family, and was collated in select passages.

42. The CODEx VALLICELLIANUS C. 46., besides other extracts, contains lessons taken from the Acts and Epistles, which were written in the sixteenth century.

43. The CODEx RICHARDIANUS 2742., at Florence: the age of this lectionary is not stated by Scholz.

44, 45. The CODICES GLASGUENSES, formerly MISSYANI 8B. and CC., (or Nos. 1663. and 1634. of the Sale Catalogue of the Rev. Cæsar de Missy, from whom they took their name) are now in the Hunterian Museum at Glasgow. They are both written on vellum, and contain lessons from the Acts and Epistles. No. 45. was written in the year 1199.

46. The CODEx AMBROSIANUS 63., written on vellum in the fourteenth century, for the most part agrees with the Alexandrine recension.

47. (Evangelist. 104.) The CODEx } are described in

49. A manuscript, numbered 16. in the LIBRARY OF THE MONASTERY OF ST. SABA, written on paper in the fourteenth century. This and the five following MSS. were cursorily collated, and agree with the Constantinopolitan recension.

50. A manuscript in the same library, No. 18.: it is written on vellum, of the fifteenth century.

51. A manuscript on vellum, in the same library, No. 26., written in the fourteenth century.

52. A manuscript on vellum, in the same library, (not numbered), written in July, 1059, by one Sergius, a monk in the monastery named Theotokos (in honour of the Virgin Mary).

53. A manuscript in the same library, No. 4. (Evangelist. 160.) is described in page 260. No. 160. It was written by one Antoly, a monk in the above named monastery.

54. A manuscript in the same library (not numbered), written in the thirteenth century.

55. (Evangelist. 179.) The CODEx S. SIMEONIS, in the Library of the Cathedral of Triers in Germany, is described in page 260. No. 179.

56. The CODEx BIBLIOTHECÆ GYMNASII FRANCOFURTENSIS, formerly Seidelianus, (Acts 42. Paul. Ep. 48. Apoc. 13.) is described in page 262*. No. 42. After the Apocalypse is a leaf of a lectionary, containing Matt. xvii. 16—22., and 1 Cor. ix. 2—12.

57. (Apoc. 26.) The CODEx WAKIANUS 1. is described in page 274*. No. 26. The lessons taken from the Gospels, Acts, and Epistles, were first collated by Dr. Scholz.

58. The CODEx WAKIANUS 5. in the Library of Christ's College, contains lessons from the Acts and Epistles, written A. D. 1171: it consists of two hundred and sixty-five folios, with two columns in a page. In some pages the ink has disappeared from the ravages of time.

§ 9. NOTICES OF MANUSCRIPTS WHICH HAVE BEEN HITHERTO ONLY SLIGHTLY OR NOT AT ALL EXAMINED.

I. The Codex San-Gallensis.—II. The Codices Manners-Suttonian.—III. The Codices Burneyani.—IV. The Codices Butleriani.—V. Other Manuscripts existing in various Libraries.

HOWEVER minute the researches of Dr. Scholz and his predecessors have been, many manuscripts, it appears, yet remain to be collated. At Moscow alone there is still an ample field for critical research, in the manuscripts preserved in the Patriarchal Library in that city, none of which (Dr. Henderson states) have been fully collated. To this class may be referred the Codex Ebnerianus, described in page 244., and the manuscripts of which some account is now to be given.

I. The CODEx SAN-GALLENSIS derives its name from the abbey of St. Gall in Switzerland, in the library of which it is preserved. This manuscript contains the four Gospels, which are written on vellum of unequal thickness, and with ink of various shades of colour, sometimes black, sometimes yellowish, and sometimes of a tawny brown. Many of the leaves are much torn, and others are much soiled with dust and dirt. In almost every line one or more letters are twice as large as the rest, and are ornamented with red, violet, yellow, or green. The Codex San-Gallensis consists of three hundred and ninety-five pages, the two first of which are filled by a poem of Hilary, Bishop of Arles, concerning the Gospel. From the differences occurring in the handwriting, Dr. Rettig (from whose prolegomena to his accurate lithographed fac-simile of this manuscript published at Zurich in 1836, this notice is abridged) has shown that it is unquestionably the work of several copyists, written at different times, and that it was finished during the administration of Hartmotus, abbot of St. Gall, who died A. D. 984. During that period the ancient Scottish handwriting prevailed in Switzerland, many learned Scotsmen having settled there. This manuscript may therefore be referred to the ninth or tenth century: from its general resemblance—not to say coincidence—with the handwriting of the Codex Boernerianus of the Epistles (described in page 233.), it is not improbable that these two manuscripts originally formed two parts of the same volume. Dr. Scholz could not obtain permission to collate the Codex San-Gallensis: he has noted it with the letter Δ, having cited it on John viii. from Gerbert's Travels, published in 1773, who first appears to have inspected it; and from the readings there given he considers it as following the Alexandrine recension.

II. The CODICES MANNERS-SUTTONIANI are a choice collection of manuscripts, in the archiepiscopal library at Lambeth, which were purchased and presented to that library by Archbishop Dr. Charles Manners Sutton. They are principally the collection made by the Rev. J. D. Carlyle, Professor of Arabic in the University of Cambridge, during his travels in the East, with a view to a critical edition of the New Testament, with various readings: which, however, was never undertaken, in consequence of his decease.¹ Of these manuscripts (which are chiefly of the New Testament) the following are particularly worthy of notice, on account of the harvest of various lections which they may be expected to afford:—

1. No. 1175. is a manuscript of the four Gospels, written on vellum, in quarto, towards the end of the eleventh or at the beginning of the twelfth century. The two first verses of the first chapter of St. Matthew's Gospel are wanting. At the end of this manuscript, on a single leaf, there are part of the last verse of the seventh chapter of Saint John's Gospel and the first eleven verses of the eighth chapter.

2. No. 1176. is another manuscript of the four Gospels, on vellum, in quarto, written in the twelfth century. On the first leaf there are some figures painted and gilt, which have nearly disappeared from age. This is followed by the chapters of the four Gospels.

3. No. 1177. is a manuscript of the four Gospels, on vellum, of the twelfth century, which is very much mutilated in the beginning.

4. No. 1178. contains the four Gospels, most beautifully written on vellum, in quarto, in the tenth century. The first seven verses and part of the eighth verse of the first chapter of Saint Matthew's Gospel are wanting.

5. No. 1179. contains the four Gospels, mutilated at the beginning and end. It is on vellum, in quarto, of the twelfth century.

6—8. Nos. 1182, 1183, and 1185. are manuscripts, containing the Acts of the Apostles, the Catholic Epistles, and the whole of Saint Paul's Epistles. They are all written in quarto and on paper. No. 1182. is of the twelfth century: the conclusion of St. John's First Epistle, and the subsequent part of this manuscript to the end, have been added by a later hand. No. 1183. is of the fourteenth century. No. 1185. is of the fifteenth century, and is mutilated at the end.

9. No. 1186. is a quarto manuscript on vellum, written in the eleventh century, and contains the Epistles of Saint Paul and the Apocalypse. It is unfortunately mutilated at the beginning and end. It commences with Rom. xvi. 15. . . . πτω (that is, Ολυμπία) και τους συν αυτους παντας αγιους, — . . . pas (that is Olympas) and all the saints which are with them: and it ends with the words, επι τω θρονω λεγοντες Αμην,—on the throne, saying, Amen. Rev. xix. 4. The Rev. H. J. Todd has given a fac-simile of this precious manuscript in his Catalogue of the Manuscripts in the Archiepiscopal Library at Lambeth.

10—12. Nos. 1187—1189. are evangelisteria or lessons from the four Gospels, written on vellum in the thirteenth century.

¹ Six of these precious MSS. having been reclaimed by the Patriarch of Jerusalem, as having been lent only to Professor Carlyle, they were returned to him in 1817, by his Grace the ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY. Full particulars relative to this transaction, so honourable to the noble and munificent character of the Primate of all England, may be seen in the Rev. H. J. Todd's "Account of Greek Manuscripts, chiefly Biblical, which had been in the Possession of the late Professor Carlyle, the greater part of which are now deposited in the Archiepiscopal Library at Lambeth Palace." London. [1818.] 8vo.

13. No. 1190. is a manuscript on vellum, written with singular neatness in the thirteenth century. Formerly it contained the Acts of the Apostles, and the Catholic Epistles, together with the whole of Saint Paul's Epistles. It is sadly mutilated and torn, both in the middle and at the end.

14. No. 1191. is a lectionary, from the Acts of the Apostles and the Epistles. It is on vellum, in quarto, of the thirteenth century. It is mutilated both at the beginning and end. All the preceding manuscripts were brought by Professor Carlyle from the Greek islands.

15—17. Nos. 1194, 1195, and 1196. are lectionaries from the Acts of the Apostles and Epistles. They are on vellum, in quarto, and were written in the thirteenth century. No. 1194. is mutilated at the end: the writing of this manuscript is singularly neat, and many of the letters are gilt. No. 1195. is also mutilated at the beginning, and No. 1196. at the end.

18. No. 1192. is a very beautiful manuscript of the four Gospels, in quarto, written on vellum in the thirteenth century.

19. No. 1193. is a lectionary from the four Gospels, also written on vellum, in the thirteenth century. It is mutilated at the end. The six last manuscripts, Nos. 1191—1196., were brought from Syria.²

III. The CODICES BURNEIANI form part of the Collection of Classical and other Ancient Manuscripts, now deposited in the Library of the British Museum. They were purchased, under the sanction of parliament, of the representatives of the late Rev. Dr. Charles Burney, in the year 1818. In this collection there are many valuable Greek and Latin manuscripts of the Scriptures. The following are those which contain the New Testament, entire or in part, which do not appear to have been hitherto collated:—

1. No. 18. contains the four Gospels, elegantly written on vellum, by one Joasaph, in the year 6874., or A. D. 1366. The letters in the first pages of the sections are of gold. To each Gospel is prefixed an index of chapters; and a synaxarion, or table of ecclesiastical lessons from the Epistles is subjoined.

2. No. 19. is a manuscript of the four Gospels, written on vellum in the eleventh century. It has pictures of the evangelists and ornaments prefixed to the sections. This manuscript formerly belonged to the library of San Lorenzo in the Escorial.

3. No. 20. is a manuscript of the four Gospels, on vellum, written by one Theophylus, a monk, in the year 6793, or A. D. 1285. It has pictures of the evangelists, and the Eusebian canons are prefixed. There are also arguments, and tables of the chapters of the several Gospels: and at the end there is an eclogadion of the four Gospels, that is, a table of the beginning and end of each Gospel throughout the year, together with a synaxarion.

4. No. 21. is a manuscript of the four Gospels, very neatly written on paper by one Theodore, a monk, in the year 6800, or A. D. 1292.

5. No. 22. is an evangelisterium, on vellum, written in 1330.

6. No. 23. is an imperfect manuscript, on vellum, containing the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke, and John i.—viii. 14. It was probably written in the twelfth century.³ A synaxarion and the epistle of Eusebius to Carpianus are prefixed, with tables of the chapters of the several Gospels.

IV. The CODICES BUTLERIANI are a choice collection of manuscripts in the library of the Rt. Rev. Samuel Butler, D.D., Bishop of Lichfield, to whom the author is indebted for the following critical notices of them.

1. NOVUM TESTAMENTUM, GRÆCE. This manuscript is a very thick octavo, of the twelfth century, on vellum. It contains the whole of the New Testament, except the Apoca-lype, and has, generally, the best readings. At the beginning it has the Eusebian canons; and at the end there are several Psalms and extracts from the Old Testament. This manuscript is written in a small clear black character, with a few illuminations; one of which (among the Psalms and extracts from the Old Testament) is a representation of David slaying Goliath, who is bearing the kite-shaped shield, which went out of use about the middle of the twelfth century. This manuscript has not been collated.

2. NOVUM TESTAMENTUM, Græce. It is a large folio volume, on vellum, containing the entire text of the New Testament, including the Apocalypse, and is written in a fine bold hand, with stops and accents throughout: the initial letters and running titles at the top, and often at the bottom of each page, are in characters of gold. It has the Eusebian τίτλοι and κρίσεις in the margins, and a collection of the whole before each book, in gold letters. The Gospels are placed first: to that of St. Matthew is prefixed a table of ecclesiastical lessons. To the Gospels succeeds the Acts of the Apostles, the seven Catholic Epistles, and the Epistles of Saint Paul, at the end of which is the date, Oct. 11 1368. Last of all comes the Apocalypse. The disputed clause in 1 John v. 7. is omitted. This most splendid manuscript, which is uninjured by worm or damp, is marked in Griesbach's Prolegomena, (sect. vii.) No. 107. and 201. It has been very imperfectly collated.

3. QUATUOR EVANGELIA, Græce. This fine manuscript, which is a short thick folio on vellum, dated A. D. 1326, has not yet been collated: it is interesting, as having been brought to the Rev. Dr. Butler from Mount Sinai. It is in the original thick wooden binding, ornamented with silver knobs, which (it is believed) are designed to represent pomegranate flowers. This manuscript is written in a bold hand, with black ink, and is illuminated with rude portraits of the Evangelists.

4. QUATUOR EVANGELIA, Græce. This manuscript, written on cotton paper, in quarto, is of the latter part of the fifteenth century. It is evidently the work of two different transcribers, and has not been collated.

5. EVANGELISTERIUM, Græce. This manuscript is a fine folio volume, on vellum, of the eleventh century: it was brought from Constantinople, and has not yet been collated.

6. SOME FRAGMENTS OF THE GOSPEL OF SAINT MATTHEW, comprised in six leaves of vellum, in small folio, of the twelfth century. They are beautifully written in double columns.

V. Although the industry of Dr. Scholz and his predecessors, who have correctly collated manuscripts of the New Testament, has left but few unexplored, yet the industry and research of Dr. Haenel have enabled him to point out some which have never yet been collated. The following notices of Greek manuscripts are collected by Scholz, from his *Catalogus Librorum Manuscriptorum*², in which elaborate compilation the libraries are alphabetically arranged in order of the places where the manuscripts are preserved.

1. The Codex Bibliothecæ Atræratensis (a manuscript at Arras, in France) contains the New Testament, written on vellum in the fifteenth century.

2. The Codex Bibliothecæ Carpentoractensis (at Carpentras, in the south of France) contains the New Testament, written on vellum in the sixth century, in uncial characters.

3. The Codex Bibliothecæ Saint Genovefæ A. 4. 35. (at Paris) contains an ancient Greek copy of Saint Paul's Epistles to the Romans and Corinthians.

4. The Codex Bibliothecæ Pictaviensis (at Poitiers) contains the New Testament written on paper. No date is assigned to this manuscript in Haenel's catalogue.

5. The Codex Bibliothecæ Basileensis B. VI. 29., on vellum, contains the Acts of the Apostles, the Catholic Epistles, and those of St. Paul.

6. The Codex Bibliothecæ Basileensis B. II. 5. contains the Acts and Epistles accurately written on vellum.

6. The Codices Escorialensis Bibliothecæ are six manuscripts in the library of the Escorial, which contain the Acts of the Apostles; one has the Apocalypse, and four have St. Paul's Epistles.

7. A manuscript (No. 207.) of an unknown library of manuscripts, of which John Lamy has given a catalogue in his Deliciae Eruditorum. It is said to contain the Gospels and Acts.

8. An Evangelisterium, written on vellum, in the Library of Besançon.

9. A manuscript in the Library of the Royal Institute at Paris, on vellum, containing the Gospel of St. John.

10. The Codex Glasguensis Bibliothecæ Q. 3. 35, 36., in the Hunterian Museum at Glasgow, contains an Evangelisterium written in the eleventh century. [This and the two following manuscripts were purchased by Dr. Hunter, at the sale of the Rev. Cæsar de Missy's library.]

11. The Codex Bibliothecæ Glasguensis Q. 122, 123 contains [two copies of] the four Gospels, written in the eleventh century.

12. The Codex Bibliothecæ Glasguensis S. 8. 141. contains the Gospel of St. John, together with the epistles of Brutus [written in the fifteenth century].

13. A manuscript in the library of Sir THOMAS PHILLIPS, Bart. of Middle Hill, in the county of Worcester, purchased by that gentleman at Ghent. It contains the Gospels written on vellum in the thirteenth century.

14. The Codex Bibliothecæ Edinburgensis Universitatis, is a manuscript of the four Gospels, in the Library of the University of Edinburgh, to which it was presented in 1650 by Sir John Chiesley, Knt., who brought it from the east. It is written on vellum, in octavo, in the eleventh century, and in the ordinary or cursive Greek characters: and it consists of one hundred and seventy-four leaves, besides sixteen leaves at the beginning which appear to be the titles of chapters. Prefixed to the Gospels of Matthew and Mark are the remains of two illuminations, upon a gold ground, representing one evangelist as writing and the other as holding up his gospel: but, with the exception of the heads, the design is almost wholly obliterated. In a manuscript catalogue of the University Library, written about the year 1700, Mr. Robert Henderson, the librarian at that time, states that its date is about the year 700: but the character of the writing (which is full of contractions) proves that it is not and cannot be anterior to the eleventh century. Either from damp, or from the bad quality of the ink, the writing of this manuscript is so frequently almost obliterated, as to render the collation of it extremely difficult: and, what in a critical point of view is far worse, the readings which might be obtained from such collation would often necessarily be conjectural.

15. The Codex Bibliothecæ Toletanæ (Toledo, in Spain) contains the four Gospels, written in the fourteenth century.

SECTION III.

ON THE ANCIENT VERSIONS OF THE SCRIPTURES.

NEXT to manuscripts, VERSIONS afford the greatest assistance in ascertaining critically the sacred text, as well as in the interpretation of the Scriptures. "It is only by means of versions that they, who are ignorant of the original languages, can at all learn what the Scripture contains; and every version, so far as it is just, conveys the sense of Scripture to those who understand the language in which it is written."

Versions may be divided into two classes, ancient and modern: the former were made immediately from the original languages by persons to whom they were familiar; and who, it may be reasonably supposed, had better opportunities for ascertaining the force and meaning of words, than more recent translators can possibly have. Modern versions are those made in later times, and chiefly since the Reformation; they are useful for explaining the sense of the inspired writers, while ancient versions are of the utmost importance both for the criticism and interpretation of the Scriptures. The present section will therefore be appropriated to giving an account of these which are most esteemed for their antiquity and excellence.¹

The principal ANCIENT VERSIONS, which illustrate the Scriptures, are the Chaldee Paraphrases, generally called Targums, the Septuagint, or Alexandrian Greek Version, the translations of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion, and what are called the fifth, sixth, and seventh versions (of which latter translations fragments only are extant), together with the Syriac, and Latin or Vulgate versions. Although the authors of these versions did not flourish at the time when the Hebrew language was spoken, yet they enjoyed many advantages for understanding the Bible, especially the Old Testament, which are not possessed by the moderns; for, living near the time when that language was vernacular, they could learn by tradition the true signification of some Hebrew words, which is now forgotten. Many of them also being Jews, and from their childhood accustomed to hear the rabbins explain the Scriptures, the study of which they diligently cultivated, and likewise speaking a dialect allied to the Hebrew,—they could not but become well acquainted with the latter. Hence it may be safely inferred that the ancient versions generally give the true sense of Scripture, and not unfrequently in passages where it could scarcely be discovered by any other means. All the ancient versions, indeed, are of great importance both in the criticism, as well as in the interpretation, of the sacred writings, but they are not all witnesses of equal value; for the authority of the different versions depends partly on the age and country of their respective authors, partly on the text whence their translations were made, and partly on the ability and fidelity with which they were executed. It will therefore be not irrelevant to offer a short historical notice of the principal versions above mentioned, as well as of some other ancient versions of less celebrity perhaps, but which have been beneficially consulted by biblical critics.

§ I. ON THE TARGUMS, OR CHALDEE PARAPHRASES OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

I. Targum of Onkelos;—II. Of the Pseudo-Jonathan;—III. The Jerusalem Targum;—IV. The Targum of Jonathan Ben Uzziel;—V. The Targum on the Hagiographa;—VI. The Targum on the Megilloth;—VII. VIII. IX. Three Targums on the book of Esther;—X. A Targum on the books of Chronicles;—XI. Real value of the different Targums.

The Chaldee word תרגום (Targum) signifies, in general, any version or explanation; but this appellation is more particularly restricted to the versions or paraphrases of the Old Testament, executed in the East-Aramæan or Chaldee dialect, as it is usually called. These Targums are termed paraphrases or expositions, because they are rather comments and explications, than literal translations of the text: they are written in the Chaldee tongue, which became familiar to the Jews after the time of their captivity in Babylon, and was more known to them than the Hebrew itself: so that, when the law was “read in the synagogue every Sabbath-day,” in pure biblical Hebrew, an explanation was subjoined to it in Chaldee; in order to render it intelligible to the people, who had but an imperfect knowledge of the Hebrew language. This practice, as already observed, originated with Ezra:² as there are no traces of any written Targums prior to those of Onkelos and Jonathan, who are supposed to have lived about the time of our Saviour, it is highly probable that these paraphrases were at first merely oral; that, subsequently, the ordinary glosses on the more difficult passages were committed to writing; and that, as the Jews were bound by an ordinance of their elders to possess a copy of the law, these glosses were either afterwards collected together and deficiencies in them supplied, or new and connected paraphrases were formed.

There are at present extant ten paraphrases on different parts of the Old Testament, three of which comprise the Pentateuch, or five books of Moses:—1. The Targum of Onkelos; 2. That falsely ascribed to Jonathan, and usually cited as the Targum of the Pseudo-Jonathan; and, 3. The Jerusalem Targum; 4. The Targum of Jonathan Ben Uzziel. (i. e. the son of Uzziel), on the Prophets; 5. The Targum of Rabbi Joseph the blind, or one-eyed, on the Hagiographa; 6. An anonymous Targum on the five Megilloth, or books of Ruth, Esther, Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon, and the Lamentations of Jeremiah; 7, 8, 9. Three Targums on the book of Esther; and, 10. A Targum or paraphrase on the two books of Chronicles. These Targums, taken together, form a continued paraphrase on the Old Testament, with the exception of the books of Daniel, Ezra, and Nehemiah (anciently reputed to be part of Ezra); which being for the most part written in Chaldee, it has been conjectured that no paraphrases were written on them, as being unnecessary; though Dr. Prideaux is of opinion that Targums were composed on these books also, which have perished in the lapse of ages.

The language, in which these paraphrases are composed, varies in purity according to the time when they were respectively written. Thus, the Targums of Onkelos and the Pseudo-Jonathan are much purer than the others, approximating very nearly to the Aramæan dialect in which some parts of Daniel and Ezra are written, except, indeed, that the orthography does not always correspond; while the language of the later Targums whence the rabbinical dialect derives its source is far more impure, and is intermixed with barbarous and foreign words. Originally, all the Chaldee paraphrases were written without vowel-points, like all other oriental manuscripts; but at length some persons ventured to add points to them, though very erroneously, and this irregular punctuation was retained in the Venice and other early editions of the Hebrew Bible. Some further imperfect attempts towards regular pointing were made both in the Complutensian and in the Antwerp Polyglots, until at length the elder Buxtorf, in his edition of the Hebrew Bible published at Basil, undertook the thankless task³ of improving the punctuation of the Targums, according to such rules as he had formed from the pointing which he had found in the Chaldee parts of the books of Daniel and Ezra; and his method of punctuation is followed in Bishop Walton's Polyglott.

I. THE TARGUM OF ONKELOS.—It is not known, with certainty at what time Onkelos flourished, nor of what nation he was: Professor Eichhorn conjectures that he was a native of Babylon, first, because he is mentioned in the Babylonish Talmud; secondly, because his dialect is not the Chaldee spoken in Palestine, but much purer, and more closely resembling the style of Daniel and Ezra; and, lastly, because he has not interwoven any of those fabulous narratives to which the Jews of Palestine were so much attached, and from which they could with difficulty refrain. The generally received opinion is, that he was a proselyte to Judaism, and a disciple of the celebrated Rabbi Hillel, who flourished about fifty years before the Christian era; and consequently that Onkelos was contemporary with our Saviour: Bauer and Jahn, however, place him in the second century. The Targum of Onkelos comprises the Pentateuch of five books of Moses, and is justly preferred to all the others both by Jews and Christians, on account of the purity of its style, and its general freedom from idle legends. It is rather a version than a paraphrase, and renders the Hebrew text word for word, with so much musical accuracy and exactness, that being set to the same musical notes, with the original Hebrew, it could be read or cantillated in the same tone as the latter in the public assemblies of the Jews. And this we find was the practice of the Jews up to the time of Rabbi Elias Levita; who flourished in the early part of the sixteenth century, and expressly states that the Jews read the law in their synagogues, first in Hebrew and then in the Targum of Onkelos. This Targum has been translated into Latin by Alfonso de Zamora, Paulus Fagius, Bernardinus Baldus, and Andrew de Leon of Zamora.¹

II. The second Targum, which is a more liberal paraphrase of the Pentateuch than the preceding, is usually called the TARGUM OF THE PSEUDO-JONATHAN, being ascribed by many to Jonathan Ben Uzziel, who wrote the much esteemed paraphrase on the prophets. But the difference in the style and diction of this Targum, which is very impure, as well as in the method of paraphrasing adopted in it, clearly proves that it could not have been written by Jonathan Ben Uzziel, who indeed sometimes indulges in allegories, and has introduced a few barbarisms; but this Targum on the law abounds with the most idle Jewish legends that can well be conceived: which, together with the barbarous and foreign words it contains, render it of very little utility. From its mentioning the six parts of the Talmud (on Exod. xxvi. 9.), which compilation was not written till two centuries after the birth of Christ;—Constantinople (on Num. xxiv. 19.), which city was always called Byzantium until it received its name from Constantine the Great, in the beginning of the fourth century; the Lombards (on Num. xxiv. 21.), whose first irruption into Italy did not take place until the year 570; and the Turks (on Gen. x. 2.), who did not become conspicuous till the middle of the sixth century,—learned men are unanimously of opinion that this Targum of the Pseudo-Jonathan could not have been written before the seventh, or even the eighth century. It was probably compiled from older interpretations. This Chaldee paraphrase was translated into Latin by Anthony Ralph de Chevalier, an eminent French Protestant divine, in the sixteenth century.

III. The JERUSALEM TARGUM, which also paraphrases the five books of Moses, derives its name from the dialect in which it is composed. It is by no means a connected paraphrase, sometimes omitting whole verses, or even chapters; at other times explaining only a single word of a verse, of which it sometimes gives a twofold interpretation; and at others, Hebrew words are inserted without any explanation whatever. In many respects it corresponds with the paraphrase of the Pseudo-Jonathan, whose legendary tales are here frequently repeated, abridged, or expanded. From the impurity of its style, and the number of Greek, Latin, and Persian words which it contains, Bishop Walton, Carpzov, Wolfius, and many other eminent philologists, are of opinion, that it is a compilation by several authors, and consists of extracts and collections. From these internal evidences, the commencement of the seventh century has been assigned as its probable date; but it is more likely not to have been written before the eighth or perhaps the ninth century. This Targum was also translated into Latin by Chevalier and by Francis Taylor.

IV. The TARGUM OF JONATHAN BEN UZZIEL.—According to the talmudical traditions, the author of this paraphrase was chief of the eighty distinguished scholars of Rabbi Hillel the elder, and a fellow-disciple of Simcon the Just, who bore the infant Messiah in his arms: consequently he would be nearly contemporary with Onkelos. Wolfius,² however, adopts the opinion of Dr. Prideaux, that he flourished a short time before the birth of Christ, and compiled the work which bears his name, from more ancient Targums, that had been preserved to his time by oral tradition. From the silence of Origen and Jerome concerning this Targum, of which they could not but have availed themselves if it had really existed in their time, and also from its being cited in the Talmud, both Bauer and Jahn date it much later than is generally admitted: the former, indeed, is of opinion, that its true date cannot be ascertained; and the latter, from the inequalities of style and method observable in it, considers it as a compilation from the interpretations of several learned men, made about the close of the third or fourth century. This paraphrase treats on the Prophets, that is (according to the Jewish classification of the sacred writings), on the books of Joshua, Judges, 1 & 2 Sam. 1 & 2 Kings, who are termed the former prophets; and on Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve minor prophets, who are designated as the latter prophets. Though the style of this Targum is not so pure and elegant as that of Onkelos, yet it is not disfigured by those legendary tales and numerous foreign and barbarous words which abound in the latter Targums. Both the language and method of interpretation, however, are irregular: in the exposition of the former prophets, the text is more closely rendered than in that on the latter, which is less accurate, as well as more paraphrastic, and interspersed with some traditions and fabulous legends. In order to attach the greater authority to the Targum of Jonathan Ben Uzziel, the Jews, not satisfied with making him contemporary with the prophets Malachi, Zachariah, and Haggai, and asserting that he received it from their lips, have related, that while Jonathan was composing his paraphrase, there was an earthquake for forty leagues around him; and that if any bird happened to pass over him, or a fly alighted on his paper while writing, they were immediately consumed by fire from heaven, without any injury being sustained either by his person or his paper!! The whole of this Targum was translated into Latin by Alfonso de Zamora, Andrea de Leon, and Conrad Pellican; and the paraphrase on the twelve minor prophets, by Immanuel Tremellius.

V. The TARGUM ON THE CETUBIM, HAGIOGRAPHIA, or Holy Writings, is ascribed by some Jewish writers to Raf Jose, or Rabbi Joseph, surnamed the one-eyed or blind, who is said to have been at the head of the academy at Sora, in the third century; though others affirm that its author is unknown. The style is barbarous, impure, and very unequal, interspersed with numerous digressions and legendary narratives: on which account the younger Buxtorf, and after him Bauer and Jahn, are of opinion that the whole is a compilation of later times; and this sentiment appears to be the most correct. Dr. Prideaux characterizes its language as the most corrupt Chaldee of the Jerusalem dialect. The translators of the preceding Targum, together with Arias Montanus, have given a Latin version of this Targum.

VI. The TARGUM ON THE MEGILLOTH, or five books of Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs, Lamentations of Jeremiah, Ruth, and Esther, is evidently a compilation by several persons: the barbarism of its style, numerous digressions, and idle legends which are inserted, all concur to prove it to be of late date, and certainly not earlier than the sixth century. The paraphrase on the book of Ruth and the Lamentations of Jeremiah is the best executed portion: Ecclesiastes is more freely paraphrased; but the text of the Song of Solomon is absolutely lost amidst the diffuse circumscriptio of its author, and his dull glosses and fabulous additions.

VII. VIII. IX. The THREE TARGUMS ON THE BOOK OF ESTHER.—This book has always been held in the highest estimation by the Jews; which circumstance induced them to translate it repeatedly into the Chaldee dialect. Three paraphrases on it have been printed: one in the Antwerp Polyglott, which is much shorter and contains fewer digressions than the others; another in Bishop Walton's Polyglott which is more diffuse, and comprises more numerous Jewish fables and traditions; and a third, of which a Latin version was published by Francis Taylor; and which, according to Carpzov, is more stupid and diffuse than either of the preceding. They are all three of very late date.

X. A TARGUM ON THE BOOKS OF CHRONICLES, which for a long time was unknown both to Jews and Christians, was discovered in the library at Erfurt, belonging to the ministers of the Augsburg confession, by Matthias Frederick Beck; who published it in 1680, 3, 4, in two quarto volumes. Another edition was published at Amsterdam by the learned David Wilkins (1715, 4to.), from a manuscript in the university library at Cambridge. It is more complete than Beck's edition, and supplies many of its deficiencies. This Targum, however, is of very little value; like all the other Chaldee paraphrases, it blends legendary tales with the narrative, and introduces numerous Greek words, such as οχλος, συναγωγα, αγγελος, &c.

XI. Of all the Chaldee paraphrases above noticed, the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan Ben Uzziel are most highly valued by the Jews, who implicitly receive their expositions of doubtful passages. Shickhard, Mayer, Helvicus, Leusden, Hottinger, and Dr. Prideaux, have conjectured that some Chaldee Targum was in use in the synagogue where our Lord read Isa. lxi. 1, 2. (Luke iv. 17—19.); and that he quoted Psal. xxii. 1. when on the cross (Matt. xvii. 46.), not out of the Hebrew text, but out of a Chaldee paraphrase. But there does not appear to be sufficient ground for this hypothesis: for as the Chaldee or East Aramæan dialect was spoken at Jerusalem, it is at least as probable that Jesus Christ interpreted the Hebrew into the vernacular dialect in the first instance, as that he should have read from a Targum; and, when on the cross, it was perfectly natural that he should speak in the same language, rather than in the Biblical Hebrew; which, we have already seen, was cultivated and studied by the priests and Levites as a learned language. The Targum of Rabbi Joseph the Blind, in which the words cited by our Lord are to be found, is so long posterior to the time of his crucifixion, that it cannot be received as evidence. So numerous, indeed, are the variations, and so arbitrary are the alterations occurring in the manuscripts of the Chaldee paraphrases, that Dr. Kennicott has clearly proved them to have been designedly altered in compliment to the previously corrupted copies of the Hebrew text; or, in other words, that "alterations have been made wilfully in the Chaldee paraphrase to render that paraphrase, in some places, more conformable to the words of the Hebrew text, where those Hebrew words are supposed to be right, but had themselves been corrupted." But notwithstanding all their deficiencies and interpolations, the Targums, especially those of Onkelos and Jonathan, are of considerable importance in the interpretation of the Scriptures, not only as they supply the meanings of words or phrases occurring but once in the Old Testament, but also because they reflect considerable light on the Jewish rites, ceremonies, laws, customs, usages, &c. mentioned or alluded to in both Testaments. But it is in establishing the genuine meaning of particular prophecies relative to the Messiah, in opposition to the false explanations of the Jews and Antitrinitarians, that these Targums are pre-eminently useful. Bishop Walton, Dr. Prideaux, Pfeiffer, Carpov, and Rambach, have illustrated this remark by numerous examples. Bishop Patrick, and Drs. Gill and Clarke, in their respective Commentaries on the Bible, have inserted many valuable elucidations from the Chaldee paraphrases. Leusden recommends that no one should attempt to read their writings, nor indeed to learn the Chaldee dialect, who is not previously well-grounded in Hebrew: he advises the Chaldee text of Daniel and Ezra to be first read either with his own Chaldee Manual, or with Buxtorf's Hebrew and Chaldee Lexicon; after which the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan may be perused, with the help of Buxtorf's Chaldee and Syriac Lexicon, and of De Lara's work, De Conventia Vocabulorum Rabbinicorum cum Græcis et quibusdam aliis linguis Europæis. I. AMONG the Greek versions of the Old Testament, the ALEXANDRIAN or SEPTUAGINT, as it is generally termed, is the most ancient and valuable; and was held in so much esteem both by the Jews and by the first Christians, as to be constantly read in the synagogues and churches. Hence it is uniformly cited by the early fathers, whether Greek or Latin, and from this version all the translations into other languages, which were anciently approved by the Christian church, were executed (with the exception of the Syriac), as the Arabic, Armenian, Ethiopic, Gothic, and Old Italic or the Latin Version in use before the time of Jerome; and to this day the Septuagint is exclusively read in the Greek and most other Oriental churches.³ This version has derived its name either from the Jewish account of seventy-two persons having been employed to make it, or from its having received the approbation of the Sanhedrin, or great council of the Jews, which consisted of seventy, or, more correctly, of seventy-two persons.—Much uncertainty, however, has prevailed concerning the real history of this ancient version; and while some have strenuously advocated its miraculous and divine origin, other eminent philologists have laboured to prove that it must have been executed by several persons and at different times.

1. According to one account, Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, caused this translation to be made for the use of the library which he had founded at Alexandria, at the request and with the advice of the celebrated Demetrius Phalereus, his principal librarian. For this purpose it is reported that he sent Aristeas and Andreas, two distinguished officers of his court, to Jerusalem, on an embassy to Eleazar, then high-priest of the Jews, to request of the latter a copy of the Hebrew Scriptures, and that there might also be sent to him seventy-two persons (six chosen out of each of the twelve tribes), who were equally well skilled in the Hebrew and Greek languages. These learned men were accordingly shut up in the island of Pharos: where, having agreed in the translation of each period after a mutual conference, Demetrius wrote down their version as they dictated it to him; and thus, in the space of seventy-two days, the whole was accomplished. This relation is derived from a letter ascribed to Aristeas himself, the authenticity of which has been greatly disputed. If, as there is every reason to believe is the case, this piece is a forgery, it was made at a very early period; for it was in existence in the time of Josephus, who has made use of it in his Jewish Antiquities. The veracity of Aristeas's narrative was not questioned until the seventeenth or eighteenth century: at which time, indeed, biblical criticism was, comparatively, in its infancy. Vives,⁴ Scaliger,⁵ Van Dale,⁶ Dr. Prideaux, and, above all, Dr. Hody,⁷ were the principal writers in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries who attacked the genuineness of the pretended narrative of Aristeas; and though it was ably vindicated by Bishop Walton,⁸ Isaac Vossius,⁹ Whiston,¹⁰ Brett,¹¹ and other modern writers, the majority of the learned in our own time are fully agreed in considering it as fictitious.

Philo, the Jew, who also notices the Septuagint version, was ignorant of most of the circumstances narrated by Aristeas; but he relates others which appear not less extraordinary. According to him, Ptolemy Philadelphus sent to Palestine for some learned Jews, whose number he does not specify: and these going over to the island of Pharos, there executed so many distinct versions, all of which so exactly and uniformly agreed in sense, phrases, and words, as proved them to have been not common interpreters; but men prophetically inspired and divinely directed, who had every word dictated to them by the Spirit of God throughout the entire translation. He adds that an annual festival was celebrated by the Alexandrian Jews in the Isle of Pharos, where the version was made, until his time, to preserve the memory of it, and to thank God for so great a benefit.¹²

Justin Martyr, who flourished in the middle of the second century, about one hundred years after Philo, relates¹³ a similar story, with the addition of the seventy interpreters being shut up each in his own separate cell (which had been erected for that purpose by order of Ptolemy Philadelphus); and that here they composed so many distinct versions, word for word, in the very same expressions, to the great admiration of the king; who, not doubting that this version was divinely inspired, loaded the interpreters with honours, and dismissed them to their own country, with magnificent presents. The good father adds, that the ruins of these cells were visible in his time. But this narrative of Justin's is directly at variance with several circumstances recorded by Aristæus; such, for instance, as the previous conference or deliberation of the translators, and, above all, the very important point of the version being dictated to Demetrius Phalerens. Epiphanius, a writer of the fourth century, attempts to harmonize all these accounts by shutting up the translators two and two, in thirty-six cells, where they might consider or deliberate, and by stationing a copyist in each cell, to whom the translators dictated their labours: the result of all which was the production of thirty-six inspired versions, agreeing most uniformly together.

It is not a little remarkable that the Samaritans have traditions in favour of their version of the Pentateuch equally extravagant with those preserved by the Jews. In the Samaritan Chronicle of Abul Phatach, which was compiled in the fourteenth century from ancient and modern authors both Hebrew and Arabic, there is a story to the following effect:—That Ptolemy Philadelphus, in the tenth year of his reign, directed his attention to the difference subsisting between the Samaritans and Jews concerning the law; the former receiving only the Pentateuch, and rejecting every other work ascribed to the prophets by the Jews. In order to determine this difference, he commanded the two nations to send deputies to Alexandria. The Jews intrusted this mission to Osar, the Samaritans to Jaron, to whom several other associates were added. Separate apartments, in a particular quarter of Alexandria, were assigned to each of these strangers; who were prohibited from having any personal intercourse, and each of them had a Greek scribe to write his version. Thus were the law and other Scriptures translated by the Samaritans; whose version being most carefully examined, the king was convinced that their text was more complete than that of the Jews. Such is the narrative of Abul Phatach, divested however of numerous marvellous circumstances, with which it has been decorated by the Samaritans; who are not surpassed even by the Jews in their partiality for idle legends.

A fact, buried under such a mass of fables as the translation of the Septuagint has been by the historians who have pretended to record it, necessarily loses all its historical character, which indeed we are fully justified in disregarding altogether. Although there is no doubt but that some truth is concealed under this load of fables, yet it is by no means an easy task to discern the truth from what is false: the following, however, is the result of our researches concerning this celebrated version:—

It is probable that the seventy interpreters, as they are called, executed their version of the Pentateuch during the joint reigns of Ptolemy Lagus, and his son Philadelphus. The Pseudo-Aristæus, Josephus, Philo, and many other writers, whom it were tedious to enumerate, relate that this version was made during the reign of Ptolemy II. or Philadelphus: Joseph Ben Gorion, however, among the rabbins, Theodoret, and many other Christian writers, refer its date to the time of Ptolemy Lagus. Now these two traditions can be reconciled only by supposing the version to have been performed during the two years when Ptolemy Philadelphus shared the throne with his father; which date coincides with the third and fourth years of the hundred and twenty-third olympiad, that is, about the years 286 and 285 before the vulgar Christian era. Further, this version was made neither by the command of Ptolemy, nor at the request nor under the superintendence of Demetrius Phalerens; but was voluntarily undertaken by the Jews for the use of their countrymen. It is well known, that, at the period above noticed, there was a great multitude of Jews settled in Egypt, particularly at Alexandria: these, being most strictly observant of the religious institutions and usages of their forefathers, had their Sanhedrin, or grand council, composed of seventy or seventy-two members, and very numerous synagogues, in which the law was read to them on every Sabbath; and as the bulk of the common people were no longer acquainted with biblical Hebrew (the Greek language alone being used in their ordinary intercourse), it became necessary to translate the Pentateuch into Greek for their use. This is a far more probable account of the origin of the Alexandrian version than the traditions above stated. If this translation had been made by public authority, it would unquestionably have been performed under the direction of the Sanhedrin; who would have examined, and perhaps corrected it, if it had been the work of a single individual, previously to giving it the stamp of their approbation, and introducing it into the synagogues. In either case the translation would, probably, be denominated the Septuagint, because the Sanhedrin was composed of seventy or seventy-two members. It is even possible that the Sanhedrin, in order to ascertain the fidelity of the work, might have sent to Palestine for some learned men, of whose assistance and advice they would have availed themselves in examining the version. This fact, if it could be proved (for it is offered as a mere conjecture), would account for the story of the king of Egypt's sending an embassy to Jerusalem. There is, however, one circumstance which proves that, in executing this translation, the synagogues were originally in contemplation, viz. that all the ancient writers unanimously concur in saying that the Pentateuch was first translated. The five books of Moses, indeed, were the only books read in the synagogues until the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria; who having forbidden that practice in Palestine, the Jews evaded his commands by substituting for the Pentateuch the reading of the prophetic books. When, afterwards, the Jews were delivered from the tyranny of the kings of Syria, they read the law and the prophets alternately in their synagogues; and the same custom was adopted by the Hellenistic or Græcizing Jews.

2. But whatever was the real number of the authors of the version, their introduction of Coptic words, (such as αἰρ, αἰ, μεμνην, &c.) as well as their rendering of ideas purely Hebrew altogether in the Egyptian manner, clearly prove that they were natives of Egypt. Thus they express the creation of the world, not by the proper Greek word κτίσις, but by ΓΕΝΕΣΙΣ, a term employed by the philosophers of Alexandria to express the origin of the universe. The Hebrew word Thummim (Exod. xxviii. 30.), which signifies perfections, they render ΑΛΗΘΕΙΑ, truth.¹ The difference of style also indicates the version to have been the work not of one but of several translators, and to have been executed at different times. The best qualified and most able among them was the translator of the Pentateuch, who was evidently master of both Greek and Hebrew: he has for the most part religiously followed the Hebrew text, and has in various instances introduced the most suitable and best chosen expressions. From the very close resemblance subsisting between the text of the Greek version and the text of the Samaritan Pentateuch, Louis de Dieu, Selden, Whiston, Hassenkamp, and Bauer, are of opinion that the author of the Alexandrian version made it from the Samaritan Pentateuch. And in proportion as these two correspond, the Greek differs from the Hebrew. This opinion is further supported by the declarations of Origen and Jerome, that the translator found the venerable name of Jehovah not in the letters in common use, but in very ancient characters; and also by the fact that those consonants in the Septuagint are frequently confounded together, the shapes of which are similar in the Samaritan, but not in the Hebrew alphabet. This hypothesis, however ingenious and plausible, is by no means determinate; and what militates most against it is, the inveterate enmity subsisting between the Jews and Samaritans, added to the constant and unvarying testimony of antiquity that the Greek version of the Pentateuch was executed by Jews. There is no other way by which to reconcile these conflicting opinions, than by supposing either that the manuscripts used by the Egyptian Jews approximated towards the letters and text of the Samaritan Pentateuch, or that the translators of the Septuagint made use of manuscripts written in ancient characters.²

Next to the Pentateuch, for ability and fidelity of execution, ranks the translation of the book of Proverbs, the author of which was well skilled in the two languages: Michaelis is of opinion that, of all the books of the Septuagint, the style of the Proverbs is the best, the translators having clothed the most ingenious thoughts in as neat and elegant language as was ever used by a Pythagorean sage, to express his philosophic maxims.³ The translator of the book of Job being acquainted with the Greek poets, his style is more elegant and studied; but he was not sufficiently master of the Hebrew language and literature, and consequently his version is very often erroneous. Many of the historical passages are interpolated; and in the poetical parts there are several passages wanting: Jerome, in his preface to the book of Job, specifies as many as seventy or eighty verses. These omissions were supplied by Origen from Theodotion's translation. The book of Joshua could not have been translated till upwards of twenty years after the death of Ptolemy Lagus: for, in chapter viii. verse 18., the translator has introduced the word paros, a word of Gallic origin, denoting a short dart or javelin peculiar to the Gauls, who made an irruption into Greece in the third year of the 125th olympiad, or B. C. 278.; and it was not until some time after that event that the Egyptian kings took Gallic mercenaries into their pay and service.

During the reign of Ptolemy Philometer, the book of Esther, together with the Psalms and Prophets, was translated. The subscription annexed to the version of Esther expressly states it to have been finished on the fourth year of that sovereign's reign, or about the year 177 before the Christian era: the Psalms and Prophets, in all probability, were translated still later, because the Jews did not begin to read them in their synagogues till about the year 170 before Christ. The Psalms and Prophets were translated by men every way unequal to the task: Jeremiah is the best executed among the Prophets; and next to this the books of Amos and Ezekiel are placed: the important prophecies of Isaiah were translated, according to Bishop Leath, upwards of one hundred years after the Pentateuch, and by a person by no means adequate to the undertaking; there being hardly any book of the Old Testament so ill rendered in the Septuagint as this of Isaiah, which (together with other parts of the Greek version) has come down to us in a bad condition, incorrect, and with frequent omissions and interpolations: and so very erroneous was the version of Daniel, that it was totally rejected by the ancient church, and Theodotion's translation was substituted for it. The Septuagint version of Daniel, which for a long time was supposed to have been lost, was discovered and published at Rome in 1772, from which it appears that its author had but an imperfect knowledge of the Hebrew language.

No date has been assigned for the translation of the books of Judges, Ruth, Samuel, and Kings, which appear to have been executed by one and the same author; who, though he does not make use of so many Hebraisms as the translators of the other books, is yet not without his peculiarities.

3. Before we conclude the history of the Septuagint version, it may not be irrelevant briefly to notice a question which has greatly exercised the ingenuity of biblical philologists, viz. from what MANUSCRIPTS did the seventy interpreters execute their translation? Professor Tyschen¹ has offered an hypothesis that they did not translate the Hebrew Old Testament into Greek, but that it was transcribed in Hebræo-Greek characters, and that from this transcript their version was made: this hypothesis has been examined by several German critics, and by none with more acumen than by Dathe, in the preface to his Latin version of the minor prophets;² but as the arguments are not of a nature to admit of abridgment, this notice may perhaps suffice. The late eminently learned Bishop Horsley doubts whether the manuscripts from which the Septuagint version was made would (if now extant) be entitled to the same degree of credit as our modern Hebrew text, notwithstanding their comparatively high antiquity. "There is," he observes, "certainly much reason to believe, that after the destruction of the temple by Nebuchadnezzar, perhaps from a somewhat earlier period, the Hebrew text was in a much worse state of corruption in the copies which were in private hands, than it has ever been since the revision of the sacred books by Ezra. These inaccurate copies would be multiplied during the whole period of the captivity, and widely scattered in Assyria, Persia, and Egypt; in short, through all the regions of the dispersion. The text, as revised by Ezra, was certainly of much higher credit than any of these copies, notwithstanding their greater antiquity. His edition succeeded, as it were, to the privileges of an autograph (the autographs of the inspired writers themselves being totally lost), and was henceforth to be considered as the only source of authentic text: inasmuch that the comparative merit of any text now extant will depend upon the probable degree of its approximation to, or distance from, the Esdrine edition. Nay, if the translation of the LXX. was made from some of those old manuscripts which the dispersed Jews had carried into Egypt, or from any other of those unauthenticated copies (which is the prevailing tradition among the Jews, and is very probable, at least it cannot be confuted), it will be likely that the faultiest manuscript now extant differs less from the genuine Esdrine text than those more ancient, which the version of the LXX. represents. But, much as this consideration lowers the credit of the LXX. separately, for any various reading, it adds great weight to the consent of the LXX. with later versions, and greater still to the consent of the old versions with manuscripts of the Hebrew, which still survive. And, as it is certainly possible that a true reading may be preserved in one solitary manuscript, it will follow, that a true reading may be preserved in one version: for the manuscript which contained the true reading at the time when the version was made, may have perished since; so that no evidence of the reading shall now remain, but the version."³

The Septuagint version, though originally made for the use of the Egyptian Jews, gradually acquired the highest authority among the Jews of Palestine, who were acquainted with the Greek language, and subsequently also among Christians: it appears, indeed, that the legend above confuted, of the translators having been divinely inspired, was invented in order that the LXX. might be held in the greater estimation. Philo the Jew, a native of Egypt, has evidently followed it in his allegorical expositions of the Mosaic law; and, though Dr. Hody was of opinion that Josephus, who was a native of Palestine, corroborated his work on Jewish Antiquities from the Hebrew text, yet Salmasius, Bochart, Bauer, and others, have shown that he has adhered to the Septuagint throughout that work. How extensively this version was in use among the Jews, appears from the solemn sanction given to it by the inspired writers of the New Testament, who have in very many passages quoted the Greek version of the Old Testament.⁴ Their example was followed by the earlier fathers and doctors of the church, who, with the exception of Origen and Jerome, were unacquainted with Hebrew: notwithstanding their zeal for the word of God, they did not exert themselves to learn the original language of the sacred writings, but acquiesced in the Greek representation of them; judging it, no doubt, to be fully sufficient for all the purposes of their pious labours. "The Greek Scriptures were the only Scriptures known to or valued by the Greeks. This was the text commented by Chrysostom and Theodoret; it was this which furnished topics to Athanasius, Nazianzen, and Basil. From this fountain the stream was derived to the Latin church, first, by the Italic or Vulgate translation of the Scriptures, which was made from the Septuagint, and not from the Hebrew; and, secondly, by the study of the Greek fathers. It was by this borrowed light, that the Latin fathers illuminated the western hemisphere; and, when the age of Cyprian, Ambrose, Augustine, and Gregory successively passed away, this was the light put into the hands of the next dynasty of theologians, the schoolmen, who carried on the work of theological disquisition by the aid of this luminary, and none other. So that, either in Greek or in Latin, it was still the Septuagint Scriptures that were read, explained, and quoted as authority, for a period of fifteen hundred years."⁵

The Septuagint version retained its authority, even with the rulers of the Jewish synagogue, until the commencement of the first century after Christ: when the Jews, being unable to resist the arguments from prophecy which were urged against them by the Christians, in order to deprive them of the benefit of that authority, began to deny that it agreed with the Hebrew text. Further to discredit the character of the Septuagint, the Jews instituted a solemn fast, on the 8th day of the month Thebet (December), to execrate the memory of its having been made. Not satisfied with this measure, we are assured by Justin Martyr, who lived in the former part of the second century, that they proceeded to expunge several passages out of the Septuagint; and abandoning this, adopted the version of Aquila, a proselyte Jew of Sinope, a city of Pontus;¹ this is the translation mentioned in the Talmud, and not the Septuagint, with which it has been confounded.²

4. The great use, however, which had been made by the Jews previously to their rejection of the Septuagint, and the constant use of it by the Christians, would naturally cause a multiplication of copies; in which numerous errors became introduced, in the course of time, from the negligence or inaccuracy of transcribers, and from glosses or marginal notes, which had been added for the explanation of difficult words, being suffered to creep into the text. In order to remedy this growing evil, ORIGEN, in the early part of the third century, undertook the laborious task of collating the Greek text then in use with the original Hebrew and with other Greek translations then extant, and from the whole to produce a new recension or revisal. Twenty-eight years were devoted to the preparation of this arduous work, in the course of which he collected manuscripts from every possible quarter, aided (it is said) by the pecuniary liberality of Ambrose, an opulent man, whom he had converted from the Valentinian heresy, and with the assistance of seven copyists and several persons skilled in caligraphy, or the art of beautiful writing. Origen commenced his labour at Cæsarea, A. D. 231; and, it appears, finished his Polyglott at Tyre, but in what year is not precisely known.

This noble critical work is designated by various names among ancient writers; as Tetrapla, Hexapla, Octapla, and Enneapla.

The Tetrapla contained the four Greek versions of Aquila, Symmachus, the Septuagint, and Theodotion, disposed in four columns:³ to these he added two columns more, containing the Hebrew text in its original characters, and also in Greek letters; these six columns, according to Epiphanius, formed the Hexapla. Having subsequently discovered two other Greek versions of some parts of the Scriptures, usually called the fifth and sixth, he added them to the preceding, inserting them in their respective places, and thus composed the Octapla; and a separate translation of the Psalms, usually called the seventh version, being afterwards added, the entire work has by some been termed the Enneapla. This appellation, however, was never generally adopted. But, as the two editions made by Origen generally bore the name of the Tetrapla and Hexapla, Dr. Grabe thinks that they were thus called, not from the number of the columns, but of the versions, which were six, the seventh containing the Psalms only.⁴ Bauer, after Montfaucon, is of opinion, that Origen edited only the Tetrapla and Hexapla; and this appears to be the real fact. The following specimens from Montfaucon will convey an idea of the construction of these two laborious works:⁵—

In this specimen the version of Aquila holds the first place, as being most literal; the second is occupied by that of Symmachus, as rendering ad sensum rather than ad litteram; the third by the Septuagint, and the fourth by Theodotion's translation.

⁵ Origen's Hexapla. Præf. Diss. tom. i. p. 16.

In the preceding specimen the first column contains the Hebrew in its proper characters; in the second column it is given in Greek characters, and is further valuable as exhibiting the mode of pronouncing Hebrew in the latter part of the second and the former part of the third century. The versions of Aquila, Symmachus, the Septuagint, and Theodotion, follow in the same order as in the specimen of the Tetrapla. When the fifth and sixth versions were added, the page consisted of eight columns, the fifth being denoted by E, and the sixth by S; and when the seventh version was added (which was designated by Z), it comprised nine columns.

HEXAPLA.
Hos. xi. i.

The original Hebrew being considered as the basis of the whole work, the proximity of each translation to the text, in point of closeness and fidelity, determined its rank in the order of the columns: thus Aquila's version, being the most faithful, is placed next to the sacred text; that of Symmachus occupies the fourth column; the Septuagint, the fifth; and Theodotion's, the sixth. The other three anonymous translations, not containing the entire books of the Old Testament, were placed in the last three columns of the ENNEAPLA, according to the order of time in which they were discovered by Origen. Where the same words occurred in all the other Greek versions, without being particularly specified, Origen designated them by Α or ΛΟ, Λοιπα, the rest; —ΟΙ Γ, or the three, denoted Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion; —ΟΙ Δ, or the four, signified Aquila, Symmachus, the Septuagint, and Theodotion; and Π, Παῖτες, all the interpreters.

The object of Origen being to correct the differences found in the then existing copies of the Old Testament, he carefully noted the alterations made by him; and for the information of those who might consult his works, he made use of the following marks:

(1.) Where any passages appeared in the Septuagint, that were not found in the Hebrew, he designated them by an obelus ÷ with two bold points: also annexed. This mark was also used to denote words not extant in the Hebrew, but added by the Septuagint translators, either for the sake of elegance, or for the purpose of illustrating the sense.

(2.) To passages wanting in the copies of the Septuagint, and supplied by himself from the other Greek versions, he prefixed an asterisk * with two bold points : also annexed, in order that his additions might be immediately perceived. These supplementary passages, we are informed by Jerome, were for the most part taken from Theodotus's translation; not unfrequently from that of Aquila; sometimes, though rarely, from the version of Symmachus; and sometimes from two or three together. But, in every case, the initial letter of each translator's name was placed immediately after the asterisk, to indicate the source whence such supplementary passage was taken. And in lieu of the very erroneous Septuagint version of Daniel, Theodotus's translation of that book was inserted entire.

(3.) Further, not only the passages wanting in the Septuagint were supplied by Origen with the asterisks, as above noticed, but also where that version does not appear accurately to express the Hebrew original, having noted the former reading with an obelus, ÷, he added the correct rendering from one of the other translators, with an asterisk subjoined. Concerning the shape and uses of the lemniscus and hypolemniscus, two other marks used by Origen, there is so great a difference of opinion among learned men, that it is difficult to determine what they were.¹ Dr. Owen, after Montfaucon, supposes them to have been marks of better and more accurate renderings.

In the Pentateuch, Origen compared the Samaritan text with the Hebrew as received by the Jews, and noted their differences. To each of the translations inserted in his Hexapla was prefixed an account of the author; each had its separate prolegomena; and the ample margins were filled with notes. A few fragments of these prolegomena and marginal annotations have been preserved; but nothing remains of his history of the Greek versions.²

Since Origen's time, biblical critics have distinguished two editions or exemplars of the Septuagint—the Kann or common text, with all its errors and imperfections, as it existed previously to his collation; and the Hexaplar text, or that corrected by Origen himself. For nearly fifty years was this great man's stupendous work buried in a corner of the city of Tyre, probably on account of the very great expense of transcribing forty or fifty volumes, which far exceeded the means of private individuals; and here, perhaps, it might have perished in oblivion, if Eusebius and Pamphilus had not discovered it, and deposited it in the library of Pamphilus the martyr at Cæsarea, where Jerome saw it about the middle of the fourth century. As we have no account whatever of Origen's autograph after this time, it is most probable that it perished in the year 653, on the capture of that city by the Arabs; and a few imperfect fragments, collected from manuscripts of the Septuagint and the Catena of the Greek fathers, are all that now remain of a work, which in the present improved state of sacred literature would most eminently have assisted in the interpretation and criticism of the Old Testament.

5. As the Septuagint version had been read in the church from the commencement of Christianity, so it continued to be used in most of the Greek churches; and the text, as corrected by Origen, was transcribed for their use, together with his critical marks. Hence, in the progress of time, from the negligence or inaccuracy of copyists, numerous errors were introduced into this version, which rendered a new revision necessary; and, as all the Greek churches did not receive Origen's biblical labours with equal deference, three principal recensions were undertaken nearly at the same time, of which we are now to offer a brief notice.

The first was the edition, undertaken by Eusebius and Pamphilus about the year 300, from the Hexaplar text, with the whole of Origen's critical marks; it was not only adopted by the churches of Palestine, but was also deposited in almost every library. By frequent transcriptions, however, Origen's marks or notes became, in the course of a few years, so much changed, as to be of little use, and were finally omitted: this omission only augmented the evil, since even in the time of Jerome it was no longer possible to know what belonged to the translators, or what were Origen's own corrections; and now it may almost be considered as a hopeless task to distinguish between them. Contemporary with the edition of Eusebius and Pamphilus was the recension of the Kann, or vulgate text of the Septuagint, conducted by Lucian, a presbyter of the church at Antioch, who suffered martyrdom A. D. 311. He took the Hebrew text for the basis of his edition, which was received in all the eastern churches from Constantinople to Antioch. While Lucian was prosecuting his biblical labours, Hesychius, an Egyptian bishop, undertook a similar work, which was generally received in the churches of Egypt. He is supposed to have introduced fewer alterations than Lucian; and his edition is cited by Jerome as the Exemplar Alexandrinum. Syncellus³ mentions another revision of the Septuagint text by Basil bishop of Cæsarea: but this, we have every reason to believe, has long since perished. All the manuscripts of the Septuagint now extant, as well as the printed editions, are derived from the three recensions above mentioned, although biblical critics are by no means agreed what particular recension each manuscript has followed.⁴

6. The importance of the Septuagint version for the right understanding of the sacred text has been variously estimated by different learned men; while some have elevated it to an equality with the original Hebrew, others have rated it far below its real value. The great authority which it formerly enjoyed, certainly gives it a claim to a high degree of consideration. It was executed long before the Jews were prejudiced against Jesus Christ as the Messiah; and it was the means of preparing the world at large for his appearance, by making known the types and prophecies concerning him. With all its faults and imperfections, therefore, this version is of more use in correcting the Hebrew text than any other that is extant; because its authors had better opportunities of knowing the propriety and extent of the Hebrew language than we can possibly have at this distance of time. The Septuagint, likewise, being written in the same dialect as the New Testament (the formation of whose style was influenced by it), it becomes a very important source of interpretation: for not only does it frequently serve to determine the genuine reading, but also to ascertain the meaning of particular idiomatic expressions and passages in the New Testament, the true import of which could not be known but from their use in the Septuagint.⁵ Grotius, Keuchenius, Biel, and Schleusner, are the critics who have most successfully applied this version to the interpretation of the New Testament.

II. 'The importance of the Septuagint, in the criticism and interpretation of the Scriptures, especially of the New Testament,' will justify the length of the preceding account of that celebrated version: it now remains that we briefly notice the other ancient Greek translations, which have already been incidentally mentioned; viz. those of Aquila, Theodotion, Symmachus, and the three anonymous versions, usually cited as the fifth, sixth, and seventh versions, from which Origen compiled his Tetrapla and Hexapla.

1. The Version of AQUILA.—The author of this translation was a native of Sinope in Pontus, who flourished in the second century of the Christian era: he was of Jewish descent; and having renounced Christianity, he undertook his version, with the intention of exhibiting to the Hellenistic Jews an accurate representation of the Hebrew text, for their assistance in their disputes with the Christians. Yet he did not on this account pervert passages which relate to Christ by unfaithful translations, as some of the ancient

⁴ "The Book," says the profound critic Michaelis, "most necessary to be read and understood by every man who studies the New Testament, is, without doubt, the Septuagint; which alone has been of more service than all the passages from the profane authors collected together. It should be read in the public schools by those who are destined for the church; should form the subject of a course of lectures at the university, and be the constant companion of an expositor of the New Testament." Introduction to the New Test. vol. i. p. 177.—"About the year 1785," says Dr. A. Clarke, (speaking of his biblical labours), "I began to read the Septuagint regularly, in order to acquaint myself more fully with the phraseology of the New Testament. The study of this version served me to expand and illuminate my mind than all the theological works I had ever consulted. I had proceeded but a short way in it, before I was convinced that the prejudices against it were utterly unfounded; and that it was of incalculable advantage towards a proper understanding of the literal sense of Scripture." ⁵ Montfaucon, Prælim. ad Hexapla, tom. i. pp. 36–42. Holmes, Vetus Testamentum Græcum, tom. i. Præf. cap. i. sect. i.–vii. The first book of Dr. Holmes's erudite preface is translated into English in the Christian Observer for 1821, vol. xx. pp. 544–548, 610–615, 676–683, 746–750.

Christian writers thought: for the examples of designed want of fidelity, which they produce, are nothing more than etymological renderings, or expressions of the same things in other words, or various readings, or else his own mistakes. Professor Jahn fixes the date of this version to the interval between the years 90 and 130: it is certain that Aquila lived during the reign of the emperor Adrian, and that his translation was executed before the year 160; as it is cited both by Justin Martyr, who wrote about that time, and by Irenæus between the years 170 and 176. In conformity with the spirit of the Jews, Aquila renders every Hebrew word by the nearest corresponding Greek word, without any regard to the genius of the Greek language: it is therefore extremely literal, but it is on that very account of considerable importance in the criticism of the Old Testament, as it serves to show the readings contained in the Hebrew manuscripts of his time. His version has been most highly approved by the Jews, by whom it has been called the Hebrew Verity, as if, in reading it, they were reading the Hebrew text itself. Nearly the same judgment was formed of it by the early Christian writers, or fathers; who must be understood as referring to this version, when they speak of the Hebrew. Professor Dathe has collated several passages from this translation, and has applied them to the illustration of the prophet Hosea.¹ As the result of his comparison of the fragments of Aquila with the Hebrew text, he states that Aquila had nearly the same readings of the Hebrew text which we have. Which almost constant agreement cannot be observed without much satisfaction; because it supplies an argument of no mean importance for refuting the charges of those who assert that the modern Hebrew text is very greatly corrupted. The fragments of Aquila and of the other Greek versions were collected and published, first by Flaminio Nobili, in his notes to the Roman edition of the Septuagint, and after him by Drusius, in his Vetere Interprum Græcorum Fragmenta (Arnheim, 1622, 4to.);² and also by Montfaucon in his edition of Origen's Hexapla above noticed. According to Jerome, Aquila published two editions of his version, the second of which was the most literal; it was allowed to be read publicly in the Jews' synagogues, by the hundred and twenty-fifth Novel of the emperor Justinian.

2. THEODOTION was a native of Ephesus, and is termed by Jerome and Eusebius an Ebionite or semi-Christian. He was nearly contemporary with Aquila, and his translation is cited by Justin Martyr, in his Dialogue with Tryphon the Jew, which was composed about the year 160. The version of Theodotion holds a middle rank between the servile closeness of Aquila and the freedom of Symmachus: it is a kind of revision of the Septuagint made after the original Hebrew, and supplies some deficiencies in the Septuagint; but where he translates without help, he evidently shows himself to have been but indifferently skilled in Hebrew. Theodotion's translation of the book of Daniel was introduced into the Christian churches, in or soon after the second century, as being deemed more accurate than that of the Septuagint. It is not unworthy of remark, that he has retained several Hebrew words, which seem to have been used among the Ebionites, such as עֲשָׂה, Lev. vii. 18.; מִלֵּךְ, Lev. xiii. 6.; וְהָיָה, Deut. xxii. 9.; and שִׁמְעָה, Isa. lxiv. 5.

3. SYMMACHUS, we are informed by Eusebius and Jerome, was a semi-Christian, or Ebionite, for the account given of him by Epiphanius (that he was first a Samaritan, then a Jew, next a Christian, and last of all an Ebionite) is generally disregarded as unworthy of credit. Concerning the precise time when he flourished, learned men are of different opinions. Epiphanius places him under the reign of Commodus II. an imaginary emperor; Jerome, however, expressly states, that his translation appeared after that of Theodotion; and as Symmachus was evidently unknown to Irenæus, who cites the versions of Aquila and Theodotion, it is probable that the date assigned by Jerome is the true one. Montfaucon accordingly places Symmachus a short time after Theodotion, that is, about the year 200. The version of Symmachus, who appears to have published a second edition of it revised, is by no means so literal as that of Aquila; he was certainly much better acquainted with the laws of interpretation than the latter, and has endeavoured, not unsuccessfully, to render the Hebrew idioms with Greek precision. Bauer³ and Morus⁴ have given specimens of the utility of this version for illustrating both the Old and New Testaments. Dr. Owen has printed the whole of the first chapter of the Book of Genesis according to the Septuagint version, together with the Greek translations of Aquila, Theodotion, and Symmachus, in columns, in order to show their respective agreement or discrepancy. This we are obliged to omit, on account of its length; but the following observations of that eminent critic on their relative merits (founded on an accurate comparison of them with each other, and with the original Hebrew, whence they were made) are too valuable to be disregarded. He remarks,

1. With respect to Aquila, (1.) That his translation is close and servile—abounding in Hebraisms—and scrupulously conformable to the letter of the text. (2.) That the author, notwithstanding he meant to disgrace and overturn the Septuagint version, yet did not scruple to make use of it, and frequently to borrow his expressions from it.

2. With respect to Theodotion, (1.) That he makes great use of the two former versions—following sometimes the diction of the one, and sometimes that of the other—nay, often commixing them both together in the compass of one and the same verse; and, (2.) That he did not keep so strictly and closely to the Septuagint version as some have unwarily represented.⁵ He borrowed largely from that of Aquila; but adapted it to his own style. And as his style was similar to that of the LXX. Origen, perhaps for the sake of uniformity, supplied the additions inserted in the Hexapla chiefly from this version.

3. With respect to Symmachus, (1.) That his version, though concise, is free and paraphrastic—regarding the sense rather than the words, of the original; 2. That he often borrowed from the three other versions—but much oftener from those of his immediate predecessors, than from the Septuagint; and, (3.) It is observed by Montfaucon,⁶ that he kept close to the Hebrew original; and never introduced any thing from the Septuagint, that was not to be found in his Hebrew copy; but it evidently appears from verse 20.—where we read, καὶ ὁ θεὸς οὐρανὸν ἰδοὺ—that either the observation is false, or that the copy he used was different from the present Hebrew copies. The 30th verse has also a reading—it may perhaps be an interpolation—to which there is nothing answerable in the Hebrew, or in any other of the Greek versions.⁷

4, 5, 6. The three anonymous translations, usually called the fifth, sixth, and seventh versions, derive their names from the order in which Origen disposed them in his columns. The author of the sixth version was evidently a Christian: for he renders Habakkuk iii. 13. (Thou wentest forth for the deliverance of thy people, even for the deliverance of thine anointed ones), in the following manner: Εἰς τὴν σωτηρίαν τοῦ λαοῦ σου διὰ ἰσχυρῶν τοῦ Χριστοῦ σου; i. e. Thou wentest forth to save thy people through Jesus thy Christ. The dates of these three versions are evidently subsequent to those of Aquila, Theodotion, and Symmachus: from the fragments collected by Montfaucon, it appears that they all contained the Psalms and minor prophets; the fifth and sixth further comprised the Pentateuch and Song of Solomon; and from some fragments of the fifth and seventh versions found by Bruns in a Syriac Hexaplar manuscript at Paris, it appears that they also contained the two books of Kings. Bauer is of opinion that the author of the seventh version was a Jew.

III. Besides the fragments of the preceding ancient versions, taken from Origen's Hexapla, there are found in the margins of the manuscripts of the Septuagint some additional marks or notes, containing various renderings in Greek of some passages in the Old Testament: these are cited as the Hebrew, Syrian, Samaritan, and Hellenistic versions, and as the version of some anonymous author. The probable meaning of these references it may not be improper briefly to notice.

1. The Hebrew (ὁ Ἑβραῖος) is supposed by some to denote the translation of Aquila, who closely and literally followed the Hebrew text; but this idea was refuted by Montfaucon and Bauer, who remark, that after the reference to the Hebrew, a reading follows, most widely differing from Aquila's rendering. Bauer more probably conjectures, that the reference to ἡ Ἑβραῖα denotes the Hebrew text from which the Septuagint version differs.

2. Under the name of the Syrian (ὁ Συρεὶς) are intended the fragments of the Greek version made by Sophronius, patriarch of Constantinople, from the very popular Latin translation of Jerome, who is supposed to have acquired the appellation of the Syrian, from his long residence on the confines of Syria. He is thus expressly styled by Theodore of Mopsuestia in a passage cited by Photius in his Bibliotheca.¹

3. The Samaritan (οἱ Σαμαριτῆται) is supposed to refer to the fragments of a Greek version of the Hebrew-Samaritan text, which is attributed to the ancient Greek scholiast so often cited by Flaminio Nobili, and in the Greek Scholia appended to the Roman edition of the Septuagint. Considerable doubts, however, exist concerning the identity of this supposed Greek version of the Samaritan text; which, if it ever existed, Bishop Walton thinks, must be long posterior in date to the Septuagint.²

4. It is not known to which version or author the citation ἡ Ἑλληνικὴ, or the Hellenic, refers:—the mark ὁ Ἄλλος, or ὁ Ἀντιπρωτερος, denotes some unknown author.

Before we conclude the present account of the ancient Greek versions of the Old Testament, it remains that we briefly notice the translation preserved in St. Mark's Library at Venice, containing the Pentateuch, Proverbs, Ruth, Song of Solomon, Ecclesiastes, Lamentations of Jeremiah, and Prophecy of Daniel. The existence of this version, which was for a long time buried among other literary treasures deposited in the above-mentioned library, was first announced by Zanetti and Bongiovanni in their catalogue of its manuscripts. The Pentateuch was published in three parts, by M. Ammon, at Erlang, 1790, 1791, 8vo.; and the remaining books by M. Villoison at Strasbourg, 1784, 8vo. The original manuscript, Morelli is of opinion, was executed in the 14th century; and the numerous errors discoverable in it prove that it cannot be the autograph of the translator. By whom this version was made is a question yet undetermined. Morelli thinks its author was a Jew: Ammon supposes him to have been a Christian monk, and perhaps a native of Syria of the eighth or ninth century; and Bauer, after Zeigler, conjectures him to have been a Christian grammarian of Constantinople, who had been taught Hebrew by a Western Jew. Whoever the translator was, his style evidently shows him to have been deeply skilled in the different dialects of the Greek language, and to have been conversant with the Greek poets. Equally uncertain is the date when this version was composed: Pichhorn, Bauer, and several other eminent biblical writers, place it between the sixth and tenth centuries: the late Dr. Holmes supposed the author of it to have been some Hellenistic Jew, between the ninth and twelfth centuries. "Nothing can be more completely happy, or more judicious, than the idea adopted by this author, of rendering the Hebrew text in the pure Attic dialect, and the Chaldee in its corresponding Doric."³ Dr. Holmes has inserted extracts from this version in his edition of the Septuagint.⁴

§ 3. ON THE ANCIENT ORIENTAL VERSIONS OF THE OLD AND NEW TESTAMENTS

I. SYRIAC VERSIONS. 1. Peschito, or literal version.—2. Philoxenian version.—3. Karkaphensian version.—4. Syro-Estrangelo, and Palæstino-Syriac version.—II. EGYPTIAN VERSION. Coptic, Sahidic, Ammonian, and Basmiric.—III. ETHIOPIC VERSION.—IV. ARABIC VERSIONS.—V. ARMENIAN VERSION.—VI. PERSIC VERSIONS.

I. SYRIAC VERSIONS.—Syria being visited at a very early period by the preachers of the Christian faith, several translations of the sacred volume were made into the language of that country.

1. The most celebrated of these is the Peschito or Literal (VERSIO SIMPLEX), as it is usually called, on account of its very close adherence to the Hebrew and Greek texts, from which it was immediately made. The most extravagant assertions have been advanced concerning its antiquity; some referring the translation of the Old Testament to the time of Solomon and Hiram, while others ascribe it to Asa, priest of the Samaritans, and a third class to the apostle Thaddeus. This last tradition is received by the Syrian churches; but a more recent date is ascribed to it by modern biblical philologists. Bishop Walton, Carpov, Leusden, Bishop Lowth, and Dr. Kennicott, fix its date to the first century; Bauer and some other German critics, to the second or third century; Jahn fixes it, at the latest, to the second century; De Rossi pronounces it to be very ancient, but does not specify any precise date. The most probable opinion is that of Michaelis,⁵ who ascribes the Syriac version of both Testaments to the close of the first, or to the earlier part of the second century, at which time the Syrian churches flourished most, and the Christians at Edessa had a temple for divine worship erected after the model of that at Jerusalem: and it is not to be supposed that they would be without a version of the Old Testament, the reading of which had been introduced by the apostles.

The OLD TESTAMENT was evidently translated from the original Hebrew, to which it most closely and literally adheres, with the exception of a few passages which appear to bear some affinity to the Septuagint: Jahn accounts for this by supposing, either that this version was consulted by the Syriac translator or translators, or that the Syrians afterwards corrected their translation by the Septuagint.⁶ Dr. Credner, who has particularly investigated the minor prophets, according to this version, is of opinion that the translator of the Old Testament for the most part followed the Hebrew text, but at the same time consulted the Chaldee Paraphrase and Septuagint Version.⁷ Leusden conjectures, that the translator did not make use of the most correct Hebrew manuscripts, and has given some examples which appear to support his opinion. Dathe, however, speaks most positively in favour of its antiquity and fidelity, and refers to the Syriac version, as a certain standard by which we may judge of the state of the Hebrew text in the second century; and both Dr. Kennicott and Professor De Rossi have derived many valuable readings from this version. De Rossi, indeed, prefers it to all the other ancient versions, and says, that it closely follows the order of the sacred text, rendering word for word, and is more pure than any other. As it is therefore probable that the Syriac version was made about the end of the first century, it might be made from Hebrew MSS. almost as old as those which were before transcribed into Greek, and from MSS. which might be in some places true where the others were corrupted. And it will be no wonder at all, if a version so very ancient should have preserved a great variety of true readings, where the Hebrew manuscripts were corrupted afterwards. Dr. Boothroyd considers this version to be as

⁶ Michaelis is of opinion, that some of the more remarkable coincidences between the Syriac Bible and the Greek did not proceed from the original translator, but from a supposed improvement, which Jacob of Edessa undertook, at the beginning of the eighth century, and of which important notices may be seen in the Journal des Savans. (Vol. i. pp. 67–99. Amsterdam edition.) As far as his observation extends, the Syriac accords with the Greek more frequently in Ezekiel than in the Proverbs of Solomon, he has also made the same observation in regard to the Chaldee version, yet with the particular and unexpected circumstance that the Chaldee version follows the Septuagint still more. ancient, and in many respects as valuable, as the Chaldee Paraphrase;¹ and in the notes to his edition of the Hebrew Bible he has shown that this version has retained numerous and important various readings. To its general fidelity almost every critic of note bears unqualified approbation, although it is not every where equal; and it is remarkably clear and strong in those passages which attribute characters of Deity to the Messiah. Michaelis and Jahn have observed, that a different method of interpretation is adopted in the Pentateuch from that which is to be found in the book of Chronicles; and Jahn has remarked that there are some Chaldee words in the first chapter of Genesis, and also in the book of Ecclesiastes and the Song of Solomon: whence they infer that this version was the work not of one, but of several authors. Further, Michaelis has discovered traces of the religion of the translator, which indicate a Christian and no Jew. A Jew by religion would not have employed the Syriac but the Hebrew letters, and he would have used the Chaldee Targums more copiously than is observed in most books of the Syriac Old Testament. This a Jew by birth would have done, if even he had been converted to Christianity; and as most of the books of the Syriac Bible thus evince that the interpreter had no acquaintance with the Targums, Michaelis (whose opinion is adopted by Gesenius) is of opinion that the translator was a Christian; and their judgment is corroborated by the fact that the arguments prefixed to the Psalms were manifestly written by a Christian author.²

The Syriac version of the New Testament comprises only the four Gospels, the Acts of the Apostles, the Epistles of Saint Paul (including the Epistle to the Hebrews), the first Epistle to Saint John, Saint Peter's first Epistle, and the Epistle of Saint James. The celebrated passage in 1 John v. 7., and the history of the woman taken in adultery (John viii. 2—11.), are both wanting. All the Christian sects in Syria and the East make use of this version exclusively, which they hold in the highest estimation. It agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension. Michaelis pronounces it to be the very best translation of the Greek Testament which he ever read, for the general ease, elegance, and fidelity with which it has been executed. It retains, however, many Greek words, which might have been easily and correctly expressed in Syriac: in Matt. xxvii. alone there are not fewer than eleven words. In like manner some Latin words have been retained which the authors of the New Testament had borrowed from the Roman manners and customs. This version also presents some mistakes, which can only be explained by the words of the Greek text, from which it was immediately made. For instance, in rendering into Syriac these words of Acts xviii. 7., ONOMATI ΔΟΥΛΟΥ ΣΕΒΟΜΕΝΟΥ, the interpreter has translated Titus instead of Justus, because he had divided the Greek in the following manner:—ONOMA ΤΗΟΥΣ ΤΟΥ ΣΕΒΟΜΕΝΟΥ.³

An important accession to biblical literature was made, a few years since, by the late Rev. Dr. Buchanan, to whose assiduous labours the British church in India is most deeply indebted: and who, in his progress among the Syrian churches and Jews of India, discovered and obtained numerous ancient manuscripts of the Scriptures, which are now deposited in the public library at Cambridge. One of these, which was discovered in a remote Syrian church near the mountains, is particularly valuable: it contains the Old and New Testaments, engrossed with beautiful accuracy in the Edrungle (or old Syriac) character, on strong vellum, in large folio, and having three columns in a page. The words of every book are numbered: and the volume is illuminated, but not after the European manner, the initial letters having no ornament. Though somewhat injured by time or neglect, the ink being in certain places obliterated, still the letters can in general be distinctly traced from the impress of the pen, (or from the partial corrosion of the ink. The Syrian church assigns a high date to this manuscript, which, in the opinion of Mr. Yeates, who has published a collation of the Pentateuch,⁴ was written about the seventh century. In looking over this manuscript, Dr. Buchanan found the very first emendation of the Hebrew text proposed by Dr. Kennicott,⁵ which doubtless is the true reading.

The first edition of the Syriac version of the Old Testament appeared in the Paris Polyglott; but, being taken from an imperfect MS., its deficiencies were supplied by Gabriel Sionita, who translated the passages wanting from the Latin Vulgate, and has been unjustly charged with having translated the whole from the Vulgate. This text was reprinted in Bishop Walton's Polyglott, with the addition of some apocryphal books. There have been numerous editions of particular parts of the Syriac Old Testament, which are minutely described by Masch.⁶ The principal editions of the Syriac Scriptures are noticed in the Bibliographical Appendix, Vol. II.

The Peschito Syriac version of the New Testament was first made known in Europe by Moses of Mardin, who had been sent by Ignatius, patriarch of the Maronite Christians, in 1552, to Pope Julius III., to acknowledge the papal supremacy in the name of the Syrian church, and was at the same time commissioned to procure the Syriac New Testament. This was accomplished at Vienna in 1555, under the editorial care of Moses and Albert Widmanstad, with the assistance of William Postell, and at the expense of the Emperor Ferdinand I. This Editio Princeps is in quarto. The Syriac New Testament has since been printed several times.

There is also extant a Syriac version of the second Epistle of Saint Peter, the second and third Epistles of John, the Epistle of Jude, and the Apocalypse, which are wanting in the Peschito: these are by some writers ascribed to Mar Abba, primate of the East, between the years 535 and 552. The translation of these books is made from the original Greek; but the author, whoever he was, possessed but an indifferent knowledge of the two languages.

2. The PHILOXENIAN or SYRO-PHILOXENIAN version derives its name from Philoxenus, or Xenayas, Bishop of Hierapolis or Mabug in Syria, A. D. 488—518, who employed his rural bishop (Chorepiscopus) Polycarp, to translate the Greek New Testament into Syriac. This version was finished in the year 508, and was afterwards revised by Thomas of Harkel or Heraclea, A. D. 616. Michaelis is of opinion, that there was a third edition; and a fourth is attributed to Dionysius Barsalibæus, who was bishop of Amida from 1166 to 1177. It appears, however, that there were only two editions—the original one by Polycarp, and that revised by Thomas of Harkel; the single copy of the Four Gospels, with the alterations of Barsalibæus, in the twelfth century, being hardly entitled to the name of a new edition. This version agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension: it was not known in Europe until the middle of the eighteenth century; when the Rev. Dr. Gloucester Ridley published a Dissertation on the Syriac Versions of the New Testament (in 1761), three manuscripts of which he had received thirty years before from Amida in Mesopotamia. Though age and growing infirmities, the great expense of printing, and the want of a patron, prevented Dr. Ridley from availing himself of these manuscripts; yet having, under circumstances of peculiar difficulty, succeeded in acquiring a knowledge of the Syriac language, he employed himself at intervals in making a transcript of the Four Gospels. These, being put into the hands of the late Professor White, were published by him with a literal Latin translation, in 1778, in two volumes 4to., at the expense of the delegates of the Clarendon press at Oxford. In 1779, Professor White published from the same press the Acts of the Apostles and the Catholic Epistles, and in 1804, the Epistles of Saint Paul, also in 4to., and accompanied with a Latin translation.

The Philoxenian version, though made immediately from the Greek, is greatly inferior to the Peschito, both in the accuracy with which it is executed, and also in its style. It is, however, not devoid of value, "and is of real importance to a critic, whose object is to select a variety of readings with the view of restoring the genuine text of the Greek original: for he may be fully assured, that every phrase and expression is a precise copy of the Greek text as it stood in the manuscript from which the version was made. But, as it is not prior to the sixth century, and the Peshito was written either at the end of the first, or at the beginning of the second century, it is of less importance to know the readings of the Greek manuscript that was used in the former, than those of the original employed in the latter.¹

3. The KARKAPHESIENSIAN Version, as it is commonly termed, is a recension of the Peshito, or old Syriac version of the Old and New Testaments, executed towards the close of the tenth century, by David, a Jacobite monk, residing in the monastery of St. Aaron on mount Sigari in Mesopotamia, whence, the appellation Karkaphensian (signifying mountain) is derived.² We are informed by the learned Professor Wiseman, who has most minutely investigated the history and literary character of this recension, that the basis of its text is the Peshito or Versio Simplex, with the printed copies of which it bears a close affinity; except that proper names and Græco-Syriac words are accommodated to the Greek orthography, or to that adopted by Thomas of Harkel in his revision of the Philoxenian version. Some eminent critics have thought that the Karkaphensian version was made for the use of the Nestorians; Dr. Wiseman, however, is decidedly of opinion, that it is of Monophysite or Jacobite origin;³ but his opinion is doubted by Professor Lee.⁴

4. Of the OTHER SYRIAC VERSIONS, the SYRO-ESTRANGELI version of the Old Testament, and the Palæstino-Syriac version of part of the New Testament, are of sufficient importance to deserve a brief notice.

[i.] The SYRO-ESTRANGELI version, also called the SYRIAC HEXAPLAR, is a translation of Origen's Hexaplar edition of the Greek Septuagint; it was executed in the former part of the seventh century, and its author is unknown. The late Professor De Rossi, who published the first specimen of it at Parma, in 1778, does not decide whether it is to be attributed to Mar-Abba, James of Edessa, Paul Bishop of Tela, or to Thomas of Heraclea. Assemanni ascribes it to Thomas, though other learned men affirm that he did no more than collate the Books of Scripture. This version, however, corresponds exactly with the text of the Septuagint, especially in those passages in which the latter differs from the Hebrew. A MS. of this version is in the Ambrosian Library at Milan, comprising the Books of Psalms, Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Hosea, Amos, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi, Jeremiah, Daniel, and Isaiah: it also contains the obelus and other marks of Origen's Hexapla; and a subscription at the end states it to have been literally translated from the Greek copy, corrected by Eusebius himself, with the assistance of Pamphilus, from the books of Origen, which were deposited in the library of Cæsarea. The conformity of this MS. with the account given by Masius, in the preface to his learned Annotations on the Book of Joshua, affords strong grounds for believing that this is the second part of the MS. described by him as then being in his possession, and which, there is reason to fear, is irrecoverably lost. From this version M. Norberg edited the prophecies of Jeremiah and Ezekiel in 1787, 4to Londini Gothorum: and M. Bugati, the Book of Daniel, at Milan, 1788, 4to.⁵

[ii.] The PALÆSTINO-SYRIAC, or SYRIAC TRANSLATION OF JERUSALEM, was discovered in the Vatican Library at Rome by M. Adler, in a manuscript of the eleventh century. It is not an entire translation of the New Testament, but only a Lectionarium, or collection of detached portions, appointed to be read in the services of the church on Sundays and festival days. It is written in the Syriac or Chaldee dialect of Jerusalem, and was evidently made in a Roman province; for in Matt. xxvii. 27. the word στρατιῶται, soldiers, is rendered by רומא (ROMA), as if the translator had never heard of any soldiers but Romans; and in the same verse στύγξ, band or cohort, is rendered by the Latin word castra, מקדש. These and other indications afford reason to think, that the manuscript contains a translation made from the Greek, in Palestine; it was written at Antioch, and from all these circumstances, this version has been denominated the Jerusalem-Syriac Version. Dr. Scholz states that its text for the most part agrees with the Alexandrine recension. This manuscript has not yet been collated throughout.⁶

II. EGYPTIAN VERSIONS.—From the proximity of Egypt to Judæa, it appears that the knowledge of the Gospel was very early communicated to the inhabitants of that country, whose language was divided into three dialects—the Coptic, or dialect of Lower Egypt; the Sahidic, or dialect of Upper Egypt; and the Baskmouiric, a dialect of the inhabitants of Bashmour, a province of the Delta.

The Coptic language is a compound of the old Egyptian and Greek; into which the Old Testament was translated from the Septuagint, perhaps in the second or third century, and certainly before the fifth century. Of this version, the Pentateuch was published by Wilkins in 1731; and a Psalter, with an Arabic translation, by the congregation of Propaganda Fide, at Rome, in 1744 and 1749.⁷

In the SAHIDIC language the ninth chapter of Daniel was published by Münster at Rome in 1786; and Jeremiah, ch. ix. 17. to ch. xiii., by Mingarelli, in Reliquiæ Egyptiorum Codicum in Bibliotheca Naniana asservatæ, at Bologna, in 1785. The late Dr. Woide was of opinion that both the Coptic and Sahidic versions were made from the Greek. They express the phrases of the Septuagint version; and most of the additions, omissions, and transpositions, which distinguished the latter from the Hebrew, are discoverable in the Coptic and Sahidic versions.

The Coptic version of the New Testament was published at Oxford in 1716, in 4to., by Daniel Wilkins, a learned Prussian, who has endeavoured to prove that it must have been executed prior to the third century; but his opinion has been controverted by many learned men, and particularly by Louis Picques, who refers it to the fifth century. Professor Hug, however, has shown that it could not have been composed before the time of Hesycheus, nor before the middle of the third century.⁸ The celebrated passage (1 John v. 7.) is wanting in this version, as well as in the Syriac-Peshito, and Philoxenian translations. From the observations of Dr. Woide, it appears that the Coptic inclines more to the Alexandrian than the Sahidic—that no remarkable coincidence is to be found between the Coptic or Sihidic, and the Vulgate,—and that we have no reason to suspect that the former has been altered or made to conform to the latter. Its text agrees with the Alexandrine recension.

Concerning the age of the Sahidic version critics are not yet agreed. Dr. Woide, however, has shown that it was most probably executed in the second century; and, consequently, it is of the utmost importance to the criticism of the Greek Testament. In a dissertation on this version, written in the German language, and abridged by Bishop Marsh,⁹ Dr. W. observes, that there are now in existence two Sahidic manuscripts,—one formerly in the possession of the late Dr. Askew, the other brought from Egypt by the celebrated traveller, Mr. Bruce. The former contains a work entitled Sophia, and written by Valentinus, in the second century. This manuscript contains various passages both from the Old and New Testament, which coincide with the fragments of the Sahidic version now extant; whence it is concluded that the Sahidic version of the whole Bible not only existed so early as the beginning of the second century, but that it was the same as that of which we have various fragments, and which, if put together, would form perhaps a complete Sahidic version of the Bible. The other manuscript to which

Dr. Woide appeals, contains two books, the one entitled Εὐαγγέλιον τῆς γνῶσεως, the other, Βιβλίον λόγων ἀπὸ μυστηρίων. Now that this was written by a Gnostic, as well as the other manuscript, appears both from the title and the contents, and therefore it is concluded that the author lived in the second century. And as various passages are quoted in it both from the Old and New Testaments, Dr. Woide deduces the same inference as from the foregoing. Of this version some fragments of the Gospels of Matthew and John have been published by Mingarelli, in a work entitled Ægyptiorum Codicum Reliquiæ, Venetiis in Bibliothecâ Naniana asservatæ. (Bononia, 1785, 4to.) But the completest collection of fragments of this version is that prepared for the press by the late Dr. Woide, who did not live to publish them. The work was completed and edited by the Rev. Dr. Ford, from the Clarendon Press, at Oxford, in folio, 1799, as an appendix to Dr. W.'s fac-simile of the Codex Alexandrinus. Scholz states that it agrees with the Alexandrine recension, but that it has many readings either peculiar to itself, or in common with the Latin versions.²

From the difference of their readings, and from the circumstance that additions in the one are omitted in the other, Bishop Marsh infers that the Coptic and Sahidic are independent versions, both made from the original Greek. Both, therefore, may be quoted as separate evidence for a reading in the Greek Testament.

Besides the versions in the Coptic and Sahidic dialects, Father Georgi discovered, in a manuscript belonging to Cardinal Borgia, some fragments of a version written in a still different Egyptian dialect, which he calls the AMMONIAN DIALECT. It contains only 1 Cor. vii. 36.—ix. 16. and xiv. 33.—xv. 33. Some fragments of a BASMURIC-COPTIC Version of the Old and New Testaments, discovered in the Borgia Museum at Velitri, were published by M. Engelbrecht at Copenhagen, in 1846. Dr. Frederick Munter has printed the Sahidic and Ammoniac texts of 1 Cor. ix. 10—16. in his Commentatio de Indole Versionis Novi Testamenti Sahidicæ (4to. Hafniæ, 1789), in parallel columns, in order to present the reader with a distinct view of the similarity or difference between the two versions. On account, however, of the chief difference consisting in the orthography of single words, he is not disposed to assign to the Ammoniac the name of a separate dialect. On considering the region where this dialect seemed to be vernacular, he was inclined for several reasons to fix upon the Oases, particularly the Ammonian Oasis, whence he called it the Ammonian Dialect: but Professor Hug, who has investigated the hypothesis of various learned men, is of opinion that the fragments in question may possibly exhibit the idiom of Middle Egypt. M. Quatremère, however, prefers the appellation of the OASITIC DIALECT to that of Basmuric.³ This version was probably executed in the latter part of the third century.⁴

III. THE ETHIOPIC OR ABYSSINIAN VERSION OF THE OLD Testament was made from the Septuagint: although its author and date are unknown, yet, from the marks of unquestionable antiquity which it bears, there is every reason to believe that it was executed in the fourth century. In the Gospels it agrees for the most part with the Alexandrine recension. Some peculiar readings occur in this translation: but, where it seems to be exact, it derives considerable authority from its antiquity. Only a few books and fragments of this version have been printed. The first portions of the Ethiopic Scriptures that appeared in print were the Psalms and the Song of Solomon; edited at Rome, by John Potken, A. D. 1513. The translation of the New Testament is supposed to have been made by Frumentius, who, about the year 330, first preached Christianity in Ethiopia. In 1548, the New Testament was printed at Rome by some Abyssinian priests, and was afterwards reprinted in the London Polyglott: but as the manuscripts used in the Roman edition were old and mutilated, the editors restored such chasms as appeared in the text, by translations from the Latin Vulgate. These editions, therefore, are not of much value, as they do not present faithful copies of the ancient Ethiopic text; which, according to Professor Hug, exhibits the appearance either of several versions being united in one copy, or of several MSS. (belonging to different recensions) being quoted in the composition of this version.⁵

There is, however, reason to expect that, in no long time the gift of the entire Ethiopic Scriptures will be imparted to Abyssinia. A manuscript copy of this version, in fine preservation, has been purchased by the committee of the Church Missionary Society. From a memoir on this manuscript by Professor Lee, we learn, that it contains the first eight books of the Old Testament, written on vellum, in a bold and masterly hand, in two columns on each page. The length of the page is that of a large quarto; the width is not quite so great. The volume contains 285 folios, of which the text covers 282, very accurately written, and in high preservation. On the first page is written, in Ethiopic, the invocation usually found in the books of the eastern Christians: "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." Then follows an account of the contents of the book, written in Latin by some former possessor, and a date A. D. 1596, 20th September. On the reverse of the first folio is found a table, not unlike the tables of genealogy in some of our old English Bibles, which seems to be intended to show the hours appointed for certain prayers. Then follows the Book of Genesis, as translated from the Greek of the Septuagint. On the reverse of the third folio is the following inscription in Arabic: "The poor Ribea, the son of Elias, wrote it: O wine! to which nothing can be assimilated, either in reality or appearance: O excellent drink! of which our Lord said, having the cup in his hand, and giving thanks, 'This is my blood for the salvation of men.'" Folios 7. and 8. have been supplied, in paper by a more modern hand. On the reverse of folio 8. is a very humble attempt at drawing, in the figure of a person apparently in prayer, accompanied by an inscription in Ethiopic at the side of the figure: "In the prayers of Moses and Aaron, to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, am I, thy servant, O Lord, presented in the power of the Trinity, a weak, infirm, and defiled sinner. Let them implore Christ." Under the drawing, in Ethiopic: "In the same manner, every slayer that slays Cain, will I repay in this; and as he slew, so shall he be slain." On the reverse of folio 98., at the end of the Book of Exodus, are two figures, somewhat similar, but rather better drawn, and seemingly by the writer of the manuscript; and in another place or two there are marginal ornaments. At the end of Deuteronomy is this inscription in Ethiopic: "The repetition of the law, which God spake to Moses. Numbered 50707 (words). Intercede for your slave Isaac."—At the end of the volume: "Pray for those who laboured in this book; and for your slave Isaac, who gave this to Jerusalem, the Holy." Then follows an inscription, in Arabic: "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, one God. O Lord, save thy people from every evil! O our God, Jesus Christ, the speaker to men! O holy people, remember your slave Isaac, the poor: God shall remember you in the mercies of this book. Pray, if God be willing, that I may be permitted to see your face. And pray for me, the sinner. Pardon my sins, O Lord! and let my body be buried in Mount Sion." Then follows, in Ethiopic: "That our enemies may not say of us, 'We have conquered them;' be ye prudent. We have given you a lamp. Be ye the culture.—Sow ye the flock: reap and rejoice." A few lines have been erased. Then follows . . . "me, Isaac, the poor, in your prayers. It was completed in Beth Gabbaza, of Axumia. In thy name, O Lord, have I planted, that thou place me not in any other place except Mount Sion; the mount of Christ; the house of Christians. Let them not be forgotten in your prayers, who have read and testified to you. Preserve, O Lord, this my offering for me thy servant, the poor; and preserve all these books which I offer, that the brethren, dwelling at Jerusalem, may be comforted. And pray for me, forget me not in the holy offices, and in prayer, that we may all stand before God in the terrible day and hours. That it might not be written that we were wanting,

I have previously sent and given you this for the warfare of the testimony. Intercede, and bless. And also for the refreshing of the record of the Fathers: and also for Cueskam, the queen of the sons of Abyssinia; that they may be comforted, and thence convert our region—may, moreover, migrate into other regions, and restore Jerusalem:—and for the Calvary of Mary. Let them pray for me. Let it be preserved as the widow's mite, for ever and ever. Let them not sell or exchange; nor let them carry it away; nor let them cause it to be placed elsewhere. And” the rest is wanting. Hence it appears, that the book was written at Axuma, the ancient capital of Ethiopia; and that it was sent by Isaac to the Abyssinians residing in Jerusalem. No date appears in the manuscript itself. It is, probably, about 300 years old. On the reverse of fol. 285, is a drawing intended to represent Andrew the Apostle, with the book of the Gospels in one hand, and the keys in the other. Some less ingenious draftsman, however, has, by means of the transparency of the vellum, traced out this figure on the first page of this folio, and given the name of Peter to his humble representation. He has thus succeeded in assigning to St. Peter the first place, and also in bestowing on him the keys. Against this picture of Peter is placed his age, 120 years.

This precious manuscript has been carefully transcribed, and in 1826 the four Gospels were edited by T. P. Platt, Esq. M.A. They were printed with a fount of types, cast at the expense of the British and Foreign Bible Society, from the matrices (preserved at Frankfort) of the celebrated Ethiopic scholar John Ludolph; whose types, as used in his printed works, have been highly approved by the Abyssinians.³

IV. ARABIC VERSIONS.—Although the Christian religion was preached in Arabia as well as in other countries of the East, at an early period, yet it never was the established religion of the country, as in Syria and Egypt: for even the temple at Mecca was a heathen temple till the time of Mohammed. Historical evidence, therefore, concerning the Arabic versions of the Old Testament, does not extend beyond the tenth century, when

1. Rabbi Saadias Gaon, a celebrated Jewish teacher at Babylon, translated, or rather paraphrased, the Old Testament into Arabic: of this version the Pentateuch was printed at Constantinople, in folio, in the year 1546, in Hebrew characters; and in the Paris and London Polyglotts, in Arabic letters.—The prophecy of Isaiah was published by Paulus in 8vo. at Jena, in 1790, 1791. Jahn, after Simon, observes, that its style is not pure. Saadias is also said to have translated the Book of Job and the Psalms: a manuscript containing Job is preserved in the Bodleian Library: Cod. Huntington. No. 511. The remaining books of this translation have not hitherto been discovered. Besides this, there are several other Arabic versions extant, made immediately from the Hebrew, either by Jews, Samaritans, or Christians, of which the following are the principal; viz.

2. The Arabic version of the Pentateuch, published by Erpenius at Leyden, in 1622, 4to., appears to have been executed in the thirteenth century by some African Jew, who has very closely adhered to the Hebrew.

3. The Arabic version of the Book of Joshua, printed in the Paris and London Polyglotts, is, in the opinion of Bauer, made directly from the Hebrew. Its author and date are not known.

4. The Pentateuch, Psalms, and Prophecy of Daniel, were translated by Saadi Ben Levi Asnekot, who lived in the early part of the seventeenth century: they are extant only in MS. in the British Museum,⁴ and are of very little value.

Besides these versions, the Arab Christians have a translation of the Book of Job (printed in the Paris and London Polyglotts), and two versions of the Psalms, still in MS., which were respectively made from the Peschito or Old Syriac version. All the Arabic books of the Old Testament (with the exception of the Pentateuch and Job), which are printed in those Polyglotts, were executed from Hesychius's recension of the Septuagint. The Psalms, inserted in Justiniani's Polyglott Psalter, and Gabriel Sionita's Arabic Psalter, were made from Lucian's recension of that version and the Arabic Psalter, printed at Aleppo in 1706, 4to., follows the Melchitic recension of the LXX.⁵

⁵ The Melchites were those Christians in Syria, Egypt, and the Levant, who, though not Greeks, followed the doctrines and ceremonies of the Greek Church. They were called Melchites, that is, Royalists, by their adversaries, by way of reproach, on account of their implicit submission to the edict of the Emperor Marcian, in favour of the council of Chalcedon. There are many Arabic translations of the New Testament, besides those which have appeared in print: for since the Arabic language supplanted the Syriac and Egyptian, the inhabitants of the countries where these had been spoken, have been obliged to annex Arabic translations to the ancient versions, which are no longer understood. These Arabic translations are supposed to have been made at different times between the seventh and the eleventh centuries: in general they were not all executed from the original text, but from the versions which they were intended to accompany. Thus some which are placed together with the Greek text have been made from the Greek, while others have been made from the Syriac, the Coptic, and even from the Latin Vulgate.¹

V. THE ARMENIAN VERSION OF THE OLD TESTAMENT was made from the Alexandrian Septuagint: its author was Miesrob, who invented letters fully expressive of the Armenian tongue, towards the close of the fourth or early in the fifth century. It is said to have been subsequently altered according to the Peschito or old Syriac version, and according to the Latin Vulgate, by Usean, an Armenian bishop, who was specially sent to Amsterdam to superintend the edition there printed in 1666. The translation of the New Testament is ascribed jointly to Miesrob, and to the patriarch Isaac at the end of the fourth or early in the fifth century. It was twice translated from the Syriac, and then from the Greek; and that the copies now extant were made from the latter language, is evident from their containing those books of the New Testament which were never admitted into the Peschito or ancient literal Syriac version. This version, in the opinion of Semler, is of great importance, as faithfully representing the Greek MSS. whence it was made: but Michaelis observes, that it would be an inestimable treasure, had it descended to us unaltered by time and superstition. It has in several instances been made conformable to the Vulgate by Haithio or Hethom, sovereign of the Lesser Armenia from A. D. 1224 to 1270, who was attached to the church of Rome, and skilled in the Latin language.²

VI. PERSIC VERSIONS.—Although we have no authentic account of the conversion of the whole Persian nation to Christianity, yet we are informed by Chrysostom and Theodoret, that the Scriptures were very anciently translated into the Persian language. It does not appear, however, that any fragments of this ancient version are extant. The Persian translation of the Pentateuch was executed by Jacob Ben Joseph surnamed Tawosi or Tusi, from Tus, a city of Persia, which anciently possessed a celebrated Jewish academy. The precise time when he lived is not known; but it is evident that he could not have lived earlier than the commencement of the ninth century, because in Gen. x. 10. for Babel he has substituted Babylon, which city was not founded until A. D. 762 by the caliph Almanson. The Persian version of the Pentateuch, which is for the most part faithfully rendered, was first printed by the Jews at Constantinople in 1546, in Hebrew characters, together with the Hebrew text, the targum of Onkelos, and the Arabic version of Saadias Gaon. From this Constantinopolitan edition the Persian version of the Pentateuch was transcribed into the Persian characters by the eminent orientalist Mr. (afterwards Dr.) Hyde, who added a very close Latin translation, and supplied between brackets the words necessary to fill up the chasms which had been caused by the negligence either of the original copyist or of the printer at Constantinople.

Bishop Walton further mentions two Persic versions of the Psalms—one by a Portuguese monk at Ispahan in the year 1618, and another by some Jesuits from the Vulgate Latin version.³ These are yet in manuscript.

There are extant two Persian Versions of the four Gospels, the most ancient and valuable of which was first printed in the London Polyglott, by Bishop Walton, from a manuscript in the possession of Dr. Pococke, dated A. D. 1311: it was made from the Syriac, having sometimes retained Syriac words, and subjoined a Persian translation. The other Persian translation was edited by Wheloc, and after his decease by Pierson, at London, in 1652—57, after a collation of three manuscripts. It is supposed to have been from the Greek.⁴

§ 4. ON THE ANCIENT WESTERN VERSIONS OF THE SCRIPTURES.

I. ANCIENT LATIN VERSIONS OF THE SCRIPTURES.

1. At the commencement of the Christian era, the Latin was gradually supplanting the Greek as a general language, and it soon might be called the language of the western church. From the testimony of Augustine,⁵ it appears that the Latin church possessed a very great number of versions of the Scriptures, made at the first introduction of Christianity, and whose authors were unknown; and that, in the primitive times, as soon as any one found a Greek copy, and thought himself sufficiently versed in both languages, he attempted a translation of it.⁶ In the course of time, this diversity of translation produced much confusion, parts of separate versions being put together to form an entire composition, and marginal notes being inserted into the text: but one of these Latin translations appears to have acquired a more extensive circulation than the others, and for several ages was preferably used, under the name of the Vetus Itala or old Italic, on account of its clearness and fidelity.⁷ This version, which in the time of Jerome was received as canonical, is by him termed sometimes the Vulgate and sometimes the Old, in opposition to the new translation undertaken by him. He mentions no other version. The Old Italic was translated from the Greek in the Old Testament as well as in the New, there being comparatively few members of the Western church who were skilled in Hebrew. From the above cited expressions of Augustine, it has been inferred that the old Italic version was made in the first century of the Christian era; but the New Testament could not have been translated into Latin before the canon had been formed, which was certainly not made in the first century: and the great number of Hebraisms and Syriacisms observable in it, particularly in the Gospels of Matthew and Mark, have induced some eminent critics to conjecture that the authors of this translation were Jews converted to Christianity.⁸ There is, however, every reason to believe, that it was executed in the early part of the second century: "at least it was quoted by Tertullian before the close of that century. But, before the end of the fourth century, the alterations, either designed or accidental, which were made by transcribers of the Latin Bible, were become as numerous as the alterations in the Greek Bible, before it was corrected by Origen."⁹

2. To remedy this growing evil, Jerome, at the request, and under the patronage of Damasus, bishop of Rome, towards the close of the fourth century, undertook to revise

⁵ "The learned and ingenious Eusebius, in his introduction to the Old Testament, supposes that the first Latin version of the Bible was made in Africa; where Latin alone being understood, a translation was more necessary; where the Latin version was held in the highest veneration; and where, the language being spoken with less purity, barbarisms might have been more easily introduced than in a provincial town in Italy." this translation, and make it more conformable to the Septuagint. He executed the revision of the Old Testament according to the Hexaplar text of Origen, which he went to Cæsarea to consult, and the New Testament after the original Greek; and completed his task A. D. 390 or 391. Of this revision, the Book of Job and the Psalms (which alone have been preserved to our times), together with the Chronicles, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Song of Solomon, are all that were ever published; Jerome's manuscripts, comprising the remaining books of Scripture, being lost or destroyed through the wilful negligence or fraud of some individual whom he has not named.¹ But before Jerome had finished his revision, he had commenced a translation of the Old Testament from the Hebrew into Latin, in order that the Western Christians, who used this last language only, might know the real meaning of the Hebrew text, and thus be the better qualified to engage in controversial discussions with the Jews.

3. This version, which surpasses all former ones, was executed at different times, Jerome having translated particular books in the order requested by his friends. We learn from Augustine, that it was introduced into the churches by degrees, for fear of offending weak persons: at length it acquired so great an authority from the approbation it received from Pope Gregory I., that ever since the seventh century it has been exclusively adopted² by the Romish church, under the name of the VULGATE version: and a decree of the fourth session of the Council of Trent, in the sixteenth century, ordained that the Vulgate alone should be esteemed authentic (a very ambiguous term, which ought to have been more precisely defined than the members of that assembly chose to define it), in the public reading of the Scriptures, in disputations, in preaching, and in expounding, and that no one should dare to reject it under any pretext whatever. "Upon this ground many contended that the Vulgate version was dictated by the Holy Spirit; at least was providentially guarded against all error; was consequently of divine authority, and more to be regarded than even the original Hebrew and Greek texts. And, in effect, the decree of the Council, however limited and moderated by the explanation of some of their more judicious divines, has given to the Vulgate such a high degree of authority, that, in this instance at least, the translation has taken the place of the original; for the learned of the church of Rome, who have taken the liberty of giving translations of Scripture in the modern languages, instead of the Hebrew and Greek texts, profess to translate the Vulgate. When, indeed, they find the Vulgate very notoriously deficient in expressing the sense, they do the original Scriptures the honour of consulting them, and take the liberty, by following them, of departing from their authentic guide; but, in general, the Vulgate is their original text; and they give us a translation of a translation; by which second transference of the Holy Scriptures into another tongue, still more of the original sense must be lost, and more of the genuine spirit must evaporate."³

The universal adoption of Jerome's new version throughout the Western church rendered a multiplication of copies necessary; and with them new errors were introduced in the course of time, by the intermixture of the two versions (the Old Italic and Jerome's or the Vulgate) with each other. Of this confusion, Cassiodorus was the principal cause, who ordered them to be written in parallel columns, that the old version might be corrected by the Vulgate; and though Alcuin in the eighth century, by the command of Charlemagne, provided more accurate copies, the text again fell into such confusion, and was so disfigured by innumerable mistakes of copyists—(notwithstanding the efforts made to correct it by Lanfranc archbishop of Canterbury, in the eleventh century, and by Cardinal Nicholas, and some other divines, about the middle of the twelfth and in the thirteenth centuries),—that the manuscripts of the middle ages materially differ from the first printed editions.

Robert STEPHENS was the first who attempted to remedy this confusion, by publishing his critical editions of the Vulgate in 1528, 1532, 1534, 1540,⁴ and particularly in 1545 and 1546. These, especially the last, having incurred the censures of the doctors of the Sorbonne, John Hentenius, a divine of Louvain, was employed to prepare a new edition of the Vulgate: this he accomplished in 1547 in folio, having availed himself of Stephens's previous labours with great advantage. A third corrected edition was published by Lucas Brugensis, with the assistance of several other divines of Louvain, in 1573, in three volumes, 8vo., which was also reprinted in 1586 in 4to. and 8vo., with the critical notes of Lucas Brugensis. In the mean time Pius IV. commanded some divines of the Romish church to collect and to collate the most ancient manuscripts which they could procure. This collation was continued during the pontificate of Pius V., who further caused the original text to be consulted. Under Gregory XIII. the work ceased, but it was resumed and completed under the auspices of Sixtus V.; who devoted much time and attention to it, and corrected the proofs of the edition which was published at Rome in 1590, in folio. The text thus revised Sixtus pronounced to be the authentic Vulgate, which had been the object of inquiry in the Council of Trent; and ordained that it should be adopted throughout the Romish church. But, notwithstanding the labours of the Pope, this edition was discovered to be so exceedingly incorrect, that his successor Gregory XIV. caused it to be suppressed; and Clement VIII., the successor of Gregory in the pontificate, published another authentic Vulgate in 1592. This, however, differs more than any other edition from that of Sixtus V., and mostly resembles that of Louvain. These fatal variances between editions, alike promulgated by pontiffs claiming infallibility, have not passed unnoticed by Protestant divines, who have taken advantage of them in a manner that sensibly affects the church of Rome; especially Kortholt, who has at great length refuted the pretensions of Bellarmine in favour of the Vulgate in a masterly manner,⁵ and our learned countryman Thomas James, in his Bellum Papale, sive Concordia Discors Sixti V. (London, 1600, 4to.), who has pointed out very numerous additions, omissions, contradictions, and other differences between the Sixtine and Clementine editions.⁶ From this very curious and now rare volume the following specimens of the differences between these two editions are selected and arranged:—

1. Clauses omitted in the Sixtine, but inserted in the Clementine Bible.

- Num. xxx. 11. Uxor in domo viri, &c. to the end of the verse Prov. xxv. 24. Melius est sedere in angulo domatib, &c.
Lev. xx. 9. Patri matricque maledixit.
Jude. xvii. 2, 3. Reddidit ergo eos matri suæ, &c.
1 Kings iv. 21. Quia capta est arca Dei.
3 Kings (same as our first) xii. 10. Sic loqueris ad eos.
2 Chron. ii. 10. Et vini viginti milia metretus.
Matt. xxvii. 35. Ut impleteretur quod dictum est per prophetam dicentem, dividerunt sibi vestimenta mea, et super vestem meam miserunt sortem.

2. Clauses or words introduced into the Sixtine, but omitted in the Clementine Bible.

- 1 Sam. xxiv. 8. Vivit dominus, quia nisi dominus percussisset eum, aut dies ejus venerit ut moriatur, aut descendens in prelium periret; propitius mihi sit dominus ut non mittam manum meam in Christum Domini.
1 Sam. xxv. 6. Ex multis annis salvos facies tuos et omnia tua.
2 Sam. vi. 12. Dixitque David, ibo et reducam arcam.
2 Sam. viii. 8. De quo fecit Salomo omnia vasa arca in templo et mare æneum et columnas et altare.
2 Sam. xix. 10. Et concilium totius Israel venit ad regem.
Prov. xxiv. ult. Usque quo piger dormis? usque quo de somno con-surges.
Hab. i. 3. Quare respicis contemptores et taces concitante impio justiore se? Et facies homines quasi pisces maris, et quasi reptilia non habentia ducem.
Matt. xxiv. 41. Duo in lecto, unus assumetur, et unus relinquetur.

printed; and it is likewise of great value to a critic, as it contains a copious collection of various readings from thirteen Latin manuscripts, and three of the early editions. Father Simon (Hist. Crit. des Versions du N. Test. ch. xi. p. 130.) calls it "un chef-d'œuvre en fait de Bible;" and (p. 131.) he terms this edition "la meilleure et des toutes." Hentenius, in his preface to the Louvain edition, calls it "accuratissima et castigatissima Biblia." (See also the praises bestowed on it in Masch's edition of Le-long's Bibliotheca Sacra, part ii. vol. iii. p. 187.) The title-page prefixed to the New Testament bears the date of 1539; though that which is prefixed to the Old Testament is dated 1540. (Marsh's Letters to Travis, p. 251. note.) It is by this latter date, that Stephens's best edition of the Vulgate is usually known and cited.

² With the exception of the Psalms; which being daily chanted to music in the church service, made it difficult to introduce alterations. The Old Italic Psalter, as corrected by Jerome, has therefore been used ever since the time of Gregory I. The apocryphal books of Baruch, Ecclesiasticus, Wisdom, and the two books of Maccabees, are also retained from the old Latin version.

Besides the preceding revisions by papal authority, there have been several others executed by private individuals; in which the Latin Vulgate has been so much corrected from the original Hebrew and Greek, that they have in some degree been considered (though erroneously) as new translations. Of this number are the Latin Bibles published by Clarus, Eber, and the Osianders.

[i.] Isidore CLARIUS's edition of the Vulgate first appeared at Venice in 1542, and is of extreme rarity: it was reprinted at the same place in 1557 and 1564. He has not only restored the ancient Latin text, but has also corrected it in a great number of places which he conceived to be erroneously translated, so as to make them conformable to the Hebrew original. Although he corrected more than eight thousand places, as he states in his preface, yet he omitted some, lest he should offend the Roman Catholics by making too many alterations in the Vulgate version.

[ii.] The method of Clarus was followed by Paul EBER, who corrected the Vulgate from Luther's German version. His edition was published at Wittenberg, in 1565, with the addition of Luther's translation under the authority of Augustus, Elector of Saxony; and was reprinted in 1574, in ten volumes, quarto.

[iii.] The edition of Luke OSIANDER appeared in 1578, and has since been very often reprinted; as also has a German translation of it, which was first published at Stuttgart in 1600. Andrew Osiander's edition was also printed in 1600, and frequently since. They have both corrected the Vulgate, according to the Hebrew originals; and have occasioned some confusion to their readers, by inserting their emendations in a character different from that in which the Vulgate text is printed.

4. The Vulgate is regarded by Papists and Protestants in very different points of view: by the former it has been extolled beyond measure, while by most of the latter it has been depreciated as much below its intrinsic merit. Our learned countryman, John Bois (canon of Ely), was the first who pointed out the real value of this version, in his Collatio Veteris Interpretis cum Beza alisque recentioribus. (8vo. 1655.) Bois was followed by Father Simon, in his Histoire Critique du Texte et des Versions du Nouveau Testament, who has proved that the more ancient the Greek manuscripts and other versions are, the more closely do they agree with the Vulgate; and in consequence of the arguments adduced by Simon, the Vulgate has been more justly appreciated by biblical critics of later times.

Although the Latin Vulgate is neither inspired nor infallible, as Morinus, Suarez, and other advocates of the Romish church have attempted to maintain, yet it is allowed to be in general a faithful translation, and sometimes exhibits the sense of Scripture with greater accuracy than the more modern versions: for all those which have been made in modern times, by divines in communion with the church of Rome, are derived from the Latin Vulgate, which, in consequence of the decree of the Council of Trent above noticed, has been substituted for the original Hebrew and Greek texts. The Latin Vulgate, therefore, is by no means to be neglected by the biblical critic: and since the Ante-Hieronymian Latin translations are unquestionably of great antiquity, both lead us to a discovery of the readings in very ancient Greek manuscripts, which existed prior to the date of any now extant. Even in its present state, notwithstanding the variations between the Sixtine and Clementine editions, and that several passages are mistranslated, in order to support the peculiar dogmas of the church of Rome, the Latin Vulgate preserves many true readings,² where the modern Hebrew copies are corrupted.³

II. The Gothic version of the Bible was made from the Greek, both in the Old and in the New Testament, by Ulphilas,⁴ a celebrated bishop of the Mæso-Goths, who assisted at the council of Constantinople in 359, and was sent on an embassy to the Emperor Valens about the year 378. He is said to have embraced Arianism, and to have propagated Arian tenets among his countrymen. Besides translating the entire Bible into the Gothic language, Ulphilas is said to have conferred on the Mæso-Goths the invention of the Gothic characters. The character, however, in which this version of the New Testament is written, is, in fact, the Latin character of that age; and the degree of perfection, which the Gothic language had obtained during the time of Ulphilas, is a proof that it had then been written for some time.

The translation of Ulphilas (who had been educated among the Greeks) was executed from the Greek; but, from its coincidence in many instances with the Latin, there is reason to suspect that it has been interpolated, though at a remote period, from the Vulgate. Its unquestionable antiquity, however, and its general fidelity, have concurred to give this version a high place in the estimation of biblical critics: but, unfortunately, it has not come down to us entire. The only parts extant in print are, a fragment of the book of Nehemiah, a considerable portion of the four Gospels, and some portions of the apostolic epistles.⁵

The most distinguished manuscript of the Gothic version of Ulphilas is the justly celebrated CODEX ARGENTEUS, now preserved in the library of the university of Upsal, in Sweden. It contains the four Gospels, but by no means in a perfect state; the following are the principal lacunæ:—

Matt. i. 1.—v. 15.	Mark vi. 31.—53.	Luke x. 30.—xiv. 9.
vi. 33.—vii. 12.	vii. 17.—20.	xvi. 21.—xvii. 3
x. 1.—23.	xii. 38.—xiii. 16.	xx. 37.—end.
xi. 25.—xxvi. 7.	xiii. 29.—xiv. 4.	John i. 1.—v. 45.

		xix. 13.—end.

This manuscript is written on vellum, and has received the name of Argenteus from its silver letters: it is of a quarto size, and the vellum leaves are stained with a violet colour: and on this ground the letters, which are all uncial or capitals, were afterwards painted in silver, except the initial s and a few other passages, which are in gold. The cover and back of the volume are of silver embossed. The deep impression of the strokes, Ihre, Michaelis, are of opinion, that the letters were either imprinted with a warm iron, cut with a graver, or cast for the purpose, and afterwards coloured; but Mr. Coxe (with whom the late eminent traveller Dr. E. D. Clarke seems to coincide), after a very minute examination, was convinced that each letter was painted, and not formed in the manner supposed by those critics. Most of the silver letters have become green by time, but the golden letters are still in good preservation. We have no knowledge of this important manuscript prior to the discovery of it in the abbey of Werden in Westphalia, whence it was taken to Prague. In the year 1648, when that city was stormed by the Swedes, it fell into the hands of a Swedish count, who presented it to his sovereign, queen Christina. After remaining some time in her library, during the confusion which preceded her abdication of the throne of Sweden, it suddenly and unaccountably disappeared, and was again brought to light in the Netherlands. Some have supposed that the celebrated Isaac Vossius received it as a present from the queen; others that he brought it away by stealth. After his death, however, it was purchased for six hundred dollars by count Magnus Gabriel de la Gardie, who presented it to the university of Upsal, where it at present remains. The following cut is a faithful fac-simile of the characters of the Codex Argenteus: it was traced from the manuscript itself for the late Dr. E. D. Clarke, and is the most correct fac-simile known to be extant. It corresponds with our version of Luke xviii. 17. Verily, I say unto you, Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, shall in no wise enter therein. It is worthy of remark, that, in the Codex Argenteus, the well known old Saxon or Gothic word Barn is used to signify the original word Παιδίον, a little child.

IN IZAI:

Concerning the age of this venerable manuscript critics are by no means agreed. Some of the zealous advocates for its antiquity have maintained that it is the very copy which Ulphilas wrote with his own hand. The librarian by whom it was exhibited to Dr. Clarke stated it to have been completed about the end of the fourth century, by a bishop of Thrace, in the Gothic language used at that time in Mæsia. This brings its age very nearly, if not quite, to the time when Ulphilas lived: but it is not likely—indeed it is utterly improbable—that the only copy of the Gothic translation of the Gospels, which is now extant, should be precisely the original. What proves that this cannot be the identical manuscript of Ulphilas, is the fact, that several various readings have been discovered in the margin, a circumstance which clearly shows that it must have been written at a time when several transcripts had been already made.

Some fragments of the Gothic version of St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans were discovered by M. Knittel, in the year 1756, in a Codex Rescriptus belonging to the library of the duke of Brunswick at Wolfenbüttel: they were published by him in 1762, and reprinted in 1763, in 4to., at Upsal, with notes by Ihre. The Brunswick manuscript, which is on vellum, and is supposed to be of the sixth century, contains only the following passages, viz. Rom. xi. 33—36. xii. 1—5. 17—21. xiv. 9—20. xv. 3—13. The version of Ulphilas is in one column, and a Latin translation in the other: it is on vellum, and is supposed to be of the sixth century. In the eighth or ninth century, the Origines Isidori Hispalensis were written over the translation of Ulphilas; but the ink had become so exceedingly pale as not to admit of deciphering the original manuscript without great difficulty.¹

explorer of ancient literature was examining two Codices Rescripti in the Ambrosian library, he was surprised with the discovery of some Gothic writing in one of them; which on further investigation proved to be fragments of the books of Kings, Ezra, and Nehemiah. The discovery thus auspiciously made stimulated him to further inquiries, which were rewarded with the discovery of four other Codices Rescripti containing portions of the Gothic version. He now associated in his researches signor Carolo Ottavio Castillioni; and to their joint labours we are indebted for a specimen and account² of these manuscripts, from which the following particulars are abridged.

The first of these five Gothic MSS. (which is noted S. 36.) consists of 204 quarto pages on vellum; the later writing contains the homilies of Gregory the Great on the Prophecies of Ezekiel, which from their characters must have been executed before the eighth century. Beneath this, in a more ancient Gothic hand, are contained the Epistles of St. Paul to the Romans, 1st and 2d Corinthians, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, 1st and 2d of Timothy, Titus, and Philemon, together with a fragment of the Gothic Calendar. The Epistles to the Romans, Corinthians, Ephesians, and to Timothy, are very nearly entire, and form the chief part of this manuscript: of the other Epistles considerable fragments only remain. The titles of the Epistles may be traced at the heads of the pages where they commence. This MS. appears to have been written by two different copyists, one of whom wrote more beautifully and correctly than the other; and various readings may be traced in some of the margins written in a smaller hand. Entire leaves have been turned upside down by the rescriber of this manuscript. The annexed fac-simile of it represents the commencement of Paul's Epistles to the Ephesians, and may be thus rendered: The Epistle of Paul to the Ephesians beginneth. Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ according to the will of God, to the saints who are at Ephesus.

The second MS. also, in quarto, and noted S. 45., contains 156 pages of thinner vellum, the Latin writings on which is of the eighth or ninth century, and comprises Jerome's exposition of Isaiah. Under this has been discovered (though with some difficulty, on account of the thickness of the Latin characters and the blackness of the ink) the Gothic version of Saint Paul's two Epistles to the Corinthians, the Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, the two Epistles to the Thessalonians, and to Titus. What is deficient in the preceding manuscript is found in this, which has some various readings peculiar to itself, and therefore is an independent codex.

In the third manuscript, noted G. 82., a quarto Latin volume, containing the plays of Plautus, and part of Seneca's Tragedies of Medea and Ædipus, signor Mai discovered fragments of the Books of Kings, Ezra, and Nehemiah. This discovery is peculiarly valuable, as not the smallest portion of the Gothic version of the Old Testament was known to be in existence; and, further, as it furnishes a complete refutation of the idle tale repeated by Gibbon after preceding writers, viz. that Ulphilas prudently suppressed the four Books of Kings, as they might tend to irritate the fierce and sanguinary spirit of his countrymen.¹ The date of the Latin writing of this manuscript, which Mai deciphered with great difficulty, is not specified; but, on comparing his specimen of it with other engraved specimens, we are inclined to refer it to the eighth or ninth century.

The fourth specimen (noted I. 61.) consists of a single sheet in small quarto, containing four pages of part of Saint John's Gospel in Latin, under which are found the very fragments of the twenty-fifth, twenty-sixth, and twenty-seventh chapters of Matthew's Gospel, which are wanting in the celebrated manuscript of the Gothic Gospels preserved at Upsal, and usually known by the appellation of the Codex Argenteus.

The fifth and last manuscript (noted G. 147.), which has preserved some remains of Gothic literature, is a volume of the proceedings of the Council of Chalcedon; under the later writing have been discovered some fragments of ancient authors, whose names signor Mai has not specified; and also a fragment of a Gothic Homily, rich in biblical quotations, and the style of which he thinks shows that it was translated from some one of the fathers of the Greek church. The characters of this manuscript bear a close resemblance to those of the Codex Argenteus, at Upsal, which was executed in the sixth century.

The manuscripts above described are written in broad and thick characters, without any division of words or of chapters, but with contractions of proper names, similar to those found in ancient Greek MSS. Some sections, however, have been discovered, which are indicated by numeral marks or larger spaces, and sometimes by large letters. The Gothic writing is referred to the sixth century.

The portions of the Gothic version of the Old and New Testament, printed by signors Mai and Castillionei, are, I. Nehemiah, chap. v. verses 13—18. chap. vi. 14—19. and vii. 1—3. II. A Fragment of Saint Matthew's Gospel, containing chap. xxv. 38—46. xxvi. 1—3. 65—75. and xxvii. 1. III. Part of St. Paul's Epistle to the Philippians, chap. ii. 22—30. and iii. 1—16. IV. Saint Paul's Epistle to Titus, chap. i. 1—16. ii. 1.; and V. verses 11—23. of his Epistle to Philemon. The Gothic text is exhibited on the left-hand page, and on the right-hand page the editors have given a literal Latin translation of it, together with the Greek original. These are succeeded by fragments of a Gothic Homily and Calendar, with Latin translations, Gothic alphabet, and a glossary of new Gothic words which they have discovered in the passages which they have printed. In 1829 signor Castillionei published the fragments of Ulphilas's version of the second Epistle to the Corinthians.

III. The SLAVONIC, or Old Russian Version, was also made from the Greek, both in the Old and New Testaments. It is ascribed to the two brothers, Cyril² (or Constantine, surnamed the Philosopher on account of his learning) and Methodius, sons of Leo, a Greek nobleman of Thessalonica, who, in the latter part of the ninth century, first preached the Gospel among the Moravo-Slavonians: but it is questionable, whether these missionaries translated the whole of the sacred code, or whether their labours comprised only the books of the New Testament and the Psalms of David. Dr. Dobrowsky (who has bestowed more pains on the critical study of the Slavonic Scriptures than any person now living) is of opinion "that, with the exception of the Psalms, no part of the Old Testament was translated at so early a period. So much, however, is certain, that the book of Proverbs must have been translated before, or in the twelfth century, as the frequent quotations made from it by Nestor (author of the Russian Chronicle, who died in 1156) agree, on the whole, with the common text. The books of Job, on the other hand, the Prophets, and the apocryphal books of Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus, appear to have been done in Servia, in the thirteenth or fourteenth century; and the Pentateuch and remaining books in the fifteenth, either in Russia or Poland, at which time the whole were collected into one volume, and arranged according to the order of the books in the Bohemian Bible, printed in 1488 or 1489." The extreme rarity and recent date of MSS. of the entire Slavonic Bible greatly corroborated this hypothesis of Dr. Dobrowsky, respecting the late execution of this version of the Old Testament.¹ Dr. Henderson has shown, by actual collation, that the Slavonic text of the Old Testament, in the editio princeps of the Bible printed at Ostrog in 1581, was made with the assistance of the Vulgate or some ancient Latin MSS. found in the Bulgarian monasteries, or that it was at least revised and altered according to them; and he is of opinion that, if this edition were carefully collated, it would yield a rich harvest of various readings, some of which might prove of essential service to a future editor of the Septuagint.²

According to Professor Hug, the Slavonic version exhibits the text of the Constantinopolitan recension. Dr. Dobrowsky pronounces it to be a very literal translation from the Greek, the Greek construction being very frequently retained, even where it is contrary to the genius of the Slavonic language; and in general it resembles the most ancient manuscripts, with which it agrees, even where their united evidence is against the common printed reading. "It contains at least three fourths of the readings which Griesbach has adopted into his text" [in his critical edition of the New Testament]. "Where he has few authorities, the Slavonic mostly corroborates the authority of the textus receptus; and, where a great agreement obtains among the ancient MSS. in favour of a reading, it joins them against the common editions. It varies from Theophylact as often as it agrees with him, and has neither been altered from him nor the Vulgate;"³ and it possesses few or no lectiones singulares, or readings peculiar to itself.⁴ From an edition of this version, printed at Moscow in 1614, M. Alter selected the readings of the four Gospels, and from a manuscript in the imperial library, the readings of the Acts and Epistles, which are printed in his edition of the Greek New Testament. (Vienna, 1787, 2 vols. 8vo.) Dr. Dobrowsky states that these various lections are given with great accuracy, but that those which Matthai has selected from the Revelation are erroneous and useless. Griesbach has given a catalogue of the Slavonic manuscripts collated for his edition of the New Testament, communicated to him by Dobrowsky.⁵

IV. ANGLO-SAXON VERSION.—Although Christianity was planted in Britain in the first century, it does not appear that the Britons had any translation of the Scriptures in their language earlier than the eighth century. About the year 706, Adhelm, the first bishop of Sherborn, translated the Psalter into Saxon; and at his earnest persuasion, Egbert or Eadfrid, bishop of Lindisfarne, or Holy Island, soon after executed a Saxon version of the Four Gospels.⁶ Not many years after this, the learned and venerable Bede (who died A. D. 735) translated the entire Bible into that language. There were other Saxon versions, either of the whole or of detached portions of the Scriptures, of a later date. A translation of the book of Psalms was undertaken by the illustrious King Alfred, who died A. D. 900, when it was about half finished; and Elfric, who was archbishop of Canterbury in 995, translated the Pentateuch, Joshua, Job, Judith, part of the book of Kings, Esther, and Maccabees. The entire Anglo-Saxon version of the Bible has never been printed: King Alfred's translation of the Psalms, with the interlineary Latin text, was edited by John Spelman, 4to. London, 1640; and there is another Saxon interlineary translation of the Psalter, deposited in the Archiepiscopal Library at Lambeth. Of the Four Gospels, there have been three editions printed; an account of which will be found in the BIBLIOGRAPHICAL APPENDIX TO VOL. II., PART I. CHAP. I. SECT. V. § 4. [iv.]

The Anglo-Saxon version being evidently translated from the Old Latin, Michaelis is of opinion that it may be of use in determining the readings of that version; and Semler has remarked, that it contains many readings which vary both from the Greek and Latin texts, of which he has given some examples. Dr. Mill selected various lections from this version: which, from the difference of style and inequalities observable in its execution, he ascribes to several authors: it is supposed to have been executed in the eighth century.⁷

 On the application of ancient versions to the ascertaining of various readings, see pp. 286, 287. infra.; and on the benefit which may be derived from them in the interpretation of the Scriptures, see Part II. Book I. Chap. II. Sect. I. § 2. of this volume.

SECTION IV.

ON THE AUTHORITY OF ANCIENT EDITIONS OF THE SCRIPTURE, CONSIDERED AS A SOURCE OF THE TEXT OF THE OLD AND NEW TESTAMENTS.

THE first and fundamental editions, whether of the Old or of the New Testament, are of equal authority with the manuscript from which they were derived. Referring the reader to the Bibliographical Appendix to Vol. II. for a detailed account of the various editions of the Old and New Testament,⁸ we may here remark that almost all other editions of the OLD TESTAMENT owe their origin either to that of Soncino, printed in 1488, to that of Brescia in 1494, which was followed by the Complutensian Polyglott in 1517; or lastly, to the second Bomberg edition printed at Venice in 1525–26. Almost all editions of the Hebrew Bible are masoretic, that is, have the masoretic notes and vowel points, a few only excepted, in which corrections have been introduced from manuscripts. Among the latter, De Rossi reckons all those which preceded the second Bomberg edition, that of 1525–26. All the later editions he terms masoretic; the non-masoretic editions are the more valuable.

With respect to the NEW TESTAMENT, after a few detached portions had been separately printed,⁹ two Editiones Principes of the entire New Testament (both derived from manuscripts alone) were published in the sixteenth century, viz. that of Erasmus, and that in the Complutensian Polyglott, the editors of which availed themselves of only a few critical aids in arranging the Greek text. According to one or other of these fundamental editions, many other editions were printed in the course of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Among the editions printed about the middle of the sixteenth century those of Robert Stephens¹⁰ claim a special notice, from his having collated many manuscripts which had not before been consulted. The text of Stephens's editions was reprinted several times. Theodore Beza, however, was the first who undertook a new revision of the text of the New Testament, with the aid of a more copious critical apparatus than his predecessors had enjoyed. Beza's text, which was first published in 1582, became the basis of numerous minor editions, until the publication of the editions printed by the Elzevirs at Leyden, in 1624 and 1633, the text of which is formed partly after that of Beza and of Stephens; and which, from its general adoption in the majority of subsequent editions, has received the appellation of the textus receptus.

SECTION V.

ON THE QUOTATIONS FROM THE NEW TESTAMENT IN THE WORKS OF THE FATHERS OF THE CHURCH AND OTHER ECCLESIASTICAL WRITERS.

A FOURTH source of the text of Scripture is the Quotations made from the Old and New Testaments in the writings of the FATHERS and other ECCLESIASTICAL WRITERS.

• The earliest portion of the New Testament, printed in Greek, is the hymns of Mary and of Zacharias in Luke i. 46–55. 68–80. They are found in the appendix to an edition of the Book of Psalms in Greek. Venice, 1486, in quarto. These portions were followed by the first six chapters of Saint John's Gospel in the appendix to the Aldine edition of Gregory Nazianzen's poems, translated into Latin. Venice, 1604. 4to. Verses 1–14. of the first chapter of Saint John's Gospel appeared at Tubingen in 1514, and in 1520 Melancthon edited Saint Paul's Epistle to the Romans at Wittemberg, in 8vo. The little demand for the original text of the New Testament, at that period, has been attributed to the universal acquiescence in the use of the Latin Vulgate version, of which there were numerous editions printed at the close of the fifteenth and at the commencement of the sixteenth century. ⁴ Dr. Henderson corroborates this account of Dr. Dobrowsky, and states that this version "may be considered as one of the most verbal ever executed. Not only is every word and particle scrupulously expressed, and made, in general, to occupy the same place in the translation that it does in the original, but the derivation and compounds, as well as the grammatical forms, are all successfully imitated." (Griesbach, Prolegomena, vol. i. pp. cxxvii.—cxxxi. Beck, Monographia Hermeneutices Novi Testamenti, pp. 108, 109. Hug, vol. i. pp. 513–517.)

⁶ The manuscript of this translation is now deposited in the Cottonian Library in the British Museum (Nero, D. iv.): Mr. Astle has given a specimen of it in plate xiv. of his "Origin and Progress of Writing," and has described it in pp. 100, 101.

Among the ancient Fathers of the church, those are particularly worthy of attention and collation who wrote in the Greek language; because they spoke, and read, and wrote that very language in which the sacred writings of the New Testament were originally composed. The phrase and diction of those writings were, therefore, familiar to them; they naturally expressed themselves in the Scripture style and language. When they referred to any texts of Scripture, or discoursed more at large upon them, they would of course be guided by the original Greek of the New Testament, and not by any version which had been made, and which might possibly vary from it: whereas the Latin fathers being accustomed only to the Latin version, it is as much to be expected that they should conform their language, quotations, and comments to it; though, perhaps, upon some occasions, and according to their ability, taking notice also of the Greek original. A Latin father will be an evidence for the Latin version, where he takes no express notice of the Greek; and according to the clearness and fullness of that evidence, we may argue, that the Latin version, or some copy or copies of it, had that reading in his time, which is cited by him. And this may deserve to be attended to with regard to any omissions in the Greek MSS. which the Latin may be thought to have supplied; but still the testimony of the Latin father in this case will prove nothing more than the reading of a Latin version: by what authority that version is supported is a matter of further inquiry. Indeed where it can be shown that a Latin father followed no particular version, but translated directly for himself (as Tertullian and Cyprian have frequently done); this brings us somewhat nearer to some manuscript in the original language, and may be considered, according as it shall happen to be circumstantiated, as a distinct testimony for the reading of some Greek manuscript in particular. The Greek fathers generally quote the Old Testament from the Septuagint version. Origen and Jerome are the only fathers who certainly made use of Hebrew manuscripts; and their evidence is equivalent to that of manuscripts of their age.

Upwards of one hundred and eighty fathers and other ecclesiastical writers, besides Catena (or expositions of portions of Scripture compiled from collections out of several authors), are enumerated by Professor Scholz, as having cited the New Testament, either from the original Greek, or from the ancient Ante-Hieronymian Latin, and from the Syriac versions. (Those fathers who confined themselves exclusively to the use of the Latin Vulgate are designedly omitted.) Among the ancient writers, the critical testimonies of the following are justly valued, viz.:—in the second century, Irenæus and Clemens Alexandrinus; in the third century, Origen; in the fourth century, Gregory bishop of Nyssa, Gregory bishop of Nazianzum, and Chrysostom bishop of Constantinople; in the fifth century, Cyril of Alexandria, Theodoret, and Isidore of Pelusium; in the eleventh century, Theophylact; and in the twelfth century, Euthymius Zigabenus.

As the criteria laid down by Michaelis and other eminent critics, for determining the text of Scripture from quotations of it in the writings of the FATHERS, more properly belong to the subject of Various Readings (see pp. 288, 289, infra), the following remarks on the relative value of the testimonies contained in the works of the writers just enumerated, may be found worthy of attention:—

1. IRENÆUS.—It is to be regretted that so few fragments of this father's writings are now extant in the original Greek. What has been transmitted to us has been found only in an ancient Latin version, the author of which appears to have inserted the quotations made by Irenæus from some ancient Latin translation of the Scriptures, or has rendered them inaccurately. It is evident, however, from those passages which are cited in the original Greek, that this father made use of different manuscripts; and though he sometimes coincides with the Alexandrine recension, yet he most frequently agrees with the Constantinopolitan recension.

2. CLEMENS ALEXANDRINUS mostly cites the New Testament from memory; but those passages which he has given accurately agree with the manuscripts of the Alexandrine family. Griesbach has given a collection of the passages quoted by Clemens and Origen, collated with the common or vulgate Greek text, in the second volume of his Symbolæ Criticæ, pp. 227—620.

3. ORIGEN used the Alexandrine text, of which he had many manuscripts. His readings are known from the references made by subsequent ecclesiastical writers to his copies of the Scriptures, as well as from his own quotations, and also from fragments inserted in the Greek Catena, and ascribed to him.

4. 5. The quotations which are to be found in the writings of GREGORY bishop of Nyssa, and GREGORY bishop of Nazianzum, chiefly agree with the Constantinopolitan recension. Scholz states that these authors have so interwoven passages of Scripture in their works, that they cannot be easily detached; consequently but few various readings, and those not very important, are to be gleaned from them.

6. Great caution is requisite in making use of the quotations of CHRYSOSTOM, bishop of Constantinople; for though in his admirable commentaries on the New Testament, he very frequently adduces the very words of the sacred writers, yet, distracted by the multiplicity of business in which he was engaged, or borne away by his ardour in writing, he has cited a great number of passages from memory. Consequently, he has confounded together similar passages of the same author or of different writers: in some instances he has changed a text which he had just before quoted correctly, and very often he follows Origen. The text, therefore, which is found in Chrysostom's works, sometimes agrees with the Constantinopolitan, and sometimes with the Alexandrine recension. The entire writings of this father were collated by Matthæi; and select passages by Scholz.

7. CYRIL of Alexandria faithfully follows the Alexandrine text.

8. THEODORET, bishop of Cyra in Syria, in his commentaries for the most part agrees with the received text, though he has sometimes rashly followed either Origen or Chrysostom.

9. ISIDORE of Pelusium agrees with the manuscripts of the Alexandrine family.

10. THEOPHYLACT, archbishop of Bulgaria, in his commentaries on the Gospels, Acts, and Epistles, mostly agrees with the received text, but he also has many Alexandrine readings.

11. Lastly, EUTHYMIUS Zigabenus for the most part agrees with the Constantinopolitan text in his commentaries on the Gospels, which are chiefly collected from the writings of Basil, Gregory of Nazianzum, and Chrysostom.²

SECTION VI.

ON THE VARIOUS READINGS OCCURRING IN THE OLD AND NEW TESTAMENTS.

§ 1. ON THE CAUSES OF VARIOUS READINGS.

I. The Christian faith not affected by what are called various readings.—II. Nature of various readings.—Difference between them and mere errata.—III. Notice of the principal collations and collections of various readings.—IV. Causes of various readings:—1. The negligence or mistakes of transcribers;—2. Errors or imperfections in the manuscript copied;—3. Critical conjecture;—4. Wilful corruptions of a manuscript from party-motives.

I. THE Old and New Testaments, in common with all other ancient writings, being preserved and diffused by transcription, the admission of mistakes was unavoidable; which increasing with the multitude of copies, necessarily produced a great variety of different readings. Hence the labours of learned men have been directed to the collation of manuscripts, with a view to ascertain the genuine reading; and the result of their researches has shown, that these variations are not such as to affect our faith or practice in any thing material: they are mostly of a minute, and sometimes of a trifling, nature. "The real text of the sacred writers does not now (since the originals have been so long lost) lie in any single manuscript or edition, but is dispersed in them all. It is competently exact indeed, even in the worst manuscript now extant; nor is one article of faith or moral precept either perverted or lost in them." It is therefore a very ungrounded fear that the number of various readings, particularly in the New Testament, may diminish the certainty of the Christian religion. The probability, Michaelis remarks, of restoring the genuine text of any author, increases with the increase of the copies; and the most inaccurate and mutilated editions of ancient writers are precisely those, of whose works the fewest manuscripts remain.¹ Above all, in the New Testament, the various readings show that there could have been no collusion; but that the manuscripts were written independently of each other, by persons separated by distance of time, remoteness of place, and diversity of opinions. This extensive independency of manuscripts on each other is the effectual check of wilful alteration; which must have ever been immediately corrected by the agreement of copies from various and distant regions out of the reach of the interpolator. By far the greatest number of various readings relate to trifles, many of which cannot be made apparent in a translation; and, of the rest, very few produce any alteration in the meaning of a sentence, still less in the purport of a whole paragraph. Thus we have Δαδδ for Δαυδ; Σελουμαντα for Σαλουμαντα; και for δε; καγω for και εγω (Et for and I); εαπτων for εαπσων; Κυρις for Θεος; αλλαωιν for αλλαωσιν; Μωυσης for Μαυσης; and γινεσθω for γινεσθαι; all which in most cases may be used indifferently.

In order to illustrate the preceding remarks, and to convey an idea of their full force to the reader, the various readings of the first ten verses of St. John's Gospel are annexed in Greek and English;—and they are particularly chosen because they contain one of the most decisive proofs of the divinity of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

¹ Michaelis's Introduction to the New Testament, vol. i. pp. 263—268. "In profane authors," says Dr. Bentley, "(as they are called), whereof one manuscript only had the luck to be preserved,—as Velleius Paterculus among the Latins, and Hesychius among the Greeks,—the faults of the scribes are found so numerous, and the defects so beyond all redress, that notwithstanding the pains of the learnedest and acutest critics for two whole centuries, those books still are, and are likely to continue, a mere heap of errors. On the contrary, where the copies of any author are numerous, though the various readings always increase in proportion, there the text, by an accurate collation of them made by skillful and judicious hands, is ever the more correct, and comes nearer to the true words of the author." from the fathers,—nowhere contradict the sense of the evangelist; nor do they produce any material alteration in the text.²

II. However plain the meaning of the term "Various Reading," may be, considerable difference has existed among learned men concerning its nature. Some have allowed the name only to such readings as may possibly have proceeded from the author; but this restriction is improper. Michaelis's distinction between mere errata and various readings appears to be the true one. "Among two or more different readings, one only can be the true reading; and the rest must be either wilful corruptions or mistakes of the copyist." It is often difficult to distinguish the genuine from the spurious; and whenever the smallest doubt can be entertained, they all receive the name of VARIOUS READINGS; but in cases where the transcriber has evidently written falsely, they receive the name of errata.

III. Human life is too short to allow of a thorough examination of all those monuments which are indispensably necessary to sacred criticism, in addition to the many other subjects which are equally worthy of attention. But, as many learned men have from time to time investigated different documents, extensive collections of various readings have gradually been formed, of which the critic should avail himself.

With regard to the OLD TESTAMENT, some beginnings were made by those ancient Jews to whom we owe the rejections and corrections of the scribes, and other observations, already noticed in pp. 201, 202, 203. of this volume. More recently the rabbis Todrosi, Menahem, and Norzi, collected a larger apparatus.³ Sebastian Munster was the first Christian editor, who in 1536 added some various readings. Not many more are found in Vander Hooght's edition, printed in 1705; but in the subsequent editions of John Henry Michaelis, in 1726, and of Houbigant in 1753, the critical collation of various readings was very considerably enlarged. At length, after many years of unremitting toil, Dr. Kennicott produced his edition of the Hebrew Bible, printed at Oxford in 1776—80, which contained various readings collected throughout Europe, from six hundred and fifteen manuscripts, from fifty-two editions, and from both the Talmuds. From this apparatus De Rossi selected the more important readings; and after collating seven hundred and thirty-one other manuscripts and three hundred editions, and examining fully the ancient versions and books of the rabbins, even in manuscript, he published all the various readings he had observed, in four volumes, quarto, in 1784—88, at Parma, to which he added a supplement or scholia, in 1798. As the price of their publication necessarily places them out of the reach of very many biblical students, the reader, who is desirous of availing himself of the results of their laborious and learned researches, will find a compendious abstract of them in Mr. Hamilton's "Codex Criticus," (London, 1821, 8vo.)

For the SEPTUAGINT VERSION, the principal collation of various readings will be found in the edition commenced by Dr. Holmes, and completed by the Rev. Dr. Parsons, at Oxford, in 1798—1827, in six volumes, folio.

For the NEW TESTAMENT, the principal collations are those of Erasmus, the editors of the Complutensian and London Polyglotts, Bishop Fell, Dr. Mill, Kuster, Bengel, Wetstein, Griesbach, Matthæi, and Scholz. The collations of three hundred and fifty-five manuscripts, besides ancient versions and quotations from the fathers, were given in Dr. Griesbach's edition; and in that of Dr. Scholz we have the collations of six hundred and seventy-four manuscripts, viz. three hundred and forty-three, which were collated by his predecessors, and three hundred and thirty-one, which for the first time were collated by himself.⁴

IV. As all manuscripts were either dictated to copyists or transcribed by them, and as these persons were not supernaturally guarded against the possibility of error, different readings would naturally be produced:—1. By the negligence or mistakes of the transcribers; to which we may add, 2. The existence of errors or imperfections in the manuscripts copied; 3. Critical emendations of the text; and, 4. Wilful corruptions made to serve the purposes of a party. Mistakes thus produced in one copy would of course be propagated ancient manuscripts. A few specimens of such abbreviations are given in the preceding part of this volume.

From this source probably originated the reading in 1 Pet. ii. 3. of Χριστός (Christ) instead of Χρηστος (gracious), which occurs in the MSS. by Griesbach numbered 40, 63, and others of less note, in Matthew's g. in some printed editions, and also in the verse as cited by Clemens Alexandrinus, Gregory Nazianzen, and Procopius, and by Theophylact in his commentary on this text. The reading in the manuscript whence the transcriber made his copy must have been ΧΣ, which, not being understood by him, he altered into Χριστός.

(8.) Lastly, the ignorance or negligence of transcribers has been a most fruitful source of various readings, by their having mistaken marginal notes or scholia for a part of the text. It was not unusual in ancient manuscripts to write in the margin an explanation of difficult passages, or a word synonymous to that in the text, but more usual and more easily understood, or with the intent of supplying a seeming deficiency; any or all of which might, in the copies taken from the manuscript in which these notes were written, be easily obtruded on the text itself.

Thus, to Matt. vi. 33. some copies, as well as the fathers Clemens Alexandrinus, Origen, and Eusebius, add the following clause, as having been uttered by Jesus Christ:—Αιτιῖς τε μεγάλαις, καὶ ταῖς μικραῖς ὅναι προσέτιται, καὶ αἰτιῖς τε ἐπουρανίαις καὶ ταῖς ἐγγύσι προστίθεται ὑμῖν.—Seek ye great things, and little things shall be added unto you; and seek ye heavenly things, and earthly things shall be added unto you. But this addition is manifestly a gloss.

So, in Mark vii. 35, after he spoke plain, the following sentence is added in MS. 90 of Griesbach's notation:—καὶ ἔλαλει τὸ ὄνομα τὸν Θεοῦ,—and he spoke, praising God. That the man did this, we may readily conclude; but the sentence was not added by the evangelist. It was evidently a gloss.

Again, in Luke vi. 16, after the sentence God hath visited his people, the words εὐχάρστησεν, for good, are added in the manuscripts by Griesbach noted M. 13, 50, 69, 71, 106, 114, and eight others, in Matthew's x. in the Syriac (as printed in the London Polyglott), in the Armenian, and in all the Arabic versions, and in the Codices Veronensis, Vercellensis, Corbeiensis, Colbertinus 4051, San-germanensis 1, and Forojulienis, of the Old Italic version. But it is manifestly a gloss, and is rejected as such by Dr. Mill and Griesbach.

It is worthy of remark, that the differences caused by these or similar additions do in no respect whatever affect any point of faith or morality. Several eminent critics, for instance, are of opinion that the controverted clause in 1 John v. 7, 8, crept into the text in this manner; because it is not found in any ancient manuscripts, nor in the writings of the fathers who disputed against the Arians. The evidence for the passage in question is fully considered in Vol. II. Part VI. pp. 366–376. But, for the sake of argument, let us suppose it to be an omission in the manuscripts where it is wanting, or an addition to those where it occurs; it cannot in any way be prejudicial to the Christian faith; because, whatever sense we may put upon that passage, the same truth being most clearly and indisputably taught in other places of the New Testament, there is no more occasion for adding it, than there is inconvenience in omitting it.

2. ERRORS OR IMPERFECTIONS in the manuscript from which a transcriber copied, are a further source of various readings.

Besides the mistakes arising from the strokes of certain letters being faded or erased, others of a contrary nature may arise from the transparency of the paper or vellum, whence the stroke of a letter on one side of the leaf may seem to be a part of the letter on the other side of the leaf, and in this manner O may be taken for Θ.

According to Wetstein, this very accident happened to Mill, in examining the celebrated passage (1 Tim. iii. 16.) in the Codex Alexandrinus. Mill had asserted in regard to the OC in this manuscript, that some remains of a stroke were still visible in the middle of the omicron, and concluded therefore that the word was properly ΘC. But Wetstein, who examined this manuscript more accurately, could discover no trace of any stroke in the omicron, but took notice of a circumstance which he supposed led Mill into error. On the other side of the leaf, directly opposite to it, is the letter C, in the word ΕΙΘΕΒΕΙΑ, the middle stroke of which is visible on the former side, and occupies the hollow of O. Wetstein, having made the discovery, called several persons to witness, who confirmed the truth of it. But this hypothesis of Wetstein's has been questioned by Dr. Woide,¹ and has been most clearly disproved by Dr. Berriman.² In order to discover the genuine reading of a manuscript where the letters are faded, Michaelis recommends the critic to have recourse to such as are related to it, either in time, place, or character, and if possible to those which were immediately copied from it while the letters were still legible. Velthusen and Griesbach are unanimous in regard to the propriety of this rule, but in their application of it to 1 Tim. iii. 16. they have drawn directly opposite conclusions. Those who endeavour to supply what time has destroyed, and venture to write anew the remnant, or seeming remnant, of a faded stroke, are guilty of an act that deserves the highest censure: the Codex Alexandrinus, Codex Ephrem, and Codex Claromontanus, have all suffered in this manner, but the authors of these amendments have deprived their successors of the means of judging for themselves, and have defeated the end which they intended to answer.

Again, the omission of a passage in an ancient manuscript, which the writer added afterwards in the margin, might lead a copyist into error, unless it was particularly marked in what part of the text the passage ought to be inserted. Many manuscripts are still extant, in which omissions are in this manner supplied, especially in those preserved at Moscow, which Matthæi has extracted and accurately described in his critical edition of the New Testament.

3. A third source of various readings is CRITICAL CONJECTURE, or an intended improvement of the original text.

"In reading the works of an author of known literary reputation we ascribe grammatical or orthographical errors, if any are to be found, rather to a mistake of the printer than to a want of knowledge in the writer. In the same manner the transcriber of a manuscript attributes the faults of his original to the error of a former copyist, and alters them as he supposes they were written by the author. But if he carries his critical conjectures too far, he falls himself into the error which he intended to avoid." This may be done in various ways.

(1.) Thus the transcriber may take an expression to be faulty which in reality is not so; or he may mistake the sense of the author, and suppose that he has discovered a grammatical error, when, in fact, he himself construes falsely:—or the grammatical error intended to be corrected actually proceeded from the author himself.³

(2.) Further, some critical copyists have not only corrected ungrammatical or inaccurate expressions, but have even converted inelegant into elegant phrases; and they have likewise omitted words that appeared to them superfluous, or the difference of which they did not understand.

Thus, in Mark vii. 37. τοὺς πολλοὺς, the dumb, is omitted as superfluous in Griesbach's MS. 28. (Colbertinus 4705, or Colbertinus 2. of Dr. Mill's notation.) So, in Mark x. 19. Μὴ ἀπορνήσῃς, defraud not, is omitted in the Codices Vaticanus and Cypricus, and in eighteen other manuscripts, as well as in the Armenian version, and also in Theophylact. It seems included in μὴ κλέψῃς, do not steal, and does not occur in the other Gospels. Once more, λεγοντος, saying, (Matt. i. 22.), is omitted, because the transcriber deemed it an unnecessary addition after the words, that which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet.

(3.) But of all the sources of various lections which are referable to this head, the most ample, according to Michaelis, and the most productive of spurious passages in the New Testament, is the practice of altering parallel passages so as to render more perfect their conformity to each other. The Gospels in particular have suffered in this way; and Saint Paul's Epistles have very frequently been interpolated, in order to make his quotations from the Old Testament harmonize with the Septuagint version, where they differed from the exact words of the latter.

Two or three instances of alterations from parallel passages will confirm this remark.

Thus, in Matt. xii. 8. For the son of man is lord even of the sabbath-day, καὶ, even, is omitted in eighty-seven manuscripts, and in several printed editions, as well as in the Syriac, Arabic, the Persian in Bp. Walton's Polyglott, the Coptic, Armenian, Slavonic, and Italic versions, and also in the passage as quoted by Tertullian, Cypricus, Origen, Chrysostom, Euthymius, and Theophylact. It has been added from the parallel passage in Mark ii. 28. or in Luke vi. 5; and is justly rejected by Griesbach as an interpolation. In Matt. xii. 35. τὴς καρδίας, of the heart, is wanting in one hundred and seven manuscripts as well as in several printed editions, and in the Arabic, Persian, Slavonic, Anglo-Saxon, Old Italic, and Vulgate version; it is also wanting in the passage as cited by Origen, the author of the Dialogue against the Marcionites, Gregory Nazianzen, Gregory of Nyssa, Chrysostom, Theophylact, Cypricus, Lucifer, Hilary, and Ambrosiaster. It has been inserted from the parallel place in Luke vi. 45.

The clause in Matt. xxvii. 35. ὡς παρρησίᾳ τὸ ρηθὲν (that it might be fulfilled which was spoken), &c. to the end of that verse, is omitted in one hundred and sixty-one manuscripts in the Syriac MSS. and also in some Syriac editions, in the Arabic version both MSS. and also as printed in Bp. Walton's Polyglott, in the Persian version of the Polyglott, in all the manuscripts, and in most printed editions of the Coptic, Sahidic, Ethiopic, and Slavonic versions, in most MSS. and editions of the Vulgate Latin version, in several MSS. of the old Italic version; and likewise in the verse as cited by Chrysostom, Titus of Bostra, Euthymius, Theophylact, Origen, the old Latin translator of Irenæus, Augustine, and Juvenius. This clause has been interpolated from John xii. 24. Griesbach justly omits it as decidedly spurious.

Numerous similar interpolations have been made in the Acts of the Apostles, by these supposed amendments; and where the same story is related more than once, transcribers, and more frequently translators, have supplied from the one what seemed to be deficient in the other. Not to multiply examples unnecessarily in illustration of this last remark, it will be sufficient to compare the narrative of Saint Paul's conversion, as related by Saint Luke (Acts ix.), with the apostle's own account of it in Acts xxii. and xxvi.; and also the two narratives of the conversion of Cornelius, described in Acts x. and xi.

(4.) Lastly, some critics have altered the text of the New Testament in conformity to the Vulgate version; but various readings, which are evidently derived from this source, are utterly undeserving of attention.

¹ With regard to these corrections of grammatical errors, Michaelis has laid down the four following rules; viz.

"1. In those passages where we find only an apparent grammatical error, the seemingly erroneous reading may be generally considered as the genuine, and the other readings as corrections, and therefore spurious.

"2. Real grammatical errors, in the works of a correct and classical writer, are justly ascribed to a mistake of the copyist, and the same sentiments may be entertained of an author of less eminence, when among several copies one or two only have the false reading.

"3. But when expressions that deviate from the strictness of grammar are found in the writings of an author who had not the advantage of a learned education, and was totally regardless of the accuracy of his style, not in single but repeated instances, and retained in a very great number of manuscripts, they must be attributed, not to the transcriber, but the author.

"4. When one grammatical error in particular is frequently found in one and the same writing, as the improper use of the nominative in the book of Revelation, no doubt can be made that it proceeded from the author himself."—Michaelis vol. i. p. 306.

4. WILFUL CORRUPTIONS, in order to serve the purposes of a party, whether orthodox or heterodox, are another source of various readings.

Among the ancient heretics no one has been more severely charged with falsifying the sacred text, in order to support his tenets, nor has any one more justly deserved the censure, which has been bestowed upon such unwarrantable conduct, than Marcion. Yet Michaelis has shown that all his deviations from the text in common use are not wilful corruptions, but that many of them are really various readings; and he has explicated the Arians from the same charge.¹ It is, however, well known that Marcion caused the first two chapters of Saint Luke's Gospel to disappear from his copy, as also Luke iv. 37, 38, 39. In Luke vii. 19, he also expunged the words μετὰ τὸν πατέρα καὶ τὸν υἱόν, his mother and brethren. In Mark xv. 28, instead of οὗτος ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, he was numbered with the transgressors, the ἐπιτιμαῖς τῶν ὑπερβύτων, dead, in order to support their hypothesis, that Christ's body was an aerial form and not human.

On the other hand, it is a fact that some corruptions have been designedly made by those who are termed orthodox, and have subsequently been preferred when so made, in order to favour some received opinion, or to preclude an objection against it. As this is a source of various readings (we believe) but little known, and less considered, we shall adduce two or three examples from Pfaff's dissertation on various readings, who has considered the subject at length.

(1.) Mark xiii. 32. Οὐδὲ οὖτος. These words are omitted in some manuscripts, and rejected by some of the fathers, because they thought it favoured the Arians. Ambrose, who flourished in the fourth century, states that many manuscripts in his time omitted them.

(2.) Luke i. 35. Αὐτὸς ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, the words ὁ υἱὸς have been added in several manuscripts in the Syriac, Persian, Arabic, Ethiopic, and other translations, as well as in numerous quotations of the fathers, in opposition to the Eutychians, who denied the two natures of Jesus Christ.

(3.) Luke xxii. 43. The whole verse is omitted in the Alexandrian and some other manuscripts, because some orthodox Christians imagined that the mention of an angel's strengthening our Saviour, during his agony in the garden, detracted from his Deity.

(4.) 1 Cor. v. 6. Saint Paul asserts that Christ appeared after his resurrection to the τρεῖς ἀδελφαί, though at that time two of the number were wanting, Thomas being absent, and Judas Iscariot being dead. Some manuscripts therefore read ἑξήκοντα, essexen, lest the sacred historian should be charged with falsehood, though every attentive reader of the New Testament knows that the apostle, in writing this, used the figure called synecdoche, in which a part is put for the whole.

(5.) Matt. i. 18. Ἐπὶ τὴν συνίτην αὐτοῦ (before they came together), and 25, αὐτὴν τὴν πρωτότοκον (her first born), are in some copies designedly omitted, lest any should doubt the perpetual virginity of Mary the mother of Christ.

§ 2. SOURCES WHENCE THE TRUE READINGS ARE TO BE DETERMINED.

- I. Manuscripts.—II. The most ancient and the best editions.—III. Ancient versions.—IV. The writings of Josephus (for the Old Testament).—V. Parallel passages.—VI. Quotations from the Old and New Testaments in the works of the fathers.—VII. Critical conjecture.

The causes of various readings being thus ascertained, the next step is to consider the SOURCES WHENCE THE TRUE READINGS ARE TO BE DETERMINED.

The legitimate sources of emendation are, 1. Manuscripts; 2. The most ancient and best Editions; 3. Ancient versions (and, for the Old Testament in particular, the Samaritan text of the Pentateuch, together with the Masora, and the Talmud); 4. The Writings of Josephus (for the Old Testament); 5. Parallel Passages; 6. Quotations from the Old and New Testaments in the works of the Fathers; 7. Fragments of Heretical Writings; and, 8. Critical Conjecture. But these various sources are all to be used with great judgment and caution, as being fallible criteria; nor is the common reading ever to be rejected but upon the most rational grounds.

I. MANUSCRIPTS.—Having already given some observations on the age of manuscripts, together with an account of some of the most ancient,¹ it will only be necessary that we should in this place offer a few hints concerning their relative value, and the application of them to the determination of various readings.

1. In general, then, we may affirm that the present copies of the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, under the guardianship of the Jewish, Samaritan, and Christian churches, agreeing in every thing essential, are of the same authenticity and authority with the original autographs; notwithstanding the errors that have crept into them, from whatever cause.

2. The number of manuscripts, however, is not so much to be considered, as their quality, antiquity, and agreement with the most ancient interpreters; for the true reading may be preserved in a single manuscript.

3. Those manuscripts are to be accounted the best, which are most consonant with those used by the ancient interpreters; and, with regard to the Old Testament, in particular, M. de Rossi states, that those manuscripts are in every case preferable which have not been tampered with by the Masoretes, and which have the Chaldee paraphrase interjected, in alternate verses.

4. Although, other things being equal, the more anciently and accurately written manuscripts are to be preferred, yet a recent and incorrect copy may often have the better reading, because it may have been transcribed from an excellent and ancient copy.

5. An accurate manuscript is preferable to one that is negligently written.

Various readings, therefore, particularly in the Hebrew Scriptures, which are found in manuscripts transcribed by a learned person, or for a learned person, from some celebrated or corrected copy, are to be preferred to those written for private use; and the readings found in ancient and unprinted manuscripts, written for the use of the synagogue, are better than those found in Masoretic exemplars.

6. The first erased reading of a manuscript is not always an error of the copyist, nor is the second substituted one always the better reading. Both are to be tried by the touchstone of the ancient versions, and in the Pentateuch by the Samaritan text also.

7. Other things being equal, Michaelis states, that a lectionarium is not of equal value with a manuscript of the same antiquity that contains the books of the New Testament complete, because in the former the text was frequently altered, according to the readings which were most approved at the time when it was written; though lectionaria sometimes have readings of great importance.²

8. In reckoning up the number of manuscripts for or against any particular reading, it will be necessary,

First, To distinguish properly between one manuscript and another, that the same MS. be not counted twice over, and consequently one pass for two.

This (it is now ascertained) was the case with the Codex Bezae, which has been proved to be the same which was the second of Stephens's MSS. marked β, and not two distinct manuscripts. Wherever, therefore, a number of manuscripts bears evident marks of having been transcribed in succession, that is, each of them being first a copy taken from another, and then an original having a copy taken from it, or where all are taken from one common original, they are not to be considered as furnishing so many different instances of various reading, but should be estimated only as one, whose authority resolves itself into that of the first manuscript. Inattention to this circumstance has contributed to increase the number of various readings beyond what they really are. But though two manuscripts, one of which is copied from the other, can be admitted only as a single evidence, yet, if a word is faded in the more ancient one, it may be supplied from that which is more modern. Manuscripts which, though not immediately copied from each other, exhibit a great uniformity in their readings, seem to be the produce of the same country, and to have, as it were, the usual readings of that country. A set of manuscripts of this kind is to be considered as the same edition, in which it is of no importance to the authenticity of a reading whether five hundred or five thousand copies be taken. Numbers alone, therefore, decide nothing in the present instance.

SECONDLY, We must carefully observe what part of the Scriptures the several manuscripts actually contain, and in what respects they are defective.

There are few MSS. extant, which contain either the Old or the New Testament entire, and have been transmitted to us without loss and damage. Of the MSS. of the Old Testament, which have been described in pp. 213, 219 supra, not one is complete; and with regard to the New Testament, we have already seen that the Codices Alexandrinus, Vaticanus, and Leicestersis, are mutilated. Other MSS. contain the Gospels, or the Gospels and Acts of the Apostles; others, the Acts and Pauline Epistles, or the Catholic Epistles, or both; others have the Epistles by themselves; and there are several manuscripts which contain the whole of the New Testament except the Apocalypse; to which are to be added the lectionaries, or select portions of the New Testament, which were read as lessons, or Epistles and Gospels in the service of the church. Now it is absolutely necessary that we observe the state and condition of MSS., in order that we may avoid false conclusions and inferences from the non-production of a manuscript for a various reading by any editor of the New Testament, who professedly gives an account of the various readings of MSS., as if it therefore did not vary, when in reality the text itself was wanting therein; and also in order that we may not cite a MS. in favour of any reading, where in truth such MS. has no reading at all. From inattention to this obvious rule, *Anelotte*³ cited the first Codex of Stephens, the Complutensian, Cardinal Ximenes's, Cisneros's, and that of Alcalá, as so many different manuscripts, when, in fact, there was but one and the same printed edition.

THIRDLY, We must also observe whether the MSS. have been entirely and exactly collated.

Sometimes, perhaps, only the more noted and important texts have been consulted. This was the case with the Codex Claromontanus, as collated by Beza, and also with the MSS. of the Apostolic Epistles in the Archiepiscopal Library at Lambeth, which have only been collated for the controverted clause in 1 John v. 7. Sometimes also it happens that MSS. have come late into the hands of editors of the New Testament, after the printing was begun, and consequently only part of the various lections have been exhibited. This was the case both with Dr. Millard and Griesbach in their critical editions. Again, it sometimes happens that a manuscript has been collated in the beginning, but, from some accident or other, the collation of it has not been completed. This was the case with the Codex Cyprius, of which we had no entire collation until Dr. Scholz printed one at the end of his Dissertation on that manuscript,¹ and also with the Codex Montfortianus, which was collated in the Gospels and most parts of the Acts of the Apostles, and in part of the Epistle to the Romans. Nor had we any complete collation of it, until the Rev. Dr. Harrett printed one at the end of his fac-simile of the Codex Rescriptus of Matthew's Gospel, now preserved in the library of Trinity College, Dublin.² It is therefore absolutely necessary that we should inquire into these particulars, that we may not be deceived ourselves, or deceive others, by alleging an authority that has never been examined.

II. The best and most ancient PRINTED EDITIONS, an account of which is given in the Appendix to Volume II. are so far only to be admitted in evidence, as they are immediately taken from manuscripts. The various readings, however, which they contain, are not to be neglected, particularly those of the Hebrew Bibles printed in Rabbi Ben Chaim's or Hajim's Masoretic edition. In the New Testament, as the readings found in all the early printed editions rest on the authority of a few manuscripts which are not always the most ancient, the concurrence of all these editions cannot confer great authority on the readings adopted by them, in opposition to others which appear to be well supported.

III. THE ANCIENT VERSIONS (of which an account has already been given), though not free from error, nevertheless afford important assistance towards determining the true readings of passages, as they show what readings their authors considered to be genuine: but it is necessary that we consult only correct texts of such versions.

1. Ancient Versions are a legitimate source of emendation, unless upon collation we have reason to conclude that the translators of them were clearly mistaken.

One or two examples will illustrate this remark. In James v. 12, many MSS., the Arabic of the London Polyglott, the Armenian and the Slavonic versions, as also the Monk Antiochus, Occumenius, and Theophylact, read ἡ μὴ ἡσυχασμένη ψυχή, lest ye fall into hypocrisy. But the Codices Alexandrinus and Vaticanus, and several other manuscripts, besides the printed editions, and the Syriac, Arabic (as edited by Erpenius), Coptic, Ethiopic, Vulgate, and other versions, all read the clause as it appears in our authorized English version, which is unquestionably the true reading, viz. ἡ μὴ ἡσυχασμένη ψυχή, lest ye fall into condemnation. Again, in 1 Pet. v. 13, we read, ἀπὸ τῶν πάλαι ἡν ἐν Βαβυλῶνι συνεκλήθητι. Here some word is evidently to be supplied, in order to complete the sense. Dr. Mill conjectures that Peter's wife was intended. But the word ἐκκλησία, church, is found in the margin of two manuscripts (4. and 33. of Griesbach's notation), and in the Syriac, Arabic, Armenian, and Vulgate versions. It ought therefore to be received into the text. It is very properly supplied in Italic characters by the learned and venerable translators of our authorized English version, who render the verse thus:—The church that is at Babylon, elected together with you, saluted you. Once more, in 2 Pet. ii. 2, the apostle, predicting the false teachers who would corrupt the church by their destructive doctrines, says, that many shall follow, αὐτῶν τὰς ἀπολλύουσας, their destructions, that is, their pernicious ways (as our translators have rendered it), their heresies of destruction or destructive opinions, mentioned in the preceding verse. This reading, however, is only found in the MSS. 43. and 63. of Griesbach's notation (both of the twelfth century), and in a few others of no note. But instead of it, we read, ἀπολλύουσας, that is, lasciviousness or uncleanness, in the Codices A. B. C. (Alexandrinus, Vaticanus, and Ephremus); and in more than fifty other manuscripts, most of which are among the most ancient, correct, and authentic. This is also the reading of both the Syriac, all the Arabic, the Coptic, Ethiopic, Armenian, Slavonic, and Vulgate versions, and of the fathers Chrysostom, Theophilus, Occumenius, and Jerome. The word ἀπολλύουσας, lasciviousness, is, therefore, beyond all doubt, the true reading, and is very properly printed as such by Griesbach; and it points out the nature of the heresy intended by the apostle. It was a sort of antinomianism. The heretics alluded to pampered and indulged the lusts of the flesh; and if the Nicolaitans were meant, it is very applicable to them, for they taught the community of wives, &c.

2. Ancient manuscripts, supported by some of the ancient versions and by the sense, render a reading certainly right, though it be not found in the more modern.

In Isa. lviii. 10, we read, If thou draw out thy soul to the hungry. This, Bishop Lowth remarks, is a correct rendering of the present Hebrew text, but it is an obscure phrase, and without example in any other place. Instead, however, of לִנְפֹשׁ (napesh) thy soul, eight manuscripts (three of which are ancient) read לִנְחֵם (lanemex) thy bread; and so it is rendered in the Syriac version. The proper reading thereof is, draw out (or bring forth) thy bread. The Septuagint version expresses both words, τὸν σπῆν τῆς ψυχῆς σου, thy bread from thy soul.³

³ Gerard's Institutes, p. 271. Lowth's Isaiah, vol. ii. p. 343. Another eminent commentator, however, defends the common reading and rendering. He is of opinion, that the emendation above proposed is a gloss, and should not be adopted. "To draw out the soul in relieving the poor, is to do it not of constraint or necessity,—but cheerfully, and with both nervous and elegant. His soul pities, and his hand gives."—(Dr. A. Clarke on Isa. lviii. 10.)

3. The concurrence of the ancient versions is sufficient to establish a reading as certainly right, when the sense or parallel place shows both the propriety of that reading, and the corruption of what is found in the copies of the original.

Thus, in Prov. xviii. 21. (22. of English version) we read, Whoso findeth a wife, findeth a good thing. This is not true in every instance; it contradicts other maxims of the inspired writer, as Dr. Kennicott has shown, who is sufficiently eloquent on this occasion. He therefore conjectured that Solomon originally expressed himself thus: he that findeth a good wife, findeth a good thing, and obtaineth favour from the Lord. This reading derives a strong confirmation from the fact, that the epithet for good is uniformly found in the Septuagint Greek, the Syriac, Arabic, and Vulgate versions. It is likewise found in two ancient manuscript Chaldee paraphrases of the Book of Proverbs (one of which is at Cambridge, and the other in the King of Prussia's library at Berlin). All these concurring testimonies, together with the necessary sense of the text itself, prove that the Hebrew originally read, and ought to be so restored, He that findeth a good wife, findeth a good thing.⁴

4. The Samaritan Pentateuch, which is only a different copy of the same original text, being more ancient than the Babylonish captivity, and religiously preserved in the ancient Hebrew characters, is a legitimate source of emendation. Although it differs in many places from the present Hebrew text, and these differences have been made objections against its authority, because it has been taken for granted that it must be wrong wherever it is not conformable to the Hebrew; yet as this assumption proceeds on the erroneous supposition of the absolute integrity of the Masoretic copies, it ought not to be regarded.

Bauer has given a considerable number of rules for the application of the Samaritan Pentateuch to the determination of various readings, which he has illustrated by examples, for the whole of which we have not room. The following are such of his remarks as are of most general application:—

(1.) Where the Samaritan text has the larger sections repeated from the other chapters of the Pentateuch, it is interpolated, and the Hebrew text is on no account to be corrected from it.

(2.) Where the Samaritan text contains readings in support of the peculiar dogmas entertained by the Samaritans, there it is to be considered as altered by the fraud of that sect.

(3.) Where the Samaritan text more strictly follows the rules of grammar, avoiding enallages of number and gender; and on the other hand, where the Hebrew text departs from those rules, not frequently expressing the enallage both of number and gender;—in such cases the reading of the Hebrew text is preferable to that of the Samaritan.

(4.) Where the Samaritan text contains a clear reading, which removes any difficulty or obscurity, by the addition of a single word or phrase, there it has evidently been corrected by the Samaritan doctors, and the reading of the Hebrew copies is to be preferred. The application of this and the preceding canon to most of the corrections, which Houbigant conceived might be drawn from the Samaritan Pentateuch, will show that those corrections are of no value whatever.

(5.) Where a reading in the Samaritan text departs from that of the Hebrew text, in the guttural letters, the true reading is to be found in the latter.

(6.) A various reading in the Samaritan text, which appears to be derived from the resemblance of the shape of the letters, is to be rejected.

(7.) A reading in the Samaritan text which is entirely unsupported by the authority of the Masoretic copies, and of the ancient versions, is not to be regarded as the true one, and is not preferable to the Masoretic reading.

(8.) If the Samaritan text agrees with the Septuagint version (as frequently is the case), their testimony is to be considered but as one, from the very close affinity subsisting between them.

(9.) A various reading of the Samaritan Pentateuch is of the greatest value when it is confirmed by the ancient versions of Aquila and Symmachus, by the Syriac version, the Chaldee paraphrase, and the best and most ancient Hebrew MSS. Thus, in Gen. xxii. 13. instead of, behold אַחֲרָי אַחֲרָי (acher), the Samaritan reads אַחֲרָי (achan), one, and with this reading agree the Septuagint and Syriac versions, the Targum or Chaldee paraphrase of Onkelos, and twenty-nine of the manuscripts collated by Dr. Kennicott, together with thirteen of those collated by De Rossi. The proper rendering, therefore, of this verse is, And Abraham lifted up his eyes and looked; and behold a ram caught in a thicket by his horns.

The two following canons are selected from Dr. Gerard's Institutes of Biblical Criticism (pp. 270, 271.), with a few corrections:—

(10.) Readings in the Pentateuch supported by the Samaritan copy, a few Hebrew MSS., the ancient versions, parallel places, and the sense, are certainly right, though they are not found in the generality of Hebrew manuscripts nor in editions.

Thus in Gen. i. 25. after ye shall carry up my bones from hence, the parallel text in Exod. xiii. 19, twelve manuscripts, the Samaritan text, the Septuagint, Syriac, Arabic, and Vulgate versions, all add with you. The words, therefore, are part of the text, and are very properly incorporated in it by Dr. Boothroyd, in his new translation of the Scriptures.

In Lev. ix. 21. the common reading is, as Moses commanded: but in thirty manuscripts, the Samaritan text, the Septuagint and Arabic versions, and the Targum of Onkelos, we read, as Jehovah commanded Moses; which unquestionably is the true reading, and is supported not only by these authorities, but also by the whole chapter itself.

(11.) Readings in the Pentateuch, supported by the Samaritan text, ancient versions, parallel places, and the sense, are certainly right, though they are not found in any (or in only one) Hebrew manuscript now extant.

Thus in Gen. ii. 24. we read, and they shall be one flesh; but it is they two in the Samaritan text, and in the Septuagint, Syriac, Old Italic, Vulgate, and Arabic versions, compared with Matt. xii. 5. Mark x. 8. 1 Cor. vi. 16. Eph. v. 31. Philo Judæus, Tertullian, Epiphanius, Jerome, and Augustine. In Exod. vi. 20. after she bare him Aaron and Moses, and Miriam their sister," is added in the Samaritan text, the Septuagint, and Syriac versions, and in one manuscript. There is no doubt but that it forms parts of the sacred text. Again, in Exod. xii. 40. we read, The sojourning of the children of Israel, who dwelt in Egypt, was four hundred and thirty years. But this is not true, for it was only two hundred and fifteen years; and it contradicts Gal. iii. 17, which says, that it was only four hundred and thirty years from the calling of Abraham, two hundred and fifteen of which elapsed before the going into Egypt. (Compare Gen. xii. 4. xvii. 1. 21. xxv. 26. and xlvii. 9.) The following is the verse as it appears in all the MSS. and editions of the Samaritan Pentateuch, confirmed by the Alexandrian manuscript of the Septuagint. Now the sojourning of the children of Israel, and of their fathers, which they sojourned in the land of Canaan and in the land of Egypt, was four hundred and thirty years. This is the true reading, and removes all doubt and obscurity. It is proper to remark, that the last three examples of additional passages from the Samaritan text are introduced by Dr. Boothroyd into the text of his translation of the Bible.

5. Such ancient versions as were immediately made from the original are proper sources of emendation, when our present Hebrew and Greek manuscripts disagree; and their respective value is in proportion to their priority of date, their being made from accurate exemplars, their being literal translations, and their being confirmed by one another, and, as far as respects the Pentateuch, by the Samaritan text; for the sole dissent of versions, unsupported by other authorities, constitutes only a dubious lection.

Before, however, we admit any various reading into the text on the authority of an ancient version, we must be certain that the text of such version has not been corrupted. And no various reading can be derived from the modern Latin Versions of the Greek or Oriental versions, which are given in the Polyglots, because the Latin translators have in some instances mistaken the sense of such Oriental versions.

6. The Greek version of the Old Testament, called the Septuagint, being the most ancient and illustrious, is preferable to the Old Syriac version of the same portion of Scripture; but the Old Syriac version of the New Testament, being executed at the close of the apostolic age, and consequently the most ancient of all the translations of the New Testament, is preferable to every other version of it.

The readings pointed out by the Greek version are sometimes the genuine lections, even when they are not found in any Hebrew manuscripts now extant. For instance, in Gen. iv. 8. we read, And Cain said to Abel his brother: And it came to pass, when they were in the field, &c. Here there is a manifest deficiency in all the Hebrew MSS. and printed editions. The translators of the authorized English version, not being able to find that any thing was said on this occasion, ventured to intimate that there was a conversation, indefinitely, and therefore rendered the first clause of the verse, and Cain talked with Abel his brother. The deficiency, which exists in all the MSS. and editions, is supplied in the Septuagint version, which is supported by the Samaritan text, the Syriac and Vulgate Latin versions, the two Chaldee Targums, the Greek translation of Aquila, and by the passage ascribed by Philo: all of which supply the deficient words, Let us go out into the field. There is no doubt, therefore, that they form part of the original text, and that the verse ought to be translated thus:—And Cain said unto Abel his brother, Let us go out into the field. And it came to pass, when they were in the field, that Cain rose up against Abel his brother, and slew him.

Again, in Acts xiii. 13. we read about the time of forty years suffered he (Satan) their manners in the wilderness: that is, he dealt indelicately with them. However the Israelites provoked Jehovah, he mercifully bore with and endured them. On which clause we find in the margin of our authorized version the following conjecture: (Gr. ἐκτρέφοντες, perhaps for ἐκτρέφοντες, bore or fed them as a nurse beareth or feedeth her child. This conjecture is confirmed by the Codices Alexandrinus, Ephremi, and Basilensis, and four others of less note, as well as by the Syriac, Arabic, Coptic, and Ethiopic versions, and the quotation in some of the fathers; all of which read ἐκτρέφοντες, he nourished and fed them, or bore them about in his arms as a tender nurse does her child. This reading agrees excellently with the scope of the place, and is at least of equal value with that in the commonly received text. Griesbach has therefore admitted it, and excluded the other. Both readings, indeed, when rightly understood, speak nearly the same sense; but the latter is the most expressive, and agrees best with St. Paul's discourse, and with the history to which he alludes. The same form of expression occurs in Exod. xix. 4. Num. xii. 12. Isa. xlvii. 3. 4. and lxliii. 9.

7. The Oldest Latin Versions of the New Testament, being of very high antiquity, notwithstanding they contain some false readings, are nevertheless of great value, because they lead to a discovery of the readings in very ancient Greek manuscripts, that existed prior to the date of any that are now extant. The Vulgate, for instance, in its present state, being (as we have already seen) a mixture of the Old Italic version, and that of Jerome, points out the state of the original text, partly in the first and partly in the fourth century, and it gives great authority to those readings which it clearly indicates: it also contains several which are preferable to the present readings, and are supported by some of the best and oldest manuscripts.

Thus the literal rendering of Jer. li. 19. is—He is the former of all things, and the rod of his inheritance, which is unintelligible. The venerable translators of our authorized version have supplied Israel is the rod, &c. most probably from the parallel sentence in Jer. x. 16.; and that this is the true reading is evident from the Vulgate version, which reads et Israel sceptrum hereditatis ejus, and also from the Chaldee paraphrase, which is further supported by twenty-three manuscripts collated by Dr. Kennicott.¹

8. The Syriac version being very literal, ascertains clearly the readings which it followed, to which, on account of its antiquity, it gives great authority; and it has preserved some, that appear to be genuine.

Thus in 2 Sam. xv. 7. we read, It came to pass after forty years, which is manifestly erroneous, though supported by the commonly printed Vulgate, the Septuagint, and the Chaldee. David reigned only forty years, and if we follow the text, the rebellion of Absalom would follow long after the death of David. In order to obviate this difficulty, some commentators have proposed to date from the time when David was first anointed by the prophet Samuel. But the Syriac version (which is confirmed by the Arabic version, by Josephus, by the Sixtine edition of the Vulgate, by several manuscripts of the same version, and by Theodoret), reads four. Most learned men are of opinion that ארבעים (ARBAYIM) forty, is an error for ארבע (ARB) four. Accordingly, Dr. Boothroyd has adopted the reading of the Syriac version, and translates at the end of four years, in his new version of the Old Testament.

9. Every deviation in the ancient versions, both of the Old and New Testaments, is not to be considered as a proof of a various reading in the original manuscript whence it was taken; for the translator may have mistaken the original word, or he may have given it a signification different from what it bears at present, and this is the case particularly with the Septuagint.

10. One or a few ancient versions may render a reading probable, when it is strongly supported by the sense, connection, or parallel places, in opposition to one that does not agree with these, though found in other versions and in manuscripts.

Thus, in Gen. xix. 20. we read, And he gave tithes of all. This leaves it uncertain whether Melchizedek or Abrahim gave tithes. It rather seems to be the former, but it was the latter. In Heb. vii. 4. as well as the Samaritan text, and the Septuagint version, we have Abraham gave to him a tithe of all, ἡρακεν αὐτῷ ἅπασι τὰς δέκατον ἀπὸ πάντων; which is probably the genuine reading.

Again, in Isa. xl. 5. we read, All flesh shall see together, which is an imperfect sentence. The translators of our authorized version have supplied it, referring to the glory of God mentioned in the preceding part of the verse. This omission is ancient, being prior to the Chaldee, Syriac, and Vulgate versions; but all the copies of the Septuagint version and the parallel passage in Isa. lii. 10. reads, shall see the salvation of our God, which lection is acknowledged by Luke. (iii. 6.) Bishop Lowth therefore considers it as genuine, and has admitted it into the text of his translation of Isaiah.

11. The concurrence of all or most of the ancient versions, in a reading not found in manuscripts now extant, renders such reading probable, if it be agreeable to the sense, though not absolutely contrary to it.²

Thus, in 1 Sam. ix. 7. we read, What shall we bring the man (LA-ISH) (LA-ISH)? In one of the manuscripts collected by Dr. Kennicott (No. 152. a manuscript of the fourteenth century), we read לֹא־ישׁ הֵאֱלֵהם (LA-ISH ME-LOHIM), to the man of God? which is confirmed by the Chaldee paraphrase, and by the Septuagint, Syriac, Vulgate, and Arabic versions, and is probably the genuine reading.

12. Of the Chaldee paraphrases,³ when manuscripts vary those are to be preferred which are the most ancient, and which have not been corrected, according to the present Masoreti text.

13. The Masora,⁴ Talmud, and Talmudical writers are also sources of emendation, but of no great authority in readings of any moment.

With regard to the Masora, that reading only is to be admitted from it which is supported by ancient versions, and is in perfect harmony with the context, the analogy of language, and parallel passages.

In Isa. ix. 2. (Heb.; 3. of English version) we read, Thou hast multiplied the nation, and not the joy. The Ketib has מל (LA) not, with which the Vulgate version and that of Symmachus agree; but the Keri reads לו (Lo) to him, or it, that is, the nation; and with this agree the Chaldee paraphrase, the Septuagint, the Vulgate version, the readings in the text of fifteen manuscripts collated by Dr. Kennicott, and six of those collated by M. de Rossi. The latter reading is not only best supported, but it is also excellently in unison with the preceding verse. Bishop Lowth has therefore adopted it, and translates thus—Thou hast multiplied the nation, thou hast increased their joy.

Readings derived from the Talmud and Talmudical writers are only to be admitted, when they expressly cite the Hebrew text, and when their readings are confirmed by manuscripts. In judging of the various lections obtained from the Jewish writers, those which are collected from the Talmud (though few in number) are of great value, and equal to those furnished by Aquila, Symmachus, the Syriac version, and the Chaldee paraphrase. But such as are derived from the commentaries and lexicons of the Rabbins, who lived between the tenth and thirteenth centuries, are (according to Prof. Bauer) to be accounted equal with the readings of manuscripts.⁵

IV. As JOSEPHUS derived his representations of sacred history principally from the Hebrew text, the collation of his writings will be found a valuable aid in the determination of various readings in the Old Testament.

1. Thus, in 2 Sam. viii. 17, according to the Hebrew text, we read that Zadok the son of Ahitub and Ahimelech the son of Abiathar were the priests; which statement is directly contrary to 1 Sam. xxii. 20, and xxiii. 6, where Abiathar is expressly termed the son of Ahimelech. But Josephus, when he says that David appointed Zadok to be priest, together with Abiathar, appears to have read the Hebrew words, much more correctly, thus transposed:—And Zadok the son of Ahitub and Abiathar the son of Ahimelech were the priests. Dr. Boothroyd has properly adopted this rendering: in the history of David, we never read of Ahimelech being priest, but the name of Abiathar frequently occurs.

2. In 1 Sam. vi. 19, we read that the Lord smote fifty thousand and seventy of the inhabitants of Beth-sheshem for looking into the ark; which number, in the Arabic and Syriac versions, is five thousand and seventy. Three of the manuscripts collated by Dr. Kennicott (of the twelfth century), and Josephus, read seventy men only, and omit fifty thousand. Seventy is evidently the true number; for, as Beth-sheshem was but a "small village," it is improbable that it could contain so many as fifty thousand inhabitants.⁴

V. PARALLEL PASSAGES afford a very material help in determining various readings, where all other assistance fails. Cappel⁵ and Dr. Kennicott⁶ have shown at great length what use may be made of parallel passages, in order to ascertain the genuine reading where it may be dubious, or to restore it where it may be lost. Professor Bauer has given an abstract of Cappel's collection of parallel passages in pp. 235—238, of his Critica Sacra; and two or three instances will show the importance of them in ascertaining a true reading in the New Testament.

In Matt. i. 4, not fewer than fourteen manuscripts and two of the fathers read Αμινάδαμ, Aminadām; but the parallel passage in 1 Chron. ii. 10, has Aminadab, which therefore is the genuine reading of the Evangelist. Again, in Matt. xxvii. 46, instead of λάμα (lama), many MSS. read λεϊμα (leima), λεμα (lima), or λεμα (lema); but a reference to Psal. xxii. 2. (Heb.; or 1. of English version) shows that λάμα is the proper reading. Once more, in Matt. ii. 23, the common reading is Ναζαρετ (Nazaret); but in the Codices C. E. K. (Ephremi, Basileensis B. VI. 21, and Cyprius), and many other MSS. of less note, besides several printed editions, and the Coptic, Armenian, Italic, Vulgate, and Anglo-Saxon versions, and also in the quotations of Eusebius and Cyril, we read Ναζαρεθ (Nazareth). And that this is the true reading is evident from comparing the numerous other passages of the four Gospels in which this place is called Nazareth, and not Nazaret.

1. Where parallel passages, together with the sense, support the reading of ancient manuscripts, they show that such reading is perfectly right.

Thus in Isa. lxi. 4, we read, they shall build the old wastes: but the sentence is incomplete, as we know not who are the builders. After they shall build, four MSS. (two of which are ancient) בָּנִימָא (banimā) that spring from (two; and this reading is confirmed by lviii. 12, where the sentence is the very same, this word being added. Bishop Lowth therefore receives it into the text, and translates the sentence thus:—

And they that spring from these shall build up the ruins of old times.

2. In a text evidently corrupted, a parallel place may suggest a reading perfectly genuine.⁷

Thus, in the common printed editions of Judg. vii. 18, we read, Say, of the Lord and of Gideon. This is defective. The venerable English translators have, with great propriety, supplied the sword, רֶבֶר (heren) from the successful exploit of Gideon, related in v. 20. The word which those learned but much-traduced men thus supplied from a parallel place proves to be right; for it is found in ten manuscripts besides the Chaldee paraphrase, and the Syriac and Arabic versions. In like manner they have supplied the word fourth in 2 Kings xxv. 3. from Jer. lii. 6. to complete the sense; and this supply is also confirmed by the different versions.

3. To determine with accuracy the authority of parallel passages in the Old Testament, they should be divided into four classes; viz.

(1.) Passages containing the historical narration of an event which occurred but once, or the record of a prayer or speech but once uttered. Ex. gr. Josh. xix. 50. xxiv. 30. comp. with Judg. ii. 9. 2 Sam. xxii. with Ps. xviii. The Book of Kings with that of Chronicles. 2 Kings xxv. with Jer. lii. 2 Kings xviii. to xx. with Isa. xxxvi. to xxxix. Isa. ii. 2. 4. with Micah i. 1—3.

(2.) Passages containing a command, and either a repetition of it, or a record of its being obeyed: Ex. xii. 2—17, with Deut. v. 6—22. Ex. xxv. to xxx. with xxxvi. to xxxix. Lev. xi. 13—19, with Deut. xiv. 12—18. Ezekiel xii. 6, with 7.

(3.) Proverbial sayings, or expressions frequently repeated: Num. xxi. 28, 29, and xxiv. 17, with Jer. xlviii. 45, 46. Ezek. v. 7, with xi. 12. Jer. v. 9, and 29, with ix. 9. Psalm xlii. 5. 11, with xliii. 5. Jer. x. 25, with Psalm lxxix. 6, 7. Jer. x. 16, with li. 19. Isa. xxiv. 17, 18, with Jer. xlviii. 43, 44.

(4.) Records of the same genealogies, 1 Chron. with several chapters of Genesis, and Ezra with Nehemiah.

In any such passages as these, where there is a difference in numbers or names—where there is more than a verbal difference in records of the same transaction—or where there is even a verbal difference in copies of the same prayer or speech, in the printed text, but not in manuscripts and versions, there it is erroneous, and ought to be corrected.⁸

VI. QUOTATIONS from the Old and New Testaments in the Writings of the FATHERS are an emendatory source which is by no means to be neglected; but only correct editions of their works should be consulted. In order to judge of the true reading of any text of Scripture, from any quotation of it, with which we meet in the writings of the fathers, the following criteria have been laid down, principally by J. D. Michaelis:—

1. In considering the testimony of a single father, we are in the first place to inquire in what age he lived, and what were his abilities? Whether he was a person of learning and judgment, of accuracy and exactness, or otherwise? And also whether the treatise or work, in which the Scriptures are so quoted, be the genuine production of the writer whose name it bears?

2. Wherever it is certain that the quotations were actually taken from manuscripts, they are of very great importance in deciding on the authenticity of a true reading, and are in general to be preferred to any manuscripts of the Greek Testament now extant, the oldest of which cannot be placed earlier than the end of the fourth or the commencement of the fifth century.

If therefore a father, who flourished in the fifth and subsequent ages, has a particular reading, it is the same as if we found it in a manuscript of that time.

3. As the fathers have frequently, though not always, quoted from memory, it is necessary to make a distinction between those passages which they expressly declare that they have taken literally from manuscripts, and those which they quote without any such assurance.

4. We are not therefore to reject the quotation of a father, because it differs from the common text, but must first examine whether it cannot be discovered in manuscripts of the New Testament; and to enable those who have access to manuscripts to make this comparison with as much ease as possible, we should endeavour to procure the most accurate and copious extracts from the writings of the fathers.

If a reading, then, which had the appearance of being an error of memory, is actually discovered in manuscripts, we may without hesitation put it down in the list of various readings: its antiquity will be determined by the age in which the father who quoted it lived; and the manuscripts which contain it will afford a secondary evidence of its age and authenticity. But we must not judge of the writings of all the fathers, nor of all the writings of the same father, in the same manner. They may be divided into three different classes. 1. Commentaries, to which may be referred also those discourses which were written as expositions of parts of the Bible. 2. Works of education. 3. Polemical writings. In the first it is evident that the book which is expounded is not quoted from memory, but the author, in writing his commentary, had lying before him a manuscript of the Greek Testament. But with respect to the polemical writings of the fathers, those who are acquainted with their mode of disputation, and know that their principal object is sometimes to confound their adversaries rather than to support the truth, will refer the quotations which appear in these productions to the lowest class. If a father was acquainted with more than one reading to a passage, he would certainly quote that which best suited his purpose, and with which he could most easily confute his opponents. It is therefore not sufficient to know what reading he quotes, but we must likewise consider where he quotes it; and those fathers who collect various readings from the writings of the ancient fathers would do well to point out the book, chapter, edition, and page, in order to enable the reader to form a proper judgment.

5. It is necessary to make an accurate distinction between a quotation properly so called, and a passage of Scripture introduced and applied as part of a discourse.

For if a writer, in treating any known doctrine of the Bible, uses the words of Scripture, he is at liberty to add or subtract, to contract or dilate them in a manner that is best adapted to the tenor of his discourse. But even such passages are not unworthy of notice, for if they are different in different manuscripts, and any one of these latter coincides with the former, the coincidence is not to be considered as a matter of chance. But when no manuscript corroborates the reading in such a passage, it is entitled to no voice in deciding on the text of the Greek Testament.

6. In collecting readings from the works of the fathers, an accurate distinction must be made between those who wrote in Greek, and those who wrote in another language.

Properly speaking, the former only are to be considered when we select readings for the Greek Testament, and the latter immediately relate to the text of the version from which they are quoted, unless particular mention be made of the Greek, or the writer, like Jerome, made a practice of correcting the translation of his country from the original.

7. It must also be observed whether a Father takes notice of a text only once, or but seldom, or very often.

For a frequent repetition will make the slighter kinds of difference deserving of more attention; whereas a single instance or two of that sort will be the more easily imputed to a slip of the memory, or a casual mistake.

8. It is necessary to observe whether an author be uniform and consistent with himself, or different and various.

If a text be found differently expressed by the same author, we shall often be at a loss to know which he esteemed the right; and sometimes, perhaps, he may be wrong in each; and yet sometimes, too, it may be easily discovered, that one passage was designed to express the text more exactly, and another was only a reference by memory, and from thence proceeded the variation. An example of this we have in Chrysostom. In his comment upon Acts xx. 28. he reads it ΕΚΚΛΗΣΙΑ ΤΟΥ ΘΕΟΥ, Church of God, three times (though Dr. Mill cites him there for the reading of ΚΥΡΙΑΙΟΝ (Lord); but in his comment on Eph. iv. 12. he casually refers to this text, and quotes it probably by memory, and there he puts it down ΕΚΚΛΗΣΙΑ ΤΟΥ ΚΥΡΙΟΥ, that is, Church of the Lord.

9. The writings of the Fathers are to be compared, one with another; and an inquiry must be instituted, what testimony arises from them upon the whole.

If it be a point, of which they generally take notice, or in which they are agreed; if we meet with no contrary voice, or none worthy of being regarded; or with some who argue for it, while others criticise or comment upon it, this will afford the clearest and strongest testimony that can be either desired or obtained.

10. We must compare the evidence arising from an examination of the writings of the Fathers, with that which appears to be the reading of the Greek manuscripts in general, and see how well they agree together. Where the MSS. in general and the Fathers do agree, it must be something very extraordinary that will make it reasonable to believe that they are altogether in a mistake. Nay, that evidence from the Fathers must be very strong, which will make it reasonable to think the Greek MSS. agreeing in general among themselves, are mistaken.

A casual citation of a text will not be sufficient to prove them so mistaken, nor a bare comment upon a version, where it varies from the original; much less will this do, where opposite testimonies can be produced from Greek writers; and especially where those opposite testimonies are so full upon the point, as supposes and implies that they found the reading which they mention in the Greek copies which were in use in their days. If any instance can be found in which it can be clearly proved from the writings of the fathers, that the general and allowed reading of the Greek copies in the early ages of the church was different from the general reading of the Greek MSS. in our days, we should without hesitation give up such general reading of our present MSS. But it is very questionable whether one single instance of this sort can any where be found; and those persons who raise general clamours about the corruption of the manuscripts of the sacred writings, unsupported by any solid proofs, are no more to be heard, but still more to be condemned, than those who speak in this manner of the writings of the Fathers. But in a matter of doubt and uncertainty, where the MSS. of the sacred writings in the original language are divided, the united testimony of the Fathers will turn the scale in favour of the side for which they appear, and will more powerfully establish and confirm the general reading of the Scripture MSS. where they are agreed.¹

11. The Fathers having in general quoted the Scriptures very exactly, as they had it in their copies, whenever a reading followed by them agrees with any ancient manuscript, it is in all probability the genuine reading.

Thus, in most copies of Matt. vi. 1. we read, Take heed that you do not your ALMS (ΔΑΙΜΟΝΙΟΝ); but in the Codices Vaticanus and Cantabrigiensis, and three or four other MSS. of less antiquity, as also in the old Italic and Vulgate Versions and most of the Fathers, we read ΔΙΑΚΡΙΤΟΝ, righteousness, that is, acts of righteousness. This reading is most agreeable to the mode of speech which obtained among the Jews,² and consequently is the genuine one. Griesbach has therefore inserted it in the text.

Again, in Luke x. 1. we read that the Lord appointed other seventy disciples. The Codices Vaticanus, Cantabrigiensis, and Mediceus (No. 42. of Griesbach's notation), together with the Persian, Armenian, Vulgate, and four copies of the Old Italic versions, read ἑβδομήκοντα δύο, seventy-two; and in this reading they are supported by eleven Fathers principally of the Latin or Western Church. On the contrary, all the other MSS. have simply ἑβδομήκοντα, seventy, in which reading they are supported by the learned Greek Fathers, Eusebius, Gregory Bishop of Nyssa, Cyril, Euthymius, Theophylact, and Theophanes, and by Irenaeus, Tertullian, Ambrose, Jerome, Damascus, and others among the Latin writers. The common reading, therefore, is established as the genuine one by the concurrence of the Fathers with MSS.

Once more, in John i. 28. we read that These things were done in Bethabara. This lection is found in thirty-one manuscripts, in the printed editions, in the Armenian version, and a late exemplar of the Slavonic version, and is preferred by Origen, and after him by Eusebius, Suidas, Jerome, and others. But it is certain that, instead of ΒΕΤΘΑΒΑΡΑ, we ought to read ΒΕΤΑΝΙΑ, Bethany, which word is found in the Codices Alexandrinus, Vaticanus, Ephremi, Basilicensis, Harleianus No. 5684, Seidelii, Stephani π, Stephani π, Regius No. 22342 (now 43) and Vaticanus 354, in B. and V. of Matthæi's notation, in upwards of one hundred other MSS. of less antiquity, and in the Syriac, Armenian, Persian, Coptic, and Vulgate versions, and in three MSS. of the Slavonic version; (one of the twelfth, the other two of the fourteenth century). The reading of ΒΕΤΑΝΙΑ, Bethany, is also confirmed by the most eminent of the primitive Fathers prior to the time of Origen (who is supposed to have first changed the reading); and is unquestionably the genuine one. Griesbach has therefore inserted it in the text.

12. The total silence of the Fathers concerning a reading, which would have confirmed their opinion in a controverted point, justly renders that reading suspicious, unless such total silence can be satisfactorily accounted for.

This negative argument against a reading will be of little weight where it respects the writings of one single author only; and where it is founded only upon some particular part of his works, and such author has himself taken notice of the text in other places, it will be of no weight at all. Nay, if but one or two only have made mention of a text, this will be a better proof that it was read in their days than any omission of their contemporaries, or of those that lived after them, will be a proof that it was not. But let us take this argument in the strongest light, and let the utmost possible be made of it; it can only furnish matter of doubt and inquiry; it can at most amount to no more than probable and presumptive evidence, and nothing can be positively and certainly concluded from it. One plain positive proof from the original MSS. or the ancient versions will be able to weigh it down, unless it can be shown that they have been altered and corrupted.

VII. The fragments of HERETICAL WRITINGS are not to be overlooked in the search for various readings: for the supposition is rash, that they generally corrupted the text of all parts of the sacred writings.³

Although Marcion wilfully corrupted various parts of such books of the New Testament as he chose to admit into his collection of canonical books, yet not all his deviations are to be ranked in the list of wilful corruptions. Michaelis therefore divides the various readings, for which he has been branded with the name of heretic, into the three following classes; viz.

1. Unwarranted alterations made in favour of Marcion's own system.

2. Alterations grounded on the authority of manuscripts, which had various readings that differed from the common text, and which are still retained in very many of our present manuscripts.

3. Readings that are not only warranted by authority, but preferable to the text of our own common editions.⁴

For instance, the words καὶ προσέλαβεν αὐτὴν πρὸς τὴν ὑπόστασιν αὐτοῦ (and shall be joined unto his wife), in Eph. v. 31. were omitted by Marcion; and Jerome⁵ was of opinion that the passage came not from the hands of St. Paul. Again Χριστός (Christ), which is the reading preferred by Marcion, in 1 Cor. x. 8. is most probably the genuine reading, and the other reading [Κυρίου, Lord] a correction of a copyist; at least we cannot ascribe it to the heterodoxy of Marcion, as it affords no argument in his favour. Χριστός is retained by Griesbach. Michaelis remarks that the readings belonging to the second and third classes are of importance in the criticism of the New Testament. Dr. Mill and Wetstein, and after them Griesbach, have given all the readings of Marcion which could be discovered. Dr. Scholz charges Epiphanius with falsehood, in affirming that Marcion corrupted the Epistles to the Philippians, Thessalonians, and Philemon, and he states that Marcion for the most part agrees with the Alexandrine family of MSS.⁶

VIII. CRITICAL CONJECTURE is not alone a legitimate source of emendation, nor is it at all to be applied, unless the text is manifestly corrupted, and in the most urgent necessity: for the conjectural criticism of an interested party, in his own cause, and in defiance of positive evidence, is little better than subornation of testimony in a court of law.

1. Conjectural Readings, strongly supported by the sense, connection, the nature of the language, or similar texts, may sometimes be probable, especially when it can be shown that they would easily have given occasion to the present reading; and readings first suggested by conjecture have sometimes been afterwards found to be actually in manuscripts, or in some version.

Thus, in Gen. i. 8. the clause, And God saw that it was good, is wanting to complete the account of the second day's work of creation, but it is found in the tenth verse in the middle of the narrative of the third day's work. Hence, many learned men have conjectured, either, 1. That the sentence, And the evening and the morning were the second day, has been transposed from verse 10. to verse 8.; or, 2. That the clause, And God saw that it was good, has been transposed from verse 8. to verse 10. The latter conjecture affords the most probable reading, and is to be preferred, being confirmed by the Septuagint version; the translators of which most evidently found this clause in the copies which they used.

2. A Conjectural Reading, unsupported by any manuscripts, and unauthorized by similarity of letters, by the connection and context of the passage itself, and by the analogy of faith, is manifestly to be rejected.

In the address of James to the apostles convened at Jerusalem, he gives it as his opinion that they should write to the believing Gentiles that they abstain from pollutions of idols, and fornication, and things strangled, and blood (Acts xv. 20). As the question related to the ceremonial and not to the moral law, the celebrated critic Dr. Bentley conjectured that for πορνείας, fornication, we should read ζώωντας, swine's flesh; and in this conjecture he has been followed by Mr. Reeves in the Scholia to his beautiful and useful editions of the Bible. But this reading is supported by no manuscript whatever, nor by any similarity of the letters, nor by the context of the passage; for in the encyclical letter of the apostles (ver. 25.) we read fornication. If ζώωντας had been the correct lection in the first instance, it would have been unquestionably retained in the second. And when it is recollected that the word εὐαγγέλιον, which in our version is rendered formation, means not only the crime against chastity usually so called, but also adultery and prostitution of every kind (for which very many of the feasts of the idolatrous Gentiles were notorious), the force of the apostolic prohibition will be evident; and the genuineness of the commonly received reading will be established in opposition to Bentley's arbitrary conjecture.

No one should attempt this kind of emendation who is not most deeply skilled in the sacred languages; nor should critical conjectures ever be admitted into the text, for we never can be certain of the truth of merely conjectural readings. Were these indeed to be admitted into the text, the utmost confusion and uncertainty would necessarily be created. The diligence and modesty of the Masorites are in this respect worthy of our imitation: they invariably inserted their conjectures in the margin of their manuscripts, but most religiously abstained from altering the text according to their hypotheses: and it is to be regretted that their example has not been followed by some modern translators of the Old and New Testament (and especially of the latter); who, in order to support doctrines which have no foundation whatever in the sacred writings, have not hesitated to obtrude their conjectures into the text. This is particularly the case with the Greek and English New Testament edited by Dr. Mace in 1739, whose bold and unhallowed emendations were exposed by Dr. Twells, and also with the editors of the (modern Socinian) improved version of the New Testament, whose conjectures and erroneous criticisms and interpretations have been most ably exposed by the Rev. Drs. Nares and Laurence, the Quarterly and Eclectic Reviewers, and other eminent critics.

§ 3. GENERAL RULES FOR JUDGING OF VARIOUS READINGS IN THE OLD AND NEW TESTAMENTS.

HAVING thus stated the causes of various readings, and offered a few cautions with regard to the sources whence the true lection is to be determined, it only remains that we submit to the reader's attention a few GENERAL RULES, BY WHICH AN ACCURATE JUDGMENT MAY BE FORMED CONCERNING VARIOUS READINGS.

1. We must take care, that we do not attempt to correct that which does not require emendation. The earlier manuscript, ceteris paribus, is more likely to be right than the later, because every subsequent copy is liable to new errors.

This rule will prevent us from being misled by an immoderate desire of correcting what we may not understand, or what may at a first glance appear to be unsuitable to the genius of the Hebrew or Greek language, or to the design of an author. Wherever, therefore, any difficulty presents itself, it will be necessary previously to consider whether it may not be obviated in some other manner, before we have recourse to emendation; and even ingeniously to acknowledge our ignorance, rather than indulge a petulant licentiousness of making corrections. Examples are not wanting of critics on the sacred writings, who have violated this obvious rule, particularly Houbigant, in the notes to his edition of the Hebrew Bible.

2. That reading in which all the recensions of the best copies agree, and which is supported by all the ancient versions, is to be accounted genuine.

3. Readings are certainly right, and that in the very highest sense, at all consistent with the existence of any various readings, which are supported by several of the most ancient manuscripts, or by the majority of them,—by all or most of the ancient versions,—by quotations,—by parallel places (if there be any),—and by the sense; even though such readings should not be found in the common printed editions, nor perhaps in any printed edition.

Thus, in the common printed editions of I Kings i. 20, we read, And thou, my Lord, O King, the eyes of all Israel are upon thee, which is not sense. Instead of וְאַתָּה, And thou, we have וְעַתָּה, And now, in ninety-one of the manuscripts collated by Dr. Kennicot, in the Chaldee paraphrase, and in the Arabic and Vulgate versions. This is the genuine reading, and is required by the sense.

Again, in Matt. xxi. 21, we read, From him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath, καὶ ὁ ἐκ τοῦ οὐκ ἔχοντος. This is found in all the ancient copies, and in the majority of manuscripts, and in all the versions but one. But in twenty-two other manuscripts, and in the Vulgate, as well as in some copies of the Syriac, Sclavonic, and Old Italic versions, and six Fathers, we read ὁ ἀποκρίσει, that which he seemeth to have. But it is wrong, and has been corrected from Luke viii. 18.

4. Greater is the authority of a reading found in only a few manuscripts of different characters, dates, and countries, than in many manuscripts of a similar complexion. But, of manuscripts of the same family or recension, the reading of the greater number is of most weight. The evidence of manuscripts is to be weighed, not enumerated; for the agreement of several manuscripts is of no authority, unless their genealogy (if we may be allowed the term) is known; because it is possible that a hundred manuscripts that now agree together may have descended from one and the same source.

5. Readings are certainly right, which are supported by a few ancient manuscripts, in conjunction with the ancient versions, quotations, parallel places (if any), and the sense; though they should not be found in most manuscript or printed editions, especially when the rejection of them in the latter can be easily accounted for.

(1.) The common reading of Psalm xxviii. 8, is, The Lord is their strength יְהוָה (Laxo); but there is no antecedent. In six manuscripts and all the versions, however, we read יְהוָה (LEAMMO) of his people, which completes the sense. This emendation is pronounced by Bp. Horsley, to be "unquestionable;" he has therefore incorporated it in the text of his New Version of the Psalms, and has translated the sentence thus:—

Jehovah is the strength of his people.

(2.) In most manuscripts and printed editions of Eph. v. 9, we read, The fruit of the Spirit (τὸν πνεύματος), is in all goodness, and righteousness, and truth. But it is the fruit of the LIGHT (τὸν φωτός) in the Codices Alexandrinus, Vaticanus, and Claromontanus, Augustinus, Sangermanensis, and Boernerianus, and six others of less note, as well as in the Syriac version, the Arabic version edited by Erpenius, the Coptic, Sahidic, Ethiopic, Armenian, Old Italic, and Vulgate versions; and it is so quoted by seven of the fathers. Φωτός, light, is therefore considered by most critics as the true reading, because the Spirit is not mentioned in any part of the context; and this reading is inserted in the text as genuine by Griesbach. The connection, indeed, shows that this last is the true reading, which was altered by some unknown copyist or critic, because it was uncommon, from Gal. v. 22. As light (Eph. v. 8) not only means the divine influence upon the soul, but also the Gospel, the apostle Paul might with admirable propriety say, that the fruit of the light (that is, of the Gospel) is in all goodness, and righteousness, and truth;—goodness, ἀγαθότητα, in the principle and disposition;—righteousness, δικαιοσύνη, the exercise of that goodness in the whole conduct of life;—and truth, ἀλήθεια, the director of that principle and of its exercise to the glory of God and the good of mankind.

(3.) Eph. ii. 21. Πᾶσα ἡ οἰκοδομία, The whole building.—The Codices Vaticanus, Claromontanus, Sangermanensis, and Boernerianus, besides many others of less ancient date, including a large proportion of those collated by Matthæi, omit the article ἡ, and many editors adopt this reading; among others, Bengel and Griesbach are disposed to think the article spurious. But thus the sense will be 'every building,' which the context will not admit, as will be evident by looking at the passage. When πᾶς in the singular number is used to signify that the whole of the thing implied by the substantive, with which it is joined, is intended, the substantive (as in the example here adduced) has the article; but when it is employed to denote that every individual of that species is spoken of, then the substantive is anarthrous, or without the article. The common reading, therefore, ought to be retained: and this is one of the instances in which the smaller number of MSS. has preserved the true reading.

6. Of two readings, both of which are supported by manuscripts, the best is to be preferred; but if both of them exhibit good senses, then that reading which gives the best sense is to be adopted. But, in order to determine the nature of the whole passage, the genius of the writer, and not the mere opinions and sentiments of particular interpreters, are to be consulted.

In Psalm ii. 6, there are two readings, one of which is found in the Masoretic copies, and the other in the Septuagint version. The former may be literally translated thus:—Yet will I appoint my King upon my holy hill of Zion. This reading is supported by weighty evidence, viz. the Masora, the quotation of it in Arch. iv. 21., the Greek versions of Aquila and Symmachus, the Chaldee paraphrase, and Jerome. The other reading, which is found in the Septuagint, may be thus rendered:—But as for me, by him I am appointed king on Zion, his holy mountain. Now here the authority for the two readings is nearly equal; but if we examine their goodness, we shall see that the Masoretic lection is to be preferred, as being more grammatically correct, and more suited to the context.

7. A good various reading, though supported only by one or two witnesses of approved character, is to be preferred.

8. In the prophetic and poetical books of the Old Testament, as well as in the New Testament, that reading is best which accords with the poetical parallelism.

The subject of poetical parallelism is fully considered in Part II. Book II. Chap. II. infra. The application of this canon to the various readings of the Old Testament has long been recognised; and as its applicability to the New Testament is not so obvious, we shall illustrate it by an example drawn from the latter.

Thus in Matt. vii. 2, we read,

Εἰς ὃν κρίνετε, κριθῆσθε.

Καὶ ὃν μετρεῖτε, μετρηθῆσθε.

For, with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged;

And with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again.

For, αὐτίκα κρινῆσθε, ὅσον μετρήσῃτε, (which is the reading of the common printed editions, of the manuscript by Matthæi noted with the letter H, of the manuscript 13. of Griesbach's notation, of the Vulgate version, of some manuscripts of the Old Italic version of Polycarp, of Clement of Alexandria, of Origen sometimes, and of the Latin Fathers, we read μετρήσῃτε, shall be measured, in the Codices Vaticanus, Harleianus No. 5684., Cyprianus, Stephani's, Regius 22432 (now 43.), and Vaticanus 354., all of which are manuscripts in uncial characters of great antiquity, in twelve manuscripts in smaller characters, by Griesbach, numbered 1. 17. 33. 77. 108. 114. 117. 131. 218. 236. of Professor Birch's Collation, the Evangelistaria, numbered 32. and 36., and seventy other manuscripts of inferior note, and by the manuscripts distinguished by Matthæi with the letters B and V (both of the eighth century), a. c. and d. (all of the tenth or eleventh century), and by eight others of Matthew's manuscripts of less note, by the Armenian and Ethiopic versions, by the copies of the Old Italic version preserved at Verona, Vercelli, Forlì, and Toledo, by Clement of Rome, by Origen once, by the author of the dialogue against Marcion, by Theodoret, Theophylact, Euthymius, Chrysostomus, and other Greek writers. The reading of $\mu\epsilon\tau\rho\alpha\zeta\eta\sigma\tau\alpha\iota$, therefore, being supported by such an overwhelming body of evidence, is very properly introduced into the text by Griesbach as preferable to the common reading of $\chi\alpha\iota\mu\epsilon\tau\rho\epsilon\zeta\eta\sigma\tau\alpha\iota$; and it is further demanded by the parallelism. $\text{For } \mu\epsilon\tau\rho\alpha\iota\sigma\tau\alpha\iota$ (judgment), $\kappa\rho\iota\tau\iota\varsigma$ (ye judge), and $\chi\alpha\iota\mu\epsilon\tau\rho\epsilon\zeta\eta\sigma\tau\alpha\iota$ (ye shall be judged), in the first line, require, in order to preserve the balance of the period, $\mu\epsilon\tau\rho\alpha$ (measure), $\mu\epsilon\tau\rho\alpha\iota\sigma\tau\alpha\iota$ (ye measure), and $\mu\epsilon\tau\rho\epsilon\zeta\eta\sigma\tau\alpha\iota$ (it shall be measured), in the second line.¹

9. Of two readings of equal or nearly equal authority, that is to be preferred, which is most agreeable to the style of the sacred writer.

If, therefore, one of two readings in the New Testament exhibits the Hebrew idiom, it is preferable to one that is good Greek, because the latter has the appearance of being a gloss of some Greek writer, which the former does not present. Thus in Jude 1, $\kappa\lambda\eta\sigma\mu\epsilon\tau\iota\varsigma$, sanctified, is a better lection than $\epsilon\gamma\alpha\gamma\mu\epsilon\tau\iota\varsigma$, beloved; because the former is more in unison with the usage of the apostles in their salutations, and in the commencement of their Epistles. In Acts xvii 26, the reading, $\epsilon\zeta\ \epsilon\upsilon\varsigma\ \alpha\iota\mu\alpha\tau\omega\varsigma$, of one blood, is preferable to $\epsilon\zeta\ \epsilon\upsilon\varsigma$, of one (which occurs in Rom. ix. 10), because it is in unison with the Hebrew style of writing. In John vi. 69, the common reading, Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God, $\chi\alpha\iota\sigma\upsilon\varsigma\ \epsilon\upsilon\varsigma\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$, $\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \zeta\omega\tau\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$, is preferable to that of the holy one of God, $\epsilon\chi\theta\omicron\varsigma\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$, which Griesbach has adopted into the text, omitting $\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \zeta\omega\tau\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$, on the authority of the Codices Vaticanus, Ephraïm, Cantabrigiensis, Stephanus, the Coptic version, and some other authorities of less note. That eminent critic, indeed, allows that the received lection is not to be despised; but we may observe that its genuineness is not only confirmed by the consistent testimonies of many MSS., versions, and fathers, but also from the fact and from the style of writing adopted by the Evangelists. For the appellation of holy one of God is nowhere applied to our Saviour, except in the confession of the demoniac. (Mark i. 21. Luke iv. 41.) In Acts iv. 27, 30, Jesus is termed $\chi\alpha\iota\sigma\upsilon\varsigma\ \pi\alpha\iota\varsigma$, holy child; but not holy one of God. On the contrary, the appellation of Christ, the Son of God, occurs repeatedly in the New Testament, and especially in this Gospel of John (i. 50, 49. of English version, and xi. 27.), and is elsewhere expressly applied to him by Peter. See Matt. xvi. 16. The common reading, therefore, of John vi. 69, is to be preferred, in opposition to that adopted by Griesbach, as being most agreeable to the style of the sacred writer.

10. That reading is to be preferred which is most agreeable to the context, and to the author's design in writing.

Every writer, and much more a divinely inspired writer, is presumed to write in such a manner, as not to contradict himself either knowingly or willingly, and to write throughout with a due regard to the order and connection of things. Now in Mark i. 2, for $\epsilon\nu\ \tau\omicron\iota\varsigma\ \pi\rho\epsilon\phi\eta\tau\alpha\iota\varsigma$, in the prophets, several manuscripts read $\epsilon\nu\ \theta\epsilon\omicron\alpha\varsigma\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \pi\rho\epsilon\phi\eta\tau\alpha\iota\varsigma$, in the prophet Isaiah. Both Mill and Griesbach reject the common reading. But as the context shows that the Evangelist cited not one but two prophets; viz. Mal. iii. 1., and Isa. xl. 3.; the common reading ought to be retained, especially as it is supported by the Codex Alexandrinus, the Ethiopic and Coptic versions, and the quotations of many fathers.

11. A reading, whose source is clearly proved to be erroneous, must be rejected.

12. Of two readings, neither of which is unsuitable to the sense, either of which may have naturally arisen from the other, and both of which are supported by manuscripts, versions, and quotations in the writings of the fathers; the one will be more probable than the other, in proportion to the preponderance of the evidence that supports it: and that preponderance admits a great variety of degrees.²

In Acts xxi. 28, we read, Feed the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood. Of this sentence there are not fewer than six various readings, viz. 1. $\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \epsilon\kappa\kappa\lambda\eta\sigma\iota\alpha\varsigma\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \kappa\upsilon\tau\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon$, the church of Christ; 2. $\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$, of God, which lection is expunged by Griesbach, who prefers, 3. $\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \kappa\upsilon\tau\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon$, of the Lord. This reading is also preferred by Wetstein; 4. $\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \kappa\upsilon\tau\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \kappa\alpha\iota\ \theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$, of the Lord and God, which Griesbach has inserted in his inner margin; 5. $\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon\ \kappa\alpha\iota\ \kappa\upsilon\tau\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon$, of the God and Lord; and 6. $\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \kappa\upsilon\tau\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$, of the Lord God; in order to determine which of these readings is to be adopted, it is necessary briefly to review the various authorities which have been adduced for each.

1. $\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \chi\epsilon\tau\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon$ —Of Christ. This reading is supported by no Greek MSS.; but it is found in the printed editions of the Peschito or Old Syriac version, even in the Vatican copies of the Nestorians. This reading is also found in the Arabic version edited by Erpenius (which was made from the Syriac), and it seems to be supported by Origen (probably, for the passage is ambiguous). By Athanasius, the anonymous author of the first dialogue against the Macedonians, Theodoret, the interpolated Epistle of Ignatius, Basil, and Fulgentius. The popish synod of the Malabar Christians, held in 1599, under the direction of Mendoza, the Portuguese archbishop of Goa, states that the Nestorians inserted this reading at the instigation of the devil, instigante diabolo!

2. $\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$ —Of God. This is the common reading. It is supported by that most ancient and venerable MS., B, or the Codex Vaticanus; and by seventeen others, none of which indeed are older than the eleventh century, and many of them are more modern. It is also supported by two MSS. of the Peschito or Old Syriac version, collated by Professor Lee for his edition of the Syriac New Testament; and which, he states, are much more ancient than those upon which the printed text was formed. This reading is also found in a very ancient Syriac MS. in the Vatican Library, in the Latin Vulgate, the Ethiopic, according to Dr. Mill, though Griesbach thinks it doubtful; and it is quoted or referred to by Ignatius, Tertullian, Athanasius, Basil, Cyprianus, Ambrose, Chrysostom, Celestine bishop of Rome, Oecumenius, Theophylact, and eleven other fathers of the Greek and Latin Church, besides the sixth Synod in Trullo (held A. D. 680), and the second Nicene Synod (see l. i. c. 75).

3. $\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \kappa\upsilon\tau\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon$ —Of the Lord. This reading is supported by thirteen manuscripts, viz. the Codices Alexandrinus, Cantabrigiensis, Ephraïm, and Laudianus (all of which are written in uncial letters, of great and undisputed antiquity, and derived from different and independent sources), the Moscow MS., which formerly belonged to Chrysostom, according to Matthæi (on Eph. iv. 9.), who has noted it with the letter H, and eight others of less note. This reading is also found in the Coptic, Sahidic, in the margin of the Philoxenian or later Syriac, in the Old Italic as contained in the Codex Cantabrigiensis, and as edited by Sabatier, and in the Armenian versions. The Ethiopic version has likewise been cited, as exhibiting the reading of $\kappa\upsilon\tau\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon$, Lord, but its evidence is indecisive, the same word being used therein for both Lord and God. Griesbach thinks it probable that this version reads $\kappa\upsilon\tau\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon$, from the consistent testimony of the Coptic and Armenian versions. Among the fathers, this reading is supported by Eusebius, Athanasius, Chrysostom, Ammonius, Maximus, Antonius, Ibas, Lucifer, Jerome, Augustine, Sedulius, Alcinus, the author of the pre-tended Apostolical Constitutions, and the second Council of Carthage (which, however, in the Greek, reads $\theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$, of God).³

4. $\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \kappa\upsilon\tau\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \kappa\alpha\iota\ \theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$ —Of the Lord and God. This reading is supported only by the Codex G. (Passionei, assigned by Blanchini to the eighth, but by Montfaucon to the ninth century), and sixty-three other MSS.; none of which, though they form the majority in point of number, are among the most correct and authoritative. It is also found in the Slavonic version, but it is not cited by one of the fathers; and is printed in the Complutensian and Plantin editions.

5. $\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon\ \kappa\alpha\iota\ \kappa\upsilon\tau\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon$ —Of the God and Lord. This reading occurs only in the MS. by Griesbach numbered 47; it is an apograph transcribed in the sixteenth century by John Faber of Deventer from one written in 1233.

6. $\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \kappa\upsilon\tau\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$ —Of the Lord God. This reading is found only in one MS. (95. of Griesbach's notation) of the fifteenth century, and the incorrect Arabic version printed in the Paris and London Polyglots; and it is cited by Theophylact alone among the fathers.

Of these six readings, No. 2. $\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$, Of God, No. 3. $\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \kappa\upsilon\tau\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon$, Of the Lord, and No. 4. $\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \kappa\upsilon\tau\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \kappa\alpha\iota\ \theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$, Of the Lord and God, are best supported by external testimony, and it is the preponderance of the evidence adduced for each, that must determine which of them is the genuine reading.

1. The testimony of manuscripts is pretty equally divided between these two readings.

Though $\kappa\upsilon\tau\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon$ is supported by the greater number of uncial MSS. (viz. the Codices Alexandrinus, Cantabrigiensis, Ephraïm, and Laudianus), yet $\theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$ is supported by the Codex Vaticanus, which is of the highest authority; and $\kappa\upsilon\tau\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \kappa\alpha\iota\ \theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$, though deficient in this respect (for G. or the Codex Passionei, as we have noticed, is not earlier than the eighth or ninth century), yet it is most numerously supported by manuscripts of different families, and especially by the Moscow manuscripts, and by the Complutensian edition.

2. The minority versions, supporting $\theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$ and $\kappa\upsilon\tau\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon$, are equal to each other in number indeed, but those which support the former are superior in weight. For the Latin Vulgate, the Peschito or Old Syriac, and the Ethiopic, in favour of $\theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$, are of higher authority than their competitors, the Coptic, Sahidic, and Armenian. The compound reading $\kappa\upsilon\tau\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \kappa\alpha\iota\ \theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$ is unsupported by any but the Slavonic; which is closely connected with the Moscow manuscripts.

3. The testimony of the fathers is greatly in favour of $\theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$. For though a considerable number of counter-testimonies in favour of $\kappa\upsilon\tau\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon$ is named by Wetstein, and copied by Griesbach; yet no citations from thence are adduced by either, which leads us to suspect, that their testimony is either spurious, slight, or else refuted by the express citations on the other side. Thus, the objection of Athanasius to the phrase "the blood of God," as "being nowhere used in Scripture, and to be reckoned among the daring fabrications of the Arians," recorded by Wetstein,⁴ is abundantly refuted by his own counter-testimony, citing the received reading of Acts xxi. 28., and by the frequent use of the phrase by the orthodox fathers, Ignatius, Tertullian, Leontius, Fulgentius, Bede, Theophylact, and others above enumerated. The objection, therefore, was urged inconsiderately, and probably in the warmth of controversy; in which Athanasius was perpetually engaged with the Arians, his incessant persecutors.

From this abstract, it appears to the writer of these pages, that the external evidence preponderates, upon the whole, in favour of $\theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$; and this is further confirmed by the internal evidence. For, in the first place, the expression $\epsilon\kappa\kappa\lambda\eta\sigma\iota\alpha\varsigma\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$, church of God, is in unison with the style of St. Paul,⁵ and it occurs in not fewer than eleven passages of his epistles; while the phrase $\epsilon\kappa\kappa\lambda\eta\sigma\iota\alpha\varsigma\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \kappa\upsilon\tau\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon$, church of the Lord, occurs nowhere in the New Testament. And secondly, $\theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$ might easily give occasion to the other readings, though none of these could so easily give occasion to $\theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$. If (as Michael remarks) the Evangelist Luke wrote $\theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$, the origin of $\kappa\upsilon\tau\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon$ and $\chi\epsilon\tau\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon$ may be explained either as corrections of the text or as marginal notes; because "the blood of God" is a very extraordinary expression; but if he had written $\kappa\upsilon\tau\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon$, it is inconceivable how any one should alter it into $\theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$. And on this latter supposition, the great number of various readings is inexplicable. It seems as if different transcribers had found a difficulty in the passage, and that each corrected according to his own judgment.

second London edition of Griesbach's Greek Testament, printed by him in 1818, with equal beauty and accuracy.

The phrase $\epsilon\kappa\kappa\lambda\eta\sigma\iota\alpha\varsigma\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \kappa\upsilon\tau\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon$, congregation of the Lord, is of frequent occurrence in the Septuagint version, whence it might have crept into the text of the MSS. that support it, particularly of the Codex Alexandrinus, which was written in Egypt, where the Septuagint version was made.

³ From Professor Birch (of Copenhagen) finding nothing noted in his collation of the Codex Vaticanus respecting the reading of $\theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$ (though he expressly says, that if any variety of reading had taken place in that MS. it could not have escaped him, as he intended to examine this remarkable place above all others in all the manuscripts that came in his way), Griesbach endeavours to set aside the testimony furnished by the Vatican manuscript. But it is a fact that $\theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$ is the reading of that manuscript: for (1.) it was there in 1738, when it was collated by the very learned Thomas Wagstaffe, then at Rome, for Dr. Berrynian, who was at that time engaged in preparing for publication his work on the genuineness of 1 Tim. iii. 16.; and (2.) $\theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$ is the reading of the Vatican MS., for a transcript of it was obtained by Mr. R. Taylor from the keeper of the Vatican library for the

Upon the whole, then, the received reading, ἐκκλησία τοῦ Θεοῦ, church of God, is BETTER supported than any of the other readings, and, consequently, we may conclude that it was the identical expression uttered by Paul, and recorded by Luke.¹

13. Whenever two different readings occur, one of which seems difficult and obscure, but which may be explained by the help of antiquity, and a more accurate knowledge of the language, whereas the other is so easy as to be obvious to the meanest capacity, the latter reading is to be suspected; because the former is more in unison with the style of the sacred writers, which, abounding with Hebraisms, is repugnant to the genius of the pure or strictly classical Greek language.

No transcriber would designedly change a clear into an obscure reading, nor is it possible that an inadvertency should make so happy a mistake as to produce a reading that perplexes indeed the ignorant, but is understood and approved by the learned. This canon is the touchstone which distinguishes the true critics from the false. Bengel, Wetstein, and Griesbach, critics of the first rank, have admitted its authority; but those of inferior order generally prefer the easy reading, for no other reason than because its meaning is most obvious.

14. If for a passage, that is not absolutely necessary to the construction, various readings are found, that differ materially from each other, we have reason to suspect its authenticity; and likewise that all the readings are interpolations of transcribers who have attempted by different methods to supply the seeming deficiency of the original.

This rule, however, must not be carried to the extreme, nor is a single variation sufficient to justify our suspicion of a word or phrase, though its omission affects not the sense, or even though the construction would be improved by its absence: for, in a book that has been so frequently transcribed as the New Testament, mistakes were unavoidable, and therefore a single deviation alone can lead us to no immediate conclusion.

15. A reading is to be rejected, in respect to which plain evidence is found that it has undergone a DESIGNED alteration.

Such alteration may have taken place, (1.) From doctrinal reasons;—(2.) From moral and practical reasons;—(3.) From historical and geographical doubts (Matt. viii. 28, compared with Mark v. 1.);—(4.) From the desire of reconciling passages contradictory with each other;—(5.) From the desire of making the discourse more intensive; hence many emphatic readings have originated;—(6.) From the comparison of many manuscripts, the readings of which have been amalgamated;—(7.) From a comparison of parallel passages.²

16. Readings, which are evidently glosses, or interpolations, are invariably to be rejected.

(1.) Glosses are betrayed, 1. When the words do not agree with the scope and context of the passage; 2. When they are evidently foreign to the style of the sacred writer; 3. When there is evident tautology; 4. When words, which are best absent, are most unaccountably introduced; 5. When certain words are more correctly disposed in a different place; and, lastly, when phrases are joined together, the latter of which is much clearer than the former.

(2.) "An interpolation is sometimes betrayed by the circumstance of its being delivered in the language of a later church. In the time of the apostles the word Christ was never used as the proper name of a person, but as an epithet expressive of the ministry of Jesus, and was frequently applied as synonymous to 'Son of God.' The expression, therefore, 'Christ is the Son of God,' Acts viii. 37, is a kind of tautology, and is almost as absurd as to say Christ is the Messiah, that is, the anointed is the anointed. But the word being used in later ages as a proper name, this impropriety was not perceived by the person who obtruded the passage on the text."

(3.) "If one or more words that may be considered as an addition to a passage, are found only in manuscripts, but in none of the most ancient versions, nor in the quotations of the early fathers, we have reason to suspect an interpolation." In Acts viii. 39. the Alexandrian manuscript reads thus: ἵνα ἀποστείλῃ αὐτὸν ἐπὶ τὸν ὄριον τοῦ ἑθνὸς Εἰς τὸν ὄριον τοῦ ἑθνὸς. The Spit. [holy] fell upon the cumach, but the Angel of the Lord caught away Philip. The words between brackets, Michaelis thinks, are spurious; and Griesbach decidedly pronounces them to be an emendation of the copyist. They are found in six manuscripts cited by him, but these are not ancient; and they are also in the Armenian version executed in the end of the fourth or early in the fifth century, and in the Slavonic version executed in the ninth century. We are justified, therefore, in stating that they are not to be received into the sacred text.

17. Expressions that are less emphatic, unless the scope and context of the sacred writer require emphasis, are more likely to be the genuine reading, than readings different from them, but which have, or seem to have, greater force or emphasis. For copyists, like commentators, who have but a smattering of learning, are mightily pleased with emphases.

18. That reading is to be preferred, which gives a sense apparently false, but which, on thorough investigation, proves to be the true one.

19. Various readings, which have most clearly been occasioned by the errors or negligence of transcribers, are to be rejected. How such readings may be caused, has already been shown in pp. 283, 284. supra.

20. Lctionaries, or Lesson Books, used in the early Christian church, alone are not admissible as evidence for various readings.

Whenever, therefore, Ἰησοῦς, Jesus, ἀδελφοί, brethren, or similar words (which were anciently prefixed to the lessons accordingly as the latter were taken from the Gospels or Epistles, and which are found only in lectionaries), are found at the beginning of a lesson, they are to be considered as suspicious; and fifty manuscripts that contain them have no weight against the same number which omit them.

21. Readings introduced into the Greek text from Latin versions are to be rejected.

22. A reading that is contradictory to history and geography is to be rejected, especially when it is not confirmed by manuscripts.

In Acts xii. 25. we read that Barnabas and Saul returned FROM (ἐξ) Jerusalem, where seven manuscripts, two manuscripts (5. and 7.) of the Slavonic version, and the Arabic version in Bishop Walton's Polyglott, have ἐκ, TO Jerusalem. This last reading has been added by some ignorant copyist, for Barnabas and Saul were returning from Jerusalem to Antioch with the money which they had collected for the poor brethren.

23. That reading which makes a passage more connected is preferable, all due allowance being made for abruptness in the particular case. Saint Paul is remarkable for the abruptness of many of his digressions.

24. Readings, certainly genuine, ought to be restored to the text of the printed editions, though hitherto admitted into none of them; that they may henceforth be rendered as correct as possible, they ought likewise to be adopted in all versions of Scripture: and till this be done, they ought to be followed in explaining it.

1 John ii. 23. The sentence—Ὁ ὁμολογῶν τὸν Υἱόν, καὶ τὸν πατέρα ἱκέει, He that acknowledgeth the Son, hath the Father also—being wanting in the manuscripts consulted by Erasmus, is omitted in all his editions, and is printed in Italics by the translators of our authorized version, to show that it is of doubtful authority; but that it is genuine, and ought to be restored to the text without any mark of spuriousness, is evident from the unquestionable authorities by which it is supported, viz. the Alexandrian and Vatican manuscripts, and the Codex Ephraemi, all which are of great antiquity, besides fourteen others enumerated by Griesbach, which were written between the eleventh and thirteenth centuries; the Peshito and Arabic Syriac versions, the Arabic (edited by Erpenius), Coptic, Sahidic, Ethiopic, Armenian, and Latin Vulgate versions. It is also quoted by Clement Alexandrinus, Origen, Meletius, Athanasius, Cyril of Jerusalem, Cyril of Alexandria, Theophylact, Virgilius bishop of Tapsus, Pelagius, Cerealis, and Cassian. It is further quoted in substance, in Greek, thus—Ὁ ὁμολογῶν τὸν Υἱόν, καὶ τὸν Πατέρα ὁμολογεῖ—(He that acknowledgeth the Son, acknowledgeth the Father also) by Euthalius and Epiphanius; and, in Latin thus—Qui (or et qui, or qui autem) confitetur Filium, et Filium, et Patrem habet,—by Cyprian, Hilary, Faustinus, Lucifer bishop of Cagliari, Augustine, Virgilius bishop of Tapsus, and Bede. This clause is omitted in the Arabic version extant in Bishop Walton's Polyglott, in the Harleian MS. No. 1775, preserved in the British Museum, and some Latin manuscripts. The clause in question is certainly genuine, and it has with great propriety been restored to the text by Griesbach, Matthæi, Knappe, Schott, Titmann, Vater, Valpy, and Boissonade, in their several editions of the Greek text. And it ought, in all future editions of the authorized English version, to be printed in Roman type as an integral part of the sacred text; as, indeed, it has been, by Dr. Clarke in his Commentary, by Dr. Boothroyd in his new Translation and Commentary, and by Mr. Nourse in his edition of our authorized English version, with an improved punctuation (New York, 1827). In addition to the positive evidence above adduced, it may be remarked that this clause not only seems to be required by the sense, but it also corresponds with the style of St. John; and its omission is undoubtedly to be ascribed to an homoteleuton.³

25. Probable readings may have so high a degree of evidence, as justly entitles them to be inserted into the text, in place of the received readings which are much less probable. Such as have not considerably higher probability than the common readings, should only be put into the margin: but they, and all others, ought to be weighed with impartiality.

26. Readings certainly, or very probably false, ought to be expunged from the editions of the Scripture, and ought not to be followed in versions of them, however long and generally they have usurped a place there, as being manifest corruptions, which impair the purity of the sacred books.

27. Lastly, since it is admitted in the criticism of the Sacred Scriptures, as in that of other ancient writings, that the true reading cannot always be determined with absolute certainty, but that only a judgment as to what is more probable can be formed, it is evident that more ought not to be required in this department, than can be performed; nor should a positive judgment be given, without the most careful examination. And, further, if in the criticism of profane authors caution and Michaelis's Introduction to the New Testament, vol. i. p. 335. Nolan's Inquiry into the Integrity of the Greek Vulgate, pp. 286—289. 516—518. Dr. N. has given at length the quotations from the writings of the fathers in which Θεοῦ is found. It is worthy of remark, that Mr. Wakefield, who was a professed and conscientious Socinian, decides in favour of τοῦ Θεοῦ, of God, as the genuine reading: but instead of rendering the words τοῦ Θεοῦ ἀδελφοί, in the following sentence, "with his own blood," he translates them by "his own Son," and he adduces some passages from Greek and Roman writers, to show that αἷμα and sanguis (blood) are used to signify a son or near relative. If, indeed, Acts xx. 27. were the only passage, where the phrase "purchasing with his own blood" occurred, we might receive this saying: but as the redemption of man is, throughout the New Testament, ascribed exclusively to the vicarious and sacrificial death of Christ, it is not likely that this very unusual meaning should apply here.—Dr. A. Clarke, in loc.

modesty should be used, much more ought every thing like rashness or levity to be excluded from the criticism of the Sacred Volume.

The preceding are the most material canons for determining various readings, which are recommended by the united wisdom of the most eminent biblical critics. They have been drawn up chiefly from Dr. Kennicott's Dissertations on the Hebrew Text, De Rossi's Compendio di Critica Sacra, and the canons of the same learned author, in his Prolegomena so often cited in the preceding pages, and from the canons of Bauer in his Critica Sacra, of Ernesti, of Pfaff, Pritius, Wetstein, Griesbach, Beck, Muntinghe, and, above all, of Michaelis, with Bishop Marsh's annotations, often more valuable than the elaborate work of his author.¹

CHAPTER IV.

ON THE QUOTATIONS FROM THE OLD TESTAMENT IN THE NEW—QUOTATIONS IN THE NEW TESTAMENT FROM THE APOCRYPHAL WRITERS, AND FROM PROFANE AUTHORS.

IT is obvious, even on the most cursory perusal of the Holy Scriptures, that some passages are cited in other subsequent passages; and, in particular, that numerous quotations from the Old Testament are made in the New. In these references, there is frequently an apparent contradiction or difference between the original and the quotation; of which, as in the contradictions alleged to exist in the Scriptures (which are considered and solved in the second part of this volume), infidelity and skepticism have sedulously availed themselves. These seeming discrepancies, however, when brought to the touchstone of criticism, instantly disappear; and thus the entire harmony of the Bible becomes fully evident. The appearance of contradiction, in the quotations from the Old Testament that are found in the New, is to be considered in two points of view, namely, 1. As to the external form, or the words in which the quotation is made; and, 2. As to the internal form, or the manner or purpose to which it is applied by the sacred writers.

A considerable difference of opinion exists among some learned men, whether the evangelists and other writers of the New Testament quoted the Old Testament from the Hebrew, or from the venerable Greek version, usually called the Septuagint. Others, however, are of opinion, that they did not confine themselves exclusively to either; and this appears most probable. The only way by which to determine this important question, is to compare and arrange the texts actually quoted. Drusius, Junius, Glassius, Cappel, Hoffman, Eichhorn, Michaelis, and many other eminent biblical critics on the Continent, have ably illustrated this topic; in our own country, indeed, it has been but little discussed. The only writers on this subject, known to the author, are the Rev. Dr. Randolph, formerly Regius Professor of Divinity in the University of Oxford, the Rev. Dr. Henry Owen, and the Rev. Thomas Scott (the titles of whose publications will be found in the BIBLIOGRAPHICAL APPENDIX to the second volume);² but they have treated it with so much ability and accuracy, that he has to acknowledge himself indebted to their labours for great part of his materials for the present chapter.³

SECTION I.

ON THE EXTERNAL FORM OF THE QUOTATIONS FROM THE OLD TESTAMENT IN THE NEW.

§ 1. TABLES OF THE QUOTATIONS FROM THE HEBREW SCRIPTURES AND FROM THE SEPTUAGINT GREEK VERSION, IN THE ORDER IN WHICH THEY OCCUR IN THE NEW TESTAMENT.⁴

¹ A Bibliographical Notice of the principal Treatises on, and Collections of, Various Readings, will be found in the APPENDIX to the second Volume, PART II. CHAP. III. SECT. IV. §§ 2, 3.

² PART II. CHAP. III. SECT. III.

⁴ In the first edition of this work, the author had simply given the references to these quotations. They are now inserted at length, in order to save the student's time, and also to enable him more readily to compare the Hebrew and Greek together; and the English version of the passages is annexed for the convenience of the mere English reader. The text of the Septuagint is that termed the Vatican; and where there are any material variations in the Alexandrine text, they are briefly noticed. The English version of the Septuagint is given from Mr. Thompson's Anglo-American translation (with the exception of two or three passages that have been altered to make them more literal), entitled "The Holy Bible, containing the Old and New Covenant, commonly called the Old and New Testament, translated from the Greek. Philadelphia, 1808." In four volumes, 8vo.

⁶ Καλέσεται is the reading of the Codex Bezae and other MSS., besides several of the fathers.

⁷ This quotation agrees exactly neither with the Hebrew nor with the Septuagint. The only material difference is that the evangelist adds the negative οὐδαμῶς, which is in neither of them. But the Syriac translation reads it with an interrogation, Nam parva es? Art thou little? And so Archbishop Newcome has rendered it.

And thou, Bethlehem Ephratah.

Art thou too little to be among the leaders of Judah?

Out of thee shall come forth unto me

One who is to be a ruler in Israel.

The question, he observes, implies the negative, which is inserted in Matt. ii. 6. and also in the Arabic version. Both the Hebrew and the Greek, as they now stand, are capable of being pointed interrogatively. And it is worthy of remark, that the Codex Cantabrigiensis reads μὴ, nol, interrogatively, instead of οὐδαμῶς, in which it is followed by the Old Italic version and by Tertullian, Cyprian, and other Latin fathers.

⁸ This rendering of the evangelist agrees with the Greek versions of Symmachus and Theodotion.

4. Jer. xxi. 15.

יהוה רבר :

The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord; make straight in the desert a highway for our God. Every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain and hill shall be made low: and the crooked shall be made straight; and the rough places plain. And the glory of the Lord shall be revealed; and all flesh shall see it together.

7. Deut. viii. 3.

לא על-הלהם לכונו יהוה האדם כי על-כל-מזון

Man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth man live.

8. Psal. xci. 11, 12.

כי מלאכיו יצוה-לך לשמור ככל-דרכיך:
על-כפם ישאונך מן-התוף כאנן נגדל :

For he shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways. They shall bear thee up in their hands, lest thou dash thy foot against a stone.

9. Deut. vi. 16.

לא תנסו את-יהוה אלהיכם
Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God.

10. Deut. vi. 13.

את-יהוה אלהיך תירא ואהו תעבד
Thou shalt fear the Lord thy God, and serve him.

11. Isa. ix. 1, 2.

בית הראשון הקל ארצה זבולן וארצה נפתלי
והארון הכביר דרך הים עבר הירדן נליל הנוס:
העם ההלכים בחסר ראו רגל נרול ישבי בארץ
צלמות אור ננה עליהם:

At the first he lightly afflicted the land of Zebulun, and the land of Naphtali, and afterwards made it more grievously afflict her by the way of the sea, beyond Jordan, in Galilee of the nations. The people that walked in darkness have seen a great light; they that dwell in the land of the shadow of death, upon them hath the light shined.

12. Isa. liii. 4.

אנן חלינו רוא נשא ומכאנונו סכלם
Our infirmities he hath borne: And our sorrows he hath carried them. (Bp. Lowth.)

Jer. xxxi. 15.

Φωνή ἐν Ῥαμὰ κλαυθῆναι ὤρνεν, καὶ κλαυθμός, καὶ ὁδύρμος· Ῥαχὴλ αποκλινομένη οὐκ ἤλελ παυσασθαι ἐπὶ τοῖς υἱοῖς αὐτῆς, ὅτι οὐκ εἶσαν.

There was heard at Rama, a sound of lamentation, and weeping and wailing: Rachel, weeping for her children, refused to be comforted, because they are not.

Isa. xl. 3-5.

Φωνὴ βοῶντος ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ· Ἐτοιμαστέτι τὴν ὁδὸν Κυρίου, εὐθείας ποιεῖτε τὰς τρίβους τοῦ Θεοῦ ἡμῶν. Πᾶσα φαραγὶς πληρωθήσεται, καὶ πᾶν ὄρος καὶ βουνὸς ταπεινωθήσεται· καὶ ἑστίαι πάντα τὰ σκολιὰ εἰς εὐθείαν, καὶ ἡ τραχὺ εἰς πᾶσι. Καὶ οὐδῆσεται ἡ ὁδὸς Κυρίου, καὶ οὐσίται πατὰ σαρεὶς τοῦ σωτήριου τοῦ Θεοῦ.

A voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare the way of the Lord; make straight the roads for our God. Every valley shall be filled up; and every mountain and hill be levelled. And all the crooked places shall be made a straight road, and the rough way smooth plains. And the glory of the Lord will appear; and all flesh shall see the salvation of God.

Dent. viii. 3.

Οὐκ ἐπ' ἄρτω μόνῳ ζήσεται ὁ ἀνθρώπος, ἀλλ' ἐπὶ παντί ῥημάτι τῷ ἐκπορευομένῳ διὰ στόματος Θεοῦ.

Man shall not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God.

Psal. xci. 11, 12.

Ὅτι τοῖς ἀγγέλοις αὐτοῦ ἐντέλλεται περὶ σου, τοῦ διαφυλάξαι σε ἐν παταῖς τῶν ἰδῶν σου· ἐπὶ χερσὶν ἀρᾶσι σε, μηποτὶ προσκοψῇς πρὸς λίθον τὸν ποδὸς σου.

For he will give his angels a charge concerning thee, to keep thee in all thy ways. With their hands they shall bear thee up, lest thou shouldst at any time strike thy foot against a stone.

Deut. vi. 16.

Οὐκ ἐκπειράσεις Κυρίον τὸν Θεόν σου.
Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God.

Deut. vi. 13.

Κυρίον τὸν Θεόν σου σεβήσῃς, καὶ αὐτὸν μόνον λατρεύσεις.
Thou shalt fear the Lord thy God, and serve him alone.

Isa. ix. 1, 2.

Χώρα Ζαβουλὸν ἢ γῆ Νεφθαλὶμ, καὶ οἱ λοιποὶ οἱ τὴν παρὰ-ἡμῶν καὶ πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου Γαλιλαϊκὰ τὸν ἐνώνον. Ὁ λαὸς ὁ πορευόμενος ἐν σκοτίᾳ, ἰδεὶ τὴν μέγαν· οἱ κατοικοῦντες ἐν χωρᾷ σκοιᾷ θανάτου, φῶς λαμπρὸν ἐφύμακε.

With regard to the region of Zebulun, the land of Nephthaliim, and the rest who inhabit the sea shore, and beyond Jordan, Galilee of the nations; ye people who walk in darkness, behold a great light! and ye who dwell in a region, the shade of death, on you a light shall shine.

Isa. liii. 4.

Οὗτος τὰς ἁμαρτίας ἡμῶν φέρει, καὶ περὶ ἡμῶν ὀδυνᾷται.
This man bareth away our sins, and for us he is in sorrow.

Matt. ii. 18.

Φωνὴ ἐν Ῥαμὰ κλαυθῆναι ὤρνεν, καὶ κλαυθμός, καὶ ὁδύρμος πολλός· Ῥαχὴλ κλαίονσα τὰ τέκνα αὐτῆς, καὶ οὐκ ἤλελ παρακληθῆναι, ὅτι οὐκ εἶσι.

In Rama was there a voice heard, lamentation, and weeping, and great mourning, Rachel weeping for her children, and would not be comforted, because they are not.

Matt. ii. 23.

Ὅπως πληρωθῇ τὸ ῥῆμα διὰ τῶν προφητῶν, ὅτι Ναζωρεὺς καλεῖσθαι.
That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophets, He shall be called a Nazarene.

Matt. iii. 3. Mark i. 3. Luke iii. 4-6.

Φωνὴ βοῶντος ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ· Ἐτοιμαστέτι τὴν ὁδὸν Κυρίου, εὐθείας ποιεῖτε τὰς τρίβους αὐτοῦ. Πᾶσα φαραγὶς πληρωθήσεται, καὶ πᾶν ὄρος καὶ βουνὸς ταπεινωθήσεται· καὶ ἑστίαι πάντα τὰ σκολιὰ εἰς εὐθείαν, καὶ αἱ τραχὺ εἰς ὁδὸν λείαν. Καὶ οὐσίται πατὰ σαρεὶς τοῦ σωτήριου τοῦ Θεοῦ.

The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight. Every valley shall be filled, and every mountain and hill shall be brought low; and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough ways shall be made smooth; and all flesh shall see the salvation of God.

Matt. iv. 4. Luke iv. 4.

Οὐκ ἐπ' ἄρτω μόνῳ ζήσεται ὁ ἀνθρώπος, ἀλλ' ἐπὶ παντί ῥημάτι ἐκπορευομένῳ διὰ στόματος Θεοῦ.

Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God.

Matt. iv. 6.

Ὅτι . . . τοῖς ἀγγέλοις αὐτοῦ ἐντέλλεται περὶ σου, καὶ ἐπὶ χερσὶν ἀρᾶσι σε, μηποτὶ προσκοψῇς πρὸς λίθον τὸν ποδὸς σου.

For . . . he shall give his angels charge concerning thee; and in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone.

Matt. iv. 7.

Οὐκ ἐκπειράσεις Κυρίον τὸν Θεόν σου.
Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God.

Matt. iv. 10.

Κυρίον τὸν Θεόν σου προσκυνεῖς, καὶ αὐτὸν μόνον λατρεύσεις.
Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve.

Matt. iv. 15, 16.

Γῆ Ζαβουλὸν, καὶ γῆ Νεφθαλὶμ, ὁδὸν θαλάσσης, πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου, Γαλιλαϊκὰ τῶν ἐνώνον. Ὁ λαὸς ὁ καθήμενος ἐν σκοτίᾳ εἶδε φῶς μέγαν, καὶ τοῖς καθημένοις ἐν χωρᾷ σκοιᾷ θανάτου φῶς ἀνέτειλεν αὐτοῖς.

The land of Zebulun, and the land of Nephthaliim, by the way of the sea, beyond Jordan, Galilee of the Gentiles; the people which sat in darkness saw great light: and to them which sat in the region and shadow of death, light is sprung up.

Matt. viii. 17.

Αὐτὸς τὰς ἀσθενείας ἡμῶν ελάβεν, καὶ τὰς νοσήσεις ἐκάτεσεν.
Himself took our infirmities, and bare our sicknesses.

² The quotation in Matthew agrees very nearly with the Hebrew, but not with the Septuagint. Dr. Randolph thinks it might possibly be taken from some other translation. (On the Quotations, p. 27.)

³ As the evangelist cites the Prophecies in the plural number, it is highly probable that this passage is not a quotation from any particular prophet, but a citation denoting the humble and despised condition of the Messiah, as described by the prophets in general, and especially by the prophet Isaiah. (See Dr. Hunt's sermon on Matt. ii. 23, at the end of his "Observations on several passages in the Book of Prophecies," pp. 170-193.) Though the words, he shall be called a Nazarene, are not to be found in the writings of the prophets, yet as the thing intended by them is of frequent occurrence, the application is made with sufficient propriety. The Israelites despised the Galileans in general, but especially the Nazarenes, who were so contemptible as to be subjects of ridicule even to the Galileans themselves. Hence, Nazarene was a term of reproach proverbially given to any despicable worthless person whatever. Wherefore since the prophets (particularly those above referred to) have, in many parts of their writings, foretold that the Messiah should be rejected, despised, and traduced, they have in reality predicted that he should be called a Nazarene. And the evangelist justly reckons Christ's dwelling in Nazareth, among other things, a completion of these predictions; because, in the course of his public life, the circumstance of his having been educated in that town was frequently objected to him as a matter of scorn, and was one principal reason why his countrymen would not receive him. knight's Harmony, vol. i. p. 53. 8vo. edit. See also Rosenmüller, Kuinöl, and other commentators on this text.

⁹ These words are not an exact translation of the Hebrew; and Dr. Randolph observes that it is difficult to make sense of the Hebrew or of the English in the order in which the words at present stand. But the difficulty, he thinks, may easily be obviated, by removing the first six words of Isa. ix. and joining them to the former chapter, as they are in all the old versions: And then the words may be thus rendered: As the former time made vile, or debased, the land of Zebulun, and the land of Nephthali, so the latter time shall make it glorious. The way of the sea, &c. A prophecy most signally fulfilled by our Saviour's appearance and residence in these parts. The evangelist, from the first part of the sentence, takes only the land of Zebulun, and the land of Nephthaliim. What follows is an exact and almost literal translation of the Hebrew: only for יהלכים, walked, is put καθήμενος, sat. How properly this prophecy is cited, and applied to our Saviour, see Mr. Mede's Disc. on Mark 4. 14. 15. I have put my spirit upon him; he will publish judgment to the nations: he will not cry aloud, nor urge with vehemence, nor will his voice be heard abroad. A bruised reed he will not break, nor will he quench smoking flax, but will bring forth judgment unto truth,—and in his name shall the nations trust (or hope).

Isa. vi. 9—11.

Ακουσθε, και ου μη συνητε, και βλεποντες βλεψετε, και ου μη ιδετε. Επακουσθη γαρ η καρδια του λαου τουτου, και τας ουσ αυτων βαρεως ηκουσων, και τους οφθαλμους κλειψαντες, μη οψαντες ιδωσι τους οφθαλμοις, και τας ουσ αυτων ακουσων, και τη τους.

By hearing, ye shall hear, though ye may not understand; and seeing, ye shall see, though ye may not perceive. For the heart of this people is stified, and their ears are dull of hearing; and they have shut their eyes, that for a while they may not see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their hearts, and return that I may heal them.

Psal. lxxviii. 2.
 Ἀνοίξω ἐν παραβολαῖς; τὸ στόμα μου, φθίζομαι·

 This people draw near to me with their mouth; and with their lips they honour me, but their heart is far from me: And in vain do they worship me, teaching the commands and doctrines of men.

Behold my servant whom I have chosen, my beloved in whom my soul is well pleased. I will put my spirit upon him, and he shall show judgment to the Gentiles. He shall not strive nor cry; neither shall any man hear his voice in the streets. A bruised reed shall he not break, and smoking flax shall he not quench, till he send forth judgment unto victory. And in his name shall the Gentiles trust.

 Αγαπήσεις τον πλησίον σου ὡς σεαυτὸν.
 Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself

¹ This quotation differs from the Hebrew and all the old versions in these two particulars: the words πρὸ προσηύχου σου are added, and what is in Hebrew לפני, before me, is rendered ἐμπροσθεν σου, before thee. For the reason of this difference it is not easy to account, but by supposing some corruptions crept into the ancient copies; the sense is much the same. (Dr. Randolph on the Quotations, p. 28.)

• This quotation by the quodammodo, p. 28, of the Septuagint version, whose authors have obscured this process by adding the words Jacob and Israel, which are not in the original Hebrew. It is probably taken from some old translation agreeing very nearly with the Hebrew. The only difficulty is in the words εως ου καταληξεν εις τας τινς κριτας. But if by εως we understood the cause univocal, then to send forth his cause unto truth, will be to carry the cause, and vindicate its truth; which agrees in sense with καταληξεν εις τας τινς κριτας, and Dr. Randolph.

■ This quotation is taken almost verbatim from the Septuagint, which has αὐτων after ὑποβαλεως in the Codex Alexandr. In the Hebrew the sense is obscured by false pointing. If, instead of reading it in the imperative mood, we read it in the indicative mood, the sense will be: ye shall hear but not understand: and ye shall see but not perceive. This people hath made their heart fat, and have made their ears heavy and shut their eyes, &c. which agrees in sense with the Evangelist and with the Septuagint, as well as with the Syriac and Arabic versions, but not with the Latin Vulgate. We have the same quotation, word for word, in Acts xxvii. 26. Mark and Luke refer to the same prophecy, but quote it only in part. (Dr. Randolph, p. 29.)

* The quotation in this passage of St. Matthew's Gospel approaches nearer to the Septuagint than to the Hebrew text, especially in the clause $\mu\epsilon\tau\alpha\beta\alpha\lambda\epsilon\iota\tau\epsilon\ \tau\alpha\ \sigma\epsilon\beta\alpha\sigma\mu\epsilon\tau\alpha\ \mu\epsilon\iota$ —in vain do they worship me; which is found in the Septuagint, but not in the Hebrew, and is retained by the Evangelist. The verbal differences, however, show that an exact quotation was not intended. (Scott.) Griesbach's reading makes the quotation still less exact, and shows that the MSS. of the Greek Testament were sometimes altered from the Septuagint.

- The Codex Alexandr. has τῇ συνδικῇ for πρὸς τὴν συνδικήν
- Αὐτοῦ is added by the Codex Ephreni and other MSS.
- This quotation agrees with the Hebrew, excepting that the word for two is there omitted. But it ought to be inserted in the Hebrew text, as we have already seen in p. 286. supra.
- Οὐ φανεύσεις· οὐ μοιχεύσεις· οὐ κλέβεις. Codex Alexandr.

יְהוָה אֶל-הַיּוֹצֵר:
Cast it unto the potter; a goodly price that I was prized at of them. And I took the thirty pieces of silver, and cast them to the potter in the house of the Lord.

⁴ This citation is attended with no small difficulty. The prophecy is cited from Jeremiah: but in that prophet no such prophecy is to be found. In Zech. xi. 13. such a prophecy is found, but neither do the words there perfectly agree with Saint Matthew's citation. Some critics are of opinion that an error has crept into Saint Matthew's copy; and that ἡ has been written by the transcribers instead of ἐξ, or that the word has been interpolated. And it is to be observed, that the word is omitted in the MSS. by Griesbach numbered 33. (of the eleventh or twelfth century), and 157. (of the twelfth century), in the later Syriac and in the modern Greek versions, one or two MSS. of the old Italic version, some manuscripts cited by Augustine, and one Latin MS. cited by Lucas Brugensis. Griesbach's MS. 22. (of the eleventh century) reads ἐξ, which word is also found in the margin of the later Syriac version, and in an Arabic exemplar cited by Bengel in his Critical Edition of the New Testament. Origen, and after him Eusebius, conjectured that this was the true reading. Other eminent

And they took the thirty pieces of silver, the price of him that was valued, whom they of the children of Israel did value: and gave them for the potter's field, as the Lord appointed me.

critics have thought that the ninth, tenth, and eleventh chapters of what is called Zechariah's Prophecy were really written by Jeremiah, and they have certainly assigned very probable reasons for such opinion both from the matter and style. (See Dr. Hammond on Heb. viii. 9. Mede's Works, pp. 786–833. Bp. Kidder's Demost. of Messiah, part ii. p. 196, &c. Lowth, Prelect. Poet., Lect. xxi. See also Volume II. Part VI. Chap. VII. p. 283., where reasons are assigned to show that these chapters were actually written by Zechariah.) It is, however, most likely, that the original reading of Matthew xxvii. 9. was simply, that which was spoken by the prophet, διὰ τὸν προφῆτην, without naming any prophet. And this conjecture is confirmed by the fact that Saint Matthew often omits the name of the prophet in his quotations. (See Matt. i. 22. ii. 5. xiii. 35. and xli. 4.) Bengel approves of the omission. It was, as we have already shown (see p. 212, 213. of this volume), the custom of the Jews, to divide the Old Testament into three parts: the first, beginning with the Law, was called THE LAW; the second, commencing with the psalms, was called the PSALMS; and the third, beginning with the prophet in question, was called JEREMIAH: consequently, the writings of Zechariah, and of the other prophets, being included in that division which began with Jeremiah, all quotations from it would go under this prophet's name. This solution completely removes the difficulty. Dr. Lightfoot (who cites the Baba Bathra and Rabbi David Kimchi's Preface to the prophet Jeremiah as his authorities) insists that the word Jeremiah is perfectly correct, as standing at the head of that division from which the evangelist quoted, and which gave its denomination to all the rest. With regard to the prophecy itself, if in St. Matthew's Gospel, for ἔδωκαν, they gave, we read ἔλαβον, I gave, which is the reading of the Evangelistia, 24. and 31. of Griesbach's notation (both of the eleventh century), and of both the Syriac versions, the evangelist's notation will very nearly agree with the original. That we should read ἔδωκαν, I gave, appears further to be probable from what follows,—καθὰ συνέταξε μοι κύριος, as the Lord commanded me,—Καὶ ἔλαβον τὰ τριακοντὰ ἀργύρια, καὶ ἐδῶκαν αὐτὰ εἰς τὸν ἀγρὸν τὸν κεραμέως: and I took the thirty pieces of silver, and I gave them for the potter's field. The translation is literal, excepting only that ἔδωκεν is rendered ἔλαβον τὸν κεραμέως, and ἔδωκεν is omitted; and the same is also omitted in some ancient MSS. (See Kennicott's Dissertation Generalis, § 49. p. 21.) The words τὴν τιμὴν τῶν τετταμήνων ἐν τριμνητῷ ἀπὸ οἴκου Ἰσραὴλ, καὶ ἐδῶκαν αὐτὰ εἰς τὸν ἀγρὸν τὸν κεραμέως are added to supply the sense, being taken in sense, and very nearly in words, from the former part of the verse; this latter clause is in the Arabic version. Isa. liii. 1.
Κυρίε, τίς ἐπιστήσιν τὴν ἀκοήν ἡμῶν;
Καὶ ὁ βραχίον Κυρίου τίνι ἀπεκάλυψεν;
Lord, who hath believed our report?
And to whom hath the arm of the Lord been revealed (or made manifest)?

Matt. xxvii. 35. John xix. 24.
Διαιμιρίσαντο τὰ ἱμάτια μου ἑαυτοῖς, καὶ ἐπὶ τὸν ἱματισμὸν μου ἔβαλον κλήρον.
They parted my garments among them, and upon my vesture did they cast lots.

Matt. xxvii. 46.
Ἡλι, Ἡλι, λαμα σαβαχθάνι; τούτ' ἐστίν, Θεὸς μου, ὦν μου, ἵνα τίς ἐλπίσῃ με;
Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani? That is to say, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?

The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the Gospel to the poor, he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord.

John ii. 17.
Ὁ Ζηλος τοῦ οἴκου σου κατέφαγεν με.
The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up.

John vi. 31.
Ἄρτον ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ ἐδωκεν αὐτοῖς φαγεῖν
He gave them bread from heaven to eat.

John vi. 45.
Καὶ ἡσονται πάντες υἱοὶ διδάσκεις τοῦ Θεοῦ
And they shall be all taught of God

John vii. 38.
Ὁ πιστεύων ἐς ἐμέ, καθὼς ἐπὶ ἐν ἡ γράφῃ, ὅτι
ἐκ τῆς κοιλίας αὐτοῦ ῥευσουσιν ὕδατος ζωντοῦ.
He that believeth on me, as the Scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water.

John x. 34.
Εἶπα, ὁ Θεὸς ἐστίς.
I said, Ye are gods.

John xii. 15. (See Matt. xxi. 5. p. 296. supra.)
Μη φοβέου, θυγατὴρ Σιών ἰδοὺ, ὁ βασιλεὺς σου ἐρχεται, καθήμενος ἐπὶ πωλον ονού.
Fear not, daughter of Sion; behold thy king cometh, sitting on an ass's colt.

John xii. 38. (and see Rom. x. 16.)
Κυρίε, τίς ἐπιστήσιν τὴν ἀκοήν ἡμῶν;
Καὶ ὁ βραχίον Κυρίου τίνι ἀπεκάλυψεν;
Lord, who hath believed our report?
And to whom hath the arm of the Lord been revealed?

² The Codex Coislinianus 195. (No. 34. of Griesbach's notation), of the eleventh century, omits the words printed between brackets.
³ This quotation is made exactly from the Septuagint, as far as the words ἀχμαλούς ἀφισιν, deliverance to the captives; and it accords with the Hebrew, except that the word Jehovah twice occurs there, which is omitted in the Septuagint and by the evangelist. But, instead of the Hebrew clause, translated the opening of the prison to them that are bound, we read τυφλοῖς ἀναβλεψέιν, recovering of sight to the blind; which words are adopted by St. Luke, who adds, ἀπιστάλαι με ἡσπασάμενος, setting at liberty them that are bruised, which words do not appear in the Septuagint. The difference between this quotation, as it appears in Luke iv. 18. and the original Hebrew, is thus accounted for—Jesus Christ doubtless read the prophet Isaiah in Hebrew, which was the language constantly used in the Synagogue; but the evangelist, writing for the use of the Hellenists (or Greek Jews), who understood and used only the Septuagint version, quotes that version, which on the whole gives the same sense as the Hebrew. Le Clerc, Dr. Owen, and Michaelis are of opinion that they are either a different version of the Hebrew, and inserted from the margin of the evangelic text, or else that they are a gloss upon it, taken from Isa. lviii. 6. where the very words occur in the Greek, though the Hebrew text is very different. The Arabic version agrees nearly with the evangelist. The Hebrew appears formerly to have contained more than we now find in the manuscripts and printed editions. (Scott, Randolph.)
⁴ There are no words answering to these either in the Septuagint, or in the Hebrew. It is indeed no citation, but only a reference or allusion.

The Jewish writers inform us that, on the last day of the Feast of Tabernacles, it was usual to pour water on the altar, to denote their praying then for the blessing of rain, the latter rain, which was then wanted against their approaching seed-time: This water they drew out of Siloah, and brought it with great pomp and ceremony to the temple, playing with their instruments, and singing, and repeating the words of the prophet: Wita joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation. (Isa. xii. 3.) Our Lord, according to his usual custom, takes occasion from hence to instruct the people; and applies this ceremony and this scripture to himself: He signifies to them that the water here spoken of was to be had from him alone—If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink: He that believeth in me, as the Scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water.—The word κοιλία, here translated belly, signifies a hollow receptacle, and may properly be used for such cisterns or reservoirs as were usually built to receive the waters issuing from their fountains: The meaning then is, that every true believer shall, according to this scripture, repeated by the people on this occasion, abound with living water, have within him such a cistern, as will supply living water, both for his own and others' use: What is signified by water we are informed in the next verse, viz. the gifts of the Spirit: The like metaphor our Lord makes use of, John iv. 10. And in the prophetic writings (see Isa. xlv. 3. lv. 1. Ezek. xxxvi. 25–27. Zech. xiv. 8.) it is often peculiarly used to signify the gifts and graces of the Spirit to be conferred under the gospel dispensation. (Dr. Randolph, p. 31.)

⁴ It is evident that the evangelist here plainly read αλη (him) instead of αλη (me) in the Hebrew: But so also read thirty-six Hebrew MSS. and two ancient editions. And that this is the true reading appears by what follows—and they shall mourn for him. On the authority of these manuscripts, Archbishop Newcome reads and translates אלי him. (Minor Prophets, p. 330. 8vo. edit.)

I foresaw the Lord always before my face, for he is on my right hand, that I should not be moved: therefore did my heart rejoice, and my tongue was glad; moreover also my flesh shall rest in hope: because thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption. Thou hast made known to me the ways of life; thou shalt make me full of joy with thy countenance.

A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you, of your brethren, like unto me: him shall ye hear in all things whatsoever he shall say unto you. And it shall come to pass, that every soul which will not hear that prophet, shall be destroyed from among the people.

And in thy seed shall all the kindreds (i. e. nations, as being derived from one common ancestor) of the earth be blessed.

Acts iv. 25, 26.

λαβὴτε τὴν σκηνὴν τοῦ Μωϋσέως, καὶ τὸ ἀστρον τοῦ Σιου ἱμῶν Ῥιμφαν, τοὺς τυπούς, οὓς ἐποίησατε προ-σκυνῶντες αὐτοῖς, καὶ μετακίτω ἡμᾶς ἐπεκεῖνα Βαβυλῶνος.

It seems to have been Stephen's design to give a short account of the conduct of God towards the children of Israel. In this he does not confine himself to the words of Moses, but abridges his history, and sometimes adds a clause by way of explication. The present citation agrees very nearly with the Hebrew. It only adds, ἐπιστὶν ὁ θεός; and again, καὶ λατρεύει σου μὴ ἐν τοῖς τοῖς τοῖς τοῖς; which seems to refer to v. 16. where it is said, they shall come hither again. (Dr. Randolph on the Quotations n. 33.)

* In this quotation there is a very considerable error in the copies of the New Testament; and some commentators have supposed that Abraham's purchase of a piece of land of the children of Heth, for a sepulchre, was alluded to. But this is clearly a mistake. It is most probably as Bishop Pearce (in loc.) and Dr. Randolph (p. 33.) have conjectured that Αφρααι is an interpolation, which has crept into the text from the margin. If, therefore, we omit this name, the sense will run very clearly thus:—And he was carried into Egypt and died, he and our fathers.—And he was carried into Sychem, and buried in a sepulchre, which he (Jacob) bought for a sum of money of the sons of Emmor the father of Sychem. See Josh. xxiv. 32, and Dr. Whitby on Acts vi. 16.

* This seems to be taken from the Septuagint, though with some variation. The only considerable difference is that we here read Βαβυλωνος, Babylon, instead of Δαμασκου, Damascus, in the Septuagint. The Hebrew and all the ancient versions read Damascus, as also do one or two manuscripts; and this seems to be the true reading. The Septuagint agrees in

Have ye offered unto me sacrifices and offerings, in the wilderness, forty years, O house of Israel? But ye have borne the tabernacle of your Moloch and Chinn, your images, the star of your god which ye made to yourselves. Therefore I will cause you to go into captivity beyond Damascus.

sonse, though not literally, with the Hebrew. 'Ραίφα, or 'Ρεμφαν, was the name of the same idol in Egypt, which was called כין (chinn) in Syria, and represented the planet Saturn. See Hammond, Lud. de Dieu. Annot. Lowth on Amos v. 25. Spencer de Leg. Heb. i. iii. c. 3. Michaelis, Supplem. ad Lex. Heb. p. 1225. (Randolph, p. 34.) The apparent variance between the prophet and Stephen is of no moment; as the prophecy was fulfilled by Salpmaneser, king of Assyria, carrying the people of Israel both beyond Damascus and Babylon, into the cities of the Medes. See 2 Kings xvii. 6. (Dr. Randolph.)

The quotation is here made from the Septuagint with no material variation; the pronouns αυτου (him) and αυτου (his) are added by the sacred historian; the latter twice. The variation from the present Hebrew text is greater, but not so great as to effect the general import of the passage. (Scott, Randolph.) This quotation agrees exactly with the Alexandrine MS. of the Septuagint. Some MSS. of the Acts follow the Alexandrian, and some the Vatican MS.

Did you, O house of Israel, offer to me burnt-offerings and sacrifices forty years in the wilderness? You have, indeed, taken up the tent of Moloch, and the star of your god Raiphan—those types of them which you have made for yourselves. Therefore I will remove you beyond Damascus.

Isa. lxvi. 1, 2.
Ουτως λεγει Κυριος, 'Ο ουρανός μου θρονός, και η γη υποπόδιον των ποδών μου: ποιουν οικον οικοδομησέν μοι; και ποιος τόπος της κατασκευής μου; Παντα γαρ ταυτα ποιήσεν η χείρ μου.
Thus saith the Lord, The heaven is my throne, and the earth my footstool. What sort of an house will ye build me? And of what sort shall be the place of my rest? For all these things my hand hath made.

I have appointed thee for the light of the nations, that thou mayest be for salvation to the furthest parts of the earth.

Amos ix. 11, 12.
Ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ ἐκείνῃ ἀναστήσω τὴν σκηνὴν Δαυὶδ τὴν πεπτωκυῖαν, καὶ ἀνοικοδομήσω τὰ πεπτωκότα αὐτῆς, καὶ τὰ κατεσκαμμένα αὐτῆς ἀναστήσω, καὶ ἀνοικοδομήσω αὐτήν, καθὼς αἱ ἡμέραι τοῦ αἰῶνος: 'Ὅπως ἐκλήθησιν οἱ καταλειποὶ τῶν ἀνθρώπων, καὶ πάντα τὰ ἔθνη, ἐφ' οὓς ἐπικεκλήται τὸ ὄνομα μου ἐπ' αὐτοὺς, λεγέτω Κυριὸς ὁ ποιῶν πάντα ταῦτα.
In that day will I raise up the tabernacle of David, which hath fallen; I will rebuild those parts of it which have fallen to decay, and repair what have been demolished. I will indeed rebuild it as in the days of old, that the rest of mankind may seek [the Lord], even all the nations who are called by my name, saith the Lord, who doeth all these things.

Exod. xxii. 23
Ἀρχόντα τοῦ λαοῦ σου οὐ κακῶς εἰπεί. Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of thy people.

O ye house of Israel, have ye offered to me slain beasts and sacrifices, forty years in the wilderness? Yea, ye took up the tabernacle of Moloch, and the star of your god Kemphan, figures which ye made to worship them: and I will carry you away beyond Babylon.

Acts vii. 49, 50.
'Ο ουρανός μου θρονός, ἡ δὲ γη υποπόδιον των ποδών μου: ποιουν οικον οικοδομησέν μοι; λεγει Κυριος: η τις τοπος της κατασκευής μου; Ουχι η χείρ μου ἐποίησε ταυτα παντα;
Heaven is my throne, and earth is my footstool: what house will ye build me? saith the Lord: or what is the place of my rest? Hath not my hand made all these things?

Acts viii. 32, 33.
'Ὡς πρόβατον ἐπὶ σφαγῆν ηἰλῆθ, καὶ ὡς ἄμνος ἐναντίον τοῦ κείροντος αὐτὸν ἀφώνος, οὕτως οὐκ ἀνοίγει τὸ στόμα αὐτοῦ. Ἐν τῇ ταπεινώσει αὐτοῦ ἡ κρίσις αὐτοῦ ῥῆθ'· τὴν δὲ γενεάν αὐτοῦ τὴς διγίγνη σεται; ὅτι αἰρεται ἀπὸ τῆς γῆς ἡ ζῶη αὐτοῦ.
He was led as a sheep to the slaughter, and like a lamb dumb before his shearer, so opened he not his mouth. In his humiliation his judgment was taken away, and who shall declare his generation? for his life is taken from the earth.

Acts xiii. 22.
Εὐρυν Δαυὶδ τὸν τοῦ Ἰσσοῦ, ἀνδρὰ κατὰ τὴν καρδίαν μου, ἡς ποιεῖται πάντα τὰ θελήματά μου.
I have found David the son of Jesse, a man after my own heart, which shall fulfil all my will.

Acts xiii. 33.
Ὁς μου εἰ σύ, ἔγω σήμερον γεγέννηκά σε. Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee.

Acts xiii. 34.
Δώσω ὑμῖν τὰ ὅσα Δαυὶδ τὰ ῥήματα.
I will give you the sure mercies of David.

Acts xiii. 41.
Ἴδτε οἱ καταφρονῶνται, καὶ θαυμάσατε, καὶ ἀφανίσθητε: διότι ἔργον ἔγω ἐργάζομαι ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις ὑμῶν, ὃν οὐκ ὀπίσσωται, ἐν ταῖς ἐκδηγήται ὑμῖν.
Behold, ye despisers, and wonder and perish; for I work a work in your days, a work which you shall in no wise believe, though a man declare it unto you.

Acts xiii. 47.
Τελεῖται σε εἰς φῶς ἔθνον, τοῦ εἶναι σε εἰς σωτηρίαν ἕως ἰσχύατος τῆς γῆς.
I have set thee to be a light of the Gentiles, that thou shouldst be for salvation unto the ends of the earth.

Acts xv. 16, 17.
Μετὰ ταῦτα ἀναστρέψω, καὶ ἀνοικοδομήσω τὴν σκηνὴν Δαυὶδ τὴν πεπτωκυῖαν, καὶ τὰ κατεσκαμμένα αὐτῆς ἀνοικοδομήσω, καὶ ἀνορθώσω αὐτήν: 'Ὅπως ἐκλήθησιν οἱ καταλειποὶ τῶν ἀνθρώπων τὸν Κυρίον, καὶ πάντα τὰ ἔθνη ἐφ' οὓς ἐπικεκλήται τὸ ὄνομα μου ἐπ' αὐτοὺς, λεγέτω Κυριὸς ὁ ποιῶν πάντα ταῦτα.
After this I will return and build again the tabernacle of David, which is fallen down; and I will build up again the ruins thereof, and I will set it up: that the residue of men might seek after the Lord, and all the Gentiles upon whom my name is called, saith the Lord, who doeth all these things.

Acts xxiii. 5.
Ἀρχόντα τοῦ λαοῦ σου οὐ κακῶς εἰπεί. Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of thy people.

2 Some MSS. add καὶ ἐπιβλεψάτε after καταφρονῶνται, as in the Septuagint.
3 O is the reading of nineteen MSS., five of which are of the greatest antiquity.

4 This quotation is the reading of the Alexandrine copy of the Septuagint, and is a literal rendering of the Hebrew, merely omitting the pronoun my; salvation, instead of my salvation. The Vatican MS. differs very much.

5 This quotation, in general, seems to be taken from the Septuagint, but with several verbal variations. The passage, however, varies more materially from the Hebrew, especially in the clause, That the residue of men may seek after the Lord; which, in the authorized English version from the Hebrew, is rendered, That they may possess the remnant of Edom. The Septuagint translators evidently read ירשו (yirshu), not יירשו (yirshu) and אדם (adam) אדם (edem); and the quotation of it by the apostle or the evangelical historian, according to that reading, gives great sanction to it. (Scott.)

70 Hab. ii. 4.
וְצִדִּיק בְּאִמְּנוֹתָיו יֵחִי׃
The just shall live by his faith.

Hab. ii. 4.
Ο δὲ δίκαιος ἐκ πίστεως μου ζήσεται.
But the just shall live by faith in me.

Rom. i. 17.
Ὁ δὲ δίκαιος ἐκ πίστεως ζήσεται.
The just shall live by faith.

71 Isa. lii. 5.
וְחִמְדוֹ כְּלִי־הַיּוֹם שָׁמַיִם׃
My name continually every day is blasphemed.

Isa. lii. 5.
Δι' ὅμης διὰ πάντων τῶν ὀνόματός μου βλασφημεῖται ἐν τοῖς ἔθνεσι.
For thy account my name is continually reviled among the nations.

Rom. ii. 24.
Τὸ γὰρ ὄνομα τοῦ Θεοῦ δι' ὅμης βλασφημεῖται ἐν τοῖς ἔθνεσι.
For the name of God is blasphemed among the Gentiles through you.

72 Psal. li. 6. (1. of English version.)
לִמְעַן חֲצֹק בִּבְרָךְ הוֹדָה בְּשִׁפְטֶךָ׃
That thou mightest be justified when thou speakest, and be clear when thou judgest.

Psal. li. 4.
Ὅπως ἀν δίκαιος ἐν τοῖς λόγοις σου, καὶ νικήσῃς ἐν τῷ κρίνεσθαί σε.
So that thou mayest be justified in thy sayings, and overcome when thou art judged.

Rom. iii. 4.
Ὅπως ἀν δίκαιος ἐν τοῖς λόγοις σου, καὶ νικήσῃς ἐν τῷ κρίνεσθαί σε.
That thou mightest be justified in thy sayings, and mightest overcome when thou art judged.

73 Gen. xv. 6.
וְאַבְרָם בִּירוֹהוּ וַיַּחֲשֶׁב לוֹ צְדָקָה׃
And he believed in the Lord, and he counted it to him for righteousness.

Gen. xv. 6.
Καὶ ἐπίστευσεν Ἀβραμ τῷ Θεῷ, καὶ ἡλογισθῆν αὐτῷ ἡ δικαιοσύνη.
And Abram believed God, and it was counted him for righteousness.

Rom. iv. 3.
Ἐπίστευσε δὲ Ἀβραμ τῷ Θεῷ, καὶ ἡλογισθῆν αὐτῷ ἡ δικαιοσύνη.
And Abraham believed God, and it was counted to him for righteousness.

74 Psal. xiv. 1—3.
אֵין עֶשְׂתִּיב׃ יְהוָה שֹׁשְׁמֵי הַשָּׁמַיִם עַל־בְּנוֹתֵיהֶם׃
לְרֹאשׁוֹת הָיִם׃ מִיִּכְבֹּד וְרֵשׁ אֲתֵּלְאֵלֵיהֶם׃ הֲלֹכְ כִּי יִהְיֶה נִלְאָחוּ אֵין עֶשְׂתִּיב׃ אֵין גַּם אֲדָר׃
There is none that doeth good. The Lord looked down from heaven upon the children of men; to see if there were any that did understand and seek God. They are all gone aside; they are all together become filthy: there is none that doeth good, no, not one.

Psal. xiv. 1—3.
Οὐκ ἔστι πῶς ἄνθρωπος χρηστέος, οὐκ ἔστιν ἄνθρωπος ὁ δίκαιος. Κύριος ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ διεκρίθη ἐπὶ τοὺς υἱοὺς τῶν ἀνθρώπων, τοῦ ἰδεῖν ἐὰν ἔστι συνέων, ἢ ἐκζητῶν τὸν Θεόν. Πάντες ἐξέκλιναν, ἅμα ἡγριώθησαν· οὐκ ἔστι πῶς ἄνθρωπος χρηστέος, οὐκ ἔστιν ἄνθρωπος ὁ δίκαιος.
There is none who doeth good: no, not one. The Lord looked down from heaven on the children of men, to see if any had understanding, or were seeking God. They had all gone aside, they were altogether become vile. There is none who doeth good, no, not one.

Rom. iii. 10—12.
Οὐκ ἔστι δίκαιος, οὐδὲ εἷς. Οὐκ ἔστιν ὁ συνέων· οὐκ ἔστιν ὁ ἐκζητῶν τὸν Θεόν. Πάντες ἐξέκλιναν, ἅμα ἡγριώθησαν· οὐκ ἔστι πῶς ἄνθρωπος χρηστέος, οὐκ ἔστιν ἄνθρωπος ὁ δίκαιος.
There is not one righteous; no, not one: there is none that understandeth, there is none that seeketh after God. They are all gone out of the way; they are altogether become unprofitable; there is none that doeth good; no, not one.

75 Psal. v. 10. (9. of English version.)
כִּבְרִמְתוֹחַ גִּרְמָה לִשְׁנֵם יַחֲלִיקוֹן׃
Their throat is an open sepulchre, they flatter with their tongue.

Psal. v. 9.
Τὰ ὦτά μου ἀνεγκύμηνος ὁ λαρὺνξ αὐτῶν· τὰς γλῶσσάς αὐτῶν ἰδοὺ ἐδολούσαν.
Their throat is an open sepulchre; with their tongue they have practised deceit.

Rom. iii. 13.
Τὰ ὦτά μου ἀνεγκύμηνος ὁ λαρὺνξ αὐτῶν· τὰς γλῶσσάς αὐτῶν ἰδοὺ ἐδολούσαν.
Their throat is an open sepulchre; with their tongues they have used deceit.

76 Psal. xli. 4. (3. of English version.)
חֶסֶד כְּשֹׁב חֶחֶת שְׁפִיתוֹ׃
Adders' poison is under their lips.

Psal. xxxix. 3. (exl. 3. of English Bible.)
Ἰσὺ ἀσπίδων ὡς τὰ χεῖλη αὐτῶν.
The poison of asps is under their lips.

Rom. iii. 13.
Ἰσὺ ἀσπίδων ὡς τὰ χεῖλη αὐτῶν.
The poison of asps (a venomous species of serpent) is under their lips.

77 Psal. x. 7.
אֱלֹהֵי מוֹפְתוֹ מָלָא וּמְדוּמָה׃
His mouth is full of cursing and deceit.

Psal. ix. 7. [2d series of verses.]
Οὐ ἀρεῖ, τὸ στόμα αὐτοῦ γίμει καὶ πικρία.
His mouth is full of cursing and bitterness.

Rom. iii. 14.
Ὡς τὸ στόμα ἀρεῖ καὶ πικρίας γίμει.
Whose mouth is full of cursing and bitterness.

78 Isa. lix. 7, 8.
רְגִלֵּיהֶם לָרֶעַ יִרְצוּ וַיִּסְתְּרוּ לִשְׁפָן רַב נָקִי—שֶׁר יִשְׁבֵּר בְּסִלְחוֹת׃ רָרָר שְׂלוֹם לֹא יִדְעוּ׃
Their feet run to evil, and they make haste to shed innocent blood.—Wasting and destruction are in their path. The way of peace they know not.

Isa. lix. 7, 8.
Οἱ δὲ ποδὶς αὐτῶν ὡς πονηρίαν τριχόουσι, ταχύνει ἡ χεὶρ αὐτῶν—συντριμμὰ καὶ ταλαιπωρία ἐν ταῖς ὁδοῖς αὐτῶν. Καὶ ὁδὸν εἰρήνης οὐκ οἶδαν.
Their feet run to evil they are swift to shed blood.—Destruction and misery are in their ways, and the way of peace they do not know.

Rom. iii. 15—17.
Ὁς εἶς οἱ ποδὶς αὐτῶν ὡς χεὶρ αἵμα. Συντριμμὰ καὶ ταλαιπωρία ἐν ταῖς ὁδοῖς αὐτῶν. Καὶ ὁδὸν εἰρήνης οὐκ οἶδαν.
Their feet are swift to shed blood. Destruction and misery are in their ways; and the way of peace they have not known.

79 Psal. xxxvi. 2. (1. of English version.)
אֵין־יִסְרוֹת אֱלֹהִים לִנְגַד עֵינָיו׃
There is no fear of God before his eyes.

Psal. xxxvi. 1. (xxxvi. 1. of English Bible.)
Οὐκ ἔστι φόβος Θεοῦ ἀπεναντί τῶν ὀφθαλμῶν αὐτοῦ.
There is no fear of God before his eyes.

Rom. iii. 18.
Οὐκ ἔστι φόβος Θεοῦ ἀπεναντί τῶν ὀφθαλμῶν αὐτοῦ.
There is no fear of God before their eyes.

80 Psal. xxxii. 1, 2.
אֲשֶׁר־יִשְׁוִי־מַעַל כִּמְעַל אֲשֶׁר־יִחַר־לֵב׃ יוֹהוּ לֹא עָוֹן׃
Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered. Blessed is the man unto whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity.

Psal. xxxii. 1, 2.
Μακάριοι ὧν πρόβλημα αἰνομασίαι, καὶ ὧν ἁμαρτίας λυφθήσαν αἱ ἁμαρτίαι. Μακάριος ἄνθρωπος ὁ ὃν μὴ λογισθήται Κύριος ἁμαρτίαν.
Happy are they, whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered. Happy is the man, to whom (to whose account) the Lord will not impute (or charge) sin.

Rom. iv. 7, 8.
Μακάριοι ὧν πρόβλημα αἰνομασίαι, καὶ ὧν ἁμαρτίας λυφθήσαν αἱ ἁμαρτίαι. Μακάριος ἄνθρωπος ὁ ὃν μὴ λογισθήται Κύριος ἁμαρτίαν.
Blessed are they, whose sins are forgiven, and whose iniquities are covered. Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute sin.

For thy sake we are killed all the day long, We are accounted as sheep for the slaughter.

¹ The Codex Ephraemi (or Regius) has μετ' αὐτῶν, as in the Septuagint; which reading was in the MS. consulted by the author of the Philoxenian or later Syriac version, and also by Eusebius and Jerome.

² In this quotation from the Septuagint, τὸν Θεόν (of God), is substituted for μετ' αὐτῶν; and the words ἐν τοῖς ἔθνεσι (among the nations), are added to the Hebrew in the Septuagint. (Scott, Randolph.)

³ This is taken from the Septuagint, which agrees with the Hebrew.

⁷ This quotation agrees with the Septuagint, which also agrees with the Hebrew, excepting that the Greek translators have rendered מְדוּמָה (meduma), deceit, by πικρία, bitterness. Dr. Randolph and Mr. Scott conjecture that they read מְדוּמָה (meduma).

91. Gen. xxi. 12. כִּי בִצְחָק יִקְרָא לְךָ זֶרַע:
For, in Isaac, shall thy seed be called.
92. Gen. xviii. 10. שׁוּב אֲשׁוּב אֵלֶיךָ כִּתְּרָה הִירָה וְהִנֵּה בֵן לְשָׂרָה אֲשֶׁרָה
I will certainly return to thee according to the time of life; and lo, Sarah thy wife shall have a son.
93. Gen. xxv. 23. וְרֵב עֶבֶד צְעִיר:
The elder shall serve the younger.
94. Mal. i. 2, 3. וָאֲהָבָה אֶת־עֵשָׂא וְאֶת־עִשָׂו שָׂנְאִי:
I loved Jacob, and I hated Esau.
95. Exod. xxxiii. 19. וְהָיִיתִי אִתְּךָ אִשָּׁר אֶתְּרַחֲמֵנִי וְהָיִיתִי מֵרַחֲמֵי אֲרָחִים:
I will be gracious to whom I will be gracious, and I will show mercy on whom I will show mercy.
96. Exod. ix. 16. וְאֹלֶם כִּעֲבוֹר וְאֵת הַעֲשָׂרִים כִּעֲבוֹר הָרָאָהָן אֶת־כִּחִי וְלִמְעַן סֵפֶר שְׁמִי כִּלְיָהָרָץ:
For this cause have I raised thee up, for to show in thee my power, and that my name may be declared throughout all the earth.
97. Hos. ii. 23. (Heb. 25.) וְרַחֲמֵי אִתְּ לֹא רַחֲמָה וְאִמְרָתִי לֹא־עָמִי עָמִי אַחֵה
I will have mercy upon her that had not obtained mercy, and I will say to them which were not my people, Thou art my people.
98. Hos. ii. 1. (i. 10. of English Version.) וְהָיָה כְּמִקְדָּם אֶשְׁרִי־יֹאמַר לָהֶם לֹא־עָמִי אֲתָם וְאִמְרָה לָהֶם בְּנֵי אֱלֹהִים:
And it shall come to pass, that in the place where it was said unto them, ye are not my people, there it shall be said unto them, ye are the sons of the living God.
99. Isa. x. 22, 23. כִּי אֶסְמִיחָה עַם־יִשְׂרָאֵל כְּחֹל הַיָּם שָׂאֵר יוֹשׁוּב כִּי כִלְיָן חָרוֹן שׁוֹכֵף צָרָה: כִּי כִלְיָן וְהַנְרָצָה אֲרֵנִי יְהוָה זְכוּתָה עֲשֵׂה בְּקִרְבִּי כִלְיָ הָאָרֶץ:
For though thy people Israel be as the sand of the sea, yet a remnant of them shall return: the consumption decreed shall overflow with righteousness. For the Lord God of Hosts shall make a consumption, even determined in the midst of all the land.
100. Isa. i. 9. לִלְוִי יְהוָה צְבָאוֹת הוֹדִיר לָנוּ שְׂרִיר כְּמֶסֶךְ כִּסְרוֹ הִיטִן לְעִמְרָה רִמְיוֹ:
Except the Lord of Hosts had left us a very small remnant, we should have been as Sodom, and we should have been like unto Gomorrah.
101. Isa. viii. 14. וְלֹאֲבָן נִגַּף וְלִצְוֹר מִכְשׁוֹל לִשְׂנֵי כְּתֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל
He shall be for a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence to both the houses of Israel.
102. Isa. xxviii. 16. הִנְנִי יֹסֵד בְּצִיּוֹן אֲבָן כְּהֵן פֶּתַח יִקְרָה מִסֹּכֶר מִסֹּכֶר הַמֵּאֲמִין לֹא יִהְיֶה:
I build, I lay the foundation, I lay the foundation of the house of the Lord, and the foundation of the house of the Lord shall be the foundation of the house of the Lord.
- Gen. xxi. 12. ‘Οτι εν Ισαακ κληθήσεται σοι σπέρμα.
For in Isaac shall thy seed be called.
- Gen. xviii. 10. Επαναστρέψων ἔξω πρὸς σὲ κατὰ τὸν καιρὸν τοῦτον εἰς ὥρας, καὶ ἔξει υἱὸν Σάρρα ἡ γυνὴ σου.
I will return to thee about this time twelve-month; and Sarah, thy wife, shall have a son.
- Gen. xxv. 23. Καὶ ὁ μείζων δουλεύσει τῷ ἑλασσονί.
And the elder shall serve the younger.
- Mal. i. 2, 3. Καὶ ἠγάπησα τὸν Ισακ, τὸν καὶ ἠσέυ ἐμισήσα.
Yet I loved Jacob, and hated Esau.
- Exod. xxxiii. 19. Καὶ ἐλεῶσα ὃν ἂν ἐλεῶ, καὶ οἰκτιρήσω ὃν ἂν οἰκτιρήσω.
I will have mercy on whom I please to have mercy; and I will have compassion on whomsoever I compassionate.
- Exod. ix. 16. Καὶ ἔτι κεν τοῦτο ἐδείκνυμαι ἐν σοὶ τὴν ἰσχύν μου, καὶ ὅπως διαγέλιη τὸ ὄνομα μου ἐν πάσῃ τῇ γῇ.
But thou hast been preserved for this purpose, that by thee I might display my power, and that my name may be celebrated throughout all the earth.
- Hos. ii. 23. Καὶ ἀγαπήσω τὴν οὐκ ἠγαπημένην, καὶ ἐρῶ τῷ οὐ λαῷ μου, ὧς μου εἰς σὺ.
And I will love her who was not beloved; and to them who were not my people, I will say, Thou art my people.
- Hos. ii. 10. Καὶ ἐσται, ἐν τῷ τόπῳ, ὃ ἐρρήθη αὐτοῖς, Οὐ λαὸς μου ὑμεῖς, κληθήσονται καὶ αὐτοὶ υἱοὶ Θεοῦ ζῶντος.
But it shall come to pass that, in the place where it was said, “Ye are not my people,” they shall be called children of the living God.
- Isa. x. 22, 23. Καὶ ἐν γενεαῖς ὁ λαὸς Ἰσραὴλ ὡς ἡ ἄμμος τῆς θάλασσης, τὸ καταλείμμα αὐτῶν σωθήσεται. Λόγον συντίλιν καὶ συντέμνουν ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ, ὅτι λόγον συντέμμενοι ποιεῖται Κύριος ἐπὶ τῇ οἰκουμένῃ ὅλη.
Though the people of Israel be as the sand of the sea, a remnant of them shall be saved. He is closing an account, and making a deduction with saving goodness. Because with the whole land the Lord will make a reckoning from which a deduction hath been made.
- Isa. i. 9. Καὶ ἐμὴ Κυρίου Σαβωὴ ἐγκατελίπειν ἡμῖν σπέρμα, ὡς Σοδομα ἂν ἐγεννηθῇ, καὶ ὡς Γομορρᾶ ἂν ὤμοισεν ὅμην.
Had not the Lord of Hosts left us a seed, we should have been as Sodom, and made like Gomorrah.
- Isa. viii. 14. Καὶ οὐκ ὡς λίθον προσκομμάτων συνκτεσσέσι, οὐδὲ ὡς πέτρας πτωματι.
And ye shall not run against a stumbling stone, nor as under a falling rock.
- Isa. xxviii. 16. Ἰδοὺ, ἐγὼ ἐμβαλλὼ εἰς τὰ θεμέλια Σιών λίθον πολυτλή, ἐκλεκτόν, ἀκρογωνιαίον, ἐντίμον, εἰς τὰ θεμέλια αὐτῆς, καὶ ὁ πιστεύων οὐ μὴ κατασχευθῇ.
Behold, I lay in Sion a stumbling stone, and rock of offence; and whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed.

¹ St. Paul here seems to have made use of some other translation, different from any we now have; it agrees in sense both with the Septuagint and the Hebrew. The most remarkable difference from the Hebrew is that כִּתְּרָה is rendered κατὰ τὸν καιρὸν τοῦτον. They seem to have read כִּתְּרָה as the same thing is expressed Gen. xvii. 21. The Samaritan agrees with the Hebrew. The Vulgate, Syriac, and Arabic versions agree with the Septuagint. However, the sense of the prophecy, both ways, is much the same, that Sarah should have a son at the time of life, or at the return of time next year. (Dr. Randolph on the Quotations, p. 36.)

² This quotation agrees nearly with the Septuagint, and still more nearly with the Arabic. They differ in several particulars from the Hebrew, but the general sense is the same. The prophet foretells a great destruction of the children of Israel, but not a total one; a remnant should return and be saved; the apostle very aptly applies this to the times of the Gospel, when some few of the Jews believed, and were saved, and a signal destruction came upon the rest. It is worthy of observation, that the expressions here in Isaiah are the same as we find in Dan. ix. where the destruction of Jerusalem is foretold. See this prophecy and the application of it well explained by Bishop Newton, Dissertations on the Prophecies, vol. ii. p. 56. (Dr. Randolph on the Quotations, p. 36.)

³ The quotation in Rom. ix. 33. is taken from two places in the prophecy of Isaiah. St. Paul, in order to prove that the Jews in general should be cast off, and only those among them who believed should be saved, refers to two passages in the prophet Isaiah, of which he quotes such parts as were sufficient to prove his point. The first citation agrees with the Hebrew. The Septuagint differs widely. The other citation agrees nearly with the Septuagint; it differs from the Hebrew only in reading with the Septuagint κατασχευθήσεται, shall be ashamed, which is also the reading of the Arabic version. They seem to have read in the original יִכָּשֵׁם (yabish) instead of יָחִישׁ (yachish). (Dr. Randolph on Quotations, p. 36.) The quotation in Rom. x. 13. agrees with the latter clause of Isa. xxviii. 16. with the whole of which also agrees the quotation in 1 Pet. ii. 6.

Behold I lay in Zion for a foundation a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner-stone, a sure foundation: he that believeth shall not make haste. (He confounded, Hp. Loeth.)

96. Lev. xviii. 5.
אשר יקשה אדם האדם והי הכס
Judgments which if a man do, he shall live in them.

97. Deut. xxx. 12-14.
לא נשמע הוא דאמר מי יעלה לנו השמיעה ויקחה לנו וישמענו אהה ונעשנה: ולא-מכבר לים הוא לאמר מי יעברנו לנו אל-עבר הים ויקחה לנו וישמענו אהה ונעשנה: כירקוב אליך הרבר כמר כמר וכלכבר לעשנו:

It is not in heaven, that thou shouldst say, Who shall go up for us to heaven, and bring it unto us, that we may hear it and do it? Neither is it beyond the sea, that thou shouldst say, Who shall go over the sea for us, that we may hear it and do it? But the word is very nigh unto thee, in thy mouth and in thy heart.

98. Isa. lii. 7.

Behold, I lay for the foundation of Zion a stone of inestimable worth—a chosen precious corner-stone for the foundations of it and he who believeth shall not be ashamed.

Lev. xviii. 5.
'Α ποιήσας αυτά άνθρωπος, ζήσεται εν αυτοις.
Which, if a man do, he shall live thereby.

Deut. xxx. 12-14.
Ουκ εν τω ουρανω ηνωσθη, ληγυν, τις αναβηται ημιν εις τον ουρανον, και ληψεται ημιν αυτην; και ακουαντες αυτων ποιησωμεν; Ουδε πέραν της θαλασσης εστι, ληγυν, τις διαπερασει ημιν εις το πέραν της θαλασσης, και λαβη ημιν αυτην, και ακουαντες ημιν ποιησωμεν αυτην, και ποιησωμεν; Εγγυς σου εστι το ρημα φοδρα εν τω στοματι σου, και εν τη καρδια σου, και εν ταις χειρισ σου ποιειν αυτο.

It is not in heaven above, that thou shouldst say, Who will ascend for us into heaven, and bring it to us, that we may hear and do it? Nor is it beyond the sea, that thou shouldst say, Who will cross the sea for us, and bring it to us, and let us hear it, and we will do it? The word is very near thee, in thy mouth and in thy heart and in thy hand.

Isa. lii. 7.
'Ὡς ὥρα ἐπὶ των ὀρειων, ὡς ποδὶς ἐπαγγελιζομένου ἀκούον εἰρήνης, ὡς ἐπαγγελιζόμενος ἀγαθὰ.

Like beauty on the mountains,—like the feet of one proclaiming peace, like one proclaiming glad tidings.

Psal. xix. 4.
Εἰς πᾶσαν τὴν γῆν ἐξήλθεν ὁ φόγγος αὐτῶν, καὶ εἰς τὰ περάτα τῆς οἰκουμένης τὰ ῥήματα αὐτῶν.
To every land their sound is gone forth, and their doctrines to the limits of the world.

Deut. xxiii. 21.
Κῆρυγμα παραχλυσμα αὐτοῦς ἐπ' οὐκ εἶναι, ἐπὶ εἶναι ἀσυνετὸν παροργισμὸν αὐτοῦς.
I will provoke them by what is not a nation. By a foolish nation will I vex them.

Isa. lxi. 1, 2.
Ἐβάρηκα ἐγὼ ἐνδὲν τοῖς ἐμοὶ μη ἀπερωτήσιν, ἐβάρηκα τοῖς ἐμοὶ μη ζητούσιν—Ἐξέπαισα τὰς χεῖρας μου σάν τε ἡμέραν πρὸς λαὸν ἀπειθύνοντα καὶ ἀντιλεγόντα.
I became manifest to them who inquired not for me; I was found by them who sought me not. — I stretched out my hands all the day long to a disobedient and gainsaying people.

1 Kings xix. 14.
Τὰ θυσιαστήρια σου κατέβαλον, καὶ τοὺς προφῆτας σου σπείκτιναν ἐν ῥομφαίᾳ· καὶ ὑπολείπωμαι ἕνα μόνον, ἐγώ, καὶ ζητοῦσι τὴν ψυχὴν μου λαοὶ ἐν αὐτῇ.
They have demolished thy altars, and slain thy prophets with the sword; and I only am left, and they seek my life to take it.

1 Kings xix. 18.
Καὶ ἀκτελέψῃς ἐν Ἰσραὴλ ἑπτὰ χίλια ἄνδρες ἀνδρῶν, πάντα γόνατα δὲ οὐκ ἀνέκλιναν γόνυ τῷ Βααλ.
And thou shalt leave in Israel seven thousand men, even all the knees which have not bowed to Baal.

Isa. xxix. 10. (and see Isa. vi. 9. Ezek. xii. 2.)
Ὅτι πειπνιστὴν ὕμῃς Κύριος πνεύματι κατανύ. ζήσιν, καὶ οὐ καμύσιν τοὺς ὀφθαλμοὺς αὐτῶν.

For the Lord hath drenched you with the spirit of stupefaction, and will close up the eyes of them.

Psal. lxi. 22, 23.
Ἰνδύθηται ἡ τραχιὰ αὐτῶν ἐν πύκτιον αὐτῶν εἰς ἀγῶνι, καὶ εἰς ἀνταπόδοσιν, καὶ εἰς σκανδαλὸν· ὁ σκότης ἔσται αὐτῶν οἱ ὀφθαλμοὶ αὐτῶν τὸν μη βλέπειν, καὶ τὸν αὐτὸν αὐτῶν διὰ παντός συγκαμψόν.

σφογγος, a sound: Which last is doubtless the true reading, as it agrees best with the context, and is supported by the Chaldaee Paraphrase, the Syriac, Arabic, and Vulgate Latin versions, and by Jerome. Symmachus, in his Greek translation, renders the Hebrew by κλος, sound. (Dr. Randolph on the Quotations, p. 37.) Prof. N. M. Berlin, Psalms, ex Recensione Textus Hebraei et Versionum Antiquarum, Latine Versi, p. 31. (Upsaliae, 1805.)

* This quotation agrees in sense both with the Septuagint and the Hebrew, but seems to be taken from a different translation. The words of the original are transposed, and somewhat abridged. (Dr. Randolph.) The MS. 30. of Griesbach's notation (Regius 100.), after ψυχην μου, adds λαβειν αυτην, which agrees with the Septuagint.

* The first part of this quotation agrees with the Hebrew, only altering the person, them for you. The latter part seems to refer to some other Scripture, either Isa. vi. 9. or Ezek. xii. 2., where the same thing is said. (Dr. Randolph on the Quotations, p. 37.)

Rom. x. 5.
'Ο ποιήσας αυτά άνθρωπος ζήσεται εν αυτοις.
The man which doeth those things shall live by them.

Rom. x. 6-8.
Μη ειπης εν τη καρδια σου· τις αναβησειται εις τον ουρανον; (τουτ' εστι Χριστον καταγαγειν) Η τις καταβησεται εις την αυυσσον; (τουτ' εστι Χριστ τον εκ νεκρων αναγαγειν) — Εγγυς σου το ρημα εστιν, εν τω στοματι σου, και εν τη καρδια σου.

Say not in thine heart, Who shall ascend into heaven? (that is, to bring down Christ from above). Or, who shall descend into the deep? (that is, to bring up Christ, again from the dead) The word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth and in thy heart.

Rom. x. 15.
'Ὡς ὥρασι οἱ ποδὶς τῶν ἐπαγγελιζομένων εἰρήνης, τῶν ἐπαγγελιζομένων τὰ ἀγαθὰ.

How beautiful are the feet of them that preach the Gospel of Peace, and bring glad tidings of good things!

Rom. x. 18.
Εἰς πᾶσαν τὴν γῆν ἐξήλθεν ὁ φόγγος αὐτῶν, καὶ εἰς τὰ περάτα τῆς οἰκουμένης τὰ ῥήματα αὐτῶν.
Their sound went into all the earth, and their words unto the ends of the world.

Rom. x. 19.
Εγὼ παραχλυσμα ὑμᾶς ἐπ' οὐκ εἶναι, ἐπὶ εἶναι ἀσυνετὸν παροργισμὸν.
I will provoke you to jealousy by them that are no people, and by a foolish nation will I anger you.

Rom. x. 20, 21.
Ἐβάρηκα τοῖς ἐμοὶ μη ζητούσιν, ἐβάρηκα τοῖς ἐμοὶ μη ἀπερωτήσιν — Ὀλην τὴν ἡμέραν ἐξέπαισα τὰς χεῖρας μου πρὸς λαὸν ἀπειθύνοντα καὶ ἀντιλεγόντα.
I was found of them that sought me not; I was made manifest unto them that asked not after me — All day long I have stretched forth my hands unto a disobedient and gainsaying people.

Rom. xi. 3.
Κυριε, τοὺς προφῆτας σου ἀπέκτειναν, καὶ τὰ θυσιαστήρια σου κατέβαλον· κἀγὼ ὑπολείφωμαι μόνος, καὶ ζητοῦσι τὴν ψυχὴν μου.
Lord, they have killed thy prophets, and digged down thine altars; and I am left alone, and they seek thy life.

Rom. xi. 4.
Κατέλιπον ἑμαυτὸν ἑπτασχιλίους ἀνδρας, οἱτι νεις οὐκ ἐκαμψαν γόνυ τῷ Βααλ.
I have reserved to myself seven thousand men who have not bowed the knee to the image of Baal.

Rom. xi. 8.
Ἐβωον αὐτοῖς ὁ θεος πνευμα κατανύξιν, ὥσῃ λα- μους του μη βλέπειν, και οτι του μη ακουειν.
God hath given them the spirit of slumber, eyes that they should not see, and ears that they should not hear.

Rom. xi. 9, 10.
Ἰνδύθηται ἡ τραχιὰ αὐτῶν εἰς παγίδα, και εἰς ὄφρα, και εἰς σκανδαλόν, και εἰς ἀνταπόδομα αὐτοῖς. Σκοτισθήσονται οἱ ὀφθαλμοὶ αὐτῶν τὸν μη βλέπειν, και τὸν αὐτὸν αὐτῶν διὰ παντός συγκαμψόν.

The apostle here, with some little alteration, accommodates what Moses says in the book of Deuteronomy to his present purpose: Moses there, speaking of the covenant made with the children of Israel, expresses the easiness of that covenant by proverbial phrases taken from the transactions of God with the children of Israel: Who (says he) shall go up for us into Heaven, &c. alluding to the delivery of the law from Heaven—Who shall go over the sea for us, &c. alluding to the passage of the Israelites over the Red Sea: St. Paul makes use of the like phrases, only altering the latter so as to allude to the descent of Christ into the grave: This is a most beautiful allusion; and the latter part, in which the main stress of the argument lies, agrees both with the Septuagint and with the Hebrew, omitting only a word or two. (Dr. Randolph on the Quotations, p. 37.)

* This quotation agrees verbatim with the Septuagint; and it agrees with the Hebrew, excepting that instead of קוץ (קוץ) a line or direction, both the apostle and the Septuagint translators seem to have read קוץ (קוץ).

For since the beginning of the world, men have not heard nor perceived by the ear, neither hath the eye seen, O God, besides thee, what he hath prepared for him that waiteth for him.

able either to make sense of the Hebrew, or to reconcile the old versions, either with the Hebrew or with one another. In the apostle's citation the sense is easy and consistent, and agreeable to the context in the prophet. No sense can be made of the Hebrew, but by a very forced construction. Some critics have imagined that the quotation was taken from some apocryphal book; but it is so near to the Hebrew here, both in sense and words, that we cannot suppose it to be taken from any other passage. Nor in this case would the apostle (it is presumed) have introduced it with—as it is written. It is more reasonable to suppose that the Hebrew text has been corrupted, and that the apostle took his citation from some more correct copy. See Bishop Lowth's Note on Isa. lxi. 4., and Dr. Kennicott's Dissertatio Generalis, § 54. 87. (Dr. Randolph on the Quotations, p. 39.)

Ἄδᾶμ is added after φρονήσεις in the Codex Alexandrinus. This quotation agrees both with the Septuagint and with the Hebrew; except that it substitutes σοφῶν, of the wise, for ἀνθρώπων, of men, which however does not alter the sense. (Dr. Randolph.) Several MSS. of the Pauline Epistles, besides the Vulgate and Coptic versions, have ἀνθρώπων.

• This does not appear to be any citation at all, though it agrees nearly both with the Septuagint and Hebrew of Deut. xxxii. 17. (Ibid.)

• This is not quoted from the Septuagint, but agrees in substance with the Hebrew; excepting that it substitutes the first person for the third, and adds λίγην Κύριος—saith the Lord. The version of Aquila agrees exactly with this quotation as far as τούτω. See Montfaucou's edition of Origen's Hexapla, in loc.

• This is taken from the Septuagint, which translates the Hebrew literally; but the apostle, by way of explanation, adds πρῶτος—first, and Ἀδάμ—Adam. (Scott.)

• Dr. Randolph is of opinion that the apostle either had a different reading of this passage of Hosea, or that he understood the words in a different sense from that expressed in the Hebrew Lexicons. But Bishop Horsley has shown that St. Paul only cited the prophet indirectly. (Translation of Hosea, Notes, pp. 163—167.)

- Isa. lii. 11, 12. Ἀποστήτε, ἀποστήτε, ἐξέλθετε ἐκ ἐκείνου, καὶ ἁπαλίσθητε ἀπὸ τῶν ἀκαθάρτων, ἐξέλθετε ἐκ ἐκείνου καὶ οὐκ ἁπαλίσθητε ἀπὸ τῶν ἀκαθάρτων.—καὶ ὁ ἐκλεκτὸς Ἰσραὴλ ὁ θεὸς ἰσχυρῶς ἐλθὲν.
- Deut. xix. 15. Ἐπὶ στόματος δύο μαρτύρων, καὶ ἐπὶ στόματος τριῶν μαρτύρων, στήσεται πᾶν ῥήμα.
- Gen. xii. 3. (and see Gen. xviii. 18.) Καὶ εὐαγγελισθήσονται ἐν σοὶ πᾶσαι αἱ φυλαὶ τῆς γῆς.
- Deut. xxvii. 27. (26. of English version.) Ἐπικατάρατος πᾶς ἀνθρώπος, ὃς οὐκ ἐμμένει ἐν πᾶσι τοῖς λόγοις τοῦ νόμου τούτου, ποιῆσαι αὐτοῦ.
- Deut. xxi. 23. Κεκταρῆμένος ὑπὸ θεοῦ πᾶς κριμαμένος ἐπὶ ξύλου.
- Isa. liv. 1. Ευφρανέητε στείρα ἢ οὐ τίκτους· ῥῆξον καὶ βοήσον ἢ οὐκ ὀδυνώσῃ· ὅτι πολλὰ τὰ τέκνα τῆς ἐρήμου πολλὸν ἢ τῆς ἐχούσης τὸν ἄνδρα.
- Gen. xxi. 10. Ἐξώλε τὴν παιδίσκην ταυτήν καὶ τὸν υἱὸν αὐτῆς· οὐ γὰρ μετὰ κληρονομίης ἐδύος τῆς παιδίσκης ταυτῆς μετὰ τοῦ υἱοῦ μου Ἰσαὰκ.
- Gen. xxi. 10. Send away this girl and her son, for the son of this girl shall not inherit (or, be the heir) with my son Isaac.
- Psal. lxxviii. 18. Ἀναβὰς εἰς ὕψος, ἡγαλλωπίστεως αἰχμαλωστῶν· ἔλαβες δῶματα ἐν ἀνθρώποις.
- Gal. iii. 10. Ἐκώλε τὴν παιδίσκην, καὶ τὸν υἱὸν αὐτῆς· οὐ γὰρ μετὰ κληρονομίης ἐδύος τῆς παιδίσκης μετὰ τοῦ υἱοῦ τῆς εὐλευδῆρας.
- Gal. iii. 10. Cast out the bondwoman and her son: for the son of the bondwoman shall not be heir with the son of the free woman.
- Eph. iv. 8. Ἀναβὰς εἰς ὕψος, ἡγαλλωπίστεως αἰχμαλωστῶν, καὶ ἔδωκε δῶματα τοῖς ἀνθρώποις.
- Eph. iv. 8. When he ascended up on high, he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men.

³ We cannot say, certainly, whence this quotation is taken; we have the substance of it in several parts of Scripture, where God promises to be a father to Israel, and calls Israel his son. Dr. Randolph thinks that it is most probably a reference to 2 Sam. vii. 14. where the very words are spoken of Solomon—I will be his father, and he shall be my son; and this promise to David is introduced v. 8. Thus saith the Lord of Hosts (in the Septuagint, Κύριος παντοκράτωρ, the Lord Almighty). The apostle applies this to Christians in general. (Dr. Randolph on the Quotations, p. 41.) But Mr. Scott is of opinion, that the apostle seems rather to apply to Paul.

the general declarations made by Jehovah concerning Israel. (Exod. iv. 22, 23. Jer. xxxi. 1. 9. and Hosea i. 9, 10.) See Christian Observer, vol. x. p. 235.

⁷ This agrees with the Septuagint, except that the pronouns ταυτῶν καὶ ταυτῆς (this) are omitted in the quotation; and that τῆς εὐλευδῆρας (of the free woman) is substituted for μου ἱσραὴλ (my son Isaac). In both these respects the quotation varies from the Hebrew; though the sense is in no respect affected or altered by it. These alterations or accommodations were necessary to the apostle's argument. (Randolph, Scott.)

■ This quotation is taken from the Septuagint, which agrees exactly with the Hebrew, only for תְּחַלְּלֶנּוּ (thou shalt change), is put ἐκδοθήσῃ (thou shalt be sold up). Some manuscripts of this epistle have ἀλλὰ αἰτίαι (thou shalt change), which is also the reading of the Vulgate version. Dr. Randolph, therefore, thinks it probable, that the original reading, both in the psalm and this epistle was ἐκδοθήσῃ. Hence so in the Alexandrine edition of the Septuagint, and in the clause immediately following, all copies read ἀλλὰ αἰτίαι.

² For ἐπιμαρτυρία, some MSS. and the quotations of this verse by Chrysostom, Theodoret, Photius, and Theophylact, read ἐπιμαρτυρία with the Septuagint.

³ For ἐπιμαρτυρία, eighteen MSS., four of which are of the greatest antiquity, seven editions, both the Syriac versions, and also the Arabic, Coptic, and Armenian versions, besides two MSS. of the Old Italic (Latin) version, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Iohannes Damascenus, and Augustine, all read ἐπιμαρτυρία, which agrees with the Septuagint, and is received by Griesbach into the Greek text of the New Testament, as the genuine reading.

⁴ The words between brackets are omitted in some MSS.

⁵ This long quotation is in general made from the Septuagint, though with several verbal differences, which will be easily observed on collation, but which do not affect the meaning, though they seem to imply that the apostle did not confine himself to the Septuagint. It is, however, manifest that he had that translation in his thoughts, because he exactly quotes it, where it differs most materially from the Hebrew. The Septuagint is, almost throughout this passage, a close version of the Hebrew; but, instead of the clause, which in our authorized English translation is rendered—although I was a husband to them, the Septuagint reads, καὶ ἐγὼ ἐκέντησα αὐτοὺς, therefore I took no care of them; which lection is followed by the apostle. Whether the Hebrew was then read differently, as Dr. Randolph and other learned men suppose, or whether the apostle did not think the difference so material as to interrupt his argument on account of it, others must determine. Another variation is, that the Hebrew has the preterite in one place, where the Septuagint has the future, ἰδούσιν δυνάμεις, I will put, &c. But the Hebrew should doubtless be read with what the grammarians term the conversive vau, and be understood in a future sense, as the context requires (which both before and after speaks of a new and future covenant); as it is also rendered in all the ancient versions, and in the Chaldee paraphrase; and as twenty of the Hebrew manuscripts collated by Dr. Kennicott read it. See his Dissertation Generalis, § 66. (Dr. Randolph, Scott.)

⁷ This quotation is taken from the Septuagint with a little variation; but although the general meaning is the same, they are widely different in verbal expression in the Hebrew. David's words are, אֲנִי כָרַתִּי לַיהוָה אֶנְיָמִין carita li, which we translate, my ears hast thou opened; but they might be more properly rendered, my ears hast thou bored; that is, Thou hast made Me thy servant for ever, to dwell in thine own house: for the allusion is evidently to the custom mentioned Exod. xii. 2, &c. "If thou buy a Hebrew servant, six years he shall serve, and in the seventh he shall go out free: but if the seventh shall positively say, I love my master, &c. I will not go out free, then his master shall bring him to the door-post, and shall bore his ear through with an awl, and he shall serve him for ever." But how is it possible that the Septuagint and the apostle should take a meaning so totally different from the sense of the Hebrew? Dr. Kennicott has a very ingenious conjecture here: he supposes that the Septuagint and apostle express the meaning of the words as they stood in the copy from which the Greek translation was made; and that the present Hebrew text

Burnt-offering and sin-offering hast thou not required. Then said I, Lo, I come; in the volume of the book it is written of me: I delight to do thy will, O my God, yea thy law is within my heart.

his bed. In the other reading the sense is plain: Jacob worshipped God, and, being old and feeble, supported himself by leaning on the top of his staff. (Dr. Randolph on the Quotations, p. 45.)

• The apostle seems purposely to have varied from the Septuagint. In order to render the quotation more emphatic and suited to his purpose. The Septuagint well translates the Hebrew, omitting the words rendered in our version, It is a little while. (Scott.)

• This is not properly a citation, but only an allusion to an expression in Hos. xiv. 3. The phrase καρπὸν χιλιῶν, fruit of the lips, is taken from the Septuagint. In the Hebrew, it is פְּרִים שִׁפְתֵינוּ, which our English translation and the Vulgate version render the calves of our lips. This expression may refer primarily to the sacrifices, heifers, calves, &c. which the Israelites had vowed to Jehovah; so that the calves of their lips were the sacrifices which they had promised. From the apostle and Septuagint rendering this word fruit (in which they are followed by the Syriac and Arabic versions) it is evident that their copies read פָּרִי (pari) the β being omitted; and thus the word would be literally fruit, and not calves. This reading, however, is not found in any of the MSS. hitherto collated.

• This, Dr. Randolph has observed, is a difficult passage. The apostle is generally thought to refer to Gen. vi. 3. 5., where we have the like in sense; but, in expression, the apostle differs widely both from the Hebrew and the Septuagint. Dr. Randolph and Mr. Scott, after some expositors, think it a general reference to the doctrine of Scripture, and not a direct quotation; as much as to say, it is the constant doctrine of Scripture, that the spirit which dwelleth in us lusteth to envy, and is prone to all evil. It ought however to be observed, that many eminent critics, as Whitby, Griesbach, MacKnight, &c., divide this verse into two members, which they read and point, interrogatively, thus, Do ye think that the Scripture speaketh in vain? Doth the spirit, which dwelleth in us, lust unto envy? Which mode of pointing removes the difficulty at once.

• Several manuscripts, editions, and the Armenian and Slavonic versions, read Κυρίως, with the Septuagint.

• This is taken from the Septuagint, only putting Ὁ Θεός instead of Κυρίως. They differ from the Hebrew, with which the Vulgate agrees—illud is corrupted in the word אֶזְנַיִם aznayim, ears, which has been written through carelessness for אֶזְנֵי az zeh, then, a boot. The first syllable אֶז az then, is the same in both; and the latter זֵי zeh, which, joined to אֶז az, makes אֶזְנַיִם aznayim, might have been easily mistaken for אֶזְנֵי az zeh, being very like גִּמְלֵי gimel; יֹד like יֹד tau; and ה he like final מ mem; especially if the line on which the letters were written in the MS. happened to be blacker than ordinary (which has often been a cause of mistake) it might have been easily taken for the under stroke of the mem, and thus give rise to a corrupt reading: add to this the root כָּרַע carah signifies as well to prepare, as to open, bore, &c. On this supposition the ancient copy translated by the Septuagint, and followed by the apostle, must have read the text thus, אֶזְנֵי נֹהָרָה לִי az zeh carita li; σῶμα so καταρτισαί μοι, then a body thou hast prepared me: thus the Hebrew text, the Version of the Septuagint, and the apostle, will agree in what is known to be an indisputable fact in Christianity; namely, that Christ was incarnated for the sin of the world. The Æthiopic has nearly the same reading: the Arabic has both, A body hast thou prepared for me, and mine ears hast thou opened. But the Syriac, the Chaldee, and the Vulgate, agree with the present Hebrew text; and none of the MSS. collated by Kennicott and De Rossi have any various reading on the disputed words. (Dr. A. Clarke's Commentary on the New Testament, note on Heb. x. 5.)

• This quotation is nearly from the Septuagint, with which the version of Aquila agrees: and as both the apostle's citation and that version differ considerably from the Hebrew, some corruption of the text may be suspected. The general meaning, however, is the same.

• This quotation is taken from the Septuagint version of Gen. xlvii. 31., omitting only the word Israel. The variation from the Hebrew is merely in the vowel points: הִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה a bed, the Septuagint read הִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה a staff. And that this is the true reading seems probable, because it does not appear that Jacob was then confined to his bed, and because it is not easy to understand what can be meant by worshipping or bowing himself on the head of Heb. x. 30.

Κύριος κοινῇ τὸν λαόν αὐτόν.
The Lord shall judge his people.

Heb. x. 37, 33. (and see Rom. i. 17. Gal. iii. 11.)

Ὁ ἐρχόμενος ἔξει, καὶ οὐ χρονίσῃ· ὁ δὲ δίκαιος ἐκ πιστεως ζήσεται· καὶ ἐὰν ὑποστείλῃται, οὐκ ἐνδοκαίῃ ἡ ψυχὴ μου ἐν αὐτῷ.

For yet a little while, and he shall come, will come, and will not tarry. Now the just shall live by faith: but if any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him.

Heb. xi. 21.

Καὶ προσκυνήσιν ἐπὶ τὸ ἀκρὸν τῆς ἑδῶδος αὐτοῦ
And worshipped, leaning upon the top of his staff.

Heb. xii. 5.

Υἱέ μου, μὴ ὀλιγοῦραι παιδείας Κυρίου, μὴδὲ ἐκλυνῶ ὑπ' αὐτοῦ ἐλιγχομένος.

My son, despise not the chastening of the Lord, nor faint when thou art rebuked of him.

Heb. xiii. 5.

Οὐ μὴ σὲ ἀφήσω, οὐδ' οὐ μὴ σὲ ἐγκαταλίπω.
I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee

Heb. xiii. 6.

Κύριος ἐμοὶ βοηθός, καὶ οὐ φοβήσασμαι τί ποιήσῃ μοι ἐνδύμπος.

The Lord is my helper, and I will not fear what man can do unto me.

Heb. xii. 26.

Ἐτι ἅπασι ἰσχυροῖσι τὸν οὐρανόν, καὶ τὴν γῆν, ἀλλὰ καὶ τὸν οὐρανόν.
Yet once more I shake, not the earth only, but also heaven.

Heb. xiii. 15.

Δι' αὐτοῦ οὐν ἀναφέρομεν θύσαντες θυσίαν δια παντός τῷ Θεῷ, τεύτιστα, καρπὸν χιλιῶν ὁμολογούντων τῷ ὀνόματι αὐτοῦ.

By him, therefore, let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually, that is, the fruit of our lips, confessing (marginal rendering) to his name.

James iv. 5.

Πρὸς ὅθον ἐπιποθεῖ τὸ πνεῦμα ὃ καυχῆσθιν ἐν ἡμῖν.
The spirit, that dwelleth in us, lusteth to envy

James iv. 6.

Ὁ Θεός ὑπερηφάνους ἀντιτάσσεται, ταπεινοὺς δὲ δίδωσι χάριν.

Surely he scorneth the scorners, but giveth grace unto the lowly. The Lord resisteth the proud, but he giveth grace unto the humble. God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace unto the humble.

72. Lev. xi. 44. והייתם קדשים כי קדוש אני
Ye shall be holy, for I am holy. 1 Pet. i. 16. 'Αγιοι γίνεσθε, ὅτι ἁγίος ἔστιν ὁ Θεός.

73. Isa. xl. 6-8. כל־הבשר חציר נלחפסו כגֵּז חֲדָשׁ: וְהָיָה צִיר בְּלִצִּיץ.....וְרֹבֵר אֱלֹהֵינוּ יָקוֹם לְקוֹם: All flesh is grass, and all the goodness thereof is as the flower of the field. The grass withereth, the flower fadeth: But the word of our God shall stand fast for ever. 1 Pet. i. 24, 25. Διότι πᾶσα σὰρξ ὡς χόρτος, καὶ ὡς ἡ ἀνθή τοῦ πεδίου, ὡς ἡ χόρτος ἐξηραίνεται, ὡς ἡ ἀνθή ἐξηραίνεται: τὸ δὲ ῥῆμα τοῦ Κυρίου μένει εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα.

74. Isa. xxviii. 16. הֲנִי יֹסֵד בְּצִיּוֹן אֶבֶן חָכָם מִסֵּד הַמָּאֲמֵן לֹא יִיחָשׁ: Behold I lay in Zion for a foundation, a stone, tried stone, a precious corner-stone, a sure foundation; he that believeth shall not make haste. 1 Pet. ii. 6. (and see Rom. ix. 33.) Ἰδοὺ, τίθημι ἐν Σιών λίθον ἀκρογωνιαίον, ἐλεκτὸν, ἐντιμὸν καὶ ἐπιστεύαντες ἐπ' αὐτὸν οὐ μὴ κατασχηθῇ.

75. Exod. xix. 6. ואֶתְּם חֵירוֹנִי מַלְכֶת כְּהֹנִים וְגוֹי קָדֹשׁ: Ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests and a holy nation. 1 Pet. ii. 9. 'Ἐμεῖς δὲ... βασιλείον ἱερατεύμα, ἕντες ἅγιοι.

76. Isa. lii. 9. לֹא־חָסַם עִשֵׂה וְלֹא מִרְמָה בְּמִוִּי: Because he had done no violence, neither was any deceit in his mouth. 1 Pet. ii. 22. 'Ὁς ἄμκαρτιαν οὐκ ἐποίησεν, οὐδὲ εὐρέθη δόλος ἐν τῷ στόματι αὐτοῦ.

77. Isa. liii. 5. וּבְחֻבְרָתוֹ נִרְפְּאוּ: With his stripes we are healed. 1 Pet. ii. 24. Οὗ τῶ μωλωπι αὐτοῦ ἰσθῆναι.

78. Psal. xxxiv. 13-17. (12-16 of English version.) מִרְהָאִישׁ הַחֲפֵץ חַיִּים אֲכַב יָמִים לִרְאוֹת טוֹב: נָצַר לְשׁוֹנָךְ מִרַע וּמִפִּתְיוֹן מִכֵּר מִרְמָה: טוֹר מִרַע וְעֵשֶׂה טוֹב כִּקֵּשׁ שְׁלוֹם וּרְדִמָּה: עֵינֵי יְהוָה אֶל־צְרוּקִים וְאוֹנִי אֶל־שְׁתוּעָתָם: פִּנִּי יְהוָה בְּעֵשֶׂי רַע: What man desireth life, and loveth many days, that he may see good? Keep thy tongue from evil, and thy lips from speaking guile. Depart from evil and do good; seek peace and pursue it. The eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous, and his ears are open unto their cry. The face of the Lord is against them that do evil. 1 Pet. iii. 10-12. 'Ὁ γὰρ θεὸς ζῶν ἀγαπᾷ, καὶ ὁρᾷ ἡμέρας ἀγαθὰς, παύσατω τὴν γλῶσσαν αὐτοῦ ἀπὸ κακοῦ, καὶ χεὶλ αὐτοῦ τοῦ μὴ λαλῆσαι δόλον ἐκκλινετω ἀπὸ κακοῦ, καὶ ποιήστω ἀγαθόν, ζητήστω εἰρήνην, καὶ διώξωται αὐτήν. 'Ὅτι οἱ ὀφθαλμοὶ τοῦ Κυρίου ἐπὶ δικαίους, καὶ αὐτὰ αὐτοῖς ἐκίσει, καὶ τὰ ὦτα αὐτῶν πρὸς φωνὴν δεήσαντων αὐτῶν ἀκούσει.

79. Isa. viii. 12, 13. וְאַתָּה מִרְאָה לֹא־תִירָאוּ וְלֹא תַעֲרִיצוּ: אֶת־יְהוָה צְבָאוֹת אֱלֹהֵינוּ: Neither fear ye their fear; nor be afraid. Sanctify the Lord of Hosts himself. 1 Pet. iii. 14, 15. Τὸν θεὸν φοβούμενοι μὴ φοβηθῆτε, μηδὲ ταραχθῆτε. Κυρίου δὲ τοῦ Θεοῦ ἡγιασάσθε.

80. Prov. x. 12. וְעַל כָּל־מַעֲשִׂים חַסְדָּה: Love covereth all sins. 1 Pet. iv. 8. 'Ὅτι ἡ ἀγάπη καλύπτει πλῆθος ἁμαρτιῶν.

81. Psal. ii. 9. חֲרַעַם בִּשְׁבֹט כְּרֹזֶל יוֹצֵר חַמְסָם: Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron; thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel. Rev. ii. 27. Καὶ ποιμανεῖ αὐτοὺς ἐν ῥάβδῳ σιδήρεᾳ ὡς τὰ σκεῖνα τὰ κεραμικὰ συντρίβονται.

illuores, he will scorn the scorners. The Arabic version agrees with the Septuagint—resistet superbis, he will resist the proud. The Syriac version renders it destruet irrisores, he will destroy the scorners; and the Chaldee paraphrase—illuores propellet, he will drive away the scorners. It is not easy to account for this difference; nor is it worth while to attempt it: the sense is much the same, as the proud and the scorners are equivalent expressions in Scripture language. (Dr. Randolph, p. 46.) Several MSS., three of which are of the greatest antiquity, read εἰσισθε, with the Septuagint; which reading, though inferior to that in the received text, Griesbach considers as not to be disregarded. Both this quotation and the Septuagint gives the meaning of the Hebrew; but the word αὐτων (their), which is used by St. Peter, seems to give the sense better than the singular αὐτοῦ (his) of the Septuagint. The original Hebrew (which is יהוה אלהינו Sabaoth, Lord of Hosts) will admit of either. (Scott.) This is a translation from the Hebrew, and widely different from the Septuagint; only for all sins, the apostle has the multitude of sins. The Septuagint, Syriac, and Arabic versions differ strangely from each other. (Dr. Randolph, Scott.) This is nearly a quotation of the Septuagint (which exactly translates the Hebrew), the person only being altered from the second to the third (Dr. Randolph, Scott.)

§ 2. CLASSIFICATION OF THE QUOTATIONS FROM THE HEBREW SCRIPTURES IN THE NEW TESTAMENT.

THE Quotations from the Hebrew Scriptures in the New Testament may be arranged under the nine following classes: viz. I. Quotations exactly agreeing with the Hebrew;—II. Those which agree nearly with the Hebrew;—III. Quotations, agreeing with the Hebrew in sense, but not in words;—IV. Such as give the general sense;—V. Quotations, which are taken from several passages of Scripture;—VI. Quotations differing from the Hebrew, but agreeing with the Septuagint;—VII. Quotations in which there is reason to suspect a different reading in the Hebrew, or that the apostles understood the words in a sense different from that expressed in our Lexicons;—VIII. Passages, in which the Hebrew seems to be corrupted;—and, IX. Passages which are not properly citations, but mere references or allusions.

I. Quotations exactly agreeing with the Hebrew.

V. Quotations that are taken from several Passages of Scripture.

Sometimes there is such a change made in the quotation, that it is not easy to ascertain from what particular passage of the Old Testament it is taken. The instances of this description, however, in which the citation is made from several passages of Scripture, are very few. Dr. Randolph has mentioned only three, to which we have added two others.

§ 3. CLASSIFICATION OF THE QUOTATIONS FROM THE SEPTUAGINT VERSION IN THE NEW TESTAMENT.

ALTHOUGH the sacred authors of the New Testament have in many instances quoted from the Hebrew Scriptures, as the preceding tables have shown; yet it is equally certain that they have very frequently made their citations from the Greek version usually denominated the Septuagint, even where this translation from the Hebrew is inaccurate, but where the errors are of such a nature as not to weaken the proofs for which they were alleged. In fact, as the apostles wrote for the use of communities who were ignorant of Hebrew, it was necessary that they should refer to the Greek version, which was generally known and read. Had they given a new and more accurate translation according to the Hebrew, citing as they often did from memory, the reader would not have known what passage they intended to quote and if, on the other hand, while they retained the words of the Septuagint, they had taken notice of each inaccuracy, they would have diverted the reader's attention from the main object to the consideration of trifles. It must, however, be remarked, that the writers of the New Testament appear to have been so careful to give the true sense of the Old Testament, that they forsook the Septuagint version, whenever it did not give that sense, so far as they had occasion to cite it, and these citations often correspond with the present Hebrew text. The quotations from the Septuagint in the New Testament may be classed under the five following heads:—I. Such as agree verbatim with the Septuagint, or only change the person, number, &c.;—II. Quotations taken from the Septuagint, but with some variation;—III. Quotations agreeing with the Septuagint in sense, but not in words;—IV. Quotations differing from the Septuagint, but agreeing exactly, or nearly, with the Hebrew;—and, V. Quotations which differ both from the Septuagint and from the Hebrew, and are probably taken from some other translation or paraphrase.

I. Quotations agreeing verbatim with the Septuagint, or only changing the Person, Number,

II. Quotations taken from the Septuagint, but with some Variation.

These variations, however, are immaterial, consisting occasionally,—1. Of additions of words, to render the sense more explicit to the Gentiles;—2. Of omissions of words, where the insertion of them was not necessary to prove the point for which they were added;—3. Of synonymous changes, substituting other words of the same import for the exact words of the Septuagint,—which might easily be done, citing, as the apostles sometimes did, from memory;—4. Of transpositions of words;—5. Of changes of proper names into appellatives;—and, 6. Of occasional alterations in the divisions of sentences. But in all these sentences the sense is invariably given.

IV. Quotations differing from the Septuagint, but agreeing exactly, or nearly, with the Hebrew.

There are several instances of an evidently intentional renunciation of the Septuagint version, in order to adhere to the Hebrew original: these instances occur when the Septuagint so materially differs from the Hebrew, as to render the passage unsuitable to the purpose for which the sacred writer produced the quotation, or where it is palpably erroneous. The number of these departures from the Septuagint is eleven; viz.

§ 4. CONSIDERATIONS ON THE PROBABLE CAUSES OF THE SEEMING DISCREPANCIES IN THE QUOTATIONS FROM THE OLD TESTAMENT IN THE NEW.

On a comparison of the quotations from the Old Testament in the New, it is obvious that in the Epistles, which were addressed generally to churches consisting of converted Hellenists (that is, Greek Jews), or Gentiles, or of both, the quotations are uniformly made from the Septuagint version, or with express reference to it, except where some important reason induced the sacred writer to deviate from it; for the Septuagint was the only version generally known in those churches, whose members were mostly strangers to the Hebrew. There are, however, some apparent contradictions in the quotations from the Old Testament in the New, the reconciliation of which has much engaged the attention of learned men, who have assigned various causes to account for, or explain, such discrepancies. These it may be useful briefly to consider, before we discuss the mode in which the sacred writers of the New Testament apply their quotations from the Old Testament. The causes of the differences in these quotations may be reduced to three, viz. 1. Sophistications or corruptions of the Hebrew text;—2. Various Readings, or differences in copies;—3. Our ignorance of the correct meaning of particular texts;—and, 4. The different designs with which they were quoted.

1. The instances of probable SOPHISTICATION, or CORRUPTION of the Hebrew text, are comparatively few, and are only six in number, as we have already seen: the comparison of manuscripts and versions alone can enable the critic to determine the true reading.

2. VARIOUS READINGS in the manuscript copies of the Greek Bible, used by the sacred writers of the New Testament, and also various readings in different manuscripts of the New Testament (some of which have been specified in the notes in the preceding pages of this section), are another cause of the apparent contradictions in the quotations made in it from the Old Testament. Professor Michaelis likewise thinks it possible that, in those cases where the quotations are materially different, another translation might have been added in the Septuagint as a marginal note, in the same manner as we find in the Hexapla of Origen, under the name of αλλος. The Proverbs of Solomon, he observes, present instances where the same Hebrew words are twice translated; which can be explained on no other supposition, than that one of them was originally a marginal note, which has insensibly crept into the text itself.¹

3. Another cause of the apparent discrepancy occurring in the quotations from the Old Testament in the New may arise from our IGNORANCE OF PARTICULAR HEBREW TEXTS or words: a few such instances have already been noticed.² But this is only a temporary cause—the researches of commentators and critics (which the preceding tables have tended to confirm) have shown that the writers of the New Testament express the true sense, though not the sense generally attributed to the Hebrew; and in proportion as such researches are more diligently prosecuted, and our knowledge of the original languages of the Scriptures is increased, these difficulties will gradually and certainly diminish.

4. It is further to be observed that the very same quotations are often contradicted by some of the evangelists, and as often enlarged by others. This difference in quoting may be accounted for by the different occasions on which they are introduced, and the DIFFERENT DESIGNS which they were intended to serve. Thus Luke, who wrote his Gospel for the instruction of Gentile converts, quotes (iii. 4—6.) not less than three verses from the prophet Isaiah; while Matthew (iii. 3.) and Mark (i. 3.) quote only the first of them. But it was necessary to Luke's purpose that he should proceed so far, in order to assure the Gentiles, that they were destined to be partakers of the privileges of the Gospel, and to see the salvation of God. On the other hand, Matthew (xiii. 14, 15.) and Paul (Acts xxviii. 26, 27.), when reproving the Jews for their incredulity, which Isaiah had long before predicted, introduced the prophecy at full length, whereas Mark (iv. 11, 12.) and Luke (viii. 10.) only refer to it briefly. Mark, whose Gospel was written for a mixed society of Jewish and Gentile converts, has many peculiarities belonging to him, which are not specified by the other evangelists. Of these peculiarities, we have an instance in his manner of citing the passage of Isaiah just noticed. The verse in his Gospel runs thus:—

Τοις ἔξω ἐν παραβολαῖς τα πάντα γινεται· ἵνα βλέποντες βλέπωσι, καὶ οὐκ ἴδωσι, καὶ ἀκούοντες ἀκούωσι, καὶ μὴ συνιῶσι, μηποτε ἐπιστρέψωσι, καὶ ἀφ᾽ οὗτοι τα ἁμαρτήματα. Unto them that are without all these things are done in parables: That seeing, they may see and not perceive; and hearing, they may hear and not understand; lest at any time they should be converted, and their sins should be forgiven them.

In order to engage the Jews the more effectually to adopt and obey his Gospel, Mark has not only inserted in it more Hebrew or rather Syro-Chaldaic phrases than all the other evangelists together; but in the verse here given, he has forsaken both the Hebrew and Greek of Isa. vi. 11. (in our translation truly rendered and I will heal them),³ and has quoted the Chaldee Paraphrase, which he translated for himself, καὶ ἀφ᾽ οὗτοι τα ἁμαρτήματα, and their sins should be forgiven them; and which thus probably became more intelligible to the Gentiles also. Now these particular variations are so far from being disparagements to the Gospels, that they are in reality the excellencies and ornaments of them. They are such variations only, as these different converts, of different conceptions, required to have made, for their obtaining a true and right knowledge of the Old Testament prophecies.⁴ A similar mode of citation is pursued by the illustrious apostle Paul, who does not mention or allege the law and the prophets in one and the same manner to Jews and Gentiles. Thus, to Felix the Roman governor, he says of himself (Acts xxiv. 14.), Believing all things which are written in the law and the prophets. But to king Agrippa (xxvi. 22.), Saying none other things than those which the prophets and Moses did say should come. And thus he distinguishes in his Epistles. In that to the Hebrews are many passages from the Old Testament, but not a single instance in which it is quoted as written. But in his other Epistles he rarely uses any other form than, It is written, or The Scripture saith. Thus he cites it to the Romans; the chief variations from which mode to that of He saith are in the three chapters, ix. x. xi. which principally relate to the Jews; and even there he seldom fails to name the prophet whose words are adduced. To the Galatians, and in both Epistles to the Corinthians, with one or two exceptions, he urges the words of the Old Testament as written. To the Philippians, Colossians, and Thessalonians, if we mistake not, he makes no direct quotation from it. In the Epistle to the Ephesians he refers to it twice, and there indeed in both places under the form of He saith. But he himself had spent above two years in teaching them with the utmost diligence and attention (Acts xix. 8, 10.), and wrote his Epistle to them some years after; when he might have full assurance that he spoke to those who knew the law. A passage in this epistle, compared with a similar one in that to the Colossians, seems to prove that he made a difference between them, and judged the Ephesians to be better versed in the sacred books. To these he proposes the precept of obedience to parents with a view to the Mosaic promise (Eph. vi. 1—3.): Children, obey your parents in the Lord; for this is right. Honour thy father and mother; which is the first commandment with promise. But he omits this reference to the words of the Decalogue, in giving the same precept to the Colossians; with whose proficiency in the Scriptures he was less acquainted, as having never been among them. He says only (Col. iii. 20.), Children, obey your parents in all things; for this is well pleasing unto the Lord.

Thus we see that Saint Paul has one mode of citing the Old Testament to the Hebrews, and another to the churches of which the Gentiles were members; that in the former case he agrees with Matthew, in the latter with Mark and Luke. And in this respect there is so much uniformity in the apostle and two evangelists, that we may justly conclude it was not accidental, but designed by him and them, for the same purpose of suiting their style to the small measure of scriptural knowledge which they might well suppose many of their readers to possess. By which means the unlearned or newly-converted Gentiles were instructed, that what was offered to them as the word of God which came in old time, was to be found in the books of Scripture; and, if Judaizers crept in and perplexed them with doctrines of an oral or traditional law, they were furnished with this reply to such teachers:—"When the apostles and evangelists, who have been our more immediate guides, propose to us any part of the Mosaic economy, they allege only what is written, and what they carefully inform us to be so."⁵

We have dwelt the longer on this subject, not only on account of its importance in illustrating the external form of the quotations of the Old Testament by the evangelists and apostles, but also because it furnishes us with an additional instance of those simple notes of authenticity with which the New Testament abounds, and which the genius of forgery could never have devised.

Upon the whole, then, as it respects the external form of quotations from the Old Testament, it may be observed that the writers of the New Testament did not make it a constant rule to cite from the Greek version, because there are many places in which their quotations differ from that version, and agree with the Hebrew.⁷ And as their quotations now correspond with the Hebrew, very frequently in express words,⁸ and generally in the sense,⁹ so it is highly probable that they uniformly agreed at first, and that, where the Hebrew was properly expressed in the Greek version, they used the words of that version. But where it materially varied from the meaning of the Hebrew Scriptures, they either gave the sense of the passage cited in their own words, or took as much of the Septuagint as suited their purpose, introducing the requisite alterations. Hence several passages are neither direct quotations from the Hebrew text, nor quotations from the Septuagint;¹⁰ and some, as we have already seen, agree with the latter even where it varies from the former, but only where the deviation does not so affect the meaning of the passage as to interfere with the pertinency of the quotation for the purpose intended. "All this accords to what ordinary writers, in similar circumstances, would have done, and, in

SECTION II.

ON THE INTERNAL FORM OF QUOTATIONS, OR THE MODE IN WHICH CITATIONS FROM THE OLD TESTAMENT ARE APPLIED IN THE NEW.

General observations on the rabbinical and other modes of quoting the Old Testament—Classification of the quotations in the New Testament:—I. Quotations from the Old Testament in the New, in which the predictions are literally accomplished;—II. Quotations in which that is said to have been done, of which the Scriptures have not spoken in a literal but in a spiritual sense;—III. Quotations made by the sacred writers in the way of illustration;—IV. Quotations and other passages from the Old Testament which are alluded to in the New.

In considering the passages of the Old Testament, which have been introduced by the apostles and evangelists into the writings of the New, "there is often a difficulty with respect to the application of such quotations; when they are applied to a purpose to which they seem to have no relation, according to their original design. This difficulty arises from the writers of the New Testament making quotations from the Old with very different views; and it can be removed only by attending to their real view in a particular quotation." An accurate distinction, therefore, must be made between such quotations as, being merely borrowed, are used as the words of the writer himself, and such as are quoted in proof of a doctrine, or the completion of a prophecy.

Michaelis² has remarked, that whenever a book is the subject of our daily reading, it is natural that its phrases should occur to us in writing—sometimes with a perfect recollection of the places whence they are taken, and at other times when the places themselves have totally escaped our memory. Thus, the lawyer quotes the maxims of the law; the scholar, his favourite classics; and the divine, the precepts of the Gospel. It is no wonder, therefore, if the same has happened to the writers of the New Testament; who being daily occupied in the study of the Old Testament, unavoidably adopted its modes of expression, and especially of the Greek Septuagint, which they have borrowed, and applied to their own use in various ways and for various purposes.

The quotations from the Old Testament in the New are generally introduced by certain formulæ, such as, That it might be fulfilled—as it is written—Isaiah prophesied, &c.; and various rules have been framed in order to account for their application. It has been observed by the same great philologist, that the writers of the New Testament quote in general like the Rabbins, without mentioning the place whence the quotation is taken; as they presuppose the reader to be so well acquainted with the Old Testament, as to be able to find it without particular direction. The Rabbins select some principal word out of each section, and apply that name to the section itself, in the same manner as the Mohammedans distinguish the suras or chapters of their Koran saying, in Eli, in Solomon, when they intend to signify the sections where those names are mentioned. For instance, Rashi, in his remarks on Hosea ix. 9. (They have deeply corrupted themselves, as in the days of Gibeah), says—"Some are of opinion that this is Gibeah of Benjamin in the concubine," that is, is mentioned in the chapter of the concubine, or Judges xix. And in this manner quotations are sometimes made in the New Testament. Thus, in Mark xii. 26. and Luke xx. 37. ἐν τῇ βύτῳ (in or at the bush) signifies, "in the section relating to the burning bush," which, according to the modern division, is the third chapter of Exodus. Again, in Rom. xi. 2. ἐν Ηλίας (in Elias) signifies, "in the section in which the actions of Elias are recorded;" which at present forms the seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth chapters of the first book of Kings.³

Another very frequent practice of the Rabbins was, to produce only the initial words of a quoted passage, while those are omitted in which the force of the argument consists, or the absence of which destroys the connection. Of this description are the quotations in Rom. vii. 7. and xiii. 9. (Thou shalt not covet), in which the apostle leaves us to supply the following words contained in Exod. xx. 17. Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife, &c. Similar instances are to be found in Rom. xi. 27. and Heb. ii. 13.⁴

The formulæ (as it is written, that it might be fulfilled, it hath been said, &c. &c.) with which the quotations in the New Testament are generally introduced, have been supposed by Surenhusius⁵ (to whose learned researches biblical students are most deeply indebted) to be the indications of the modes in which they are expressed: so that by attending to these formulæ, we may easily know why the evangelists allege the subsequent words in one certain manner rather than in another; and why they depart more or less from the Hebrew text. Agreeably to this hypothesis, Surenhusius has, with infinite labour and industry, collected a great variety of rules⁶ out of the Talmud and the Rabbinical writings, and has illustrated them with numerous extracts, in order to explain and justify all the quotations made from the Old Testament in the New. But what militates against this hypothesis is, that we find, that the very same quotations, expressed in the same words, and brought to prove the very same points, are introduced by different formulæ in different gospels. A further objection to the rules adduced by Surenhusius is their number and their complexity, which render it difficult to refer all the quotations accurately to them. It is therefore not only more convenient, but more intrinsically useful, to refer the citations from the Old Testament in the New to the four following classes, which have been adopted, with some alteration, from Rosenmüller,⁷ after Gusset and Wolfius. According to these critics, the phrases, that it might the books of Samuel in which the history of Abiathar is related. This explanation, Rosenmüller very justly remarks, would be preferable to any other, if Mark had added the expression it is written, or the Scripture saith. Scholia in N. ² In the preface to his "Βιβλίου Κατάλλαξης: in quo, secundum veterum Theologorum Hebræorum Formulæ allegandi et modos interpretandi, conciliantur loca ex Veteri in Novo Testamento allegata." 4to. Amst. 1713. The words of Professor Surenhusius are as follow:—"Etenim omni in loco ex V. T. in N. allegato recte conciliandū, videndum est prius, quæ allegandi formulæ utantur Apostoli; ex quâ statim dignoscere liceat, quæ sequentia verba hoc, et non alio modo, allegaverint, atque ad eorum Scripturam Hebræam pluvie minute attenderint. Sic alium eorum involvit illa allegandi formula Ερρῶν; alium Γενεστας; alium Ινα περιβῶν το ρῖνον; alium Επικραδὴν ἡ γράστιν, &c.

³ The following are the principal theses or rules laid down by Surenhusius, whose work, it may be proper to remark, deserves a place in the library of every biblical student, on account of its learned illustration of many passages of Scripture not immediately connected with the quotations from the Old Testament:—

1. Sometimes the words are read, not according to the regular vowel-points, but agreeably to others substituted for them. Instances of this sort, Surenhusius is of opinion, are to be found in Acts iii. 22, 23. and vii. 42, &c. 1 Cor. xv. 51. and 2 Cor. viii. 15.

2. Sometimes letters are changed, as in Rom. ix. 33. 1 Cor. ix. 9, &c. Heb. viii. 9. and x. 5.

3. Sometimes both letters and vowel-points are changed, as in Acts xiii. 40, 41. and 2 Cor. viii. 15.

4. Sometimes words are added from a parallel passage, or are changed in the quotation, which words appear as if the whole occurred in the cited text, as in Rom. xi. 3. xv. 10. 1 Cor. xv. 45. 2 Cor. vi. 16. Eph. v. 14. and Heb. xii. 12, 13.

5. Sometimes additional words are inserted to complete the sense, as in Matt. iv. 10. xxi. 5. John vi. 49. xii. 38. and Rom. x. 6.

6. Sometimes several passages are abridged together, in order to make the subject more clear, as in Matt. xxi. 5. Luke iv. 18, 19. John vii. 5. &c.

7. Sometimes the beginnings of verses are only added, for the sake of brevity, although the sacred writer refers to the whole passage which he paraphrases. Instances of this sort occur in Acts i. 20. Rom. xi. 27. Heb. iii. and iv. and x.

8. Some passages are cited, either allegorically, or by way of simple proof, in which case the subject cannot be proved unless the passage cited be compared with others, and illustrated, as in Rom. ix. 12, 13. x. 8. and Heb. iv. 5, 6.

9. Sometimes one and the same passage is cited to prove many things, and is applied to many persons, as in Matt. xiii. 14. compared with John xii. 40. Rom. ix. 33. and x. 11. compared with 1 Pet. ii. 6.

10. Sometimes a subject is intended to be proved by several passages, though one only is adduced, the reader being left to find them out, as in Acts xv. 16.

11. The first and last clauses of a verse only are sometimes cited, the intermediate clauses being omitted. See Eph. v. 14. and 1 Pet. i. 24, 25.

12. Sometimes a passage is simply adduced without any formulæ of quotation, and then another intervenes parenthetically; which being cited, the sacred writer returns to the first quoted passage, which is illustrated in a variety of particulars. Thus Saint Paul, in Heb. iii. 7. first cites Psal. xcvi. 7; then he interposes references to Exod. xvii. 2. Num. x. 13. xiv. 23. and Deut. i. 34.; and at length, in the fifteenth verse, he returns to Psal. xcvi. 7; which he explains, as if all the intermediately quoted passages were contained in one and the same text. Similar instances occur in Heb. iv. 15. and 1 Cor. iii. 7. Surenhusii Βιβλίου Κατάλλαξης, pp. 1–56.

³ Michaelis, vol. i. pp. 243, 244, 133, 134, 492. Upon the same rule, Michaelis thinks the supposed contradiction between Mark ii. 26. and 1 Sam. xii. 1. may be explained "in the chapter of Abiathar," or, in that part of be fulfilled, as it is written, &c. &c. may be properly applied in the New Testament,—

- I. When the thing predicted is literally accomplished.
- II. When that is done, of which the Scripture has spoken, not in a literal, but in a spiritual sense.
- III. When a thing is done, neither in a literal nor in a spiritual sense according to the fact referred to in the Scriptures; but is similar to that fact. The passages thus cited may, briefly, be termed quotations in the way of illustration.
- IV. *When the sacred writers have made simple allusions to passages in the Old Testament.*¹

In the following tables, the quotations are arranged under each class, to which they appear respectively to belong. Some of the references, perhaps, may be disputable; and in some, it is possible that the author may be mistaken: but as they are the result of a laborious and patient comparison of every prophecy or citation, in classifying which he could have but little assistance, he trusts he may be allowed to say, that he has exerted the best of his judgment, and to indulge the hope that he has not misapplied the quotations in any essential point.

I. Of Quotations from the Old Testament in the New, in which the things predicted are literally accomplished.

Direct prophecies are those which relate to Christ and the Gospel, and to them alone, and which cannot be taken in any other sense; and the Scripture is said to be fulfilled in the literal sense, when that event which it foretells is accomplished. The quotations from the Old Testament in the New, which belong to this class, are both numerous and highly important. Such are those which mention the calling of the Gentiles and the everlasting kingdom of Messiah: such also is the 110th Psalm, which, it has been well remarked, is as plain as a prophetic description ought to be. It is applicable to Christ alone, and it sets forth his exaltation, his royal dignity, his priestly office, the propagation of his Gospel, the obedience of his subjects; the destruction of his enemies, and of the Roman emperors who persecuted his church.²

II. Of Quotations from the Old Testament in the New, in which that is said to have been done, of which the Scriptures have not spoken in a literal but in a spiritual sense.

There are citations out of the Old Testament in the New in a mediate and typical or spiritual sense, respecting Christ and his mystical body the church. The Scripture is therefore said to be fulfilled, when that is accomplished in the antitype which is written concerning the type. Thus, in John xix. 36. we read, these things were done that the Scriptures should be fulfilled—"a bone of him shall not be broken." These words, which were originally written of the paschal lamb (Exod. xii. 46. Num. ix. 12.), are said to be fulfilled in Christ, who is the antitype of that lamb. Additional examples of the same kind will be found in the annexed passages.

III. Of Quotations from the Old Testament in the New, in which a thing is done neither in a literal nor in a spiritual sense, according to the fact referred to in the Scriptures, but is similar to that fact,—in other words, where the passages referred to are cited in the way of illustration.

The attentive reader of the New Testament cannot fail to observe, that many passages of the Old Testament are cited and adapted by the writers of the New Testament to an occurrence which happened in their time, on account of their correspondence and similitude. These citations are not prophecies, though they are said sometimes to be fulfilled; for any thing may be said to be fulfilled when it can be pertinently applied. This method of explaining Scripture by the way of illustration will enable us to solve some of the greatest difficulties relating to the prophecies.

For the better understanding of this important subject, it should be recollected, that the writings of the Jewish Prophets, which abound in fine descriptions, poetical images, and sublime diction, were the classics of the later Jews; and, in subsequent ages, all their writers affected allusions to them, borrowed their images and descriptions, and very often cited their identical words when recording any event or circumstance that happened in the history of the persons whose lives they were relating; provided it was similar and parallel to one that occurred in the times, and was described in the books of the ancient prophets. It was a familiar idiom of the Jews, when quoting the writings of the Old Testament, to say,—that it might be fulfilled, which was spoken by such and such a prophet; not intending to be understood that such a particular passage in one of the sacred books was ever designed to be a real prediction of what they were then relating, but signifying only, that the words of the Old Testament might be properly adapted to express their meaning and illustrate their ideas. And thus the apostles, who were Jews by birth, and wrote and spoke in the Jewish idiom, have very frequently alluded to the sacred books, after the customary style of their nation; intending no more by this mode of speaking, than that the words of such an ancient writer are happily descriptive of what was transacted in their time, and might, with equal propriety, be adapted to characterize such a particular circumstance as happened in their days: that there was a con-similarity of case and incidents; and that the expressive style and diction of the old inspired prophets were as justly applicable to the occurrences recorded by the apostles, as they were suitable to denote those events and facts in their times which they had commemorated.

Thus, our Lord speaking of the insurmountable prepossessions and perverseness of the Jews to whom he preached, says,—Seeing they see not, and hearing they hear not, neither do they understand,—that is, their stupidity is so gross, and their prejudices are so numerous, that though they have capacities proper for understanding and receiving my doctrine, they will neither understand nor receive it; so that in them is fulfilled the prophecy of Isaiah,—his words are perfectly applicable to the present age, and descriptive of their moral character and condition:—Hearing ye will hear, and will not understand; and seeing ye will see, and will not perceive. For this people's heart is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes they have closed, lest at any time they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and should understand with their heart, and should be converted, and I should heal them. (Isa. vi. 9, 10. cited in Matt. xiii. 14, 15.) The same passage of the evangelical prophet is cited by St. Paul (Rom. xi. 8.), and applied to the invincible obstinacy of his countrymen,—not, indeed, as though they had then, and then only, received their precise accomplishment, but as beautifully expressive of the obduracy, determined infidelity, and impenitence of the Jews.

Again, the prophet Jeremiah, describing the miseries of captivity by a beautiful figure, represents Rachel as deploring the loss of her children, bathed in tears, piercing the air with loud lamentations, and indulging in inconsolable grief. When Herod imbrued his hands in the blood of the innocents in Bethlechem and its vicinity, how applicable were the prophet's words to such a cruel scene, and how happily are they cited by the evangelist, to exhibit to his reader the mourning and lamentation caused by that sanguinary tyrant! They are a beautiful quotation, and not a prediction of what then happened, and yet, upon the murder of these babes, the sacred historian says, according to the Jewish phraseology, when they cited Scripture,—Then was fulfilled that which was spoken by the prophet Jeremiah; In Ramah there was a voice heard, lamentation and weeping, and great mourning, Rachel weeping for her children, and would not be comforted because they are not. (Jer. xxxi. 15. cited in Matt. ii. 17, 18.)

Once more,—our Lord having delivered several parables, the sacred historian, after remarking that Jesus Christ chose to convey his religious and moral instruction to the Jews by means of parables, with which all his public discourses abounded, says,—That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, “I will open my mouth in parables, I will utter things which have been kept secret from the foundation of the world.” (Psal. lxxviii. 2. quoted in Matt. xiii. 35.)

A similar instance occurs in St. Paul's second Epistle to the Corinthians (vi. 2.); where he cites the saying of the prophet (Isa. xlii. 8.)—I have heard thee in a time accepted, and in the day of salvation I have secured thee. In this passage the apostle does not mean to declare that the prophet had the Corinthians in view, but he cites it as a parallel case: intimating that they might collect from that saying that there was a certain accepted time, in which God would hear them, and which, therefore, it concerned them not to let pass without carefully improving it.

† This mode of quoting passages by way of illustration was not confined to the inspired penman. Pagan writers often cite passages from their old poets, to describe things of which these poets never thought; and this, Dr. Jortin remarks, is no fault, but rather a beauty in writing; and a passage, applied justly in a new sense, is ever pleasing to an ingenious reader, who loves to see a likeness and pertinency where he expected none. (Rem. on Eccl. Hist. vol. i. p. 120.) In Ælian, Diogenes the Cynic philosopher is reported to have said, that “he fulfilled in himself all the curses of tragedy;” and Olympiodorus, in his life of Plato, has this expression, “that it might be true concerning him,” and then cites the following verse from Homer:

ΤΟΥ ΚΑΙ ΑΝΤΟ ΓΛΥΨΣΗΣ ΜΕΛΙΤΟΣ ΓΛΥΚΙΝΗ ΡΙΝΗ ΑΥΤΟΥ.

Words sweet as honey from his lips distill'd. Pope.

Which verse, however applicable to that great philosopher, is not to be considered as an oracle delivered by the poet, with a view to the particular use or accommodation of it by this biographer. (Sharpe's Second Argument in Defence of Christianity, p. 349.)

It cannot escape observation, that by far the larger portion of the preceding passages is cited and adapted to the purpose of illustration by the apostle Paul. Dr. John Taylor² has some useful remarks (of which the following are an abstract) on the various designs with which St. Paul cited them:

1. Sometimes his intention goes no further than using the same strong expressions, as being equally applicable to the point in hand. Thus, in Rom. x. 6–8. he uses the words of Moses (Deut. xxx. 12–14.) not to prove any thing, nor as if he thought Moses spoke of the same subject; but merely as intimating that the strong and lively expressions, used by Moses concerning the doctrine he taught, were equally applicable to the faith of the Gospel. So, in Rom. x. 18. he quotes Psal. xix. 4. though it is not unlikely that those expressions were used by the ancient Jews in application to the Messiah, as the apostle applies them.

2. Sometimes the design of the quotation is only to show that the cases are parallel; or that what happened in his times corresponded with what happened in former days. See Rom. ii. 24. viii. 36. ix. 27–29. xi. 2–5. 8–10. and xv. 21.

3. Sometimes the quotation is only intended to explain a doctrinal point. See Rom. i. 17. iv. 7, 8. 18–21. ix. 20, 21. x. 15. and xv. 3.

4. Sometimes the quotation is designed to prove a doctrinal point. See Rom. iii. 4. 19–18. iv. 3–17. v. 12–14. ix. 7. 9. 12, 13. 15, 17. x. 5. 11. 13. xii. 20. xiv. 11.

Lastly, when a passage of the Old Testament is quoted in the New, in order to prove a point of doctrine, the person or writer applies it, though not always in the precise words of the original, yet constantly according to its genuine sense as it stands there. Examples of such application will be found in Deut. viii. 3. compared with Matt. iv. 4.; Deut. vi. 16. compared with Matt. iv. 7.; Deut. xxxiii. 35. and Prov. xxv. 21, 22. compared with Rom. xii. 19, 20.—The expression in Hos. vi. 6., mercy and not sacrifice, is applied to different purposes in Matt. ix. 13., but to both properly.

In applying passages cited from the Old Testament by way of illustration, Turretin has suggested the three following rules, which claim the attention of the biblical student:—

• In his Paraphrase and Notes on Saint Paul's Epistle to the Romans, p. 339 4th edit. 1769.

1. In applications of this kind, we must not neglect the literal sense, which is the first and only genuine sense of Scripture.

2. Such applications ought not to be forced, or far-fetched; for those which were made by the apostles were simple and easy to be apprehended.

3. Too much stress ought not to be laid on these applications; which, it should be considered, are merely illustrations adduced by the sacred writers further to explain the subjects under their discussion.

Such being the nature of these illustrative quotations, it follows that no doctrines—at least such as are necessary to salvation—either can or ought to be deduced from them.¹

IV. Of Quotations, and other Passages from the Old Testament, which are alluded to in the New.

Besides the passages mentioned in the preceding class as citations by the writers of the New Testament in the way of illustration, there is a fourth class, nearly allied to them, and comprising a few quotations, together with a larger number of other passages not distinctly cited from the Old Testament; but which, on comparing them with the New Testament, appear most evidently to have been present to the minds of the sacred writers, who have alluded to them without expressly quoting them. A careful inspection of such passages, with reference to their scope and context, together with an application of the rules above suggested by Turretin, will readily enable the student to judge of the allusions which he may meet with in the New Testament; and in addition to those rules, Dr. Gerard has remarked, that when the inspired writers quote a passage from the Old Testament, merely in the way of allusion, it is enough that the words which they borrow emphatically express their own meaning. It is not necessary that they be precisely the same with those of the passage alluded to, nor that they be there used, either of the same subject or of a similar subject.² The following table presents a list of the principal passages thus alluded to in the New Testament:—

SECTION III.

OF APOCRYPHAL PASSAGES, SUPPOSED TO BE QUOTED IN THE NEW TESTAMENT.—QUOTATIONS FROM PROFANE AUTHORS.

It was a practice of the ancient Hebrew divines to cite, not only the Scriptures, as we have seen in the preceding sections, but also to quote histories, facts, and apophthegms or sayings of their early sages, which they had received by oral tradition from the time of Moses, in order to supply those passages which are wanting in the Pentateuch. Of this method of quotation we have three supposed instances in the New Testament. The first is 2 Tim. iii. 8. where we meet with the name of Jannes and Jambres as the two Egyptian magicians who opposed Moses. Schickard and some other learned men are of opinion that Saint Paul, being deeply conversant in Jewish literature, derived his knowledge of these names from the Targum or Chaldee Paraphrase of Jonathan Ben Uzziel, on Exod. vii. 11. But as there is reason to believe that this Targum is of too late a date to have been consulted by the apostle, it is most probable that he alluded to an ancient and generally received tradition relative to those men. What corroborates the latter conjecture is, that their names are mentioned by some ancient profane writers, as Numenius the Pythagorean,³ by Artapanus,⁴ and by Pliny.⁵ The Jews affirm that they were princes of Pharaoh's magicians, and that they greatly resisted Moses. Origen, who flourished in the second century, informs us, that there was extant, in his time, an apocryphal book concerning these magicians, inscribed Jannes et Mambres Liber.⁶ The other two instances alluded to are the 9th verse of the Epistle of Jude, which cites the story of Michael the archangel, contending with Satan about the body of Moses, and the 14th verse of the same epistle, in which it has been supposed that he quoted an apocryphal prophecy of Enoch;⁷ but both these instances are borrowed from traditional accounts then received by the Jews, with whom the apostle argues from their own authors and concessions.⁸ If, however, it could be proved that the apostle had quoted a single passage from the apocryphal book of Enoch, such a quotation will no more prove his approbation of the whole book, than Paul's quotations from certain heathen poets prove that apostle's approbation of every part of the compositions to which he referred. On the subject of the supposed apocryphal quotations by Jude, see further, Vol. II. pp. 377, 378.

On a reference to the passages of the Old Testament, which are cited in the way of illustration by the evangelical writers,⁹ it will be observed that by far the greater number of such quotations has been made by Saint Paul. But the same great apostle of the Gentiles, becoming all things to all men, and being deeply versed in the works of heathen authors, as well as in the sacred writings, did not confine himself exclusively to the inspired books; and, accordingly, we have three instances in the New Testament of the fine taste and ability with which he cited and applied passages from Pagan authors when contending with the Gentiles, or writing to Gentile converts. The first is in Acts xvii. 28., where he cites part of a verse from the Phænomena of Aratus.

The passage was originally spoken of the heathen deity Jupiter, and is dexterously applied to the true God by Paul, who draws a very strong and conclusive inference from it.

The last instance to be noticed under this head is Titus i. 12., where St. Paul quotes from Epimenides, a Cretan poet the verse which has already been cited and illustrated in Vol. I. p. 81.; to which the reader is referred.

CHAPTER V.

ON HARMONIES OF SCRIPTURE.

I. Occasion and Design of Harmonies of the Scriptures.—II. Harmonies of the four Gospels.—III. Observations on the different Schemes of Harmonizers, and on the Duration of the public Ministry of Jesus Christ.

1. THE several books of the Holy Scriptures, having been written at different times and on different occasions, necessarily treat on a great variety of subjects, historical, doctrinal, moral, and prophetic. The sacred authors also, writing with different designs, have not always related the same events in the same order: some are introduced by anticipation; and others again are related first which should have been placed last. Hence seeming contradictions have arisen, which have been eagerly seized by the adversaries of Christianity, in order to perplex the minds and shake the faith of those who are not able to cope with their sophistries. These contradictions, however, are not real, for they disappear as soon as they are brought to the test of candid examination.

The manifest importance and advantage of comparing the sacred writers with each other, and of reconciling apparent contradictions, have induced many learned men to undertake the compilation of works, which, being designed to show the perfect agreement of all parts of the sacred writings, are commonly termed HARMONIES. A multitude of works of this description has, at different times, been issued from the press; the execution of which has varied according to the different designs of their respective authors. They may, however, be referred to three classes; viz.

1. Works which have for their object the RECONCILING OF APPARENT CONTRADICTIONS in the sacred writings.—These, in fact, are a sort of commentaries; and a notice of the principal publications of this kind will be found in the BIOGRAPHICAL APPENDIX to the second Volume, PART II. CHAP. V. SECT. III. § 8. among the commentators and expositors of Holy Writ.

2. HARMONIES OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.—The design of these is, to dispose the historical, poetical, and prophetic books in chronological order, so that they may mutually explain and authenticate one another. Our learned countryman, Dr. Lightfoot, in the year 1647, published a "Chronicle" or Harmony of the Old Testament; on the basis of which the Rev. George Townsend constructed "The Old Testament arranged in Historical and Chronological Order;" but he has deviated from, and improved upon, the plan of Lightfoot very materially. His work is noticed in the BIOGRAPHICAL APPENDIX to the second Volume, PART I. CHAP. II. SECT. I.

3. HARMONIES OF THE NEW TESTAMENT are of two sorts; viz.

(1.) HARMONIES OF THE ENTIRE NEW TESTAMENT, in which not only are the four Gospels chronologically disposed, but the Epistles are also placed in order of time, and interspersed in the Acts of the Apostles. Mr. Townsend's "New Testament arranged in Chronological and Historical Order" is the most complete work of this kind in the English language.

(2.) HARMONIES OF THE FOUR GOSPELS, in which the narratives or memoirs of the four evangelists are digested in their proper chronological order.

11. The Memoirs or Narratives of the life of Jesus Christ having been written with different designs, and for the use of particular classes of Christians, the importance and advantage of collating these relations with each other, and obtaining the clear amount of their various narratives, at a very early period suggested the plan of forming the Gospels into harmonies, exhibiting completely their parallelisms and differences, or into a connected history, termed respectively Monotessaron and Diatessaron; in which the four accounts are blended into one, containing the substance of them all. Works of this description are extremely numerous. Mr. Pilkington has enumerated one hundred and four, which had come to his knowledge in 1747;¹ and Walchius has given a select list of one hundred and thirty, which had been published prior to the year 1765.² The indefatigable bibliographer Fabricius, and his editor, Professor Harles, have given a list of those which were known to be extant, to the year 1795, which amounts to one hundred and seventy-two, but it is by no means complete.³ Our notice must necessarily be confined to a few of the principal composers of harmonies.⁴

1. TATIAN, who wrote about the middle of the second century, composed a digest of the evangelical history, which was called τὰ διὰ τεσσάρων, that is, the Gospel of the four, or Monotessaron, that is, one narrative composed out of the four. Tatian is the most ancient harmonist on record; for, if Theophilus bishop of Antioch had before written on that subject (as Jerome insinuates), his work is long since lost.

2. In the beginning of the third century, AMMONIUS, an Alexandrian, composed a harmony which was also called τὰ διὰ τεσσάρων or the Gospel of the four, of the execution of which Eusebius speaks with approbation. The works of Tatian and Ammonius have long ago perished; but attempts have been made to obtrude spurious compilations upon the world for them in both instances. Victor, who was bishop of Capua, in the sixth century, gave a Latin version of a harmony, which was published by Michael Memler at Mayence, in 1524, as a translation of Ammonius's Harmony, in consequence of Victor being undetermined to which of those writers it was to be ascribed, though he was disposed to refer it to Tatian. And Ottomar Luscinus published one at Augsburg in 1524, which he called that of Ammonius, though others have ascribed it to Tatian. It is not a harmony in the strict sense of the term, but a mere summary of the life of Christ delivered in the author's own words.

3. The diligent ecclesiastical historian EUSEBIUS, who wrote in the former part of the fourth century, composed a very celebrated harmony of the Gospels; in which he divided the evangelical history into ten canons or tables, which are prefixed to many editions and versions of the New Testament, particularly to Dr. Mill's critical edition of it. In the first canon he has arranged, according to the ancient chapters (which are commonly called the Ammonian Sections, from Ammonius, who made these divisions), those parts of the history of Christ which are related by all four evangelists. In the rest he has disposed the portions of history related by,

⁴ Our notices of Harmonies are chiefly derived from the three works just cited, and from Michaelis's Introduction to the New Testament, vol. iii. part i. pp. 31—36. and part ii. pp. 29—49.

2. Matthew, Mark, and Luke.
3. Matthew, Luke, and John.
4. Matthew, Mark, and John.
5. Matthew and Luke.
6. Matthew and Mark.
7. Matthew and John.
8. Luke and Mark.
9. Luke and John.
10. Only one of the four evangelists.

Though these Eusebian canons are usually considered as harmony, yet it is evident, from a bare inspection of them, that they are simply Indexes to the four Gospels, and by no means form a harmony of the same nature as those which have been written in modern times, and which are designed to bring the several facts recorded by the evangelists into chronological order, and to reconcile contradictions. On this account Walchius does not allow them a place in his bibliographical catalogue of harmonies.

4. About the year 330, JUVENCUS, a Spaniard, wrote the evangelical history in heroic verse. His method is said to be confused, and his verse is not of a description to ensure him that immortality which he promised himself. His work has fallen into oblivion.

5. The four books of AUGUSTINE, bishop of Hippo, in Africa, De Consensu Quatuor Evangeliorum, are too valuable to be omitted. They were written about the year 400, and are honourable to his industry and learning. Augustine wrote this work with the express design of vindicating the truth and authority of the Gospels from the cavils of objectors.

From the middle ages until the close of the fifteenth century various harmonies were compiled by Peter Comestor, Guido de Perpiniano, Simon de Cassia, Ludolphus the Saxon (a German Carthusian monk, whose work was held in such high estimation that it passed through not fewer than thirty editions, besides being translated into French and Italian), Jean Charlier de Gerson, chancellor of the university of Paris, Peter Lombard, Thomas Aquinas, and many others, which are now of little value, and which have long since fallen into disuse. Of the various harmonies published since the Reformation, by foreign authors, the Latin Harmony of Chemnitz (or Chemnitzius) is the most esteemed; and among our British divines those of Drs. Doddridge and Macknight are most generally read on account of their valuable expositions and commentaries. But, for exhibiting the parallel passages of each evangelist, perhaps the columnar form of Archbishop Newcome, or of the Rev. Edward Greswell, is preferable; while he, who is desirous of perusing one connected and continuous narrative, in which all the shades of circumstances are judiciously interwoven, will find Mr. Townsend's "New Testament arranged in Historical and Chronological Order," &c. the most useful.¹

III. In the construction of an Evangelical Harmony, two questions have presented themselves to the consideration of harmonizers; viz. first, what evangelist has preserved the true order of circumstances, to which all the others are to be reduced? And, secondly, what was the duration of the public ministry of Jesus Christ?

1. On the first of these topics, we may remark that all the modern harmonies of the Gospels may be divided into two classes; viz. 1. Harmonies, of which the authors have taken for granted, that all the facts recorded in all the four Gospels are arranged in chronological order; and, 2. Harmonies, of which the authors have admitted, that in one or more of the four Gospels the chronological order has been more or less neglected. At the head of the first class is Andrew Osiander, one of Luther's fellow-labourers, in promoting the reformation in Germany: his method is followed by Calovius, Sandhagen, and others, on the Continent, and in this country by Dr. Macknight. Chemnitz stands at the head of the other class, and also has many followers of his method of arrangement. "The harmonies of the former kind are very similar to each other, because, though the authors of them had to interweave the facts recorded in one Gospel with the facts recorded in another, yet, as they invariably retained the order which was observed in each Gospel, and consequently repeated whatever facts occurred in different places in different Gospels, as often as those facts presented themselves to the harmonists in their progress through the Gospels, there was less room for material deviations in their plan and method. But in the harmonies of the latter kind we meet with considerable variations, because, though the authors of them are unanimous in their principle, they are at variance in the application of it; and, though they agree in making transpositions, by which they distinguish themselves from the harmonists of the first class, yet they do not always make the same transpositions. Some, for instance, have supposed, as Chemnitz, Archbishop Newcome, and other harmonists of this class have done, that St. Matthew has mostly neglected chronological order, while others, as Bengel and Bertling, have supposed, that he has in general retained it. Hence, though they have all the same object in view, namely, to make a chronological harmony, or to arrange the events, which are recorded in the Gospels, as nearly as possible according to the order of the time in which the events happened, they have adopted different modes of producing this effect. For in some harmonies the order of St. Matthew is inverted, and made subservient to that of St. Mark, while in other harmonies St. Mark's order is inverted, and made subservient to that of St. Matthew. Some harmonists again suppose, that all the evangelists have neglected chronological order, while others make an exception in favour of one or more of them, though the question, which of the evangelists should be excepted, likewise affords matter of debate. And even those harmonists, who agree as to the Gospel or Gospels, in which transpositions should be made, differ in respect to the particular parts where these transpositions ought to take place."²

A late excellent writer on the evidences and criticism of the New Testament,³ however, is of opinion that the evangelists did not design to adhere to the order of time in writing their respective memoirs of the life of Jesus Christ. The purpose with which the four Gospels were written, he remarks, appears to have been, not a regular chronologically disposed history of the life, ministry, and sufferings of Jesus Christ, but the collection of such a body of well-authenticated facts, as might disclose the nature, and form sufficient proof of the truth of Christianity. This, he thinks, is obvious from the manner in which the evangelists generally place together the facts narrated. "That manner is such as completely to effect the latter, but not the former, purpose. There are no marks of an intention, on the part of any of the evangelists, to give to their narratives a regular chronological order. While, in general, there are no indications of the succession and proximity of the events narrated, but from their being prior, or posterior, and contiguous in the narrative, or from such indefinite expressions as τοτε, παλαι, εν ταις ημεραις εκειναις, η μετιστα το καιρο, εν το καιρο, μετα ταυτα; on the other hand, it sometimes occurs, that the events which one evangelist relates as in immediate succession, are noticed by himself to be not contiguous in time, and are put down by another, with some of the intervening transactions interposed. Than evidence of this kind, as to the purpose of a history, no declaration by the writer can be more satisfactory. Such declaration, unless perfectly explicit, may require to be modified by what his work bears within itself of its purpose. But there can be no ambiguity in the evidence, deduced from such facts as we have noticed, in the Gospel narratives.

"Against this evidence, too, there is no contrary declaration to be weighed. The evangelist, John (xx. 30, 31.), expressly asserts that the purpose of his writing was to make such a selection of facts as might be good ground of faith in the divine mission of Jesus Christ; but he nowhere affirms the chronological order of the selection. Luke, also, thus declares the purpose of his writing to Theophilus:—ἵνα εἰς πίστιν ὑμῶν κατηχηθῆτε λογῶν τῆν ἀσφαλῆναι (Luke i. 4.), and the expression in the preceding verse, Εδῆξε κίματα, παρηκολούθηκατε ἀναθεῖν πρὸς ἀμύβας, καθὼς οὗ γράφει, is to be interpreted according to that purpose. For this purpose, thus distinctly expressed by two of the evangelists, and evident from the manner of writing common to them all, it was assuredly necessary that, either directly or indirectly, they should furnish us with such information, as might enable us to refer the facts in the Gospel history to a certain country, and a certain period in the history of the world. Without this, the Gospels would not have afforded the proper means for distinguishing them from fictitious histories; and hence, could not have answered the purpose of furnishing evidence to the truth of Christianity. This it was possible to do, either formally by dates, such as are found in the beginning of the second and third chapters of Luke's Gospel; or by allusions to known places, persons, and circumstances, to be learnt from other histories. Of these two modes, the evangelists, with a few exceptions, follow the latter; natural to men writing immediately for contemporaries, upon or near the scene of the events; and conformable to the usual simplicity by which their whole style is pervaded. But for this purpose, it was not in the least necessary to frame regular chronological narratives; and accordingly what was not necessary, has not been effected; the connections carrying forward the arrangement of events in the Gospels, being not merely those of time, but of the various associations, such as similarity in the facts themselves, vicinity of place, &c. by which it is possible that the human mind may be guided, in recollecting and classifying things that are past. And such, perhaps, upon the whole, is the impression made on most readers by the narratives of the evangelists. As we read them, we have a general feeling that they are carrying us ultimately forward, from preceding to subsequent events, yet, occasionally, over intervals of time concerning which nothing has been recorded, or with deviations from the chronological order; thus rendering it difficult, or impossible, to make one harmonious arrangement of the whole Gospel history, in which each event shall obtain, in perfect consistency with the account of each evangelist, its proper chronological place.¹

² Michaelis's Introduction, vol. iii. part ii. p. 46.

Auid this diversity of opinions, supported as each is by the most ingenious arguments which its author could produce, it is extremely difficult to decide. By the adoption of the very probable hypothesis last stated, concerning the purpose for which the evangelists wrote, we certainly get rid, and in the fairest way, of all the difficulties with which the two classes of authors of Harmonies of the Gospels above noticed have to combat. As the evidence laid before the reader will enable him to determine for himself which of these hypotheses to adopt, we shall only remark, that Bishop Marsh recommends Griesbach's Synopsis of the first three Gospels as preferable to every other harmony extant.²

2. Very different opinions have been entertained by the compilers of harmonies, with regard to the duration of Christ's public ministry: whence a corresponding diversity has necessarily arisen in the disposition of their respective harmonies. During the first three centuries, the common opinion was, that Christ's ministry lasted only one year, or at furthest one year and four months. Early in the fourth century, Eusebius, the ecclesiastical historian, maintained that it continued between three and four years: this opinion was generally received, though the ancient opinion was retained by Augustine. During the middle ages, no further inquiries appear to have been made on this subject; and, after the Reformation, all the harmonizers of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries assumed it for certain that Christ's ministry lasted between three and four years. Bengel, however, in his German Harmony of the Gospels, published at Tubingen in 1736, reduced it to two years; and, three years before, Mr. Mann, in his essay "Of the true Years of the Birth and Death of Christ" (London, 1733, 8vo.), revived the ancient opinion that it lasted only one year. This was also followed by Dr. Priestley in his Greek and English Harmonies. The hypothesis of Eusebius was adopted by Archbishop Newcome, who maintained that one year was by far too short a period for the several progresses of Jesus Christ in Galilee, and the transactions connected with them; and Bishop Marsh observes, that the Gospel of John presents almost insuperable obstacles to the opinion of those who confine Christ's ministry to one year. For, in order to effect this purpose, it is necessary to make omissions and transpositions in St. John's Gospel, which are not warranted by the laws of criticism, but are attempted merely to support a previously assumed hypothesis. On the other hand, he thinks that the opinion, which makes Christ's ministry to have continued three years (and which receives no support whatever from the first three Gospels), cannot be satisfactorily proved even from the Gospel of Saint John, who at the utmost has noticed, or at least named, only three distinct passovers.³

Another opinion was announced, with equal modesty and learning, in a dissertation on "The Chronology of our Saviour's Life," by the Rev. C. BEXSON, M. A. (Cambridge, 1819, 8vo.) The results of his investigation (which depends on minute chronological and critical discussions that do not admit of abridgment) are, that Herod died in the year of the Julian period 4711; and, consequently, that the birth of Christ took place A. J. P. 4709, in the spring (probably in the month of April or May); that his baptism was performed in or about the month of November, A. J. P. 4739, during the procuratorship of Pontius Pilate; that, agreeably to the indications of time contained in Saint John's Gospel, the ministry of Jesus Christ lasted through three passovers, or two years and a half; and that he was crucified on the fifteenth day of the month Nisan (April 15th), A. J. P. 4742.

From the difficulty of producing a harmony, complete in all its parts, some eminent critics (and among them the elegant and accomplished expositor Gilpin) have maintained that we ought to peruse the four several memoirs of Jesus Christ, written by the evangelists, separately and distinctly; and that, by explaining them separately, the whole becomes more uniform. Archbishop Newcome, however, has ably vindicated, and proved, the utility and advantage of harmonies; and with his observations the present chapter shall conclude. A harmony, he remarks, has the following uses:—

By the juxtaposition of parallel passages, it is often the best comment; and it cannot but greatly alleviate the reader's trouble, in his attempts to illustrate the phraseology and manner of the evangelists. It also shows that Mark, who inserts much new matter, did not epitomize the Gospel of Matthew; and it affords plain indications, from the additions and omissions in John's Gospel, that his was designed to be a supplemental history. Further, a harmony in many instances illustrates the propriety of our Lord's conduct and works. Thus, previously to the call of the four apostles (Mark i. 16—20,) Andrew had been the Baptist's disciple, and had received his testimony to Jesus (John i. 35. 40.): Peter had been brought to Jesus by Andrew his brother (John i. 42.); and Jesus had shown more than human knowledge and more than human power (John i. 48. ii. 11. 23. iii. 2. iv. 29. 49. 50.) than what had probably fallen within the experience of these disciples, or at least must have gained their belief on the firmest grounds. So, the words of Christ (John v. 21. 25.) are prophetically spoken before he had raised any from the dead; and his reproofs (Matt. xii. 31. Mark vii. 6.) are uttered after he had wrought miracles, during two feasts at Jerusalem. Nor was the jealousy of the Jewish rulers early awakened by the call of the twelve apostles to a stated attendance. This event took place after our Lord had celebrated his second passover at Jerusalem, and when he was about to absent himself from that city for so long a period as eighteen months. In like manner, the seventy were not sent forth to show, throughout a wide tract of country, with what wisdom and power their Master endowed them, till within about six months of our Lord's crucifixion; and the scene of raising the dead, a kind of miracle which would have exasperated his enemies in proportion as it tended to exalt his prophetic character, was remote from Jerusalem, till the last passover approached. Lastly, strong presumptions of the inspiration of the evangelists arise from an accurate comparison of the Gospels, from their being so wonderfully supplemental to each other, in passages reconcilable only by the suggestion of a seemingly indifferent circumstance, and from their real agreement in the midst of a seeming disagreement. "Truth, like honesty, often neglects appearances: hypocrisy and imposture are always guarded."⁴

² Michaelis's Introduction, vol. iii. part ii. p. 47. Michaelis has given a harmonized table of the four Gospels (Introd. vol. iii. part i. pp. 37—83); which Bishop Marsh (part ii. p. 67.) pronounces to be a very useful one, considered as a general index to the four Gospels. Dr. A. Clarke has reprinted Michaelis's harmonized table at the end of his Commentary on the Gospels; observing that it is useful to the reader of them, in pointing out where the same transaction is mentioned by the evangelists, what they have in common, and what is peculiar to each. Michaelis has generally followed Matthew's account, with which the narratives of the other evangelists are collated. In 1821, an English Harmony was compiled by, and printed at the expense of, Thomas Bowles, Esq. (for private distribution only), entitled "Diessaron, or the History of our Lord Jesus Christ, compiled from the four Gospels, according to the Translation of Dr. Campbell, and in the Order adopted by John David Michaelis, London," 8vo. In this beautifully executed volume the compiler has made some slight variations from the order of time followed by Michaelis in the harmonized table just mentioned.

PART II.

ON THE INTERPRETATION OF SCRIPTURE.

BOOK I.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF INTERPRETATION

CHAPTER I.

ON THE SENSE OF SCRIPTURE.

SECTION I.

ON THE MEANING OF WORDS.

1. Nature of Words.—II. The Sense of Scripture defined: 1. The literal Sense;—2. The allegorical, typical, and parabolical Sense;—3. The moral Sense of Professor Kant shown to be destitute of Foundation;—4. The Declarations of Jesus Christ and his Apostles are NOT an Accommodation to popular Opinion and Prejudice.

MAN, being formed for society, has received from his Creator the faculty of communicating to his fellow-men, by means of certain signs, the ideas conceived in his mind. Hence, his organs of speech are so constructed, that he is capable of forming certain articulate sounds, expressive of his conceptions; and these, being fitly disposed together, constitute discourse: which, whether it be pronounced or written, must necessarily possess the power of declaring to others what he wishes they should understand.

I. The vehicles, or signs, by which men communicate their thoughts to each other, are termed WORDS; whether these are orally uttered, or described by written characters, the idea, or notion, attached to any word, is its SIGNIFICATION; and the ideas which are expressed by several words connected together,—that is, in entire sentences and propositions, and which ideas are produced in the minds of others,—are called the SENSE or proper meaning of words. Thus, if a person utter certain words, to which another individual attaches the same idea as the speaker, he is said to understand the latter, or to comprehend the sense of his words. If we transfer this to sacred subjects, we may define the sense of Scripture to be that conception of its meaning, which the Holy Spirit presents to the understanding of man, by means of the words of Scripture, and by means of the ideas comprised in those words.¹

EVERY WORD MUST HAVE SOME MEANING.

Although in every language there are very many words which admit of several meanings, yet in common parlance there is only one true sense attached to any word; which sense is indicated by the connection and series of the discourse, by its subject-matter, by the design of the speaker or writer, or by some other adjuncts, unless any ambiguity be purposely intended. That the same usage obtains in the Sacred Writings there is no doubt whatever. In fact, the perspicuity of the Scriptures requires this unity and simplicity of sense in order to render intelligible to man the design of their Great Author, which could never be comprehended if a multiplicity of senses were admitted. In all other writings, indeed, besides the Scriptures, before we sit down to study them, we expect to find one single determinate sense and meaning attached to the words; from which we may be satisfied that we have attained their true meaning, and understand what the authors intended to say. Further, in common life, no prudent and conscientious person, who either commits his sentiments to writing or utters any thing, intends that a diversity of meanings should be attached to what he writes or says; and, consequently, neither his readers, nor those who hear him, affix to it any other than the true and obvious sense. Now, if such be the practice in all fair and upright intercourse between man and man, is it for a moment to be supposed that God, who has graciously vouchsafed to employ the ministry of men in order to make known his will to mankind, should have departed from this way of simplicity and truth? Few persons, we apprehend, will be found, in this enlightened age, sufficiently hardy to maintain the affirmative.²

II. THE SENSE OF SCRIPTURE DEFINED.

1. The LITERAL SENSE of any place of Scripture is that which the words signify, or require, in their natural and proper acceptation, without any trope, metaphor, or figure, and abstracted from any mystic meaning: thus, in

Gen. i. 1. We read that God created the heaven and the earth. These words mean what they literally import, and are to be interpreted according to the letter. So, in John x. 30. we read, I and the Father are one; in which passage the deity of Christ, and his equality with God the Father, are so distinctly and unequivocally asserted, that it is difficult to conceive how any other than its proper and literal meaning could ever be given to it.

The literal sense has also been termed the grammatical sense; the term grammatical having the same reference to the Greek language as the term literal to the Latin, both referring to the elements of a word. Words may also be taken properly and physically, as in John i. 6. There was a man whose name was John: this is called the proper literal sense. When, however, words are taken metaphorically and figuratively, that is, are diverted to a meaning which they do not naturally denote, but which they nevertheless intend under some figure or form of speech,—as when the properties of one person or thing are attributed to another,—this is termed the tropical or figurative sense.³

"Thus, when hardness is applied to stone, the expression is used literally, in its proper and natural signification:—when it is applied to the heart, it is used figuratively, or in an improper acceptation. Yet, the sense, allowing for the change of subject, is virtually the same, its application being only transferred from a physical to a moral quality."⁴ An example of this kind occurs in Ezek. xxxvi. 26. and xi. 19., where the heart of stone denotes a hard obdurate heart, regardless of divine admonitions, and the heart of flesh signifies a tender heart, susceptible of the best and holiest impressions. In like manner, in Zech. vii. 12., the obdurate Jews are said to have made their hearts as an adamant stone. Numerous similar expressions occur in the New as well as in the Old Testament, as in Luke xiii. 32. John i.

² "The tropical sense is no other than the figurative sense. As we say, in language derived from the Greek, that a trope is used when a word is turned from its literal or grammatical sense; so we say, in language derived from the Latin, that a figure is then used, because in such cases the meaning of the word assumes a new form. The same opposition, therefore, which is expressed by the terms literal sense and figurative sense, is expressed also by the terms grammatical sense and tropical sense." Bishop Marsh's Lect. par. iii. p. 67.

29. and xv. 5.; where Herod, for his craftiness and cruelty is termed a fox; the Saviour of the world is called the Lamb of God, because to his great atoning sacrifice for the sins of the whole world, the lamb, which was offered every morning and evening, had a typical reference; he is also called a vine, as all true Christians are designated the branches, to intimate that Christ is the support of the whole church, and of every particular believer,—that, in the language of the New Testament, they are all implanted and grafted into him, that is, united to him by true faith and sincere love, and that they all derive spiritual life and vigour from him. It were unnecessary to multiply examples of this kind, as every diligent reader of the Word of God will doubtless be able to recollect them.

Further, the literal sense has been called the HISTORICAL SENSE, as conveying the meaning of the words and phrases used by a writer at a certain time.

Thus, in the more ancient books of the Old Testament, the word isles or islands signifies every inhabited region, particularly all the western coasts of the Mediterranean Sea, and the seats of Japhet's posterity, viz. the northern part of Asia, Asia Minor, and Europe, together with some other regions. Of this sense of the word we have examples in Gen. x. 5. Isa. xi. 11. xx. 6. xxiii. 6. xxiv. 15. xlii. 15. lxvi. 19. Ezek. xxvi. 15. 18. xxvii. 3—7. 15. 35. But, in a later age, it denotes islands properly so called, as in Esther x. 1., and, perhaps, Jer. xlvii. 4. (marginal rendering).¹ Again, the phrase, to possess or inherit the land, which is of very frequent occurrence in the Old Testament, if we consider it historically, that is, with reference to the history of the Jewish nation, means simply, to hold the secure and undisturbed possession of the promised land; and in the New Testament, the phrase to "follow Christ" must in like manner be understood historically in some passages of the Gospels; implying no more than that the persons there mentioned followed the Lord Jesus Christ in his progress, and were auditors of his public instructions, precisely as the apostles followed him from place to place, and heard his doctrine.²

Interpreters now speak of the true sense of a passage, by calling it the GRAMMATICO-HISTORICAL SENSE; and exegesis, founded on the nature of language, is called grammatico-historical. The object in using this compound name is, to show that both grammatical and historical considerations are employed in making out the sense of a word or passage.

2. Where, besides the direct or immediate signification of a passage, whether literally or figuratively expressed, there is attached to it a more remote or recondite meaning, this is termed the MEDIATE, SPIRITUAL, or MYSTICAL SENSE; and this sense is founded, not on a transfer of words from one signification to another, but on the entire application of the matter itself to a different subject.

Thus, what is said literally in Exod. xxx. 10. and Levit. xvi. concerning the high-priest's entrance into the most holy place on the day of expiation, with the blood of the victim, we are taught by St. Paul to understand spiritually of the entrance of Jesus Christ into the presence of God with his own blood. (Heb. ix. 7—20.)

The spiritual sense of Scripture has frequently been divided into allegorical, typical, and *paraboli*c. The reason of this mode of classifications, as well as of some other minor distinctions, does not sufficiently appear. Since, however, it has obtained a place in almost every treatise on the interpretation of the Scriptures, it may not be irrelevant to define and illustrate these senses by a few examples.

(1.) The ALLEGORICAL SENSE is, when the Holy Scriptures, besides the literal sense, signify any thing belonging to faith or spiritual doctrine.

Such is the sense which is required rightly to understand Gal. iv. 24. ἡ τὴν ἐν τῇ ἀλλογίᾳ ἱστορίαν, which things are allegorically spoken, or which things are thus allegorized by me; that is, under the veil of the literal sense they further contain a spiritual or mystical sense.

(2.) The TYPICAL SENSE is, when, under external objects or prophetic visions, secret things, whether present or future, are represented; especially when certain transactions, recorded in the Old Testament, presignify or adumbrate those related in the New Testament.

Thus, in Psal. xcv. 11., the words "they should not enter into my rest," literally understood, signify the entrance of the Israelites into the promised land; but, spiritually and typically, the entering into the rest and enjoyment of heaven, through the merits and mediation of Christ, as is largely shown in the epistle to the Hebrews, chapters iii. and iv.

(3.) The PARABOLICAL SENSE is, when, besides the plain and obvious meaning of the thing related, an occult or spiritual sense is intended. As this chiefly occurs in passages of a moral tendency, the parabolic has by some writers been termed the moral or tropological sense.

Of this description is the parable of the talents: the design of which is to show that the duties which men are called to perform are suited to their situations and the talents which they severally receive; that whatever a good man possesses he has received from God, as well as the ability to improve that good; and that the grace and temporal mercies of God are suited to the power which a man has of improving them. Thus, also, the injunction in Deut. xxv. 4., relative to muzzling the ox while treading out the corn, is explained by Saint Paul with reference to the right of maintenance of ministers of the Gospel. (1 Cor. ix. 9—11.)

It were easy to multiply examples of each of the different senses here mentioned; but as they have all one common foundation, and as we shall have occasion to adduce others in the course of the following pages, when stating the rules for interpreting the sense of Scripture after it has been ascertained, the instances above quoted may suffice to illustrate the distinctions subsisting between them.³

3. The MORAL SENSE or interpretation, advocated by the late Professor Kant of Berlin (whose philosophical system has obtained many followers on the Continent), consists in setting aside the laws of grammatical and historical interpretation, and attributing a moral meaning to those passages of Scripture, which, agreeably to grammatical interpretation, contain nothing coincident with the moral dictates of unassisted reason. According to this hypothesis, nothing more is necessary, than that it be possible to attach a moral meaning to the passage;—it is of little moment how forced or unnatural it may be. Against this mode of interpretation (which is here noticed in order to put the student on his guard) the following weighty objections have been urged:—

(1.) Such a mode of explaining Scripture does not deserve the name of an interpretation; for this moral interpreter does not inquire, what the Scriptures actually do teach by their own declarations, but what they ought to teach, agreeably to his opinions.

(2.) The principle is incorrect, which is assumed as the basis of this mode of interpretation; viz. that the grammatical sense of a passage of Scripture cannot be admitted, or at least is of no use in ethics, whenever it contains a sentiment which reason alone could not discover and substantiate.

(3.) Such a mode of interpretation is altogether unnecessary; for the Bible is abundantly sufficient for our instruction in religion and morality, if its precepts are construed as applying directly or by consequence to the moral necessities of every man. And although there are passages of difficult explanation in the Bible, as might naturally be expected from the antiquity and peculiar languages of the Scriptures, yet in most instances these passages do not relate to doctrines; and when they do, the doctrines in question are generally taught in other and plainer passages.

(4.) As, on this plan, the mere possibility of attaching a moral import to a text is regarded as sufficient for considering it as a true signification; almost every passage must be susceptible of a multitude of interpretations, as was the case during the reign of the mystical and allegorical mode of interpretation, which has long since been exploded. This must produce confusion in religious instruction, want of confidence in the Bible, and, indeed, a suspicion as to its divine authority; for this must be the natural effect of the moral of interpretation on the majority of minds.

² Many additional instances might be offered, if the limits of this work would permit. The reader, who is desirous of fully investigating the historical sense of Scripture, will derive much solid benefit from Dr. Storr's Disquisition de Sensu Historico, in vol. i. The two writers last cited have illustrated the sense of Scripture, by applying it to the discussion of some important controversial points between Protestants and Romanists, which the limits of a practical work will not admit of being noticed.

(5.) Lastly, if such a mode of interpreting the doctrines of Christianity should prevail, it is not seen how insincerity and deceit, on the part of interpreters, are to be detected and exposed.¹

4. Equally untenable is the hypothesis of some modern critics, that the interpretation of certain passages of the Old Testament relative to the Messiah, given by Jesus Christ and his apostles, are a doctrinal ACCOMMODATION TO THE OPINIONS AND PREJUDICES OF THE JEWS.²

Since the time of Semler, about the middle of the eighteenth century, an opinion has prevailed widely in the Protestant churches of Germany, that the Old Testament contains very few passages, or none at all, which treat literally and properly of Jesus Christ; and that all or most of the passages cited in the New Testament are used in the way of accommodation. In support of this theory, its advocates have offered the following reasons:—The Jews, at the time of Christ, were very much given to the allegorical interpretation of Scripture. Even after the time of the Babylonish captivity, when the expectation of a Messiah had become universal among them, they had eagerly searched the Old Testament for every thing, which in the least favoured this expectation; and, by the help of their allegorical interpretation, they had succeeded in making their Scriptures seem to contain predictions respecting a Messiah. Jesus and the apostles (these theorists affirm) were, therefore, compelled to pursue the same method, and to use it as a means of gradually bringing the Jews to a better knowledge of religion.

But in this statement we must carefully distinguish between what is true, and what is erroneous and exaggerated; for,

1. The allegorical interpretation of the sacred Scriptures cannot be historically proved to have prevailed among the Jews from the time of the captivity, or to have been common with the Jews of Palestine at the time of Christ and his apostles.

Although the Sanhedrin and the hearers of Jesus often appealed to the Old Testament, yet they give no indication of the allegorical interpretation; even Josephus has nothing of it. The Platonic Jews of Egypt began in the first century, in imitation of the heathen Greeks, to interpret the Old Testament allegorically. Philo of Alexandria was distinguished among those Jews who practised this method; and he defends it as something new and before unheard of, and for that reason opposed by the other Jews.³ Jesus was not, therefore, in a situation in which he was compelled to comply with a prevailing custom of allegorical interpretation; for this method did not prevail at that time among the Jews, certainly not in Palestine, where Jesus taught. Moreover, the representations contained in the works of Philo and Josephus differ, in a variety of respects, from the doctrines of the New Testament. If, however, some of the instructions of Jesus Christ and his apostles did coincide with the popular opinion of the Jews, it will by no means follow that they must therefore have been erroneous. So far as these Jewish opinions were correct, they were worthy of the approbation of Jesus; and the providence of God may, by previous intimations of them, have paved the way for the reception of the peculiar doctrines of Christianity.

When they do use the allegorical method, they either say expressly, "These things may be allegorized" (Gal. iv. 24); or they show it by the context, or by prefixing some particle of comparison; for instance, ομοιωσις or αναλογια, (as) in John iii. 14. and Matt. xii. 40. But they express themselves very differently in texts, which they quote as literal prophecy for the purpose of proof.

(3.) If the apostles did not allude to the Old Testament in the instructions which they gave to the Gentiles, it does not follow either that they believed the Old Testament to be of no use to them, or that they did not seriously consider the passages which they cited as predictions, in their instruction to the Jews, to be really such. The reason why the apostles omitted these allusions at the commencement of the instructions which they gave to the heathen, is the same as leads the wise missionary at the present day to omit them in the same circumstances. Their Gentile hearers and readers knew nothing of the Bible, and could not, of course, be convinced from an unknown book. The apostles, however, gradually instructed their Gentile converts in the contents of this book, and then appealed to it as frequently before them as before Jews or converts from Judaism. This is proved by the Epistles and the Acts of the Apostles. Thus Peter says to the heathen centurion, Cornelius, after the latter had become acquainted with the prophets,—To him [Jesus] give all the prophets witness, &c. (Acts x. 43. compared with Acts viii 26—35. and the Epistles of Saint Paul.)

(4.) It cannot be shown in general that Jesus Christ and his apostles, in compliance with the current prejudices of their contemporaries, ever taught any thing, or seemingly affirmed any thing to be true, which they themselves consider as false. (Their moral character renders such a supposition inadmissible.) Neither can it be shown, in particular, that they adopted and authorized any explanations of the Old Testament, which they themselves considered as invalid, merely because they were common among their contemporaries.

Such compliance is entirely contrary to their usual course of action (see Matt. v. 19. 23.); nor can it be at all justified on pure moral principles. When therefore Christ says distinctly in Matt. xxii. 43. that David by divine revelation called the Messiah Lord (Psal. cx. 1.), he must have believed exactly as he said; and consequently must have admitted a divine prediction respecting the Messiah in this Psalm.

Hence it follows that whenever Jesus and his apostles expressly assent to the Jewish explanations of the Old Testament, or build proofs upon them, they themselves must have considered these explanations as just.

(5.) The hypothesis of the theory of accommodation, that Jesus and his apostles propagated falsehoods under the garb of truth, is overturned by the fact, that miracles attested their high authority as teachers.

(6.) No such criteria can be given, which shall enable us to distinguish between such of their declarations as they believed themselves, and those in which they accommodated themselves to the erroneous notions of the Jews. The Scriptures nowhere make a distinction between what is universally true, and what is only local or temporary. The theory of accommodation involves the whole of revelation in uncertainty.

SECTION II.

GENERAL RULES FOR INVESTIGATING THE MEANING OF WORDS.

SINCE words compose sentences, and from these, rightly understood, the meaning of an author is to be collected, it is necessary that we ascertain the individual meaning of words before we proceed further to investigate the sense of Scripture. In the prosecution of this important work, we may observe, generally, that as the same method and the same principles of interpretation are common both to the sacred volume and to the productions of uninspired man, consequently the signification of words in the Holy Scriptures must be sought precisely in the same way, in which the meaning of words in other works usually is or ought to be sought. Hence also it follows, that the method of investigating the signification of words in the Bible is no more arbitrary than it is in other books, but is in like manner regulated by certain laws, drawn from the nature of languages. And since no text of Scripture has more than one meaning, we must endeavour to find out that one true sense precisely in the same manner as we would investigate the sense of Homer or any other ancient writer; and in that sense, when so ascertained, we ought to acquiesce, unless by applying the just rules of interpretation, it can be shown that the meaning of the passage had been mistaken, and that another is the only just, true, and critical sense of the place. This principle, duly considered, would alone be sufficient for investigating the sense of Scripture; but as there are not wanting persons who reject it altogether, and as it may, perhaps, appear too generally expressed, we shall proceed to consider it more minutely in the following observations.⁴

² Knapp's Lectures on Christian Theology, vol. ii. pp. 157—159. (New York, 1833.) Schumucker's Biblical Theology, vol. i. pp. 229, 230. Dr. Tittman has examined and refuted at considerable length the theory of accommodation; and has most convincingly shown, that it is a mode of interpretation altogether unexampled, deceptive, and fallacious, manifestly uncertain, and leading to consequences the most pernicious. See the Preface to his Meltemata Sacra, sive Commentarius in Evangelium Johannis, pp. xiv.—xxi.

1. Ascertain the usus loquendi, or notion affixed to a word by the persons in general, by whom the language either is now or formerly was spoken, and especially in the particular connection in which such notion is affixed.

The meaning of a word used by any writer is the meaning affixed to it by those for whom he immediately wrote. For there is a kind of natural compact between those who write and those who speak a language; by which they are mutually bound to use words in a certain sense; he, therefore, who uses such words in a different signification, in a manner violates that compact, and is in danger of leading men into error, contrary to the design of God, "who will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth" (1 Tim. ii. 4). The aids for investigating the usus loquendi being considered in the ensuing chapter, it will be sufficient to observe in illustration of the present canon, that

(1.) The books of the Old and New Testament are, each, to be frequently and carefully read, and the subjects therein treated are to be compared together, in order that we may ascertain the meaning of what the authors thought and wrote.

They, who wish to attain an accurate knowledge of the philosophical notions of Plato, Aristotle, or any other of the ancient Grecian sages, will not consult the later Platonic writers, or the scholastic authors who depended wholly on the authority of Aristotle, and whose knowledge of his works was frequently very imperfect, but will rather peruse the writings of the philosophers themselves.—In like manner, the books of the Old and New Testament are to be constantly and carefully perused and weighed by him, who is sincerely desirous to obtain a correct knowledge of their important contents. For, while we collate the expressions of each writer, we shall be enabled to harmonize those passages which treat on the same topics; and may reasonably hope to discover their true sense. Some foreign biblical critics, however (who, in their zeal to accommodate the immutable truths of Scripture to the standard of the present age, would divest the Christian dispensation of its most important doctrines), have asserted that, in the interpretation of the Old Testament, all reference to the New Testament is to be excluded. But, unless we consult the latter, there are passages in the Old Testament whose meaning cannot be fully apprehended. To mention only one instance, out of many that might be adduced:—in Gen. i. 26, 27, God is said to have created man after his own image; this passage (which, it should be recollected, describes man in his primal state of spotless innocence, before he became corrupted by the fall), the divines in question affirm, must be interpreted according to the crude and imperfect notions entertained by the ancient heathen nations concerning the Deity.¹ But, if we avail ourselves of the information communicated in the New Testament (as we are fully warranted to do by the example of Christ and his inspired apostles), we shall be enabled to form a correct notion of the divine image intended by the sacred historian; viz. that it consisted in righteousness, true holiness, and knowledge. See Eph. iv. 24. and Col. iii. 10.

(2.) It is also indispensable that we lay aside, in many instances, that more accurate knowledge which we possess of natural things, in order that we may fully enter into the meaning of different parts of the sacred writings.

The ancient Hebrews being altogether ignorant of, or imperfectly acquainted with, many things, the nature of which is now fully explored and well known, it were absurd to apply our more perfect knowledge to the explanation of things which are related according to the limited degrees of knowledge they possessed. Hence it is not necessary that we should attempt to illustrate the Mosaic account of the creation according to the Copernican system of the universe, which the experiments of philosophers have shown to be the true one. As the Scriptures were composed with the express design of making the divine will known to man, the sacred authors might, and did, make use of popular expressions and forms of speech, then in use among the persons or people whom they addressed; the philosophical truth of which they neither affirmed nor denied.

2. The received signification of a word is to be retained, unless weighty and necessary reasons require that it should be abandoned or neglected.

We shall be justified in rejecting the received meaning of a word in the following cases; viz.

(1.) If such meaning clash with any doctrine revealed in the Scriptures. Thus, according to our authorized English version, Eli's feeble reproaches of his profligate sons served only to lull them into security, because the Lord would slay them (1 Sam. ii. 25), the meaning of which rendering is, to make their continuance in sin the effect of Jehovah's determination to destroy them; and thus apparently support the horrid tenet, that God wills his creatures to commit crimes because he is determined to display his justice in their destruction. It is true that the ordinarily received meaning of the Hebrew participle שׁוֹמֵר (shomer), is, because; but in this instance it ought to be rendered therefore or though, which makes their wilful and impenitent disobedience the cause of their destruction, and is in unison with the whole tenor of the sacred writings. The proper rendering, therefore, of this passage is, Notwithstanding, they hearkened not unto the voice of their father. THESAURUS the Lord would slay them.

(2.) If a certain passage require a different explanation from that which it appears to present: as Mal. iv. 5, 6. compared with Luke i. 17. and Matt. xi. 11.

(3.) If the thing itself will not admit of a tropical or figurative meaning being affixed to the word.

3. Where a word has several significations in common use, that must be selected which best suits the passage in question, and which is consistent with an author's known character sentiments, and situation, and the known circumstances under which he wrote.

² Noldius, in his work on Hebrew particles, has shown that שׁוֹמֵר (shomer) has the meaning of therefore in a great number of instances, among which he quotes this very passage. He has also adduced others, where it evidently means though. Purver adopts the latter, and thus translates the clause in question:—Notwithstanding they would not hearken to the voice of their father though the Lord should slay them.

For instance, the word blood, which in various accounts is very significant in the sacred writings, denotes—our natural descent from one common family, in Acts xvii. 26.—death in Heb. xii. 4.; the Suffering and Death of Christ, considered as an atonement for the souls of sinners, in Rom. v. 9. and Eph. i. 7.; and also as the procuring cause of our justification in Rom. v. 9, and of our sanctification in Heb. ix. 14.

4. Although the force of particular words can only be derived from etymology, yet too much confidence must not be placed in that frequently uncertain science; because the primary signification of a word is frequently very different from its common meaning.

5. The distinctions between words, which are apparently synonymous, should be carefully examined and considered.

In the Latin language many words are accounted perfectly synonymous which, however, only partially accord together. Thus, a person whose discourse is cut short, is said to be silent (silens); and one, who has not begun to speak, is said to hold his tongue (tacere). Cicero, in speaking of beauty, observes, that there are two kinds of it; the one dignified and majestic (dignitas); the other soft and graceful (venustas); the latter to be considered proper to women, the former to men.⁴ The same remark will apply to the language of Scripture. For instance, in the 119th Psalm there are not fewer than ten different words, pointing out the word of God; viz. Law, Way, Word, Statutes, Judgments, Commandments, Precepts, Testimonies, Righteousness, and Truth or Faithfulness. Now all these words, though usually considered as synonymous, are not literally synonymous, but refer to some latent and distinguishing properties of the Divine Word, whose manifold excellences and perfections are thus illustrated with much elegant variety of diction. In the New Testament we meet with similar instances, as in Col. ii. 22. ἐντολὰς καὶ διδασκαλίας ἀνθρώπων, the commandments and doctrines of men. Doctrines in this passage include truths propounded to be believed or known; Commands imply laws, which direct what is to be done or avoided; the latter depend upon and are derived from the former. The apostle is speaking of the traditions taught by the elders, and the load of cumbrous ceremonies commanded by them, in addition to the significant rites prescribed in the law of Moses. In Rom. xiv. 13. προσκόμμα, a stumbling-block, means a slighter cause of offence, viz. that which wounds and disturbs the conscience of another. σκανδαλον, an occasion to fall, means a more weighty cause of offence; that is, such as may cause any one to apostatize from the Christian faith. Similar examples occur in 1 Tim. ii. 1. and 1 Pet. iv. 3.

6. The epithets introduced by the sacred writers are also to be carefully weighed and considered, as all of them have either a declarative or explanatory force, or serve to distinguish one thing from another, or unite these two characters together.

The epithets of Scripture then are,—

(1.) Exegetical or Explanatory, that is, such as declare the nature and properties of a thing.

Thus, in Tit. ii. 11. the grace of God is termed saving, not indeed as if there were any other divine grace bestowed on man, that was not saving; but because the grace of God revealed in the Gospel is the primary and true source of eternal life. Similar epithets occur in 2 Tim. i. 9. in which our calling is styled holy; in 1 Pet. iv. 3. where idolatry is termed abominable, and in 1 Pet. ii. 9. where the Gospel is called the marvellous light of God, because it displays so many amazing scenes of divine wonders.

(2.) Discritical or Distinctive, that is, such as distinguish one thing from another.

For instance, in 1 Pet. v. 4. the crown of future glory is termed a never-fading crown, ἀκαταρτιστος, to distinguish it from that corruptible crown which, in the Grecian games, was awarded to the successful candidate. In like manner, genuine faith, in 1 Tim. i. 5. is called undissolved, ἀντοκρυστος; God, in the same chapter (v. 17.), is designated the King incorruptible, βασιλευς ἀσφάτος; and in Rom. xii. 1. Christians dedicating themselves to God, is termed a reasonable service, λογικὴ λατρεία, in contradistinction to the Jewish worship, which chiefly consisted in the sacrifice of irrational creatures.

(3.) Both Explanatory and Distinctive, as in Rom. ix. 5.

Where Christ is called God blessed for ever. By which epithet both his divine nature is declared, and he is eminently distinguished from the Gentile deities. Similar examples occur in John xvii. 11. (compared with Luke xi. 11–13), where God is termed Holy Father; in 1 John v. 20. where Christ is styled the true God, as also the Great God in Tit. ii. 13. and Heb. ix. 14. where the Holy Spirit is denominated the Eternal Spirit.

7. General terms are used sometimes in their whole extent, and sometimes in a restricted sense, and whether they are to be understood in the one way or in the other must depend upon the scope, subject-matter, context, and parallel passages.

Thus, in 1 Thess. iii. 8. St. Paul, speaking to the Thessalonians, says, Now we live, if (more correctly, when) we stand fast in the Lord. The word live, in this passage, is not to be understood in its whole extent, as implying that the apostle's physical life or existence depended on their standing fast in the Lord, but must be understood in a limited sense. It is as if he had said, "Your steadfastness in the faith gives me new life and comfort. I now feel that I live to some purpose—I relish and enjoy life—since my labour in the Gospel is not in vain." That this is the true meaning of the apostle, is evident both from the subject-matter and from the context; for Saint Paul, filled with deep anxiety lest the Thessalonians should have been induced to depart from the faith by the afflictions which they had to endure, had sent Timothy to raise and comfort them. Having heard of their constancy in the faith, he exclaims, Now we live, if ye stand fast in the Lord.

8. Of any particular passage the most simple sense—or that which most readily suggests itself to an attentive and intelligent reader, possessing competent knowledge,—is in all probability the genuine sense or meaning.

This remark is so obvious as to require no illustrative example. Where indeed two meanings or senses present themselves, without doing any violence to the words or to their scope and connection, and to the subject-matter, &c. in such case the different arguments for and against each meaning must be carefully discussed, and that meaning which is supported by the most numerous and weighty arguments, and is found to be the most probable, must be preferred, as being the genuine sense. Yet, simple and obvious as this canon confessedly is, it is perpetually violated by the modern school of interpreters in Germany, at the head of which stand the names of Professors Semler, Bauer, Paulus, Wegscheider, Eichhorn, and others; against whose tenets the unwary student cannot be sufficiently put upon his guard, on account of the great celebrity which some of these writers have justly acquired for their profound philological attainments. The teachers of this school assert that there is no such thing as a divine revelation in the sense attached to this word by Christians; and that the miracles recorded in the Scriptures are merely natural occurrences, exaggerated and embellished by those who have related them. According to these anti-supernaturalists, the whole of the doctrines of Scripture consist either of the precepts of nature clothed in obscure expressions, or of absolutely false doctrines invented by the sacred writers, who were men subject to error like ourselves, and (what they say is still worse) who were deprived of that mass of knowledge which constitutes the glory of our age. To confirm the preceding observations by a few examples:—

(1.) According to Eichhorn, the account of the creation and fall of man is merely a poetical, philosophical speculation of some ingenious person, on the origin of the world and of evil. So, in regard to the offering up of Isaac by Abraham, he says, "The Godhead could not have required of Abraham so horrible a crime; and there can be no justification, palliation, or excuse for this pretended command of the Deity." He then explains it. "Abraham dreamed that he must offer up Isaac, and, according to the superstition of the times, regarded it as a divine admonition. He prepared to execute the mandate which his dream had conveyed to him. A lucky accident (probably the rustling of a rain who was entangled in the bushes) hindered it; and this, according to ancient idiom, was also the voice of the deity." But "what is there in the character of Abraham which will justify taking such a liberty with it, as to maintain that he was not raised above the superstitions of the merest savages; or, who can show that he understood nothing of the nature of dreams? And then, whence the approbation of God, of Christ, and of the holy apostles, bestowed on a horrible act of mere superstition? For horrible it was, if superstition only dictated it. This is a nodus, to solve which something more than witty conjectures and brilliant declamation is needed."¹

(2.) The same writer represents the history of the Mosaic legislation, at Mount Sinai, in a curious manner. Moses ascended to the top of Sinai, and kindled a fire there (how he found wood on this barren rock, or raised it to the top, Eichhorn does not tell us), a fire consecrated to the worship of God, before which he prayed. Here an unexpected and tremendous thunder-storm occurred. He seized the occasion to proclaim the laws which he had composed in his retirement, as the statutes of Jehovah; leading the people to believe that Jehovah had conversed with him. Not that he was a deceiver; but he really believed, that the occurrence of such a thunder-storm was a sufficient proof of the fact, that Jehovah had spoken to him, or sanctioned the work in which he had been engaged.² The prophecies of the Old Testament are, according to him, patriotic wishes, expressed with all the fire and elegance of poetry, for the future prosperity, and a future deliverer, of the Jewish nation.³

(3.) In like manner, C. F. Annum, who was formerly professor of theology at Erlangen, tells us, in respect to the miracle of Christ's walking on the water, that "to walk on the sea, is not to stand on the waves, as on the solid ground, as Jerome dreams, but to walk through the waves so far as the shoals reached, and then to swim."⁴ So, in regard to the miracle of the loaves and fishes,⁵ he says, that Jesus probably distributed some loaves and fishes which he had, to those who were around him; and thus excited, by his example, others among the multitude, who had provisions, to distribute them in like manner.⁶

(4.) Thies, in his commentary on the Acts, explains the miraculous effusion of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost,⁷ in the following manner:—"It is not uncommon," says he, "in those countries, for a violent gust of wind to strike on a particular spot or house. Such a gust is commonly accompanied by the electric fluid; and the sparks of this are scattered all around. These float about the chamber, become apparent, and light upon the disciples. They kindle into enthusiasm at this; and believe the promise of their Master is now to be performed. This enthusiasm spectators assemble to witness; and instead of preaching as before in Hebrew, each one uses his own native tongue to proclaim his feelings."

(5.) The same Thies⁸ represents the miraculous cure by Peter, of the man who was lame from his birth, in a very singular way. "This man," says he, "was lame only according to report. He never walked at all; so the people believed that he could not walk.—Peter and John, being more sagacious, however, threatened him. 'In the name of the Messiah,' said they, 'Stand up.' The word Messiah had a magical power. He stood up. Now they saw that he could walk. To prevent the compassion of men from being turned into rage (at his death), he chose the most sagacious party, and connected himself with the apostles."

(6.) The case of Ananias falling down dead is thus represented by the same writer:—"Ananias fell down terrified; but probably he was carried out and buried while still alive." Heinrichs, however, who produces this comment of Thies, relates another mode of explaining the occurrence in question; viz. that Peter stabbed Ananias; "which does not at all dis agree with the vehement and easily-exasperated temper of Peter." It is, however, but just to Heinrichs to state that he has expressed his decided disapprobation of this pretended interpretation.⁹

(7.) Professor de Witte, in his treatise De Morte Christi Expiatoria (on the atonement of Christ), represents Christ as disappointed, that the Jews would not hearken to him as a moral teacher simply; which was the first character he assumed. Christ then assumed the character of a prophet, and asserted his divine mission, in order that the Jews might be induced to listen to him. Finding that they would not do this, and that they were determined to destroy him, in order not to lose the whole object of his mission, and to convert necessarily into an occasion of giving himself credit, he gave out, that his death itself would be expiatory.¹⁰

9. Since it is the design of interpretation to render in our own language the same discourse which the sacred authors originally wrote in Hebrew or Greek, it is evident that our interpretation or version, to be correct, ought not to affirm or deny more than the inspired penmen affirmed or denied at the time they wrote; consequently we should be more willing to take a sense from Scripture than to bring one to it.

This is one of the most ancient laws of interpretation extant, and cannot be sufficiently kept in mind, lest we should teach for doctrines the commandments of men, and impose our narrow and limited conceptions instead of the broad and general declarations of Scripture. For want of attending to this simple rule, how many forced and unnatural interpretations have been put upon the sacred writings!—interpretations alike contradictory to the express meaning of other passages of Scripture, as well as derogatory from every idea we are taught to conceive of the justice and mercy of the Most High. It will suffice to illustrate this remark by one single instance:—In John iii. 16, 17, we read that "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him shall not perish, but have everlasting life: for God sent not his Son to condemn the world, but that the world through him might be saved." The plain, obvious, and literal sense of this passage, as well as of its whole context, is, that the whole of mankind, including both Jews and Gentiles, without any exception in favour of individuals, were in a ruined state, about to perish everlastingly and utterly without the power of rescuing themselves from destruction; that God provided for their rescue and salvation by giving his Son to die for them; and that all who believe in him, that is, who believe what God has spoken concerning Christ, his sacrifice, the end for which it was offered, and the way in which it is to be applied in order to become effectual; that all who believe shall not only be exempted from eternal perdition, but shall also ultimately have everlasting life, in other words, be brought to eternal glory. Yet how are these "good tidings of great joy to all people" narrowed and restricted by certain expositors, who adopt the hypothesis that Jesus Christ was given for the elect alone! How, indeed, could God be said to love those, to whom he denies the means of salvation, and whom he destines by an irrevocable decree to eternal misery? And what violence are such expositors compelled to do to the passage in question in order to reconcile it to their preconceived notions! They are obliged to interpret that comprehensive word, the world, by a synecdoche of a part for the whole; and thus say, that it means the nobler portion of the world, namely, the elect, without calling to their aid those other parallel passages of Scripture, in which the above consolatory truth is explicitly affirmed in other words. A similar instance occurs in Matt. xviii. 11, where Jesus Christ is said to have "come to save that which was lost," το σπυλιον; which word, as its meaning is not restricted by the Holy Spirit, is not to be interpreted in a restricted sense, and consequently must be taken in its most obvious and universal sense. In this way we are to understand Dent. xxvii. 26; and Isa. lxiv. 6.

10. Before we conclude upon the sense of a text, so as to prove any thing by it, we must be sure that such sense is not repugnant to natural reason.

If such sense be repugnant to natural reason, it cannot be the true meaning of the Scriptures; for God is the original of natural truth, as well as of that which comes by particular revelation. No proposition, therefore, which is repugnant to the fundamental principles of reason, can be the sense of any part of the word of God; and that which is false and contrary to reason, can no more be true and agreeable to the revelations contained in the sacred writings, than God (who is the author of one as well as the other) can contradict himself. Whence it is evident that the words of Jesus Christ, This is my body, and This is my blood—(Matt. xxvi. 26, 28.) are not to be understood in that sense, which makes for the doctrine of transubstantiation; because it is impossible that contradictions should be true; and we cannot be more certain that any thing is true, than we are that that doctrine is false.

I. NATURE OF EMPHASIS:—its different kinds.

In the use of language, cases arise where the ordinary signification of a word receives a certain augment (actuarium)

² For the preceding examples, the absurdity and extravagance of which are too obvious to require any comment, the author is indebted to the researches of Professor Stuart in his letters to the Rev. W. E. Channing, (pp. 143, 145, 147.) Andover (North America), 1819. 12mo. On the topic above discussed, the reader will find some painfully interesting details in Mr. Jacob's Agricultural and Political Tour in Germany (London, 1820, 4to.), pp. 208–212; in the Maassin Evangelique (Genève, 1820, 8vo.), tome ii. pp. 26–32; in Dr. J. P. Smith's Scripture Testimony to the Messiah, vol. ii. part ii. pp. 634, 635; and Mr. Rose's State of Protestantism in Germany. or idea, which such word has not of itself. This augment is of two kinds: "the one affects the dignity of the word itself; the other, the extent and weight of its signification. In the former case the word receives a sort of honour or dishonour from popular usage." Of this kind of augment it would be irrelevant to treat in this place. The second class of words comprises those which receive an accession or augmentation in the extent or force of meaning. These constitute what may with propriety be called EMPHATIC WORDS. Emphasis, therefore, may be thus defined:—In accession or augment to the ordinary signification of a word, either as to the extent or force of its meaning.

Thus, when the Jews speak of Moses, they simply term him the Prophet. In like manner, the ancient Greeks called Demosthenes the Orator; Plato, the Philosopher; Homer, the Poet, by way of eminence. These respective appellations are emphatic. The title of the Prophet, given by the Jews to Moses, signifies that he was the first of the Jewish prophets, and of such distinguished dignity, that there arose no subsequent prophet in Israel like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face, and conversed mouth to mouth. (Deut. xxxiv. 10. Num. xii. 8.)¹

Emphases are either verbal, that is, such as occur in words both separately and together, or real, that is, such as appear in the magnitude and sublimity of the thing described by words. The propriety of this division has been contested by Huet, Ernesti,² and some others, who affirm that emphases subsist in words only, and not in things, and that in things grandeur and sublimity alone are to be found. On this classification, however, there is a difference of opinion; and Longinus himself, who has placed emphases among the sources of the sublime, seems to have admitted that they exist also in things. In the first instance, unquestionably, they are to be sought in words, sometimes in particles, and also in the Greek article; and when their force is fully apprehended, they enable us to enter into the peculiar elegances and beauties of the sacred style. A few examples illustrative of this remark must suffice.

H. VERBAL EMPHASES.

1. Emphases of the Greek article.

In Matt. xxvi. 28. our Saviour having instituted the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, after giving the cup to his disciples, adds,—“For this is my blood of the New Testament which is shed for many for the remission of sins.” Almost every syllable of the original Greek, especially the articles, is singularly emphatic. It runs thus—Τοῦτο γὰρ ἐστὶ τὸ αἷμα μου, τὸ ὑπὲρ πολλῶν ἀποχυννόμενον εἰς ἁγίαν ἁγάρτην. The following literal translation and paraphrase do not exceed its meaning:—“For this [represents] τὸ αἷμα of mine, which was pointed out by all the sacrifices under the Jewish law, and particularly by the shedding and sprinkling of the blood of the paschal lamb; THAT BLOOD of the sacrifice slain for the ratification of the new covenant; THE blood ready to be poured out for the multitudes, the whole Gentile world as well as the Jews, for the taking away of sins; sin, whether original or actual, in all its power and guilt, in all its energy and pollution.” In Matt. xvi. 16, the following sentence occurs:—Σὺ εἶ; ὁ Χριστὸς; ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ζῶντος Θεοῦ; “Thou art THE Christ, THE Son of the living God.” In this passage, also, every word is highly emphatic, agreeably to a rule of the Greek language, which is observed both by the sacred writers, as well as by the most elegant profane authors, viz. that when the article is placed before a noun, it denotes a certain and definite object; but when it is omitted, it in general indicates any person or thing indefinitely. The apostle did not say, “Thou art Christ, Son of God,” without the article; but, “Thou art THE Christ, THE Messiah, THE Son,” that very Son, thus positively asserting his belief of that fundamental article of the Christian religion, the divinity and office of the Redeemer of the world.—“Of the living God, or of God THE living one.” Similar instances occur in John i. 21. Ὁ πρῶτος γεννητὸς υἱός; “art thou THAT Prophet” whom the Jewish nation have so long and so anxiously expected, and who had been promised by Moses (Deut. xviii. 15. 18.)³ and also in John x. 11. Ἐγώ εἰμι; ὁ ποιμὴν ὁ καλός; I am THAT good Shepherd, or the shepherd, THAT good one, of whom Isaiah (xl. 11.) and Ezekiel (xxxiv. 23.) respectively prophesied.

has met with able refutations; and Kuinöel, whose commentary on the historical books of the New Testament (noticed in another part of this work) was composed principally for Germans, has given abstracts of these refutations. For a refutation of the neologin hypothesis that the first three chapters of the book of Genesis are a philosophical mythos or fable, see Vol. II. p. 205.

¹ Ernesti, Inst. Interp. Nov. Test. pp. 40, 41. Mr. Terrot's translation of Ernesti, vol. i. p. 52. Mori Hermeneut. Nov. Test. Acroases, tom. i. pp. 323, 324. Suard's Elements of Interpretation, p. 27.
² Ernesti (Inst. Interp. Nov. Test. p. 41.) and after him Bauer (Herm. Sacra, p. 232.) and Morus (Hermeneut. Nov. Test. Acroases, tom. i. pp. 323–325) have distinguished emphasis into temporary and permanent. The former is that which is given to a word at a certain time and place, and arises from the feelings of the party speaking, or from the importance of the subject requiring that the word used should be understood with some addition to its usual force. The latter or permanent emphases are those, in which a word receives from custom a greater signification than it has of itself, and which it retains in particular modes of speaking. The knowledge of both these is to be derived from a consideration of the context and subject-matter. But the examples adduced in defence of this definition concur to make it a distinction without a difference, when compared with the ordinary classification of emphases into verbal and real, which we have accordingly retained.

³ Dr. A. Clarke's Discourse on the Eucharist, pp. 61, 62.

Another very important rule in the construction of the Greek article is the following, which was first completely illustrated by the late eminently learned Granville Sharp; though it appears not to have been unknown to former critics and commentators.⁴

“When two or more personal nouns of the same gender, number, and case, are connected by the copulative καὶ (and), if the first has the definitive article, and the second, third, &c. have not, they both relate to the same person.”

This rule Mr. S. has illustrated by the eight following examples:—

| Common Version.
And denying the only Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ. | Corrected Version.
And denying our only Master, God and Lord Jesus Christ. |

The above rule and examples are further confirmed by the researches of Bishop Middleton; and altogether furnish a most striking body of evidence in behalf of the divinity of our Saviour. The fundamental and most important doctrine of the Christian faith does not indeed depend upon the niceties of grammatical construction; but when these are eagerly seized by those who deny the divinity of the Son of God, in order to support their interpretation, we are amply justified in combating them with the same weapons. On this account the reader will be gratified by the addition of a few examples, both from classic authors, as well as from two or three of the fathers of the Christian church, in which Mr. Sharp's rule is completely exemplified. They are selected from Mr. Boyd's supplementary researches on the Greek article, annexed to Dr. A. Clarke's Commentary on Eph. vi. and on the Epistle to Titus.

2. Emphasis of other Words.

John i. 14. The word was made flesh and dwelt among us, ἐσκήνωσεν ἐν ἡμῖν, literally tabernacled among us. The verb σκηνῶν (from σκηνή) signifies to erect a booth, tabernacle, or temporary residence, and not a permanent habitation or dwelling place: it was therefore fitly applied to the human nature of Christ; which, like the ancient Jewish tabernacle, was to be only for a temporary residence of the Eternal Divinity.

Matt. ix. 36. When Jesus saw the multitudes, he had compassion on them,—ἐσπλαγχνισθῆναι (from σπλάγχνον, a bowel); the ancients generally, and the Jews in particular, accounting the bowels to be the seat of sympathy and the tender passions, applied the organ to the sense.¹ The proper meaning, therefore, of this phrase is, that our Lord was moved with the deepest sympathy and commiseration for the neglected Jews.

Heb. iv. 13. All things are naked and opened, τετραχρῆσθαι, to the eyes of him with whom we have to account. The emphasis is here derived from the manner in which sacrifices were anciently performed.

3. Emphatic Adverbs.

[i.] Sometimes ADVERBS OF TIME are emphatic; and a careful notation of the time indicated by them will materially illustrate the force and meaning of the sacred writings.

Thus, in Mal. iii. 16, we read, THEN they that feared the Lord, spake often one to another, &c. The word THEN is here peculiarly emphatic, and refers to the time when the last of the prophets wrote, and when many bold infidels and impious persons were found among the Jews, who spake "stout words" against God, and vindicated them. They considered all the time spent by them in his service as lost; they attended his "ordinances" with many expressions of self-denial and humiliation, but they derived no benefit from them; and they concluded that those haughty rebels who cast off all religion, and tempted God by their presumptuous wickedness, were the most prosperous and happy persons. (v. 13—15.) THEN, viz. at this season of open wickedness, there was a remnant of pious Jews, who "spake often one to another," met together from time to time that they might confer on religious subjects, animate each other to their duty, and consult how to check the progress of impiety. Of these persons, and their pious designs and discourses, we are told that Jehovah took especial notice; and that "a book of remembrance was written before him for them that feared the Lord, and that thought upon his name."

[ii.] A knowledge of historical circumstances, however, is requisite, lest we ascribe the emphasis to a wrong source; as in Acts ix. 31.

THEN had the churches rest (ἐρήνην, literally, peace or prosperity). The cause of this peace has by some commentators been ascribed to the conversion of Saul, who had previously "made havoc of the church;" but this is not likely, as he could not be a cause of universal persecution and distress, whatever activity and violence he might have shown during the time of his enmity to the Christian church. Besides, his own persecution (as the context shows) proves that the opposition to the Gospel continued with considerable violence three years after his conversion. If we advert to the political circumstances of the Jewish nation at that time, we shall find the true cause of this rest. The emperor Caligula had ordered his statue to be erected in the temple at Jerusalem; and, in pursuance of his mandate, Petronius, the president of Syria, was on his march with an army for that purpose. Filled with consternation, the Jews met him in vast multitudes in the vicinity of Ptolemais or Acre, and ultimately prevailed on him to abandon his design. It was this persecution of the Jews by the Romans that the sacred writer had in view, which diverted the Jews from persecuting the Christians; and "THEY had the churches rest throughout all Judea and Galilee and Samaria," the terror occasioned by the imperial decree having spread itself throughout those regions.²

III. REAL EMPHASES.

The knowledge of these can only be derived from an acquaintance with the manners, customs, &c. of ancient nations, which are noticed by writers on biblical antiquities and by commentators, so far as they are necessary to illustrate the sacred writings. Two or three instances of these also will suffice to explain their nature.

1. Rom. ix. 17. In this verse we have a very beautiful illustration taken from the ingrafting of trees; an art with which we find St. Paul was well acquainted. The point to be explained was, the union of the Gentiles with the Jews under the Gospel dispensation. The Jews were the olive tree; the grafts were both Gentiles and Jews; and the act of ingrafting was, the initiation of both into the Christian religion. The Jews are informed that olive branches may with greater ease be ingrafted into their own original stock, which is more natural and congenial to them. The Gentiles are again reminded, that, if the natural branches were not spared because of their unfruitfulness, much less would they be spared who were aliens to the Jewish stock, if they should prove unfruitful.

2. The prize, βραβεῖον, mentioned in 1 Cor. ix. 24, is the crown awarded to the victor in the olympic games; whence κατὰ βραβεῖον; rendered beguile you of your reward (Col. ii. 18), means to deprive any one of a reward or prize, either by partial judgment or in any way impeding him in his Christian course. In 1 Cor. ix. 24, the apostle illustrates the necessity of being in earnest in the Christian race, by a beautiful allusion to the games of the heathen. As the racers and wrestlers in those games fitted themselves for their different exercises, and each strove zealously for the victory, so should the Christian prepare himself for his religious course, and strive for the victory in his great contest with the world.

3. 1 Cor. iv. 13. We are made the fifth of the earth, περιχρησται, literally, a purgation or lustrative sacrifice: the allusion is to a custom common among heathen nations in times of public calamity, who selected some unhappy men of the most abject and despicable character. These, after being maintained a whole year at the public expense, were then led out crowned with flowers, as was usual in sacrifices, and were devoted to appease or avert the anger of their deities, being either precipitated into the sea, or burnt alive, after which their ashes were thrown into the sea.

4. Eph. v. 27. That it (the church of Christ) should be holy and without blemish, ἀκμῶς, i. e. so pure and spotless, so free from all censure, that even Momois himself (the fictitious deity of mirth and ridicule) could find nothing to carp at or ridicule.

IV. GENERAL RULES FOR THE INVESTIGATION OF EMPHASES.

A consideration of the affections by which the sacred authors were animated, when they committed their inspired communications to writing, as well as the scope and context of the passage under consideration, together with the nature of its subject, will always enable us to ascertain the true emphasis of words: but, as ingenious and fanciful minds are apt to discover them where they do not actually exist, it may not be irrelevant to offer a few leading hints respecting the particular investigation of emphases, selected from the great mass of observations, which have been collected by eminent biblical critics.

1. No emphases are to be sought in refined explanations of passages, or from etymology, both of them uncertain guides at the best; and which are too often carried to extremes by men of lively imaginations. Neither will prepositions always enlarge or give additional force to the meaning of a word, particularly in the Greek language.

We may instance in 1 Cor. xiii. 6, where we read that true charity rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth (συγχαίρει) in the truth. Some commentators have conceived that this word is emphatic, and have rendered the passage rejoiceth jointly (with true beliefs) in the truth. But in this instance, as Schleusner has remarked from Hesychius, the Greek compound verb means no more than the simple verb χαίρει implies, viz. to be delighted or to rejoice in a thing. Our authorized version therefore fully expresses the apostle's meaning. But in Heb. xii. 2 the preposition is highly emphatic, and demands particular attention, in order to apprehend the full force and beauty of the passage, which is wholly agonistical, i. e. allusive to the ancient footrace. Having in the first verse exhorted Christians to divest themselves of every incumbrance, and to run with patience their Christian course, St. Paul adds (v. 2), Looking unto Jesus the author and finisher of our faith. The original word here rendered looking (σκοπεῖν), literally means to look off FROM every other object to some particular object placed full in view; as the reward destined to the victor in the olympic footrace was placed immediately in view of the candidates. It is impossible to express the full import of this passage without the aid of a paraphrase. The whole clause may be thus rendered—*Wherefore, seeing we are also compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, who (like the spectators at the ancient olympic race) surround us on every side in a vast innumerable assembly, the spectators of our trial, let us lay aside every incumbering weight, and especially the sin, which in present circumstances has the greatest advantage (against us), or the well circumstanced sin, that which has every thing in its favour, time, place, and opportunity, more particularly, a disposition to relinquish or dissemble our profession of the Gospel for fear of sufferings; and let us run with patience and perseverance the race which is set before us, resolutely persisting in it, however long and painful it may be: Looking off from every object that would interrupt us in our career, and fixing our eyes upon (or to) Jesus, the author (or leader) and finisher of our faith; who called us out to this strenuous yet glorious enterprise; who animates us by his example, and supports us by his grace, until the season arrive, when he will bestow upon us the promised crown.*⁴

2. Further: Emphases are not to be sought in versions: which, however excellent they may in general be, are yet liable to error; consequently the derivation of emphases from them may lead us not merely to extravagant, but even to false expositions of Scripture.

One instance will suffice to illustrate this remark. In Col. ii. 6, according to the authorized English version, we read thus, As ye have therefore received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk ye in him. From this rendering of the Greek text many persons have laid much stress on the words as and so (which last is not to be found in the original), and have deduced a variety of inferences from them, viz. as ye received Jesus Christ in a spirit of faith, so walk ye in him; as ye received him in a spirit of humility, so walk ye in him, &c. Now all these inferences, though proper enough in themselves, are derived from false emphases, and are contrary to the apostle's meaning, who intended to say no such thing. His meaning, as Dr. Macknight has well

¹ This word occurs in Josephus precisely in the very same meaning as it is used by the apostle. The Jewish historian, relating the aggressions of the Jews which led to the war with the Romans, says, among other things, that those who officiated in the temple-service rejected the sacrifice for Caesar and the Roman people. "And when many of the high priests and principal men besought them not to omit the sacrifice, which was customary for them to offer for their princes, they would not be prevailed upon." These relied much upon their number, for the most flourishing part of the innovators assisted them." ΑΛΦΟΡΝΤΕΣ ἵς τῷ ΕΛΕΑΣΑΡ, "having the chief regard to Eleazar, the governor of the temple," looking to him exclusively, by whom they had been instigated to those offensive measures. De Bell. Jud. lib. li. c. xvii. § 2.

² See Braunius, Krebsius, Kybe, Ernesti, and also Drs. Doddridge, Macknight, and A. Clarke on Heb. xii. 1, 2 by whom every emphatic word in these two verses is particularly illustrated.

¹ Kuinöel in loc. who has given illustrations from classical writers, and also from the Apocrypha.

² Dr. Lardner has collected and given at length various passages from Josephus (De Bell. Jud. lib. ii. c. 10. and Ant. Jud. lib. xviii. c. 9.) and Philo (De Legat. ad Calum. 1024.), which confirm the above statement. See his Credibility book i. ch. ii. § 12.

translated the passage, is simply this,—"Since ye have received Christ Jesus the Lord, walk ye in him;" in other words, as the context plainly shows, "since ye have embraced the doctrine of Christ, continue to hold it fast, and permit not yourselves to be turned aside by sophistical or Judaizing teachers."¹

3. No emphases are to be sought merely in the plural number of words.

We must be cautious, also, that we do not deduce emphasis merely from the use of the plural number; supposing that, where the plural is put instead of the singular, it necessarily denotes emphases. Thus οὐρανοί; and οὐρανοί simply mean heaven; yet Origen, following the trifling distinctions of some Jewish writers, has attempted to distinguish between them, and has announced the existence of several heavens each above the other.

4. No emphases are to be sought in words where the abstract is put for the concrete.

In the Old Testament the abstract is very frequently put for the concrete; that is, substantives are necessarily put in the place of adjectives, on account of the simplicity of the Hebrew language, which has few or no adjectives. A similar mode of expression obtains in the New Testament. Thus, in Eph. v. 8. we read, Ye were sometimes DARKNESS, σκοτεινὸν; in the parallel place, in iv. 18. the metonymy is thus expressed 'being DARKENED,' σκοτισμένοι, in the understanding; or, as it is rendered in our authorized version, having the understanding darkened. Numerous examples, in which the abstract is put for the concrete, will be found, infra, Book II. Chap. II. Sect. II. § 4.

5. *As every language abounds with idioms,² or expressions peculiar to itself, which cannot be rendered verbatim into another language without violating its native purity, we should be careful not to look for emphases in such expressions.*³

"In the sacred books, and especially in the Hebrews of the New Testament, we must take care not to seek for and recognise emphasis, merely in the idiom, which is so very dissimilar to ours. Many persons, though acquainted with Hebrew, have often made this mistake; but nothing is more fallacious. In the oriental languages many things appear hyperbolic (if you translate them literally, that is, merely by the aid of common lexicons and etymology) which are not in reality hyperbolic."⁴

CHAPTER II.

ON THE SUBSIDIARY MEANS FOR ASCERTAINING THE SENSE OF SCRIPTURE.

Words being the arbitrary signs of things, the meaning of them depends upon the usus loquendi, or the custom of expressing certain things by certain words. It is surprising that any attempts should have been made to find the sense of words in a dead language, by means different in their nature from those which we employ in order to find the sense of words in a living language. The meaning of a word must always be a simple matter of fact; and, of course, it is always to be established by appropriate and adequate testimony. The original languages of Scripture being to us dead languages, the usus loquendi in them is to be ascertained by the testimony of those who lived at the time when these languages were flourishing and in common use, and who well understood them. This testimony is either direct or indirect.

DIRECT TESTIMONY is to be obtained, in the first place, from those writers to whom the language, which is to be investigated by us, was vernacular, either from the same authors whom we interpret, or from their contemporaries; next from ancient versions made by persons to whom the language was not vernacular, but who lived while it was a spoken language, and by individuals who were acquainted with it; thirdly from Scholiasts and Glossographers; fourthly, from those who, though foreigners, had learned the language in question.

Where direct testimony fails, recourse must be had to INDIRECT TESTIMONY; under which head we may include the Context, Subject-matter, Scope, Analogy of Languages, Analogy of Doctrine, Jewish Authors, the Greek Fathers, Historical Circumstances, and Commentators.⁵ Some of these various aids are peculiar to the Old Testament, and others to the New Testament: to avoid unnecessary repetition, it is proposed to discuss them in the order pursued in the following Sections.

SECTION I.

DIRECT TESTIMONIES FOR ASCERTAINING THE USUS LOQUENDI.

§ 1. THE TESTIMONY OF CONTEMPORARY WRITERS.

THE most important aid is afforded by those writers to whom the language to be investigated was vernacular; and where it is undubitable its evidence is abundantly sufficient. This testimony may be drawn from three sources, viz. I. From the definitions of words; II. From examples, and the nature of the subject; and, III. From parallel passages.

1. With regard to DEFINITIONS, nothing more is necessary than to take good care that the definition be well understood; and to consider how much weight the character of the writer who defines may properly give to it.⁶

Professor Morus has collected various examples of definitions from profane writers, both Greek and Latin, which it is not necessary to adduce in this place: but the following definitions of certain words occurring in the New Testament are of importance for the right understanding of the sacred writings.

1. In Heb. v. 14. St. Paul says that he writes τοις τέλει, to the perfect; and he there, with almost logical precision, defines the perfect to be those who by reason of use have their senses exercised to discern both good and evil; that is, those who by long custom and conversation in the sacred writings have so exercised and improved their faculties, that they can discern between good and bad, true and false doctrines. In the whole of that passage, therefore, we are to understand who are the perfect, agreeably to St. Paul's definition.

2. If we are at a loss to understand, in the style of the same apostle, what he means by the body of Christ; we may learn it from Eph. i. 23., where it is defined by the church: thus, . . . the church, which is his body, the fulness of him that filleth all in all.

3. Heb. xi. 1. contains a definition of faith; which is there said to be the substance of things hoped for and the evidence of things not seen.

II. EXAMPLES AND THE NATURE OF THE SUBJECT also show us the usus loquendi and force of words; but in order to judge correctly, and to make proper distinctions, a good understanding and considerable practice are highly necessary.

1. By Examples is meant, that the writer who uses a particular word, though he does not directly define it, yet gives in some one or more passages an example of what it means by exhibiting its qualities or showing the operation of it. Thus,

(1.) In order to explain the word δικαιοσύνη, righteousness, which is of very frequent occurrence in the New Testament, we must examine what examples of righteousness are added in each passage.

(2.) In Gal. iv. 3. St. Paul uses the term στοιχία του κόσμου, elements of the world, at first without an explanation: but afterwards we have an example of the meaning of it in Gal. iv. 9., where the expression is used of the religion and philosophy of the Jews and Gentiles which preceded the Christian dispensation, and includes the idea of incompleteness and imperfection.

2. The Nature of the subject, in innumerable instances, helps to define which meaning of a word the writer attaches to it, in any particular passage.

For instance, χαρίς, in our version usually rendered grace, denotes pardon of sin, divine benevolence, divine aid, temporal blessings, &c. Which of these senses it bears in any particular passage is to be determined from the nature of the subject.⁷

III. In order to ascertain the usus loquendi, and to investigate the meaning of a passage, recourse is in the next place to be had to the COMPARISON OF SIMILAR OF PARALLEL PASSAGES; and as much caution is requisite in the application of this hermeneutic aid, it becomes necessary to institute a particular inquiry into its nature, and the most beneficial mode of employing it in the interpretation of the Bible.

1. "When, in any ordinary composition, a passage occurs of doubtful meaning with respect to the sentiment or doctrine it conveys, the obvious course of proceeding is, to examine what the author himself has in other parts of his work delivered upon the same subject; to weigh well the force of any particular expressions he is accustomed to use; and to inquire what there might be in the occasion or circumstances under which he wrote, tending to throw further light upon the immediate object he had in view. This is only to render common justice to the writer; it is necessary both for the discovery of his real meaning, and to secure him against any wanton charge of error or inconsistency. Now, if this may justly be required in any ordinary work of uninspired composition, how much more indispensable must it be when we sit in judgment upon the sacred volume; in which (if we acknowledge its divine original) it is impossible even to imagine a failure either in judgment or in integrity."¹

"God has been pleased, in sundry portions and in divers manners, to speak unto us in his word; but in all the books of Scripture we may trace an admirable unity of design, an intimate connection of parts, and a complete harmony of doctrines. In some instances the same truths are conveyed nearly in the same modes of expression; in other instances the same sentiments are clothed with beautiful varieties of language. While we are interested in discovering some of the indications of mental diversity among the sacred writers, we clearly perceive that the whole volume of revelation is distinguished by a certain characteristic style and phraseology altogether its own, and which, for simplicity, dignity, energy, and fulness, must be allowed to have no parallel. Now, if there be in the various parts of Scripture such important coincidences of sentiment, of language, and of idiom, it is evident that we proceed on just and rational principles, in comparing together passages that have some degree of resemblance, and in applying those, the meaning of which is clear, to the illustration of such as are involved in some degree of obscurity."²

The passages, which thus have some degree of resemblance, are termed PARALLEL PASSAGES; and the comparison of them is a most important help for interpreting such parts of Scripture as may appear to us obscure or uncertain; for, on almost every subject, there will be found a multitude of phrases, which, when diligently collated, will afford mutual illustration and support to each other; the truth which is more obscurely intimated in one place being expressed with greater precision in others. Thus, a part of the attributes or circumstances, relating to both persons and things, is stated in one text or passage, and part in another; so that it is only by searching out several passages, and connecting them together, that we can obtain a just apprehension of them. More particularly, the types of the Old Testament must be compared with their antitypes in the New (as Num. xxi. 9. with John iii. 14.); predictions must be compared with the history of their accomplishment (as Isa. liii. the latter part of v. 12. with Mark xv. 27, 28. and Luke xxii. 37. and the former part of Isa. liii. 12. with Matt. xxvii. 57. Mark xv. 43. Luke xxiii. 50.); and the portion of Scripture, in which any point is specifically treated, ought to be chiefly attended to in the comparison, as Genesis ch. i. on the creation, Romans ch. iii.—v. on the doctrine of justification, &c. &c.³

The foundation of the parallelisms occurring in the Sacred Writings is the perpetual harmony of Scripture itself; which, though composed by various writers, yet proceeding from one and the same infallible source, cannot but agree in words as well as in things. Parallelisms are either near or remote; in the former case the parallel passages are sought from the same writer, in the latter from different writers. They are further termed adequate, when they affect the whole subject proposed in the text; and inadequate, when they affect it only in part; but the most usual division of the analogy of Scripture, or parallelisms, is into verbal, or parallelisms of words, and real, or parallelisms of things.

2. A Verbal Parallelism or Analogy is that in which, on comparing two or more places together, the same words and phrases, the same mode of argument, the same method of construction, and the same rhetorical figures, are respectively to be found. Of this description are the following instances:—

(1.) Parallel words and phrases.—Thus, when the prophet Jeremiah, speaking of the human heart, says, that it is "deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked" (Jer. xvii. 9.), in order to understand the full import of the original word there rendered desperately, we must compare Jer. xv. 18. and Micah i. 9. where the same word occurs, and is rendered desperate or incurable. From which two passages it is obvious that the prophet's meaning was, that the deceitfulness and wickedness of the heart of man are so great that they cannot be healed or removed by any human art. Compare also Isa. xl. 11. and Ezek. xxxiv. 23. with John x. 11. 14, 15. Heb. xlii. 20. and 1 Pet. ii. 25. and v. 4.

(2.) Parallel modes of arguing.—Thus the apostles, Paul, James, and Peter, respectively support their exhortations to patience by the example of Jesus Christ. Compare Heb. xii. 2, 3. James v. 10, 11. and 1 Pet. ii. 21. On the contrary, dissuaves from sin are more strongly set forth in the Old and New Testaments, by urging that sinful courses were the way of the heathen nations. Compare Lev. xviii. 24. Jer. x. 2. and Matt. vi. 32.

(3.) Of Parallel constructions and figures we have examples in Rom. viii. 3. 2 Cor. v. 21. and Heb. x. 6. in which passages respectively the Greek word αμαρτια, there translated sin, means sacrifices or offerings for sin, agreeably to the idiom of the Hebrew language, in which the same word elliptically signifies both sin and sin-offering, which the Septuagint version invariably renders by αμαρτια in upwards of one hundred places. Dr. Whitby, on 2 Cor. v. 21., has pointed out a few instances; but Dr. A. Clarke (on the same text) has enumerated all the passages, which are, in fact, so many additional examples of verbal parallelisms. To this class some biblical critics refer those passages in which the same sentence is expressed not precisely in the same words, but in similar words, more full as well as more perspicuous, and concerning the force and meaning of which there can be no doubt. Such are the parallelisms of the sacred poets; which, from the light they throw on the poetical books of the Scriptures, demand a distinct consideration.

Verbal Parallelisms are of great importance for ascertaining the meaning of words that rarely occur in the Bible, as well as of those which express peculiar doctrines or terms of religion, as faith, repentance, new creature, &c., likewise in explaining doubtful passages, and also the Hebraisms appearing in the New Testament.

3. A Real Parallelism or Analogy is, where the same thing or subject is treated of, either designedly or incidentally, in the same words, or in others which are more clear, copious, and full, and concerning whose force and meaning there can be no doubt. In comparing two passages, however, we must will not only attain all that practical knowledge which is necessary to his salvation; but, by God's blessing, he will become learned in every thing relating to his religion in such degree, that he will not be liable to be misled either by the refined arguments or by the false assertions of those who endeavour to ingraft their own opinions upon the oracles of God. He may safely be ignorant of all philosophy, except what is to be learned from the sacred books; which indeed contain the highest philosophy adapted to the lowest apprehension. He may safely remain ignorant of all history, except so much of the history of the first ages of the Jewish and of the Christian church, as is to be gathered from the canonical books of the Old and New Testament. Let him study these in the manner I recommend, and let him never cease to pray for the ILLUMINATION OF THAT SPIRIT by which these books were dictated; and the whole compass of abstruse philosophy, and recondite history, shall furnish no argument with which the perverse will of man shall be able to shake this LEARNED CHRISTIAN'S faith. The Bible, thus studied, will indeed prove to be what we Protestants esteem it—a certain and sufficient rule of faith and practice, a helmet of salvation, which alone may quench the fiery darts of the wicked."—Sermons on the Resurrection &c. pp. 221—223.

² Rev. H. F. Burder's Sermon on the Duty and Means of ascertaining the Sense of Scripture, pp. 17, 18.

³ On the importance and benefit of consulting parallel passages, Bishop Horsley has several fine observations in his comment on Psal. xcvi. The whole passage is too long to extract, but the following sentences are so appropriate to the subject of this section, that the author deems any apology for their insertion unnecessary. "It should," says his lordship, "be a rule with every one, who would read the Holy Scriptures with advantage and improvement, to compare every text which may seem either important for the doctrine it may contain, or remarkable for the turn of the expression, with the parallel passages in other parts of Holy Writ; that is, with the passages in which the subject-matter is the same, the sense equivalent, or the turn of the expression similar. These parallel passages are easily found by the marginal references in Bibles of the larger form."....."It is incredible to any one, who has not in some degree made the experiment, what a proficiency may be made in that knowledge which maketh wise unto salvation, by studying the Scriptures in this manner, without any other commentary or exposition than what the different parts of the sacred volume mutually furnish for each other. I will not scruple to assert that the most ILLITERATE CHRISTIAN, if he can but read his English Bible, and will take the pains to read it in this manner, ascertain whether the same thing is really expressed more fully as well as more clearly, and also without any ambiguity whatever, otherwise little or no assistance can be obtained for illustrating obscure places. Real parallelisms are twofold—historical, and didactic or doctrinal.

(1.) An Historical Parallelism of things is, where the same thing or event is related: it is of great and constant use in order to understand aright the Four Gospels, in which the same things are for the most part related more fully by one evangelist than by the others, according to the design with which the Gospels were respectively written.

Thus the account of our Saviour's stilling the tempest in the sea of Genesareth is more copiously related by Saint Mark (iv. 36—41.) and Saint Luke (viii. 22—25.) than it is by Saint Matthew. (viii. 24, 25.) By comparing the several narratives of the evangelists together, harmonies are constructed from their separate histories. In like manner, the historical books of the Old Testament are mutually illustrated by comparing together the books of Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles. For instance, many passages in the book of Genesis are parallel to 1 Chron. i.—ix.; many parts of the books of Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers are parallel to the book of Deuteronomy; the books of Samuel and Kings, to the two books of Chronicles; and, lastly, 2 Kings xviii. 13—37, and 2 Chron. xxxii. are parallel with Isa. xxxvi. Dr. Lightfoot and Mr. Townsend have compiled very valuable harmonies of the Old Testament, in which the historical and prophetic passages are interwoven in the order of time, of which an account is given in the HERMENEUTICAL APPENDIX to the second Volume, PART I. CHAP. II. SECT. I.

(2.) A Didactic or Doctrinal Parallelism of things is, where the same thing is taught: this species of parallel is of the greatest importance for comprehending the doctrines inculcated in the Bible, which we should otherwise be liable to mistake or grossly pervert.

We have examples of it in all those Psalms which occur twice in the book of Psalms, as in Psal. xiv. compared with lili.; xl. 13—17, with lxx.; lvii. 7—11, with cviii. 1—5.; lx. 5—12, with cviii. 6—13.; and exv. 4—8, with cxviii. 13—18. Sometimes also a hymn of David, which occurs in the book of Psalms, is to be found in some one of the historical books, as Psal. xvi. compared with 1 Chron. xvi. 23—33.; Psal. cv. 1—15, with 1 Chron. xvi. 8—22, and Psal. civ. 47, 48, with 1 Chron. xvi. 33, 36.

In like manner, in the New Testament, the same thing is taught nearly in the same words, as in the Epistle of Jude compared with 2 Pet. ch. ii. Frequently also the same doctrine is explained more fully in one place, which had been more concisely stated in another: such, for instance, are the superseding of the Mosaic dispensation by that of the Gospel, and all those passages which are parallel as to the thing or subject discussed though different in words; so that, by comparing them, the scope of the doctrine inculcated will readily be collected. On the other hand, where the same subject or doctrine is delivered with more brevity, all the various passages must be diligently collated, and the doctrine elicited from them. Of this description are the numerous predictions, &c. relative to the future happiness of mankind, connected with the removal of the Jewish economy, and the conversion of the Gentiles to the Christian religion.

But the use of this parallelism will more fully appear from one or two instances. Let us then compare Gal. vi. 15, with Gal. v. 6. 1 Cor. vii. 19. 2 Cor. v. 17. and Rom. ii. 23, 29. In the former passage we read, In Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth any thing nor uncircumcision, but a new creature, or rather [there is] a new creation. In Gal. v. 6, the apostle had briefly delivered the same doctrine in the following terms: In Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, but faith that worketh by love.—1 Cor. vii. 19. Circumcision is nothing, nor uncircumcision, but the keeping of the commandments of God.—2 Cor. v. 17. Therefore if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature, or more correctly, [there is] a new creation: old things have passed away; behold! all things are become new.—Rom. ii. 23, 29. He is not a Jew that is one outwardly, i. e. he is not a genuine member of the church of God who has only an outward profession: neither is that circumcision which is outward in the flesh. But he is a Jew, a true member of the church of God, which is one inwardly, and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter; whose praise is not of men, but of God. From these passages it is evident that what Saint Paul, in Gal. vi. 15, terms a new creature, or creation, he in Gal. v. 6, denominates faith that worketh by love; and in 1 Cor. vii. 19, keeping the commandments of God. From this collation of passages, then, we perceive, that what the apostle intends by a new creature or new creation, is the entire conversion of the heart from sin to God: and as creation is the proper work of an All-wise and Almighty Being, so this total change of heart, soul, and life, which takes place under the ministration of the Gospel, is effected by the power and grace of God, and is evidenced by that faith and obedience which are indispensably necessary to all Christians in order to salvation!

Again: in 2 Cor. i. 21, God is said to have anointed us: the parallel passage, where this expression is so explained as to give an idea of the thing intended, is 1 John ii. 20, where true Christians are said to have an unction from the Holy One, and to know all things; and in v. 27, the same anointing is said to teach all things. Now, if the effect of this unction be that we should know all things, the anointing will be whatever brings knowledge to us, and therefore teaching. From this comparison of passages, therefore, we learn that by unction and anointing is intended the Holy Spirit, whose office is to teach all things, and to guide us into all truth (John xiv. 26. and xvi. 13.); and whose gifts and graces are diffused throughout the church of Christ, and imparted to every living member of it. For his assistances are equally necessary to all, to the learned as well as the unlearned, to teachers as well as to hearers: he it is that enlightens our minds, purifies our hearts, and inclines our wills, not only beginning but carrying on and perfecting a new and spiritual life in our souls. The expression in v. 20, and ye know all things, is not to be understood in the largest sense, but must be limited to those things which are necessary to salvation. These every true Christian not only knows speculatively—that is, he not only has a notion of them in his mind—but he has also a practical and experimental knowledge and taste of them, which is productive of holy obedience. This inestimable gift was purchased by the sufferings and death of Christ, who is here styled the Holy One. The words in v. 27, and ye need not that any man should teach you, cannot be intended to set aside all outward teaching; but their meaning is, either that ye need not the teaching of any of those antichrists and false teachers mentioned in various parts of this epistle, or that ye need not that any one should teach you how to judge of those deceivers and their doctrines.

4. Besides verbal and real parallelisms, there is a third species partaking of the nature of both, and which is of equal importance for understanding the Scriptures: this has been termed a parallelism of members: it consists chiefly in a certain equality, resemblance, or parallelism, between the members of each period; so that in two lines, or members of the same period, things shall answer to things, and words to words, as if fitted to each other by a kind of rule or measure.

The nature of this kind of parallelism, which is the grand characteristic of the poetical style of the Hebrews, being fully considered in a subsequent chapter,² a few examples of its utility as a hermeneutical aid will only be necessary in this place.

In the poetical parts of the Old Testament, it sometimes happens that, in the alternate quatrain, the third line forms a continuous sense with the first, and the fourth with the second. Bishop Lowth has given a striking example of this variety of parallelism in his nineteenth prælection, from Deut. xxxii. 42. But as its distinguishing feature is not there sufficiently noted, Bishop Jebb adopts the following translation of Mr. Parkhurst:—

I will make mine arrows drunk with blood;
And my sword shall devour flesh:
With the blood of the slain and the captive;
From the hairy head of the enemy.

That is, reducing the stanza to a simple quatrain:—

I will make mine arrows drunk with blood:
With the blood of the slain and the captive:
And my sword shall devour flesh;
From the hairy head of the enemy.

Again,—

From without the sword shall destroy;
And in the inmost apartments terror;
Both the young man and the virgin:
The suckling, with the man of gray hairs.

Deut. xxxii. 25.

“The youths and virgins,” says Bishop Jebb, “let out of doors by the vigour and buoyancy natural at their time of life, fall victims to the sword in the streets of the city: while infancy and old age, confined by helplessness and decrepitude to the inner chambers of the house, perish there by fear before the sword can reach them.”

Mr. Green, in his “Poetical Parts of the Old Testament translated,” observes that there is a similar hyperbaton in Isa. xxxiv. 6. And Dr. Hales reduces to a similar form that remarkable prophecy, Gen. xlix. 10:—

The sceptre shall not depart from Judah;
Nor a scribe of his offspring;
Until Shiloh shall come;
And [until] to him a congregation of peoples.

“That is, according to Dr. Hales, the sceptre, or civil government, shall not depart, till the coming or birth of Shiloh; and the scribe, or expounder of the law, intimating ecclesiastical regimen, shall not depart, or cease, until there shall be formed a congregation of people, a church of Christian worshippers from various nations; the former branch of this prophecy was fulfilled, when Augustus made his enrolment preparatory to the census throughout Judæa and Galilee; thereby degrading Judæa to a Roman province: the latter branch was fulfilled at the sacking of Jerusalem by Titus; when the temple was destroyed, and the Jewish ritual abolished.”³

By the application of this parallelism of members, Bishop Jebb has thrown considerable light upon a difficult passage in the eighty-fourth psalm, which he considers as an introverted parallelism:—

Blessed is the man whose strength is in Thee:
The passengers, in whose hearts are thy ways,
In the valley of Baca make it a spring,
The rain also filleth the pools;
They go from strength to strength;
He shall appear before God in Zion.

Psal. lxxxiv. 5—7.

“The first and sixth lines are here considered, at once, as constructively parallel, and as affording a continuous sense: the intermediate four lines may be accounted parenthetical; the second, constructively parallel with the fifth; and the third with the fourth. The first line seems to contain the character of a confirmed proficient in religion,—his strength is in God; the

² See Book II. Chap. II. infra.

³ Jebb's Sacred Literature, pp. 30, 31.

For if such passages be cited to explain another that is obscure, they will be of no use whatever, however similar they may be, but equally obscure. It is to little purpose, therefore, to accumulate similar passages where the same name of a tree, plant, herb, &c. is mentioned, and especially where there is no note or mark attached to it; for several of the birds, beasts, fishes, trees, plants, precious stones, and musical instruments, mentioned in the Scriptures, are either unknown to us, or cannot now be precisely distinguished.

(8.) The exercise of comparison should be often repeated.

"To the observance of the principles above stated, frequent practice must be added, so that the interpreter may easily discern what passages are similar, and how he may rightly compare them, and judge of them. It will be very useful, here, to consult good interpreters, not only of the Scriptures, but of profane authors; that where they carry these principles into practice, and plainly make a right and skilful application of them, we may learn to imitate them, by attentively considering the manner in which they attain to the understanding of things which are obscure or ambiguous. By frequently renewing this exercise, we may learn to go in the same path in which they have travelled.

"The books of the New Testament present more inducement to repeat this exercise very frequently, than any other books. For (1.) They are of all books the most important. (2.) They are not only all of the same idiom in general, but they have reference to the same subject, viz. the development of Christianity. They originated, too, from contemporary writers, possessed of views, feelings, and languages that were alike. Hence comparison has more force in illustrating the New Testament, than in the illustration of either Greek or Latin authors; many of whom, that agreed with each other in all the circumstances just stated, cannot be found. But (3.) To all who admit that the same Holy Spirit guided the authors of the New Testament, and that their views of religion, in consequence of this, must have been harmonious, the inducement to comparison of various parts and passages with each other, in order to obtain a correct view of the whole, must be very great; and the additional force of the evidence arising from comparison, on account of the really harmonious views of the writers, must make this exercise an imperious duty of every theologian."

(9.) Many parallel passages should be compared.

"To compare one passage only is often insufficient, whether you are endeavouring to find the usus loquendi by the aid of parallel passages, or by testimony derived from the nature of the subject and from examples. Specially is this the case, when we are investigating the sense of words that have a complex or generic meaning, made up of various parts. In this case, comparisons should be made from numerous passages, until we perceive that what we are seeking is fully and entirely discovered.

"Suppose the word παις occurs in a particular passage, where you are doubtful what sense should be applied to it. First, you call to mind, that παις is a generic word, having several meanings related to each other, but still diverse, as species under the genus. You wish to determine how many species of meaning παις has; and in order to accomplish this, many passages where it is used must be compared, in order that you may know whether all the species are found. This being done, you proceed to compare them with the passage under investigation, and see which will fit it. And in this way all generic words must be investigated, before the generic idea can be determined."

(10.) It will be of great use to collect and reduce into alphabetical order all those similar passages in which the same forms of speech occur, and the same things are proposed in a different order of narration: but care must be taken to avoid the accumulation of numerous passages that are parallel to each other in forms of speech, or in things which are of themselves clear and certain; for such accumulations of parallel places savour more of a specious display of learning than real utility.

The best and most certain help by which to find out parallel passages is, unquestionably, the diligent and attentive perusal of the Scriptures, repeated after short intervals of time, and accompanied by the commitment of the most difficult passages to writing, together with such other passages as are either similar in words or in things, and which tend to throw any light on obscure places. But, in instituting such parallelisms, care must be taken not to multiply references unnecessarily for mere show rather than for their practical utility, and also that they do not violate the analogy of faith. For instance, Rom. ii. 28. and James ii. 24. are not in every respect parallel to each other; because in the former passage Saint Paul is treating of justification in the sight of God—a doctrine which numerous passages of Scripture most clearly testify to be by faith alone; whereas Saint James is speaking of justification in the sight of men, who form their judgment of a man by his works.

The method here indicated is the only effectual way by which to ascertain parallel words and phrases, as well as parallelisms of things; it will indeed require a considerable portion of time and study, which every one may not perhaps be able to give; but individuals thus circumstanced may advantageously facilitate their researches by having recourse to editions of the Bible with parallel references, and to Concordances.

§ 2. ANCIENT VERSIONS.

Observations on the respective merits of the several ancient versions.—Rules for consulting them to the best advantage.

Of the Ancient Versions of the Holy Scriptures, and their uses in sacred criticism, an account has already been given in pages 262—280. 286, 287. and it may here be remarked, that, to those who are able to consult them, these versions afford a very valuable aid in the interpretation of the Bible: for they were the works of men, who enjoyed several advantages above the moderns, for understanding the original languages and the phraseology of Scripture. One or two instances will illustrate the propriety of this remark.

1. In the first promulgation of the Gospel to mankind (Gen. iii. 15.), God said to the serpent that beguiled our first parents, And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed, and IT (that is, the seed of the woman, as our authorized translation rightly expounds it) shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel. But in the Anglo-Romish version, after the Latin Vulgate (which has trisa conteret caput tuum), it is rendered, Sue shall bruise his head, as if a woman should do it; which the Romanists interpreting of the Virgin Mary, ascribe to her this great victory and triumph over sin and Satan, and are taught to say in their addresses to her, "Adoro et benedico sanctissimos pedes tuos, quibus antiqui serpentis caput calcasti," that is, "I adore and bless thy most holy feet, whereby thou hast bruised the head of the old serpent." That this rendering of the Romanists is erroneous, is proved by the Septuagint Greek version, by the Chaldee paraphrase, and by the Syriac version, all of which refer the pronoun IT to the seed of the woman, and not to the woman herself.

2. As the expression breaking bread, mentioned in Acts ii. 46., ordinarily means taking food in the Jewish idiom, some expositors have understood that expression in this sense; but the old Syriac version, executed towards the close of the first or early in the second century, renders it breaking of the Eucharist. We are justified, therefore, in referring the term to the celebration of the Lord's supper among the first Christians (κκτ' αικν) in a house appropriated to that purpose.

In applying ancient versions, as an auxiliary, to the interpretation of Scripture, it is material to observe, that, since no version can be absolutely free from error, we ought not to rely implicitly on any one translation: but, if it be practicable, the aid of the cognate dialects should be united with reference to a version, in order that, by a comparison of both these helps, we may arrive at the knowledge of the genuine readings and meanings. From inattention to this obvious caution, many eminent men have at different times ascribed to particular versions a degree of authority to which they were by no means entitled. Thus, by many of the fathers, the Alexandrian interpreters were accounted to be divinely inspired, and consequently free from the possibility of mistake; a similar opinion was held by various eminent modern critics, particularly by Isaac Vossius, who asserted the Septuagint to be preferable to the Hebrew text, and to be absolutely free from error! The Church of Rome has fallen into the like mistake with respect to the Vulgate or Latin version, which the Council of Trent declared to be the only authentic translation.

Further, versions of versions, that is, those translations which were not made immediately from the Hebrew Old Testament, or from the Greek New Testament, are of no authority in determining either the genuine text or meaning of the original, but only of that version from which they were taken. This remark applies particularly to the Anglo-Saxon, Old English, Spanish, French, and German translations, whether of the Old or New Testament; which, being made before the sixteenth century, were executed immediately from the Latin: and subsequently, even in those examples where they are unanimous in a reading, their united voices are of no more authority than that of the Latin version alone.⁷ In all cases, therefore, which require the aid of a version, either for the purpose of criticism or interpretation, recourse must be had to those translations which, being more ancient or better executed, are preferable to every other. And in this view the following will be found most deserving of attention, not only as uniting the two qualifications of antiquity and excellence, but also as being more generally accessible to students, being for the most part comprised in the Polyglott Bibles, which are to be found in almost every public library.

I. The Alexandrian Version is confessedly the most ancient, and, with all its errors and imperfections, contains very much that is highly valuable, and on this account it has been used by nearly all the more ancient interpreters. With the Septuagint should be consulted the fragments of the translations executed by Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion, and also the fifth, sixth, and seventh versions. The version of Aquila, in particular, exhibits a diction similar to that of the New Testament, as he was not very remote from the age of the apostles; and he has some things which may be of especial use in the interpretation of the New Testament. The version of Symmachus is also a valuable hermeneutic aid; as, by translating into pure Greek, he has facilitated the understanding of Hebrew.

II. The Syriac Peschito, whose fidelity as a version, independently of the excellence of its style, has received the highest commendations from Michaelis, is particularly serviceable for the interpretation of the New Testament.¹ Nor is its value inferior in the interpretation of the Old Testament. "Of all the ancient versions," says a living critic, "the Syriac is the most uniformly faithful and accurate; and as the language so nearly resembles the Hebrew, its value can scarcely be estimated too high."²

III. The Latin Vulgate, with the exception of the Psalms, deservedly claims the third place.

IV. The Targums, or Chaldee Paraphrases, though unequally executed, contain many things that are exceedingly useful, and necessary to be known, especially the paraphrases of Jonathan Ben Uzziel; they not only contribute essentially to the understanding of many difficult passages in the Old Testament, but also throw much light on the interpretation of the New Testament, as well as afford much advantage in arguing with the Jews, because they almost invariably view the prophecies in the same light as Christians do, as referring to the Messiah.³ Extracts from them are to be found in all the larger commentaries, and also in the works of Dr. Lightfoot.

V. The Jewish Antiquities of Josephus (of whose writings some account is given in page 346. infra) may be reckoned among the ancient versions: for though, on some occasions, he followed the Septuagint, yet he derived his representations of sacred history chiefly from the Hebrew Text, as is evident by his abandoning the sense of that version in very many places. With regard to these he is an evidence of great authority, for he is more ancient than the other translators, except the Alexandrine or Septuagint; the Chaldee was his vernacular dialect; and as he was a learned priest, and subsequently a commander of an army in Galilee during the war with the Romans, he was well versed in all ecclesiastical, civil, and military matters. His readers, however, will find it necessary, not rashly to give credence to all his statements, especially such as are warped in favour of his own nation, or even of the heathens, or such as represent the temple of Solomon by a description taken from that of Herod.⁴

VI. The other versions made immediately from the Hebrew and Greek originals follow next in order, particularly the Arabic translations of the Old Testament: but no certain dependence can be placed, as an authority, on the Latin translations of the Oriental versions, which are printed in the Polyglott Bibles.

It will not however be necessary to consult ancient versions, except in passages that are really difficult, or unless a particular examination of them be instituted for some special object of inquiry. In this case not one or two versions merely should be consulted, but every version that is accessible should be referred to: and all such places should be compared together as are parallel, that is, those passages in which the same word or the same form of speaking respectively occurs; and, where any thing worthy of preservation offers itself, it will materially facilitate future studies to note it either in an interleaved Bible, or, which perhaps is preferable, in an interleaved Lexicon. This practice will not only enable the biblical student to discover and correctly to appreciate the genius of a version, and the ability, or the reverse, with which it may be executed; but it will also supply many important helps for the interpretation of Scripture. As, however, some of the ancient versions have been altered or interpolated in many places, great care must be taken to distinguish the modern amendments from the genuine text of the original ancient translator. The various excellent concordances that are extant will afford great assistance in finding out such parallel words or phrases.

In order to ascertain how far the ancient versions represent correctly the meaning of Hebrew or Greek words, the following rules will be found useful:—

1. That meaning is to be taken and received as the true one, which all the versions give to a word, and which is also confirmed by the kindred dialects.

Because, the number of testimonies worthy of credit being as great as possible, there can be no room left for doubt.

2. All those significations, formerly given to Hebrew words, are to be considered as correctly given, which the Septuagint or other Greek translators express by the same or similar Greek words, although no trace of such meaning appear in any Oriental language:

For, as no doubt can be entertained of the diligence and scrupulous learning of those translators, who can presume to measure the vast copiousness of the Arabic, Syriac, and other Oriental languages by the few books which in our time are extant in those languages! since no one is so ignorant as to suppose that all the riches of the Greek and Latin languages are comprised in the very numerous remains of classical literature, in which our age happily abounds. With regard to the New Testament, "in cases where the sense is not affected by different readings, or the translator might have taken them for synonymous, the evidence of Greek manuscripts is to be preferred to that of an ancient version. The same preference is due to the manuscripts wherein the translator has omitted words that appeared of little importance, or a passage in the Greek original is attended with a difficulty which the translator was unable to solve, and therefore either omitted or altered according to the arbitrary dictates of his own judgment."⁵

3. Where the versions differ in fixing the sense of a word, the more ancient ones, being executed with the greater care and skill, are in the first place to be consulted, and preferred to all others:

For, the nearer a translator approaches to the time when the original language was vernacular, we may readily infer that he has expressed with so much the greater fidelity the true signification of words, both primary and proper, as well as those which are derivative and translated. There are, however, some cases in which ancient versions are of more authority than the original itself. Most of the translations of the New Testament, noticed in the preceding pages, surpass in antiquity the oldest Greek manuscripts now extant: "and they lead to a discovery of the readings in the very ancient manuscript that was used by the translator. By their means, rather than from the aid of our Greek manuscripts, not one of which is prior to the fourth or fifth century, we arrive at the certain knowledge, that the ancient writings have been transmitted from the earliest to the present age without material alteration; and that our present text, if we except the passages that are rendered doubtful by an opposition in the readings, is the same which proceeded from the hands of the apostles. Whenever the reading can be precisely determined, which the translator found in his Greek manuscript, the version is of equal authority with a manuscript of that period: but as it is sometimes difficult to acquire this absolute certainty, great caution is necessary in collecting readings from the ancient versions."⁶

4. A meaning given to a word by only one version, provided this be a good one, is by no means to be rejected; especially if it agree with the author's design and the order of his discourse:

For, it is possible that the force and meaning of a word should be unknown to all other translators, and no trace of it be discoverable in the kindred dialects, and yet that it should be preserved and transmitted to posterity by one version. This remark applies chiefly to things which a translator has the best opportunity of understanding from local and other circumstances. Thus the Alexandrine interpreters are the most ample testimony for every thing related in the Old Testament concerning Egypt, while others, who were natives of Palestine, and perhaps deeply skilled in Jewish literature, are the best guides we can follow in whatever belongs to that country.⁷

5. Lastly, "Those versions" of the New Testament, "in which the Greek is rendered word for word, and the idioms of the original, though harsh and often unmeaning in another language, are still retained in a translation, are of more value in point of criticism than those which express the sense of the original in a manner more suitable to the language of the translator."

The value of the latter, as far as regards their critical application, decreases in proportion as the translator attends to purity and elegance, and of course deviates from his original: but their worth is greater in all other respects, as they are not only read with more pleasure, but understood in general with greater ease. By means of the former we discover the words of the original, and even their arrangement;—but the latter are of no use in deciding on the authenticity of a reading, if the various readings of the passages in question make no alteration in the sense. No translation is more literal than the Philoxenian (or New) Syriac, and none, therefore, leads to a more accurate discovery of the text in the ancient manuscript whence that version was taken; but, setting this advantage aside, the Old Syriac is of much greater value than the New.¹

§ 3. SCHOLIASTS AND GLOSSOGRAPHERS.

I. Nature of Scholia.—II. And of Glossaries.—III. Rules for consulting them to advantage in the interpretation of the Scriptures.

We have already stated that scholiasts and glossographers afford direct testimonies for finding out or fixing the meaning of words: it now remains that we briefly notice the nature of the assistance to be derived from these helps.

1. SCHOLIA are short notices on ancient authors, and are of two kinds—exegetical or explanatory, and grammatical. The former briefly explains the sense of passages, and are, in fact, a species of commentary; the latter, which are here to be considered, illustrate the force and meaning of words by other words which are better known. Such scholia are extant on most of the ancient classics, as Homer, Thucydides, Sophocles, Aristophanes, Horace, Juvenal, Persius, &c. &c.

On the Old Testament, we believe, there are no ancient scholia extant; but on the New Testament there are several collections, which present themselves under three classes.

1. Scholia taken from the writings of the Greek fathers, who in their homilies and commentaries have often briefly explained the force of particular words.

The homilies of Chrysostom, in particular, abound with these scholia; and from his works, as well as those of Origen and other fathers, the more modern Greeks have extracted what those illustrious men had concisely stated relative to the meaning of words. Similar grammatical explanations, omitting whatever was rhetorical and doctrinal, have been collected from Chrysostom by Theodoret in a commentary on the fourteen Epistles of Saint Paul; by Theophylact, in an indifferent commentary on the four Evangelists; and, to mention no more, by Euthymius in a similar commentary executed with better judgment. There are extant numerous collections of this kind of explanations, made from the writings of the fathers, and known by the appellation of Catena,² which follow the order of the books comprised in the New Testament. Many such scholia have been published by Matthæi in his edition of the New Testament.

2. Scholia, written either in the margin, within the text, or at the end of manuscripts.

Many of this description have been published separately by Wetstein in the notes to his elaborate edition of the Greek Testament, and particularly by Matthæi in his edition of the New Testament already noticed.

3. Ancient Scholia, which are also exegetical or explanatory; these, in fact, are short commentaries, and, therefore, are discussed infra, in the Appendix to the second volume.

II. A GLOSSARY differs from a Lexicon in this respect, that the former treats only of words that really require explanation, while the latter gives the general meaning of words. The authors of the most ancient Glossaries are Hesychius, Suidas, Phavorinus, Photius, and Cyril of Alexandria. The celebrated Ernesti selected from the first three of these writers, and also from the Etymologicum Magnum, whatever related to the New Testament, and published the result of his researches at Leipsic, in 1786, in two octavo volumes; from which Schleusner has extracted the most valuable matter, and inserted it in his well known and excellent Greek Lexicon to the New Testament.

III. In estimating the value of scholiasts and glossographers, and also the weight of their testimony, for ascertaining the force and meaning of words, it is of importance to consider, first, whether they wrote from their own knowledge of the language, and have given us the result of their own learning, or whether they compiled from others. Almost all the scholia now extant are compiled from Chrysostom, Origen, or some other fathers of the third and fourth centuries; if the scholiast have compiled from good authorities, his labours have a claim to our attention.

In proportion, therefore, to the learning of a scholiast (and the same remark will equally apply to the glossographer), he becomes the more deserving of our confidence: but this point can only be determined by daily and constant use. The Greek fathers, for instance, are admirable interpreters of the New Testament, being intimately acquainted with its language; notwithstanding they are sometimes mistaken in the exposition of its Hebraisms. But the Latin fathers, many of whom were but indifferently skilled in Hebrew and Greek, are less to be depended on, and are, in fact, only wretched interpreters of comparatively ill-executed versions.

Again, our confidence in a scholiast, or in the author of a glossary, increases in proportion to his antiquity, at least in the explanation of every thing concerning ancient history, rites, or civil life. But, in investigating the force and meaning of words, the antiquity of scholia and glossaries proves nothing; as their authors are liable to error, notwithstanding they lived near the time when the author flourished, whose writings they profess to elucidate. It not unfrequently happens that a more recent interpreter, availing himself of all former helps, perceives the force of words much better than one that is more ancient, and is consequently enabled to elicit the sense more correctly. The result, therefore, of our inquiry into the relative value of scholiasts and compilers of glossaries is, that in perusing their labours, we must examine them for ourselves, and form our judgment accordingly, whether they have succeeded, or failed, in their attempts to explain an author.³

§ 4. ON THE TESTIMONY OF FOREIGNERS WHO HAVE ACQUIRED A LANGUAGE.

I. Importance of this testimony.—II. Rules for applying it to the interpretation of the Scriptures.

THE testimony of those who, though foreigners, have acquired a language, are an important help for ascertaining the Usus Loquendi. Thus, the writings of Philo and Josephus, who were Jews, and also those of the Emperor Marcus Antoninus, may be used to illustrate the meaning of Greek words; because, although foreigners, they well understood the Greek language. The productions of those writers, indeed, whom by way of distinction we commonly term Pagan Writers, are in various ways highly deserving the attention of the biblical student, for the confirmation they afford of the leading facts recorded in the sacred volume, and especially of the doctrines, institutions, and facts, upon which Christianity is founded, or to which its records indirectly relate. “Indeed it may not be unreasonably presumed, that the writings of Pagan antiquity have been providentially preserved with peculiar regard to this great object, since, notwithstanding numerous productions of past ages have perished, sufficient remains are still possessed, to unite the cause of heathen literature with that of religion, and to render the one subservient to the interests of the other.”⁴

Of the value of the heathen writings in thus confirming the credibility of the Scriptures, very numerous instances have been given in the early part of this volume. We have there seen that the heathen writings substantiate, by an independent and collateral report, many of the events, and the accomplishment of many of the prophecies recorded by the inspired writers; and that they establish the accuracy of many incidental circumstances which are interspersed throughout the Scriptures. “Above all, by the gradually perverted representations which they give of revealed doctrines, and institutions, they attest the actual communication of such truth from time to time; and pay the tribute of experience to the wisdom and necessity of a written revelation.” Valuable as these testimonies, from the works of heathen authors, confessedly are, their uses are not confined to the confirmation of Scripture facts; they also frequently contribute to elucidate the phraseology of the sacred writers. Two or three instances will illustrate this remark.

1. Pagan writers use words and phrases coincident with, or analogous to, those of the sacred writers, whose meaning they enable us to ascertain, or show us the force and propriety of their expressions.

Thus, the sentiment and image of the prophet Isaiah,

On what part will ye smite again, will ye add correction?

The whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint:

Isa. i. 5. Bp Lowth's Translation.

Are exactly the same with those of Ovid, who, deploring his exile to Aticum, says that he is wounded by the continual strokes of fortune, so that there is no space left in him for another wound:

Ego continuo fortunæ videror ictu :
Vixque habet in nobis jam nova plaga locum.
Ovin, Epist. ex Ponto. lib. ii. ep. vii. 41, 42.

But the prophet's sentiment and image are still more strikingly illustrated by the following expressive line of Euripides, the great force and effect of which Longinus ascribes to its close and compressed structure, analogous to the sense which it expresses.

Γέμω κακῶν ὅτι· καὶ οὐκ ἔστι δὴν τόπος.
I am full of miseries : there is no room for more.
Eurip. Herc. Furens, v. 1245.

2. Pagan writers often employ the same images with the sacred, so as to throw light on their import, and generally to set off their superior excellence.

Thus, the same evangelical prophet, when predicting the blessed effects that should flow from the establishment of the Messiah's kingdom, says,

They shall beat their swords into ploughshares,
And their spears into pruning-hooks :
Nation shall not lift up sword against nation,
Neither shall they learn war any more.

Isa. ii. 4.

The same prediction occurs in the same words, in Micah iv. 2. The description of well-established peace (Bp. Lowth remarks) by the image of beating their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks, is very poetical. The Roman poets have employed the same image. Thus Martial has an epigram (lib. xiv. ep. xiv.) entitled Falsæ enses—the sword converted into a pruning-hook.

The prophet Joel has reversed this image, and applied it to war prevailing ever peace.

Beat your ploughshares into swords,
And your pruning-hooks into spears.
Joel iii. 10.

And so has the prince of the Roman poets :

Non ullus aratro
Dignus honos : squalent abductis arva colonis,
Et curvæ rigidum falces confantur in ensem.
VIRGIL, Georg. lib. i. 506—508.

Dishonour'd lies the plough : the banish'd swains
Are hurried from the uncultivated plains ;
The sickles into barbarous swords are beat.

Additional examples, finely illustrative of the above remark, may be seen in Bishop Lowth's notes on Isa. viii. 6—8. xi. 6—8. xx. xxix. 4, 5. xxxii. 2. xlv. 2. and xlix. 2.

The following cautions will be useful in applying the productions of the Greek and Latin writers to the ascertaining of the usus loquendi.

1. The profane writers are not to be promiscuously used.
2. We must observe in what sense each of the Greek writers uses the expression which occurs in the New Testament, in what places, in what manner, and in what kind of writings.
3. We are not to seek illustration from profane authors of those passages and expressions, which may more properly be explained from Jewish sources.
4. Nor are we to expect from them an explanation of those expressions which are peculiar to the Christian system.
5. They are not to be consulted with a view of proving the entire purity of the style of the sacred writers ; nor that the rules, which (it may be found) they observed, should be applied in all cases to determine the sense of the sacred penmen.
6. It is not sufficient, when a single word in a phrase used in the New Testament is found in profane writers, to prove that the latter may properly be cited as an illustration of the former.
7. Some Greek authors may be more advantageously compared with certain writers of the New Testament than with others, as Thucydides with Saint Paul ; and particular modes of expression may be more happily illustrated from some authors than from others.
8. Some of the Greek writers may, to a certain extent, be applied to the illustration, not only of the language, but also of the ideas and subjects, of the sacred writers. This, however, must be done with the greatest caution.³

The great benefit which is to be derived from Jewish and Heathen profane authors, in elucidating the Scriptures, is excellently illustrated by the Rev. Dr. Gray [now Bishop of Bristol], in his "Connection between the Sacred Writings and the Literature of Jewish and Heathen Authors, particularly that of the Classical Ages, illustrated." London, 1819, in 2 vols. 8vo.

Grotius and other commentators have incidentally applied the productions of the classical writers to the elucidation of the Bible : but no one has done so much in this department of sacred literature, as Elsner, Raphelius, and Kypke, whose publications on account is given in the Bibliographica Appendix to the second Volume.

SECTION II.

INDIRECT TESTIMONIES FOR ASCERTAINING THE USUS LOQUENDI.

THE usus loquendi cannot always be found with sufficient certainty by those direct means which have been discussed in the preceding section. Proper evidence is sometimes wanting ; sometimes usage is variable or inconstant, even in the same age or in the same writer ; or there is an ambiguity of language, or of grammatical forms ; or an obscurity covers the thing or subject treated of ; or novelty of language occurs or a neglect of the usus loquendi, which sometimes happens even in the most careful writers. Other means must, therefore, be used, by which the true sense can be elicited. These indirect means it is the object of the present section to state and to illustrate.

§ 1. OF THE CONTEXT.

1. The Context defined and illustrated.—II. Rules for investigating the Context.

1. ANOTHER most important assistance, for investigating the meaning of words and phrases, is the consideration of the CONTEXT, or the comparison of the preceding and subsequent parts of a discourse.

1. If we analyze the words of an author, and take them out of their proper series, they may be so distorted as to mean any thing but what he intended to express. Since, therefore, words have several meanings, and consequently, are to be taken in various acceptations, a careful consideration of the preceding and subsequent parts will enable us to determine that signification, whether literal or figurative, which is best adapted to the passage in question.

A few instances will illustrate this subject, and show not only the advantage, but also the necessity, of attending to the context.

(1.) It has been questioned whether those words of the prophet Micahiah (1 Kings xxii. 15.), Go and prosper, for the Lord shall deliver it (Ramoth) into the hand of the king, are to be understood affirmatively according to their apparent meaning, or are to be taken in an ironical and contrary sense ? That they are to be understood in the latter sense, the consideration of the context will plainly show, both from the prophet's intention, and from the prophetic denunciation afterwards made by him. Hence it may be inferred that some sort of ironical gesture accompanied Micahiah's prediction, which circumstance ought to be borne in mind by the interpreter of Scripture.

(2.) Further, there is a difference of opinion whether the address of Job's wife (Job ii. 9.) is to be understood in a good sense, as Bless (or ascribe glory to) God, and die, or in a different signification, Curse God, and die, as it is rendered in our authorized version. Circumstances show that the last is the proper meaning ; because as yet Job had not sinned with his lips, and consequently, his wife had no ground for charging him with indulging a vain opinion of his integrity.

(3.) Job xii. Whether the leviathan is a whale or a crocodile has also divided the judgment of commentators. That the latter animal is intended is evident from the circumstances described in the context, which admirably agree with the crocodile, but can in no respect be applied to the whale : for instance, ch. xli. 17, &c. relative to the hardness of his skin, and v. 13—16. concerning his teeth and impenetrable scales.

(4.) Once more, it has been doubted whether our Lord's command to his disciples, to provide neither gold nor silver in their purses (Matt. x. 9.), be a rule of perpetual observation. That it was only a temporary command is evident from the preceding and subsequent parts of the chapter, which prove that particular mission to have been only a temporary one ; and that as they were to go for a short time through Judea, and then to return to Jesus, he therefore forbade them to take any thing that would retard their progress.

2. The context of a discourse or book in the Scriptures, may comprise either one verse, a few verses, entire periods or sections, entire chapters, or whole books.

Thus, if 1 Cor. x. 16. be the passage under examination, the preceding and subsequent parts of the epistle, which belong to it, are the eighth, ninth, and tenth chapters. If Isa. li. be the chapter in question, the reader must not stop at the end of it, but continue his perusal to the twelfth verse of ch. lii. ; for these together form one subject or argument of prediction, in which the prophet is announcing to his countrymen the certainty of their deliverance and return from the Babylonish captivity. This entire portion ought, therefore, to be read at once, in order to apprehend fully the prophet's meaning. In like manner, the verses from v. 13. of ch. lii. to the end of ch. liii. form a new and entire section relative to the sufferings of the Messiah. Here, then, is a wrong division of chapters, to which no regard should be paid in examining the context of a book. Ch. li. ought to include v. 12. of ch. lii., and ch. lii. ought to commence at v. 13. and be continued to the end of ch. lii. In like manner, the first verse of the fourth chapter of Saint Paul's Epistle to the Colossians ought to be joined to the third chapter, the slightest attention to this point will enable a diligent student to add numerous other examples.

² Lowth's Isaiah, vol. ii. p. 29.

³ Beckii Monogrammata Hermeneuticæ Novi Test. pp. 148, 149

* See a further illustration of this passage in Vol. I. p. 120 121.

3. Sometimes a book of Scripture comprises only one subject or argument, in which case the whole of it must be referred to precedents and subsequents, and ought to be considered together.

Of this description is Saint Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians, which consists of two parts, doctrinal and practical. The design of the doctrinal portion is to show, that although there was a difference between Jewish and Gentile believers, inasmuch as the former enjoyed a priority of time, a point of expecting and acknowledging Christ, and through the free grace of God they were a church or congregation of believers before the Gentiles; yet that now, the latter are become partakers of the same grace with them, and being thus admitted to this communion of grace, every real distinction between them is abolished; and, therefore, that both Jews and Gentiles together form one body of the church under one head, even Jesus Christ. Other special doctrines, indeed, are incidentally mentioned; but these are either adduced to explain and enforce the principal doctrine, or they are derived from it. The practical part or exhortation, which naturally flows from the doctrine inculcated, is concord and peace between Jew and Gentile, which the apostle enforces with great beauty and energy.¹

To this head may also be referred the Psalms, each of which being separated from the other, and having no connection with the preceding or following Psalm, for the most part comprises a distinct and entire subject. That some of the Psalms have been divided, and forcibly disjoined, which ought to have remained united, and to have formed one ode, is evident as well from the application of sacred criticism as from the subject-matter. The number of the Psalms by no means corresponds, either in manuscripts or in the ancient versions. Thus, in some manuscripts, the first and second Psalm are not reckoned at all, while in others the former is considered as part of the second Psalm: that they are two distinct compositions, is evident from a comparison of the subject-matter of each Psalm. In the first Psalm the characters of the pious man and the sinner, as well as their respective ends, are contrasted: the second Psalm is prophetic of the Messiah's exaltation. The ninth and tenth Psalms are united together in the Septuagint version; while the hundred and sixteenth and hundred and forty-seventh are each divided into two. The argument which prevails the forty-second and forty-third Psalms plainly shows that they are properly but one divine ode, and are, therefore, rightly joined together in many manuscripts, although they occur as separate compositions in all our printed editions.²

II. In examining the context of a passage, it will be desirable,

1. To investigate each word of every passage: and as the connection is formed by PARTICLES, these should always receive that signification which the subject-matter and context require.

The Hebrew Concordances of Noldius and Taylor, and also Glassius's Philologia Sacra,³ will materially assist in ascertaining the force of the Hebrew particles; as will the elaborate work of Hoogeveen on the subject of the Greek particles.⁴ Further, where particles are wanting, as they sometimes are, it is only by examining the argument and context that we can rightly supply them. For instance, the conditional conjunction is sometimes wanting, as in Gen. xlii. 34, and [if] mischief befall him by the way, in Exod. iv. 23, and [if] thou refuse to let him go. Particles of comparison also are frequently wanting, as in Gen. xvi. 12, he will be a wild man; literally, he will be a wild ass man, that is, [like] a wild ass. How appropriately this description was given to the descendants of Ishmael, will readily appear by comparing the character of the wild ass in Job xxxix. 5-8, with the wandering, lawless, and freebooting lives of the Arabs of the Desert, as portrayed by all travellers. Psal. xl. 1. Flee [as] sparrows to your mountain. Psal. xli. 6. The words of the Lord are pure words, [as] silver tried in a furnace of earth. Isaiah ix. 18. They shall mount up [as or like] the ascending of smoke. Similar examples occur in the New Testament; as in John v. 17. My father worketh hitherto, and I work; that is, as my Father worketh hitherto, so also do I work together with him. Sometimes particles are wanting both at the beginning and end of a sentence: thus Job xxiv. 19. [As] drought and heat consume the snow; so do the grave those which have sinned. Jer. xvii. 11. [As] the partridge sitteth on eggs, and hatcheth not; [so] he that getteth riches and not by right, &c. Numerous similar instances occur in the book of Job, and especially in the Proverbs; where, if it is but justice to our admirable authorized version to add, that the particles omitted are properly supplied in Italic characters, and thus complete the sense.

2. Examine the entire passage with minute attention.

Sometimes a single passage will require a whole chapter, or several of the preceding and following chapters, or even the entire book, to be perused, and that not once or twice, but several times. The advantage of this practice will be very great: because, as the same thing is frequently stated more briefly in the former part of a book, which is more clearly and fully explained in the subsequent portion, such a perusal will render every thing plain to the meanest capacity. For instance, that otherwise difficult passage, Rom. ix. 18. Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth, will become perfectly clear by a close examination of the context, beginning at verse 18. of chap. viii., and reading to the end of the eleventh chapter; this portion of the epistle being most intimately connected. Disregarding this simple and all but self-evident canon, some expositors have explained 1 Pet. ii. 8. as meaning that certain persons were absolutely appointed to destruction; a notion, not only contradicting the whole tenor of Scripture, but also repugnant to every idea which we are there taught to entertain of the mercy and justice of God. An attentive consideration of the context and of the proper punctuation of the passage alluded to (for the most ancient manuscripts have scarcely any points), would have prevented them from giving so repulsive an interpretation. The first epistle of Peter (it should be recollected) was addressed to believing Jews.⁵ After congratulating them on their happiness in being called to the glorious privileges and hopes of the Gospel, he takes occasion to expatiate upon the sublime manner in which it was introduced, both by the prophets and apostles; and having enforced his general exhortations to watchfulness, &c. by an affecting representation of our relation to God, our redemption by the precious blood of Christ, the vanity of all worldly enjoyments, and the excellence and perpetuity of the Gospel dispensation (ch. i. throughout)—he proceeds (in 1-12) to urge them, by a representation of their Christian privileges, to receive the word of God with meekness, to continue in the exercise of faith in Christ as the great foundation of their eternal hopes, and to maintain such an exemplary conduct as might adorn his Gospel among the unconverted Gentiles. Wherefore, says he, in consideration of the ever lasting permanency and invariable certainty of the word of God, laying aside all malice, and all guile, and hypocrisies, and envies, and all evil speakings, which are so contrary to its benevolent design, with all simplicity, as new-born babes (or infants), who are regenerated by divine grace, desire the sincere milk of the word, that ye may grow thereby [unto salvation]. Since (or seeing that) you have tasted that the Lord is gracious. To whom coming as unto a living stone, discoloured indeed of men, but chosen of God, and precious, Ye also (who believe), as living stones are built up a spiritual house, an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices by Jesus Christ. (Wherefore also it is contained in the Scripture, Behold I lay in Zion a chief corner-stone, &c., precious; and he that believeth on it (confideth in it) shall not be confounded, or ashamed). Unto you, therefore, who believe, he is precious; but unto them that disbelieve, whereunto they were appointed, the stone which the builders discoloured, the same is become the head of the corner, and a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence. They disbelieving the word (το λογον απιστουσιν), that is the word of the Gospel, which contains this testimony, stumble at this corner-stone, whereunto they were appointed. But ye (believers, who rest your salvation on it) are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a peculiar people, &c. &c. Hence, it is evident, that the meaning of 1 Pet. ii. 8. is not, that God had ordained them to disobedience (for in that case their obedience would have been impossible, and their disobedience would have been sin); but that God, the righteous judge of all the earth, had appointed, or decreed, that destruction and eternal perdition should be the punishment of such believing persons, who wilfully rejected all the evidences that Jesus Christ was the Messiah, the Saviour of the world. The mode of pointing above adopted, is that proposed by Drs. John Taylor, Doddridge, and Macknight, and recognised by Griesbach in his critical edition of the Greek Testament, and is manifestly required by the context.

3. A verse or passage must not be connected with a remote context, unless the latter agree better with it than a nearer context.

² This expression very emphatically denotes those who are newly converted or regenerated, as the apostle had said (1 Pet. i. 23.) the believing Jews were, through the incorruptible word of God. It is well known that the ancient Jewish rabbies styled new proselytes to their religion, little children and new-born babes; and Peter, who was a Jew, very naturally adopts the same phraseology, when writing to Jewish converts to the Gospel.

³ These words [unto salvation, εἰς σωτηριαν], though omitted in the common printed editions, are, by Griesbach, inserted in the text, of which they form an integral part. They are found in the Codices Alexandrinus, Vaticanus, and Ephreni (the three oldest manuscripts extant); in thirty-nine others of good authority, though of less antiquity; and also in the Old Syriac, the Peshito (or later) Syriac, the Arabic, edited by Erpenius, the Coptic, Ethiopic, Armenian, Slavonic, and Vulgate versions, and are quoted by Clement Alexandrinus, Origen, Cyril, Joannes Damascenus, and Theophylact, among the Greek Fathers; and by the Latin Fathers, Jerome, Rufinus, Augustine, Gildas, Cassiodorus, and the venerable Bede. This reading is, therefore, undoubtedly genuine, and is of great importance. It shows the reason why the believing Jews were regenerated, and also why they were to desire the unadulterated doctrines of the Gospel, viz. that they might thereby increase, or grow up, unto salvation. This was the end they should always have in view; and nothing could so effectually promote this end, as continually receiving the pure truth of God, praying for the fulfilment of his promises, and acting under its dictates.

⁴ The verb πιστευω (whence the particle πιστουσιν), and its derivative substantive πιστις, signify such a disbelief, as constitutes the party guilty of obstinacy, or wilful refusal to credit a doctrine or narrative. In the New Testament it is specially used concerning those who obstinately persist in rejecting the doctrine of the Gospel, regardless of all the evidences that accompanied it. Thus, in John iii. 36. πιστευειτω υμεις, οτι ο υιος ουκ εστι ο υιος. So in Acts xiv. 2, those Jews who stirred up the Gentiles, and made them evil affected towards the brethren, are termed πιστευοντες τω υιο, the disbelievers (or, as it is not ill rendered in our authorized version), the unbelieving or wilfully incredulous Jews, who are opposed to the great multitude both of the Jews and also of the Greeks, who believed, πιστευοντες, (verse 1). The same verb is found in Acts xvii. 5, and xix. 2. Rom. xi. 30, 31, and 1 Pet. iii. 1. (Gr.), in which last place Saint Peter exhorts wives, who believed the Gospel, to be in subjection to their husbands, that if any, πιστευουσιν το λογον, disbelieve the word, they may also without the word be won over to the Gospel, i.e. the exemplary conversation of the wives. The lexicographer Suidas, as cited by Schleusner, in note, to whom we are chiefly indebted for this note), considers πιστευω as synonymous with απιστευω. Απιστευω δεσιν απιστευω.

For examples, in which the derivative substantive απιστις means disbelief, or contempt of the Christian doctrine, see Schleusner's Lexicon sub voce.

² They are considered, and translated as one Psalm, by Bishop Horsley. See his Version of the Psalms, vol. i. pp. 110-114, and the notes.

³ See particularly, tract v., viii. on adverbs, prepositions, and conjunctions, tom. i. pp. 361-556. ed. Dathili.

Thus, Rom. ii. 16., although it makes a good sense if connected with the preceding verse, makes a much better when joined with verse 12 (the intermediate verses being read parenthetically as in the authorized version); and this shows it to be the true and proper context.

4. Examine whether the writer continues his discourse, lest we suppose him to make a transition to another argument, when, in fact, he is prosecuting the same topic.

Rom. v. 12. will furnish an illustration of this remark. From that verse to the end of the chapter Saint Paul produces a strong argument to prove, that as all men stood in need of the grace of God in Christ to redeem them from their sins, so this grace has been afforded equally to all, whether Jews or Gentiles. To perceive the full force, therefore, of the apostle's conclusion, we must read the continuation of this argument from verse 12. to the close of the chapter.

5. The parentheses which occur in the sacred writings should be particularly regarded: but no parenthesis should be interposed without sufficient reason.

Sometimes the grammatical construction, with which a sentence begins, is interrupted; and is again resumed by the writer after a larger or shorter digression. This is termed a parenthesis.

Parentheses being contrary to the genius and structure of the Hebrew language, are, comparatively, of rare occurrence in the Old Testament. In fact, as there is no sign whatever for it in Hebrew, the sense only can determine when it is to be used.

The prophetic writings, indeed, contain interruptions and intercolutions, particularly those of Jeremiah; but we have an example of a real parenthesis in Zech. vii. 7. The Jewish captives had sent to inquire of the prophet, whether their fasting should be continued on account of the burning of the temple, and the assassination of Gedaliah; after a considerable digression, but closely connected with the question proposed, the prophet at length replies, in ch. viii. 19, that the season formerly devoted to fasting should soon be spent in joy and gladness. The intermediate verses, therefore, from ch. vii. 4. to ch. viii. 17., are obviously parenthetical, though not marked as such in any of the modern versions which we have had an opportunity to examine.

A remarkable instance of complicated parenthetical expression occurs in Dan. vii. 2. And I saw in vision (and when I saw I was in Shushan), and I saw (I was then by the waters of Ulai), and I lifted up my eyes, and saw and beheld! &c. See other instances in Gen. xxiv. 10. 2 Chron. xxxii. 9. Exod. xii. 15. Psal. xlv. 6. Isa. lli. 14.

In the New Testament, however, parentheses are frequent, especially in the writings of St. Paul; who, after making numerous digressions (all of them appropriate to, and illustrative of, his main subject), returns to the topic which he had begun to discuss. They are generally introduced in the following manner:—

(1.) Where the parenthesis is short, it is inserted without hesitation between two clauses which are grammatically connected, and then after the conclusion of the parenthesis, the latter clause proceeds, as if no interruption had taken place. Thus:—

i. In Acts i. 15. Peter... said the number of names together was about an hundred and twenty, &c. Men and brethren, &c.

ii. Rom. viii. 19–21. The application of the parenthesis will render this very difficult passage perfectly easy. The earnest expectation of the creation waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God: (for the creation, γὰρ... ὑποτάχθη, &c.)... was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who subjected it in hope that the creation itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the sons of God.

iii. 1 Cor. xv. 52. At the last trumpet: (for the trumpet shall sound, &c.) and we shall be changed; &c. for this corruptible must put on incorruption, &c.

Similar parentheses occur in 2 Cor. vi. 2. x. 3. 4. Gal. ii. 8. A parenthesis of considerable length is in this way inserted in Rom. ii. 13–16. In cases of this kind the parenthesis is commonly indicated by the particles καὶ, καὶ, &c. at its commencement. See the examples above adduced, and Rom. i. 20. x. 3., and Heb. vii. 20, &c.

(2.) When the parenthesis is longer, the principal word or words of the preceding clause are repeated, with or without variation, after the parenthesis.

i. 1 Cor. viii. 1–4. Now as touching things offered unto idols (we know that we all have knowledge. Knowledge puffeth up, but charity edifieth, &c.)... as concerning those things that are offered in sacrifice unto idols we know that an idol is nothing, &c. Similar instances occur in John vi. 22–24. Eph. ii. 1–5. 12–19. and Rev. iii. 8–10: and the observant student of the New Testament will easily be enabled to supply other examples.

Another instance of the parenthesis we have in Phil. i. 27. to chap. ii. 16. inclusive: in which the apostle discusses a subject, the proposition of which is contained in ch. i. 27.; and afterwards in ch. ii. 17. he returns to the topic which he had been treating in the preceding chapter. "In conformity with this statement we find (ch. i. 23.), that Saint Paul says, he is influenced by two things—a desire both of life and death; but he knows not which of these to choose. Death is the most desirable to himself; but the welfare of the Philippians requires rather that he may be spared a little longer; and, having this confidence, he is assured that his life will be lengthened; and that he shall see them again in person. Then, after the interruption which his discourse had received, he proceeds (ch. ii. 17.) as follows:—

³ Winer's Grammar to the Gr. Test. p. 164. Some observations on Parentheses will be found in Franck's Guide to the Scriptures, pp. 183, 189. Mr. Jacques's Translation.) 1st edit.

"Yea, and if I be offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith, I joy and rejoice with you all. The intervening charge is happily and judiciously introduced by the apostle in order that the Philippians might not remit their exertions until his arrival, but contend for the faith of the Gospel with unity and humility; as will be evident to those who examine the point with attention and candour."

ii. To this class we may refer the following beautiful example of the parenthesis, in 2 Tim. i. 16–18. The apostle acknowledging the intrepid affection of Onesiphorus—who, when timorous professors deserted him, stood by him and ministered to him—begins with a prayer for the good man's family: The Lord grant mercy to the house of Onesiphorus, for he often refreshed me, and was not ashamed of my chains, but, being in Rome, very carefully sought me, and found me out. St. Paul then stops his period, and suspends his sentence, to repeat his acknowledgments and prayer with renewed fervour and gratitude—(The Lord grant that he may find mercy from the Lord in that day, and in how many instances he ministered to me at Ephesus, you very well know. If we peruse the choicest authors of Greece and Rome, we shall scarcely find, among their many parentheses and transpositions of style, one expressed in so pathetic and lively a manner, nor for a reason so substantial and unexceptionable.)

Additional instances might be offered, to show the importance of attending to parentheses in the examination of the context. The preceding will abundantly suffice for this purpose. The author has been led to discuss them at greater length than may seem to have been requisite, from the circumstances, that less attention appears to be given to the parenthesis, than to any other species of punctuation, in the different works on the study of the Scriptures, in our language, that have fallen under his notice.

6. No explanation must be admitted, but that which suits the context.

In direct violation of this self-evident canon of interpretation, the church of Rome expounds Matt. xviii. 17. if a man neglect to hear the church, let him be unto thee as a heathen man and as a publican, of the infallibility and final decisions of all doctrines by the (Roman) Catholic church. But what says the evangelist? Let us read the context. "If," says our Lord, thy brother shall trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone: if he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother. But if he will not hear, take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of one or two witnesses every word may be established. And if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it unto the church: but if he neglect to hear the church, let him be unto thee as a heathen man and a publican. (verses 15–17.) That is, if a man have done you an injury, first admonish him privately of it; if that avail not, tell the church;—not the universal church dispersed throughout the world, but that particular church to which you both belong. And if he will not reform upon such reproof, regard him no longer as a true Christian, but as a wicked man with whom you are to hold no religious communion, though, as a fellow-man, you owe him earnest and persevering good-will and acts of kindness. Through the whole of this context there is not one word said about disobeying the determination of the Catholic church concerning a disputed doctrine, but about slighting the admonition of a particular church concerning known sin; and particular churches are owned to be fallible.

7. Where no connection is to be found with the preceding and subsequent parts of a book, none should be sought.

This observation applies solely to the Proverbs of Solomon, and chiefly to the tenth and following chapters, which form the second part of that book: and are composed of separate proverbs or distinct sentences, having no real or verbal connection whatever, though each individual maxim is pregnant with the most weighty instruction.

From the preceding remarks it will be evident, that, although the comparison of the context will require both labour and unremitting diligence, yet these will be abundantly compensated by the increased degree of light which will thus be thrown upon otherwise obscure passages. The very elaborate treatise of Franzius, already referred to, will supply numerous examples of the Holy Scriptures, which are rendered perfectly clear by the judicious consideration of the context.

§ 2. OF THE SUBJECT-MATTER.

such cases is not so great but that it may in general be removed, and the proper signification of the passage in question may be determined: for the SUBJECT-MATTER—that is, the topic of which the author is treating—plainly shows the sense which is to be attached to any particular word. For there is a great variety of agents introduced in the Scriptures, whose words and actions are recorded.

Some parts of the Bible are written in a responsive or dialogue form: as the twenty-fourth Psalm, Isa. vi. 3. and Rom. iii. 1—9. And the sense of a text is frequently mistaken, by not observing who is the speaker, and what is the specific topic of which he treats; and also by not attending to the frequent and very elegant changes and successions of persons occurring in the Scriptures, and especially in the prophetic writings. One or two examples will illustrate the necessity of considering the subject-matter.

1. The Hebrew word בשר (ne-sien) literally signifies the skin; by a metonymy, the flesh beneath the skin; and by a synecdoche it denotes very animal, especially man considered as infirm or weak, as in Jer. xvi. 5. Cursed be the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm; there are also several other meanings derived from these, which it is not material now to notice. But that the word flesh is to be understood of man only in Gen. vi. 12. Psal. lxx. 2. and Job x. 4. will be evident on the slightest inspection of the subject-matter. All flesh had corrupted his way—that is, all men had wholly departed from the rule of righteousness, or had made their way of life abominable throughout the world. And, in the Psalm above cited, who can doubt but that by the word flesh men are intended: O thou that hearest prayer, unto thee shall all flesh, that is, all mankind come. In like manner, also, in Job x. 4. it is evident that flesh has the same meaning; if, indeed, the passage were at all obscure, the parallelism would explain it: Fast thou the eyes of a man (Heb. of fle 3) or, seest thou as men are.

2. The first chapter of the prophecy of Isaiah affords an apposite elucidation of attending to the changes and successions of persons occurring in the Scriptures. Jehovah is there represented as including his disobedient people, Israel. The prophet, with a boldness and majesty becoming the herald of the Most High, begins with summoning the whole creation to attend when Jehovah speaks. (ver. 2.) A charge of gross insensibility is in the next verse brought against the Jews, whose guilt is amplified (ver. 4); and their obstinate wickedness highly aggravated the chastisements and judgments of God, though repeated till they had almost been left like Sodom and Gomorrah. (v. 5—9.) The incidental mention of these places leads the prophet to address the rulers and people of the Jews, under the character of the princes of Sodom and Gomorrah, in a style not less spirited and severe, than it is elegant and unexpected. (10.) The vanity of trusting to the performance of the external rites and ceremonies of religion is then exposed (11—15), and the necessity of repentance and reformation is strongly enjoined (16, 17), and urged by the most encouraging promises, as well as by the most awful threatenings. (18—20.) But, as neither of these produced the proper effect upon that people, who were the prophet's charge, he bitterly laments their degeneracy (21—23), and concludes with introducing the Almighty himself, declaring his purpose of inflicting such heavy judgments as would entirely cut off the wicked, and exalte in the righteous, who should pass through the furnace, an everlasting shame and abhorrence of every thing connected with idolatry, the source of all their misery. (24—31.) The whole chapter, in loftiness of sentiment, and style, affords a beautiful example of this great prophet's manner, whose writings, like his lips, are touched with hallowed fire.

But it is not merely with reference to the meaning of particular passages that a consideration of the subject-matter becomes necessary to the right understanding of Scripture. It is further of the greatest importance in order to comprehend the various dispensations of God to man, which are contained in the sacred writings. For although the Bible comprises a great number of books, written at different times, yet they have a mutual connection with each other, and refer, in the Old Testament, with various but progressively increasing degrees of light and clearness, to a future Saviour, and in the New Testament to a present Saviour. With reference, therefore, to the several divine dispensations to man, the subject-matter of the whole Bible ought to be attentively considered; but, as each individual book embraces a particular subject, it will also be requisite carefully to weigh its subject-matter, in order to comprehend the design of the author. An analysis of each book will materially assist a reader of the Scriptures in forming a comprehensive view not only of its chief subject-matter, but will also show the methodical and orderly coherence of all the parts of the book with one another. Such an analysis the author has attempted in the second volume of this work. "Books," says an old writer, "looked upon confusedly, are but darkly and confusedly apprehended; but considered distinctly, as in these distinct analyses or resolutions into their principal parts, must needs be distinctly and much more clearly discerned."

* Bp. Lowth's Isaiab. vol. ii. pp. 4—27. See, edit. Vitringa, in his comment on the same prophet, eminently excels in pointing out the rapid transitions of persons, places, and things. Van Til, in his celebrated Opus Analyticum, has ably noticed various similar transitions in the Scriptures generally, and in the Psalms in particular, though in the last-mentioned book he has sometimes unnecessarily multiplied the speakers introduced. The value of Dr. Macknight's version and paraphrase of the Epistle to the Romans is enhanced by his distinguishing between the objections brought by the Jews whom St. Paul introduces as arguing with him, and the replies and conclusive reasonings of the apostle.

§ 3. OF THE SCOPE.

1. The scope defined.—Importance of investigating the scope of a book or passage of Scripture.—II. Rules for investigating it.

I. A CONSIDERATION of the SCOPE, or DESIGN, which the inspired author of any of the books of Scripture had in view, essentially facilitates the study of the Bible: because, as every writer had some design which he proposed to unfold, and as it is not to be supposed that he would express himself in terms foreign to that design, it therefore is but reasonable to admit that he made use of such words and phrases as were every way suited to his purpose. To be acquainted, therefore, with the scope of an author is to understand the chief part of his book. The scope, it has been well observed, is the soul or spirit of a book; and that being once ascertained, every argument and every word appears in its right place and is perfectly intelligible; but, if the scope be not duly considered, every thing becomes obscure, however clear and obvious its meaning may really be.

The scope of an author is either general or special; by the former we understand the design which he proposed to himself in writing his book; by the latter we mean that design which he had in view when writing particular sections, or even smaller portions, of his book or treatise.

The means, by which to ascertain the scope of a particular section or passage, being nearly the same with those which must be applied to the investigation of the general scope of a book, we shall briefly consider them together in the following observations.

II. The Scope of a book of Scripture, as well as of any particular section or passage, is to be collected from the writer's express mention of it, from its known occasion, from some conclusion expressly added at the end of an argument: from history, from attention to its general tenor, to the main subject and tendency of the several topics, and to the force of the leading expressions; and especially from repeated, studious, and connected perusals of the book itself.

1. When the scope of a whole book, or of any particular portion of it, is expressly mentioned by the sacred writer, it should be carefully observed.

Of all criteria this is the most certain, by which to ascertain the scope of a book. Sometimes it is mentioned at its commencement, or towards its close, and sometimes it is intimated in other parts of the same book, rather obscurely, perhaps, yet in such a manner that a diligent and attentive reader may readily ascertain it. Thus the scope and end of the whole Bible, collectively, is contained in its manifold utility, which St. Paul expressly states in 2 Tim. iii. 16, 17. and also in Rom. xv. 4. In like manner, the royal author of Ecclesiastes announces pretty clearly, at the beginning of his book, the subject he intends to discuss, viz. to show that all human affairs are vain, uncertain, frail, and imperfect; and, such being the case, he proceeds to inquire, What profit hath a man of all his labour which he taketh under the sun? (Ecc. i. 2, 3.) And towards the close of the same book (ch. xii. 8.) he repeats the same subject, the truth of which he had proved by experience. So, in the commencement of the book of Proverbs, Solomon distinctly announces their scope. (ch. i. 1—4. 6.) "The Proverbs of Solomon, the Son of David king of Israel;—to know wisdom and instruction, to perceive the words of understanding; to receive the instruction of wisdom, justice, judgment, and equity; to give subtilty to the simple, to the young man knowledge and discretion; to understand a proverb, and the interpretation; the words of the wise, and their dark sayings."—Saint John, also, towards the close of his gospel, announces his object in writing it to be, "That ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that, believing, ye might have life through his name." Therefore, all those discourses of our Lord, which are recorded almost exclusively by this evangelist and apostle, are to be read and considered with reference to this particular design: and, if this circumstance be kept in view, they will derive much additional force and beauty.

Of the application of this rule to the illustration of a particular section, or the ascertaining of a special scope, the seventh chapter of Saint Paul's first epistle to the Corinthians will supply an example.—In that chapter, the object of which is to show that it was not good to marry, the apostle, in replying to the queries which had been proposed to him by the Corinthian converts; and it is evident that his reply is continued through the whole chapter. But did he mean to insinuate absolutely that matrimony in itself was not good? By no means: on the contrary, it is clear from the scope of this section, given by Saint Paul in express words, that his design was not, in general, to prefer a state of celibacy to that of marriage: much less

* "How unfair, how irrational, how arbitrary, is the mode of interpretation which many apply to the word of God? They insulate a passage; they fix on a sentence; they detach it from the paragraph to which it belongs, and explain it in a sense dictated only by the combination of the syllables or the words, in themselves considered. If the word of God be thus dissected or tortured, what language may it not seem to speak, what sentiments may it not appear to countenance, what fency may it not be made to gratify? But would such a mode of interpretation be tolerated by any living author? Would such a method be endured in commenting on any of the admired productions of classical antiquity? Yet in this case it would be comparatively harmless, although utterly intolerable: but who can calculate the amount of injury which may be sustained by the cause of revealed truth, if its pure streams be thus defiled, and if it be contaminated even at the very fountain head?" Rev. H. F. Burder's Sermon on the Duty and Means of ascertaining the Genuine Sense of the Scriptures, p. 2.

was it to teach that the living unmarried was either more holy or more acceptable to God; or that those who vow to lead a single life shall certainly obtain eternal salvation, as the church of Rome erroneously teaches from this place. But we perceive that he answered the question proposed to him with reference to the then existing circumstances of the Christian church. The apostle thought that a single life was preferable on account of the present distress—that is, the sufferings to which they were then liable. The persecutions to which they were exposed, when they came upon them, would be more grievous and afflictive to such as had a wife and children who were dear to them, than to those who were single; and, therefore, under such circumstances, the apostle recommends celibacy to those who had the gift of living chastely without marriage.

2. The scope of the sacred writer may be ascertained from the known occasion on which his book was written.

Thus in the time of the apostles, there were many who disseminated errors, and defended Judaism; hence it became necessary that the apostles should frequently write against these errors, and oppose the defenders of Judaism. Such was the occasion of Saint Peter's second epistle: and this circumstance will also afford a key by which to ascertain the scope of many of the other epistolary writings. Of the same description also were many of the parables delivered by Jesus Christ. When any question was proposed to him, or he was reproached for holding intercourse with publicans and sinners, he availed himself of the occasion to reply, or to defend himself by a parable. Sometimes, also, when his disciples laboured under any mistakes, he kindly corrected their erroneous notions by parables.

The inscriptions prefixed to many of the Psalms, though some of them are evidently spurious, and consequently to be rejected, frequently indicate the occasion on which they were composed, and thus reflect considerable light upon their scope. Thus the scope of the 18th, 34th, and 3d Psalms is illustrated from their respective inscriptions, which distinctly assert upon what occasions they were composed by David. In like manner, many of the prophecies, which would otherwise be obscure, become perfectly clear when we understand the circumstances on account of which the predictions were uttered.

3. The express conclusion, added by the writer at the end of an argument, demonstrates its general scope.

Thus, in Rom. iii. 23. after a long discussion, Saint Paul adds this conclusion:—Therefore we conclude, that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law: Hence we perceive with what design the whole passage was written, and to which all the rest is to be referred. The conclusions interpersed through the epistles may easily be ascertained by means of the particles, "wherefore," "seeing that," "therefore," "then," &c. as well as by the circumstances directly mentioned or referred to. The principal conclusions, however, must be separated from those which are of comparatively less importance, and subordinate to the former. Thus in the epistle to Philemon, our attention must chiefly be directed to verses 8 and 17, whence we collect that Saint Paul's design or scope was to reconcile Onesimus (who had been a runaway slave) to his master, and to restore him to the latter, a better person than he had before been. In the Epistle to the Ephesians, the principal conclusions are, ch. ii. 11, 12, and ch. iv. 1, 3. The subordinate or less principal conclusions are ch. i. 15. iii. 13. iv. 17. 25. v. 1, 7. 15. 17. and vi. 13, 14.

4. A knowledge of the time when a book was written, and also of the state of the church at that time, will indicate the scope or intention of the author in writing such book.

For instance, we learn from history, that during the time of the apostles there were numerous errors disseminated; and therefore they wrote many passages in their epistles with the express design of refuting such errors. An acquaintance with these historical particulars will enable us to determine with accuracy the scope of entire books as well as of detached passages.

Thus, the epistle of Saint James was written about the year of Christ 61, at which time the Christians were suffering persecution, and probably (as appears from ch. ii. 6. and ch. v. 6.) not long before the apostle's martyrdom; which Bp. Pearson thinks, happened A. D. 62. in the eighth year of Nero's reign, when the destruction of the Jewish temple and polity was impending. (James v. 1. 8.) At the period referred to, there were in the church certain professing Christians, who in consequence of the sanguinary persecution then carried on against them both by Jews and Gentiles, were not only declining in faith and love, and indulging various sinful practices—for instance, undue respect of persons (chapter ii. verse 1. et seq.); contempt of their poor brethren (chapter ii. verse 9. et seq.); and unbridled freedom of speech (chapter iii. verse 3. et seq.); but who also most shamefully abused to licentiousness the grace of God, which in the Gospel is promised to the penitent; and, disregarding holiness, boasted of a faith destitute of its appropriate fruits, viz. of a bare assent to the doctrines of the Gospel; and boldly affirmed that this inoperative and dead faith was alone sufficient to obtain salvation. (chapter ii. verse 17. et seq.) Hence we may easily perceive, that the apostle's scope was not to treat of the doctrine of justification; but, the state of the church requiring it, to correct those errors in doctrine, and those sinful practices, which had crept into the church, and particularly to expose that fundamental error of a dead faith unproductive of good works. This observation further shows the true way of reconciling the supposed contradiction between the apostles Paul and James, concerning the doctrine of salvation by faith.

5. If, however, none of these subsidiary aids present themselves, it only remains that we repeatedly and diligently study the entire book, as well as the whole subject, and carefully ascertain the scope from them, before we attempt an examination of any particular text.

Thus we shall be enabled to understand the mind of its author, and to ascertain the main subject and tendency of the book or epistle which may be under consideration: or, if it have several views and purposes in it, not mutually dependent upon each other, nor in subordination to one chief end, we shall be enabled to discover what those different matters were, as also in what part the author concluded one and began another; and, if it be necessary to divide such book or epistle into parts, to ascertain their exact boundaries.

But in this investigation of the scope, there is not always that clearness which leads to a certain interpretation: for sometimes there are several interpretations which sufficiently agree with the writer's design. In those places, for instance, where the coming of Christ is mentioned, it is not always determined whether it is his last advent to judge the world, or his coming to inflict punishment on the unbelieving Jews. In such cases, the interpreter must be content with some degree of probability. There are, however, two or three cautions, in the consideration of the scope, to which it will be desirable to attend.

1. Where, of two explanations, one is evidently contrary to the series of the discourse, the other must necessarily be preferred.

In Psal. xlii. 2. the royal psalmist pathetically exclaims—When shall I come and appear before God?—This verse has, by some writers, been expounded thus; that a man may wish for death, in order that he may the sooner enjoy that state of future blessedness which is sometimes intended by the phrase seeing God. Now this exposition is manifestly contrary to the design of the Psalm; in which David, exiled from Jerusalem, and consequently from the house of God, through Absalom's unnatural rebellion, expresses his fervent desire of returning to Jerusalem, and beholding that happy day, when he should again present himself before God in his holy tabernacle. In the fourth verse he mentions the sacred pleasure with which he had gone (or would repair, for some of the versions render the verb in the future tense) with the multitude to the house of God. There is, therefore, in this second sense a necessary and evident connection with the scope and series of the discourse.

In 1 Cor. iii. 17. we read, If any man defile (more correctly destroy) the temple of God, him shall God destroy. The phrase temple of God, in this passage, is usually interpreted of the human body, and by its defilement is understood libidinous unchastity, which God will destroy by inflicting corresponding punishment on the libidinous man. This sense is certainly a good one, and is confirmed by a similar expression at the close of the sixth chapter. But, in the former part of the third chapter, the apostle had been giving the teachers of the Corinthian Christians an important caution to teach pure and salutary doctrines, together with that momentous doctrine—Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ (v. 11.)—and that they should not add false doctrines to it. After largely discussing this topic, he subsequently returns to it, and the passage above cited occurs immediately. From this view of the scope it will be evident that by the temple of God is to be understood the Christian church; which, if any man defile, corrupt, or destroy, by disseminating false doctrines, God will destroy him also.

2. Where a parallel passage plainly shows that another passage is to be understood in one particular sense, this must be adopted, to the exclusion of every other sense, although it should be supported by the grammatical interpretation as well as by the scope.

Thus, in Matt. v. 25. we read—Agree with thine adversary quickly, whilst thou art in the way with him; lest at any time the adversary deliver thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the officer, and thou be cast into prison. This passage has been interpreted to refer either to a future state of existence, or to the present life. In the former sense, the adversary is God; the judge, Christ; the officer, death; and the prison, hell and eternal punishments. In the latter sense, the meaning of this passage simply is, "If thou hast a lawsuit, compromise it with the plaintiff, and thus prevent the necessity of prosecuting it before a judge; but if thou art headstrong, and wilt not compromise the affair, when it comes to be argued before the judge, he will be severe, and will decree that thou shalt pay the uttermost farthing." Now, both these expositions yield good senses, agreeing with the scope, and both contain a cogent argument that we should be easily appeased: but if we compare the parallel passage in Luke xii. 58, 59. we shall find the case thus stated:—When thou goest with thine adversary to the magistrate, as thou art in the way, give diligence that thou mayest be delivered from him, lest he hale thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the officer (το πρακτερι, whose duty it was to levy fines imposed for the violation of the law); and the officer on non-payment cast thee into prison. I tell thee thou shalt not depart thence till thou hast paid the very last mite. In this passage there is no reference whatever to a future state, nor to any punishments which will hereafter be inflicted on the implacable; and thus a single parallel text shows which of the two senses best agrees with the scope of the discourse, and consequently which of them is preferably to be adopted.

§ 4. ANALOGY OF LANGUAGES.

I. Analogy of languages defined.—Its different kinds.—II. Use of grammatical analogy.—III. Analogy of kindred languages.—IV. Hints for consulting this analogy in the interpretation of Scripture.—V. Foundation of analogy in all languages.

I. ANALOGY of languages is an important aid in enabling us to judge of the signification of words.

Analogy means similitude. For instance, from the meaning attached to the forms of words, their position, connection, &c. in one, or rather in many cases, we agree to establish a similarity of meaning, where the phenomena are the same, in another. This analogy is the foundation of all the rules of grammar, and of all that is established and intelligible in language. The analogy of languages is of different kinds, viz. 1. the Analogy of any particular Language (that is, of the same language with that which is to be interpreted), the principles of which are developed by grammarians. This kind of analogy has been termed Grammatical Analogy. 2. The Analogy of kindred Languages.¹

II. USE OF GRAMMATICAL ANALOGY.

Grammatical analogy is not only useful in finding the usages loquendi, but is also applicable to some doubtful cases; for instance, when the kind of meaning, generally considered, is evident (by comparing other similar words, and methods of speaking concerning such things, appropriate to the language), we may judge of the especial force or power of the word, by the aid of grammatical analogy.

1. In Col. ii. 23. occurs the word θελοδουσκια, in our version rendered will-worship. As there is no example of this word, its meaning must be sought from analogy by ascertaining the import of words compounded with θελα. Of this description of words there are many examples. Thus, θελοπροξενος is one who takes upon him voluntarily to afford hospitality to strangers, in the name of a city: θελοδουλος is one who offers himself to voluntary servitude: θελοεργος is one who labours of his own free will. From this analogy, we may collect that θελοδουσκια, in Col. ii. 23., means an affected or superstitious zeal for religion; which signification is confirmed by the argument of the apostle's discourse.

2. In 1 Pet. v. 5. where many critics have attached an emphatic sense to καταπαύσαι, we must compare the other Greek phrases which relate to clothing or investing; and thus we shall see that the prepositions παι, αυρι, and νι, are used in composition without any accession of meaning to the verb thereby; for instance, ιματιον περιελλων, αμφελλων, οιμαλλων, simply means to put on a garment. Consequently, καταπαύσαι means no more than εμπασθαι, with which it is commuted by Clemens Romanus.² The meaning, therefore, of the apostle Peter's expression — be clothed with humility — is to exhibit a modest behaviour.

III. ANALOGY OF KINDRED LANGUAGES.

Another analogy is that of KINDRED LANGUAGES, either as descended from one common stock, as the Hebrew, Syriac, Chaldee, and Arabic; or derived the one from the other, as Latin and Greek.

Besides the critical use to which the Cognate or Kindred Languages³ may be applied, they afford very considerable assistance in interpreting the Sacred Writings. They confirm by their own authority a Hebrew form of speech, already known to us from some other source: they supply the deficiencies of the Hebrew language, and make us fully acquainted with the force and meaning of obscure words and phrases, of which we must otherwise remain ignorant, by restoring the lost roots of words, as well as the primary and secondary meaning of such roots; by illustrating words, the meaning of which has hitherto been uncertain, and by unfolding the meanings of other words that are of less frequent occurrence, or are only once found in the Scriptures. Further, the cognate languages are the most successful, if not the only means of leading us to understand the meaning of phrases, or idiomatical combinations of words found in the Bible, and the meaning of which cannot be determined by it, but which, being agreeable to the genius of the original languages, are preserved in books written in them. Schultens, in his Origines Hebrææ,⁴ has illustrated a great number of passages from the Arabic, from whose work Bauer⁵ and Dr. Gerard⁶ has given many examples which do not admit of abridgment. Schleusner has also availed himself of the cognate dialects to illustrate many important passages of the New Testament. Of the various modern commentators on the Bible, no one perhaps has more successfully applied the kindred languages to its interpretation than Dr. Adam Clarke.

IV. In consulting the cognate languages, however, much care and attention are requisite, lest we should be led away by any verbal or literal resemblance that may strike the mind, and above all by mere etymologies, which, though in some instances they may be advantageously referred to, are often uncertain guides. The resemblance or analogy must be a real one. We must, therefore, compare not only similar words and phrases, but also similar modes of speech, which, though perhaps differing as to the etymology of the words, are yet evidently employed to designate the same idea. The following examples will illustrate this remark:—

1. In 1 Cor. iii. 15. St. Paul, speaking of certain Christian teachers at Corinth, observes, that “if any man's work shall be burnt, he shall suffer loss, but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire.” On this passage, by a forced and erroneous construction, has the church of Rome erected the doctrine of purgatory, a place in which she pretends that the just, who depart out of this life, expiate certain offences that do not merit eternal damnation. Let us, however, consider the subject-matter of the apostle's discourse in his Epistle to the Corinthians. Reflecting on the divisions which were among them, and on that diversity of teachers who formed them into different parties, he compares these to various builders; some of whom raised a edifice upon the only foundation, Jesus Christ, composed of gold silver, and precious stones; in other words, who preached the pure, vital, and uncorrupted doctrines of the Gospel; while others, upon the same foundation, built wood, hay, stubble, that is, disseminated false, vain, and corrupt doctrines. Of both these structures, he says (v. 13.), Every man's work shall be made manifest; for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try (rather prove) every man's work of what sort it is:—either the day of the heavy trial of persecution, or rather the final judgment of God, shall try every man's work, search it as thoroughly as fire does things that are put into it. Then, adds the apostle, if any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, if the doctrines he hath taught bear the test, as silver, gold, and precious stones abide in the fire, he shall receive a reward. But if any man's work shall be burnt, if, on that trial, it be found that he has introduced false or unsound doctrines, he shall be like a man, whose building, being of wood, hay, and stubble, is consumed by the fire; all his pains in building are lost, and his works destroyed and gone. But (rather yet) if he be upon the whole a good man, who hath built upon Christ as the foundation, and on the terms of the Gospel committed himself to him, he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire, ὡς διὰ πυρός, that is, not without extreme hazard and difficulty, as a man is preserved from the flames of his house when he escapes naked through them, and thus narrowly saves his life, though with the loss of all his property. This expression is proverbial concerning persons who escape with great hazard out of imminent danger; and similar expressions are to be found in the Old Testament, as in Amos iv. 11, 13 and Zech. iii. 2., and also in the Epistle of Jude, ver. 23. Now, let this phrase be compared with the Latin words ambustus and semustus. Livy, speaking of Lucius Æmilius Paulus, says, that he had very narrowly escaped being sentenced to punishment, prope ambustus evaserat (lib. xxii. c. 35.); and again (c. 40.) the consul is represented as saying that he had, in his former consulate, escaped the flames of the popular rage not without being scorched, se populare incendium semustum evasisse.⁷

² Grotius, in his note on this passage, has remarked that a similar mode of speaking obtained among the Greeks, ὡς διὰ πυρός, or, ὡς ἐκ πυρός, but he has not cited any examples. Palaircit cites the following passage from one of the orations of Aristides; who, speaking of Apelles, says that the gods saved him out of the midst of the fire, ἐκ μέγας πυρός. Test. p. 286. ὡς διὰ πυρός. Observations Philologico-Critice in Nov. Test. p. 286. Some additional instances are given in Elsnser's Observationes Sacre in Novi Fœderis Libros, vol. ii. p. 78. See Bishop Porteus's Brief Confutation of the Errors of the Church of Rome, pp. 48, 49, 12no. London, 1796; and Bishop Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. ii. pp. 347–351; Drs. ³ Cicero (Orat. pro Milone, c. 5.) has the following passage:—“Declarant hujus ambusti irribus plebis ille intermortuus conciones, quibus quotidie meum potentiam invidiose criminabatur” (tom. vi. p. 91. edit. Bipont.). and in his second pleading against Verres, the following sentence, which is still more fully in point:—“Sic iste (Verres) nullo sceleratorum et nequiorum quam ille Hadriani, aliquanto etiam felicius fuit. Ille quod ejus avaritiam cives Romani ferre non poterant, Uicem domi suæ vivus exustus est; ille ita illi merito accidisse existimatio est, ut lætarentur omnes nequique animadvertio constitueretur: hic sociorum ambustus incendio, tamen ex illa flamma periculoque evolat,” &c. Here, also, there is no verbal resemblance between the expression of Saint Paul and those of the Roman historian, yet the real analogy is very striking, and shows that the apostle employed a well known proverbial expression, referring solely to a narrow escape from difficulty, and not, as the Romanists erroneously assert, to the fire of purgatory, a doctrine which is justly characterized as "a fond thing, vainly invented, and grounded upon no warranty of Scripture, but rather repugnant to the word of God."¹

2. The sentence in Gen. xlix., nor a lawgiver from between his feet, has greatly exercised the ingenuity of commentators. It is at present considered as equivalent to a teacher from his offspring. But, without altogether rejecting this interpretation, we may derive some light on the venerable patriarch's meaning from the Greek writers, among whom the expression of Moses occurs in the very same terms. Thus in the age of Plato we have α ταν πδων αυτου σφισιν. In other writers the expression is α τδων, or α πδων γινεσθαι, which is equivalent to e medio discedere, e medio evadere, e conspectu abire, that is, to disappear.² The general meaning of Moses, therefore, may be, that a native lawgiver, or expounder of the law, teacher, or scribe (intimating the ecclesiastical polity of the Jews), should not be wanting to that people, until Shiloh, or the Messiah, come. How accurately this prediction has been accomplished it is not necessary to show in this place.

3. In Matt. viii. 20. we read that Christ had not where to lay his head: which expression has been interpreted as meaning that he had literally no home of his own. But considerable light is thrown upon it by two passages from the Arabic History of Abulpharagius; in the first of which, having stated that Saladin had animated his soldiers to the storming of Tyre, he says, that no place now remained to the Franks, where they could lay their head, except Tyre; and again, after relating that the Arabs had stormed Acca, or Ptolemais, he says that no place was left to the Franks, on the coast of this (the Mediterranean) Sea, where they could lay their head.³ From these two passages it is evident that the evangelist's meaning is, that Jesus Christ had no secure and fixed place of residence.

V. FOUNDATION OF ANALOGY IN ALL LANGUAGES.

No one can doubt that men are affected in nearly the same way, by objects of sense. Hence, those who speak of the same objects, perceived and contemplated in the same manner, although they may use language that differs in respect to etymology, yet must be supposed to have meant the same thing; and on this account the one may be explained by the other.

"Men are physically and mentally affected in the same manner, by very many objects; and, of course, it may be presumed that they entertain and, mean to express the same ideas concerning these objects, however various their language may be. Besides, modes of expression are often communicated from one people to another.

"In general, this principle is of great extent, and of much use to the interpreter, in judging of the meaning of tropical language, and in avoiding fictitious emphasis. Accordingly, we find it resorted to, now and then, by good interpreters, with great profit. But it needs much and accurate knowledge of many tongues to use it discreetly; whence it is not to be wondered at, that its use is not very common among interpreters."⁴

The following general cautions, on the subject of comparing words and languages with each other, may be of some utility: they are abridged from Dr. H. C. A. Richstädt's notes to Morus's Acroases Academicæ.

1. The meaning in each or any language is not to be resolved into the authority of Lexicons, but that of good writers.

2. Words, phrases, tropes, &c. of any ancient language are to be judged of by the rules of judging among those who spoke that language, and not by those which prevail in modern times, and which have originated from different habits and tastes.

The antiscritural doctrine of purgatory is copiously and ably exposed by Dr. Fletcher in his "Lectures on the Principles and Institutions of the Roman Catholic Religion" (pp. 236—250); and more concisely, but with great force of argument, in the Rev. Geo. Hamilton's "Tracts upon some leading Errors of the Church of Rome" (London, 1825), pp. 73—81.

3. Guard against drawing conclusions as to the meaning of words, in the same or different languages, from fanciful etymology, similarity or metathesis of letters, &c.

4. When the sense of words can be ascertained in any particular language, by the ordinary means, other languages, even kindred ones, should not be resorted to, except for the purpose of increased illustration or confirmation.

5. Take good care that real similitude exists whenever comparison is made.⁵

§ 5. OF THE ANALOGY OF FAITH.

I. The Analogy of Faith defined, and illustrated.—II. Its importance in studying the Sacred Writings.—III. Rules for investigating the Analogy of Faith.

I. OF all the various aids that can be employed for investigating and ascertaining the sense of Scripture, the ANALOGY OF FAITH is one of the most important. We may define it to be the constant and perpetual harmony of Scripture in the fundamental points of faith and practice, deduced from those passages, in which they are discussed by the inspired penmen, either directly or expressly, and in clear, plain, and intelligible language. Or, more briefly, the analogy of faith may be defined to be that proportion which the doctrines of the Gospel bear to each other, or the close connection between the truths of Revealed Religion.

The Analogy of Faith is an expression borrowed from Saint Paul's Epistle to the Romans (xii. 6.), where he exhorts those who prophecy in the church (that is, those who exercise the office of authoritatively expounding the Scriptures), to prophecy according to the proportion, or, as the word is in the original, the analogy of faith. To the same effect many commentators interpret Saint Peter's maxim (2 Pet. i. 20.), that no prophecy of Scripture is of any private or self-interpretation; implying that the sense of any prophecy is not to be determined by any abstract consideration of the passage itself, but by taking it in conjunction with other portions of Scripture relating to the subject, "comparing things spiritual with spiritual" (1 Cor. ii. 13.):—a rule which, though it be especially applicable to the prophetic writings, is also of general importance in the exposition of the sacred volume.

II. It is evident that God does not act without a design in the system of religion taught in the Gospel, any more than he does in the works of nature. Now this design must be uniform: for as in the system of the universe every part is proportioned to the whole, and is made subservient to it, so, in the system of the Gospel, all the various truths, doctrines, declarations, precepts, and promises, must correspond with and tend to the end designed. For instance, if any one interpret those texts of Scripture, which maintain our justification by faith only, or our salvation by free grace, in such a sense as to exclude the necessity of good works, this interpretation is to be rejected, because it contradicts the main design of Christianity, which is to save us from our sins (Matt. i. 21.), to make us holy as God is holy (1 Pet. i. 15.), and to cleanse us from all filthiness both of flesh and spirit. (2 Cor. vii. 1.) In the application, however, of the analogy of faith to the interpretation of the Scriptures, it is indispensably necessary that the inquirer previously understand the whole scheme of divine revelation; and that he do not entertain a predilection for a part only; without attention to this, he will be liable to error. If we come to the Scriptures with any preconceived opinions, and are more desirous to put that sense upon the text which coincides with our own sentiments rather than the truth, it then becomes the analogy of our faith rather than that of the whole system. This, Dr. Campbell remarks, was the very source of the blindness of the Jews in our Saviour's time: they searched the Scriptures very assiduously; but, in the disposition they entertained, they would never believe what that sacred volume testifies of Christ. The reason is obvious; their great rule of interpretation was the analogy of faith, or, in other words, the system of the Pharisean

The subject of the Analogy of Languages is also discussed at considerable length by G. G. Zennisch in his Disputatio Philologica de Analogia Linguarum Interpretationis Subsidio (Lipsiæ, 1753, 4to.), reprinted in Pot's and Rupert's Sylloge Commentationum Theologicarum, vol. vii. pp. 185—221.

Scribes, the doctrine then in vogue, and in the profound veneration of which they had been educated. This is that veil by which the understandings of the Jews were darkened, even in reading the law, and of which Saint Paul observed that it remained unremoved in his day; and we cannot but remark that it remains unremoved in our own time.¹ There is, perhaps, scarcely a sect or denomination of Christians, whether of the Greek, Romish, or Protestant churches, but has some particular system or digest of tenets, by them termed the analogy of faith, which they individually hold in the greatest reverence; and all whose doctrines terminate in some assumed position, so that its partizans may not contradict themselves. When persons of this description, it has been well remarked, meet with passages in Scripture which they cannot readily explain, consistently with their hypothesis, they strive to solve the difficulty by the analogy of faith which they have themselves invented. But allowing all their assumptions to be founded in truth, it is by no means consonant with the principles of sound divinity, to interpret Scripture by the hypothesis of a church; because the sacred records are the only proper media of ascertaining theological truth.²

III Such, then, being the importance of attending to the analogy of faith, it remains to state a few observations which may enable the student to apply it to the clearing up of obscure or difficult passages of Scripture.

1. Wherever any doctrine is manifest, either from the whole tenor of divine revelation or from its scope, it must not be weakened or set aside by a few obscure passages.

As the observance of this canon is necessary to every student of the inspired volume, so it ought especially to be regarded by those who are apt to interpret passages, which are not of themselves plain, by those opinions, of the belief of which they are already possessed; but for which they have little ground besides the mere sound of some texts, that appear, when first heard, to be favourable to their preconceived notions. Whereas, if such texts were compared with the scope of the sacred writers, they would be found to bear quite a different meaning. For instance, no truth is asserted more frequently in the Bible, and consequently is more certain in religion, than that God is good, not only to some individuals, but also toward all men. Thus, David says (Psal. cxlv. 9), The Lord is good to all, and his tender mercies are over all his works; and Ezekiel (xviii. 23), I have I any pleasure at all in the wicked that he should die; saith the Lord: and not that he should turn from his ways and live? Frequently also does the Almighty declare, both in the books of the law as well as in the prophets, and also in the New Testament, how earnestly he desires the sinner's return to him. See, among other passages, Deut. v. 29. Ezek. xviii. 32. and xxxiii. 11. Matt. xxiii. 37. John iii. 16. 1 Tim. ii. 4. Titus ii. 11. and 2 Pet. iii. 9. If, therefore, any passage occur which at first sight appear to contradict the goodness of God, as, for instance, that He has created some persons that he might damn them (as some have insinuated); in such case the very clear and certain doctrine relative to the goodness of God is not to be impugned, much less set aside, by these obscure places, which, on the contrary, ought to be illustrated by such passages as are more clear. Thus, in Prov. xvi. 4. according to most modern versions, we read, that The Lord hath made all things for himself, yea even the wicked for the day of evil. This passage has, by several eminent writers, been supposed to refer to the predestination of the elect and the reprobation of the wicked, but without any foundation. Junius, Cocceius, Michaelis, Glassius, Pfeiffer, Turretin, Ostervald, Dr. Whitby, Dr. S. Clarke, and other critics, have shown that this verse may be more correctly rendered, The Lord hath made all things to answer to themselves, or apply to refer to one another, yea even the wicked, for the evil day, that is, to be the executioner of evil to others; on which account they are in Scripture termed the rod of Jehovah (Isa. x. 5) and his sword. (Psal. xvii. 13). But there is no necessity for rejecting the received version, the plain and obvious sense of which is that there is nothing in the world which does not contribute to the glory of God, and promote the accomplishment of his adorable designs. The pious and the wicked alike conduce to this end; the wicked, whom God has destined to punishment on account of their iniquity, serve to display his justice (see Job xxi. 30), and consequently to manifest his glory. "God," says Dr. Gill (who was a strenuous advocate for the doctrines of election and reprobation), "made man neither to damn him nor to save him, but for his own glory, and that is secured whether in his salvation or damnation; nor did nor does God make men wicked. He made man upright, and man has made himself wicked; and being so, God may justly appoint him to damnation for his wickedness, in doing which he glorifies his justice."³

2. No doctrine can belong to the analogy of faith, which is founded on a single text.

Every essential principle of religion is delivered in more than one place. Besides, single sentences are not to be detached from the places where they stand, but must be taken in connection with the whole discourse.

From disregard of this rule, the temporary direction of the apostle James (v. 11, 15) has been perverted by the church of Rome, and rendered a permanent institution from a mean of recovery, to a charm, when recovery is desperate, for the salvation of the soul. The mistake of the church of Rome, in founding what she calls the sacrament of extreme unction upon this place, is very obvious; for the anointing here mentioned was applied to those whose recovery was expected, as appears from verse 16, where it is said that the Lord in answer to the prayer of faith shall raise up and restore the sick; whereas in the Romish church, extreme unction is used where there is little or no hope of recovery, and is called the sacrament of the dying.⁴ The same remark is applicable to the popish system of auricular confession to a priest; which is attempted to be supported by James v. 16. and 1 John i. 9. neither of which passages has any reference whatever to the ministerial office. In the former, confession of our faults is represented as the duty of the faithful to each other; and in the latter, as the duty of the penitent to God alone.

3. The whole system of revelation must be explained, so as to be consistent with itself.—When two passages appear to be contradictory, if the sense of the one can be clearly ascertained, in such case that must regulate our interpretation of the other.

Thus, in one passage, the apostle John says; If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins; if we say we have not sinned, we make him a liar, and his word is not in us. (1 John i. 8–10.) In another passage, the same apostle affirms: Whosoever abideth in him, sinneth not. Whosoever is born of God, doth not commit sin: for his seed remaineth in him; and he cannot sin because he is born of God. (1 John iii. 6, 9.) This is an apparent contradiction; but the texts must be explained, so as to agree with one another. Now, from Scripture and experience, we are certain that the first passage must be literally understood. At the dedication of the temple, Solomon said; If they sin against thee, and thou be angry (for there is no man that sinneth not), 1 Kings viii. 46. And in Eccl. viii. 20. For there is not a just man upon the earth, that doeth good and sinneth not. The explanation of the second passage, therefore, must be regulated by the established signification of the first; that both may agree. When it is affirmed that even good men cannot say they have no sin, the apostle speaks of occasional acts, from which none are free. When Saint John says, that he who is born of God doth not commit sin, he evidently means, habitually, as the slave of sin; and this is incompatible with a state of grace. Both passages, therefore, agree, as the one refers to particular deeds, and the other to general practice; and in this manner must every seeming contradiction be removed. The passage, of which the literal sense can be established, must always regulate the interpretation of a different expression, so as to make it agree with fixed principles.

4. An obscure, doubtful, ambiguous, or figurative text must never be interpreted in such a sense as to make it contradict a plain one.

In explaining the Scriptures, consistency of sense and principles ought to be supported in all their several parts; and if any one part be so interpreted as to clash with another, such interpretation cannot be justified. Nor can it be otherwise corrected than by considering every doubtful or difficult text, first by itself, then with its context, and then by comparing it with other passages of Scripture; and thus bringing what may seem obscure into a consistency with what is plain and evident.

(1.) The doctrine of transubstantiation, inculcated by the church of Rome, is founded on a strictly literal interpretation of figurative expressions, this is my body, &c. (Matt. xxvi. 26, &c.) and which has no relation to the supper) eat my flesh, drink my blood. (John vi. 51–58.) But independently of this, we may farther conclude that the sense put upon the words, "this is my body," by the church of Rome, cannot be the true one, being contrary to the express declaration of the New Testament history, from which it is evident that our Lord is ascended into heaven, where he is to continue "till the time of the restitution of all things" (Acts iii. 21); that is, till his second coming to judgment. How then can his body be in ten thousand several places on the earth at one and the same time? We may further add that, if the doctrine of transubstantiation be true, it will follow that our Saviour, when he instituted the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, did actually eat his own flesh and drink his own blood; a conclusion this, so obviously contradictory both to reason and to Scripture, that it is astonishing how any sensible and religious man can credit such a tenet.

(2.) Upon a similar literal interpretation of Matt. xvi. 18. Thou art Peter, and upon this rock will I build my church, the church of Rome has erected the claim of supremacy for Peter and his successors. Hence, building on Peter is explained away by some commentators as being contrary to the faith that Christ is the only foundation. (1 Cor. iii. 11.) The most eminent of the ancient fathers, as well as some of the early bishops or popes of Rome, particularly Gregory the Great, and likewise several of the most judicious modern commentators, respectively take this rock to be the profession of faith, which Peter had just made, that Christ was the Son of God. The connection, however, shows that Peter is here plainly meant. Thou art Peter, says Christ; and upon this rock, that is, Peter, pointing to him; for thus it connects with the reason which follows for the name, in the same manner as the reason is given for that of Abraham in Gen. xvii. 5. and of Israel in Gen. xxxii. 28. The apostles are also called, in other parts of the New Testament, the foundation on which the church is built, as in Eph. ii. 20. and Rev. xxi. 14, as being the persons employed in erecting the church, by preaching. It is here promised that Peter should commence the building of it by his preaching, which was fulfilled by his first converting the Jews (Acts ii. 14–42.) and also the Gentiles. (Acts x. xv. 7.) This passage, therefore, gives no countenance to the papal supremacy, but the contrary, for this prerogative was personal and incommunicable.⁵

5. Such passages as are expressed with brevity are to be expounded by those where the same doctrines or duties are expressed more largely and fully.

(1.) The doctrine of justification, for instance, is briefly stated in Phil. iii.; but that momentous doctrine is professedly discussed in the Epistle to the Galatians, and especially in that to the Romans; and according to the tenor of these, particularly Rom. iii., all the other passages of Scripture that treat of justification should be explained.

(2.) Even slight variations will oftentimes serve for the purpose of reciprocal illustration. Thus the beatitudes related in the sixth chapter of Saint Luke's Gospel, though delivered at another time and in a different place, are the same with those delivered by our Lord in his sermon on the Mount, and recorded in the fifth chapter of Saint Matthew's Gospel. Being, however, epitomized by the former Evangelist, they may be explained by the latter.

(3.) Further, the quotation from Isaiah vi. 9, 10. Hear ye indeed, but understand not, &c. is contracted in Mark iv. 12, Luke viii. 10, and John xii. 40, but it is given at large in Matt. xiii. 13, 15; and accordingly from this last cited Gospel, the sense of the prophet is most evident. Again, nothing is more certain than that God hath no pleasure in wickedness, or sin (Psalm v. 4), and, consequently, cannot be the cause of sin. When, therefore, any passages occur which appear to intimate the contrary, they must be so understood as not to impugn this important truth. The hardening of Pharaoh's heart, therefore, is not to be taken as the act of God, but that he permitted him to go on, following his own cruel schemes, regardless of the divine judgments.¹

6. "Where several doctrines of equal importance are proposed, and revealed with great clearness, we must be careful to give to each its full and equal weight."

"Thus, that we are saved by the free grace of God, and through faith in Christ, is a doctrine too plainly affirmed by the sacred writers to be set aside by any contravening position: for it is said, By grace ye are saved through faith, and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God. (Eph. ii. 8.) But so, on the other hand, are the doctrines of repentance unto life, and of obedience unto salvation; for again it is said, Repent and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out (Acts iii. 19), and, If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments. (Matt. xix. 17.) To set either of these truths at variance with the others, would be to frustrate the declared purpose of the Gospel, and to make it of none effect. Points thus clearly established, and from their very nature indispensable, must be made to correspond with each other; and the exposition, which best preserves them unimpaired and undiminished, will in any case be a safe interpretation, and most probably the true one. The analogy of faith will thus be kept entire, and will approve itself, in every respect, as becoming its divine author, and worthy of all acceptance."²

Some farther remarks might be offered in addition to the above rules; but as they fall more properly under consideration in the subsequent part of this work, the preceding observations on the interpretations of Scripture by the analogy of faith will, perhaps, be found abundantly sufficient. It only remains to state, that valuable as this aid is for ascertaining the sense of Scripture, it must be used in concurrency with those which have been illustrated in the foregoing sections, and to subjoin a few cautions respecting the application of the analogy of faith, attention to which will enable us successfully to "compare things spiritual with spiritual."

1. "Care," then, "must be taken, not to confound seeming with real analogies; not to rely upon merely verbal resemblances when the sense may require a different application; not to interpret what is parallel only in one respect, as if it were so in all; not to give to any parallel passages so absolute a sway in our decisions as to overrule the clear and evident meaning of the text under consideration; and, above all, not to suffer an eagerness in multiplying proofs of this kind to betray us into a neglect of the immediate context of the passage in question, upon which its signification must principally depend."³ The occasion, coherence, and connection of the writing, the argument carrying on, as well as the scope and intent of the paragraph, and the correspondence of the type with its antitype, are all to be carefully remarked.

2. Further, "In forming the analogy of faith, all the plain texts relating to one subject or article ought to be taken together, impartially compared, the expressions of one of them restricted by those of another, and explained in mutual consistency; and that article deduced from them all in conjunction: not, as has been most commonly the practice, one set of texts selected, which have the same aspect, explained in their greatest possible rigour; and all others, which look another way, neglected or explained away, and tortured into a compatibility with the opinion in that manner partially deduced."

3. Lastly, "the analogy of faith, as applicable to the examination of particular passages, ought to be very short, simple, and purely scriptural; but most sects conceive it, as taking in all the complex peculiarities, and scholastic refinements, of their own favourite systems."⁴

Thus, as it has been remarked with equal truth and elegance,⁵ "by due attention to these principles, accompanied with the great moral requisites already shown to be indispensable, and with humble supplication to the throne of grace for a blessing on his labours, the diligent inquirer after Scripture truth may confidently hope for success. The design of every portion of Holy Writ, its harmony with the rest, and the divine perfection of the whole, will more and more fully be displayed. And thus will he be led, with increasing veneration and gratitude, to adore HIM, to whom every sacred book bears witness, and every divine dispensation led the way; even HIM who is Alpha and Omega, the first and the last, Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever."⁶

§ 6. ON THE ASSISTANCE TO BE DERIVED FROM JEWISH WRITINGS IN THE INTERPRETATION OF THE SCRIPTURES.

I. The apocryphal books of the Old Testament.—II. The Talmud.—1. The Misna.—2. The Gemara.—Jerusalem and Babylonish Talmuds.—III. The writings of Philo Judæus and Josephus.—Account of them.

BESIDES the various aids mentioned in the preceding sections, much important assistance is to be obtained in the interpretation of the Holy Scriptures, from consulting the apocryphal writings, and also the works of other Jewish authors, especially those of Josephus and Philo; which serve not only to explain the grammatical force and meaning of words, but also to confirm the facts, and to elucidate the customs, manners, and opinions of the Jews, which are either mentioned or incidentally referred to in the Old and New Testaments.

Of the writings of the Jews, the Targums or Chaldee Paraphrases, which have been noticed in a former page,⁷ are, perhaps, the most important; and next to them are the apocryphal books of the Old Testament, and the Talmud.

I. THE APOCRYPHAL BOOKS are the productions of the Alexandrian Jews and their descendants, who thought and wrote in the Jewish manner: hence there are many things in those books not found in the Old, though alluded to in the New Testament. (Compare Heb. xi. with Eccles. xiv. xv.) The apocryphal books are all curious, and some of them extremely valuable. It is to be regretted that the just rejection of these books from the scriptural canon by the reformed churches has occasioned the opposite extreme of an entire disregard to them in the minds of many serious and studious Christians. As a collection of very ancient Jewish works, anterior to Christianity, as documents of history, and as lessons of prudence and often of piety, the Greek apocryphal writings are highly deserving of notice; but, as elucidating the phraseology of the New Testament, and as exhibiting the Jewish manner of narration, teaching, and arguing, they claim the frequent perusal of scholars, and especially of theological students. Kuinzel has applied these books to the illustration of the New Testament, with great success; and Dr. Bretschneider has also drawn many elucidations from the apocryphal books in his Lexicon to the New Testament. The apocryphal books of the New Testament exhibit a style in many respects partaking of the Hebraic-Greek idiom of the genuine books of the New Testament.

II. THE TALMUD (a term which literally signifies doctrine) is a body of Jewish Laws, containing a digest of doctrines and precepts relative to religion and morality. The Talmud consists of two general parts, viz. The Misna or text, and the Gemara or commentary.

1. THE MISNA (or repetition, as it literally signifies) is a collection of various traditions of the Jews, and of expositions of Scripture texts; which, they pretend, were delivered to Moses during his abode on the Mount, and transmitted from him, through Aaron, Eleazar, and Joshua, to the prophets, and by them to the men of the Great Sanhedrin, from whom they passed in succession to Simeon (who took our Saviour in his arms), Gamaliel, and ultimately to Rabbi Jehuda, surnamed Hakkadosh or the Holy. By him this digest of oral law and traditions was completed, towards the close of the second century, after the labour of forty years. From this time it has been carefully handed down among the Jews, from generation to generation; and in many cases has been esteemed beyond the written law itself. The Misna consists of six books, each of which is entitled order, and is further divided into many treatises, amounting in all to sixty-three: these again are divided into chapters, and the chapters are further subdivided into sections or aphorisms.

2. The GEMARAS or Commentaries on the Misna are two-fold:—

(1.) The Gemara of Jerusalem, which in the opinion of Prideaux, Buxtorf, Carpzov, and other eminent critics, was compiled in the third century of the Christian era; though, from its containing several barbarous words of Gothic or Vandalic extraction, Father Morin refers it to the fifth century. This commentary is but little esteemed by the Jews.

(2.) The Gemara of Babylon was compiled in the sixth century, and is filled with the most absurd fables. It is held in the highest estimation by the Jews, by whom it is usually read and constantly consulted, as a sure guide in all questions of difficulty.

The Jews designate these commentaries by the term Gemara, or perfection, because they consider them as an explanation of the whole law, to which no further additions can be made, and after which nothing more can be desired. When the Misna or text, and the commentary compiled at Jerusalem, accompany each other, the whole is called the Jerusalem Talmud; and when the commentary which was made at Babylon is subjoined, it is denominated the Babylonish Talmud. The Talmud was collated for Dr. Kennicott's edition of the Hebrew Bible; and as the passages of Scripture therein contained were taken from manuscripts in existence from the second to the sixth century, they are so far authorities as they show what were the readings of their day. These various readings, however, are neither very numerous nor of very great moment. Bauer states that Fromman did not discover more than fourteen in the Misna; and although Dr. Gill, who collated the Talmud for Dr. Kennicott, collected about a thousand instances, yet all these were not, in strictness, various lections. The Talmud, therefore, is chiefly useful for illustrating manners and customs noticed in the Scriptures.¹ Sometimes the passages cited from the Old Testament are exactly quoted; and sometimes many things are left out, or added arbitrarily, in the same manner as some of the fathers have quoted from the New Testament.²

The Rabbinical Writings of the Jews are to be found chiefly in their Commentaries on the Old Testament.

As all these Jewish writings are both voluminous and scarce, many learned men have diligently collected from them the most material passages that tend to illustrate the Scriptures. An account of their labours, as well as of the editions of the Misna, Talmud, and Jewish Commentators, will be found in the BIBLIOGRAPHICAL APPENDIX to the second volume.

The Misna, being compiled towards the close of the second century, may, for the most part, be regarded as a digest of the traditions received and practised by the Pharisees in the time of our Lord. Accordingly, different commentators have made considerable use of it in illustrating the narratives and allusions of the New Testament, as well as in explaining various passages of the Old Testament; particularly Ainsworth on the Pentateuch, Drs. Gill and Clarke in their entire comments on the Scriptures, Wetstein in his critical edition of the New Testament, and Koppe in his edition of the Greek Testament, who in his notes has abridged the works of all former writers on this topic.

In availing ourselves of the assistance to be derived from the Jewish writings, we must take care not to compare the expressions occurring in the New Testament too strictly with the Talmudical and Cabbalistical modes of speaking; as such comparisons, when carried too far, tend to obscure rather than to illustrate the sacred writings. Even our illustrious Lightfoot is said not to be free from error in this respect; and Dr.

Gill has frequently encumbered his commentary with Rabbinical quotations. The best and safest rule, perhaps, by which to regulate our references to the Jewish writers themselves, as well as those who have made collections from their works, is the following precept delivered by Ernesti:—We are to seek for help, says he, only in those cases where it is absolutely necessary; that is to say, where our knowledge of the Greek and Hebrew tongues affords no means of ascertaining an easy sense, and one that corresponds with the context. The same distinguished scholar has further laid it down as a rule of universal application, that our principal information is to be sought from the Jewish writings, in every thing that relates to their sacred rites, forms of teaching and speaking; especially in the Epistle to the Romans, which evidently shows its author to have been educated under Gamaliel.³

Some very important hints, on the utility of Jewish and Rabbinical literature in the interpretation of the New Testament, occur in the Rev. Dr. (now Bishop) Blomfield's discourse, entitled A Reference to the Jewish Tradition necessary to an Interpretation of the New Testament. London, 1817, 8vo.

III. More valuable in every respect than the Talmudica and Rabbinical Writings, are the works of the two learned Jews, Philo and Josephus, which reflect so much light on the manners, customs, and opinions of their countrymen, as to demand a distinct notice.

1. PHILO, surnamed Judæus, in order to distinguish him from several other persons of the same name,⁴ was a Jew of Alexandria, descended from a noble and sacerdotal family, and pre-eminent among his contemporaries for his talents, eloquence, and wisdom. He was certainly born before the time of Jesus Christ, though the precise date has not been determined: some writers placing his birth twenty, and others thirty years before that event. The latter opinion appears to be the best supported; consequently Philo was about sixty years old at the time of the death of our Redeemer, and he lived for some years afterwards. He was of the sect of the Pharisees, and was deeply versed in the Scriptures of the Old Testament, which he read in the Septuagint version, being a Hellenistic Jew, unacquainted (it is supposed) with the Hebrew, and writing in the Greek language. Some eminent critics have imagined that he was a Christian, but this opinion is destitute of foundation; for we have no reason to think that Philo ever visited Judæa, or that he was acquainted with the important events which were there taking place. Indeed, as the Gospel was not extensively and openly promulgated out of Judæa, until ten years after the resurrection of Jesus Christ, and as there is not the most distant allusion to him—much less mention of him—made in the New Testament, it cannot be supposed that this distinguished person was a convert to Christianity. The striking coincidences of sentiment, and more frequently of phraseology, which occur in the writings of Philo, with the language of Saint Paul and Saint John in the New Testament, are satisfactorily accounted for, by his being deeply versed in the Septuagint (or Alexandrian Greek) version of the Old Testament, with which those apostles were also intimately acquainted. The writings of Philo exhibit many quotations from the Old Testament, which serve to show how the text then stood in the original Hebrew, or at least, in the Septuagint Version: and although they contain many fanciful and mystical comments on the Old Testament, yet they abound with just sentiments eloquently expressed, and were highly esteemed by the primitive Christian church; and his sentiments concerning the Logos or Word, bear so close a resemblance to those of the apostle John, as to have given rise to the opinion of some eminent men that he was a Christian.⁵ In the writings of Philo, we meet with accounts of many customs of the Jews; of their opinions, especially such as were derived from the oriental philosophy; and of facts particularly relating to their state under the Roman emperors, which are calculated to throw great light on many passages of the sacred writings.¹

(8vo. London, 1776.) As this volume is now rarely to be met with, the reader will find the most material passages of Philo's writings selected and faithfully translated in the Rev. Dr. J. P. Smith's Scripture Testimony to the Messiah, vol. i. pp. 420–445. Dr. A. Clarke has given thirty-five instances of the particular terms and doctrines found in Philo's work, with parallel passages from the New Testament, in his commentary, at the end of the first chapter of Saint John's Gospel.

2. FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS was of sacerdotal extraction and of royal descent, and was born A. D. 37: he was alive in A. D. 96, but it is not known when he died. He received a liberal education among the Pharisees, after which he went to Rome, where he cultivated his talents to great advantage.² On his return to Judæa, he commanded the garrison appointed to defend Jotapata against the forces of Vespasian, which he bravely maintained during forty-seven days. Josephus, being subsequently taken prisoner by Vespasian, was received into his favour; and was also greatly esteemed by Titus, whom he accompanied to the siege of Jerusalem, on the capture of which he obtained the sacred books and many favours for his countrymen. When Vespasian ascended the imperial throne, he gave Josephus a palace, together with the freedom of the city of Rome, and a grant of lands in Judæa. Titus conferred additional favours upon him, and Josephus out of gratitude assumed the name of Flavius. The writings of Josephus consist of, 1. Seven books, relating the War of the Jews against the Romans, which terminated in their total defeat, and the destruction of Jerusalem. This history was undertaken at the command of Vespasian, and was written first in Hebrew and afterwards in Greek: and so highly was the emperor pleased with it, that he authenticated it by putting his signature to it, and ordering it to be preserved in one of the public libraries; 2. Of the Jewish Antiquities, in twenty books, comprising the period from the origin of the world to the twelfth year of the reign of Nero (A. D. 66), when the Jews began to rebel against the Romans; 3. An account of his own Life; and, 4. Two books vindicating the Antiquity of the Jewish nation against Apion and others.

The writings of Josephus contain accounts of many Jewish customs and opinions, and of the different sects that obtained among his countrymen; which very materially contribute to the illustration of the Scriptures. Particularly, they contain many facts relative to the civil and religious state of the Jews about the time of Christ: which being supposed, alluded to, or mentioned in various passages of the New Testament, enable us fully to enter into the meaning of those passages.³ His accurate and minute detail of many of the events of his own time, and above all, of the Jewish war, and the siege and destruction of Jerusalem, affords us the means of perceiving the accomplishment of many of our Saviour's predictions, especially of his circumstantial prophecy respecting the utter subversion of the Jewish polity, nation, and religion. The testimony of Josephus is the more valuable, as it is an undesigned testimony, which cannot be suspected of fraud or partiality. The modern Jews have discovered this, and therefore a writer who is a principal ornament of their nation since the cessation of prophecy, is now not only neglected, but despised; and is superseded among the Jews by a forged history, composed by an author who lived more than eight centuries after the time of Josephus, and who has assumed the name of Josippon, or Joseph Ben Gorion. The plagiarisms and falsehoods of this pseudo-Josephus have been detected and exposed by Gagnier, Basnage, and especially by Dr. Lardner.⁴

Michaelis particularly recommends a diligent study of the works of Josephus, from the beginning of Herod's reign to the end of the Jewish antiquities, as affording the very best commentary on the Gospels and Acts;⁵ and Morus observes, that the Jewish historian is more valuable in illustrating the histories related in the New Testament than for elucidating its style. Our numerous references to his works in the second, as well as in the early part of the present volume of this work, sufficiently attest the advantages resulting from a diligent examination of them.⁷ Josephus is justly admired for his lively and animated style, the bold propriety of his expressions, the exactness of his descriptions, and the persuasive eloquence of his relations, on which accounts he has been termed the Livy of the Greek authors. Though a strict Pharisee, he has borne such a noble testimony to the spotless character of Jesus Christ, that Jerome considered and called him a Christian writer.⁸

As, however, the authority of both Philo and Josephus has been disputed, we must distinguish, with respect to both, what is delivered as being merely their own opinion, and what is stated as the popular notion. We must also consider what influence the pharisaical principles of Josephus, and the profane philosophy of Philo, would have upon their writings.

§ 7. ON THE ASSISTANCE TO BE DERIVED FROM THE WRITINGS OF THE GREEK FATHERS, IN THE INTERPRETATION OF SCRIPTURE.

LEARNED men are by no means agreed as to the persons to whom the venerable appellation of FATHERS OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH ought to be given. While some would confine it exclusively to the apostles, or to those writers who lived in the century immediately succeeding them, others would extend it to those who flourished in the fifth and sixth centuries; and some even give the appellation of fathers to all those theologians who lived and wrote so lately as the twelfth century. The most probable classification is, that which would enrol among the fathers those Christian doctors only who flourished before the close of the sixth century; because, in the seventh and following centuries, the purity of Christian doctrine was debased by the most absurd notions and degrading superstitions; and also because but few of those, who held the office of teachers of religion during the dark ages, conducted themselves in such a manner as to deserve the appellation of FATHERS OF THE CHURCH. Still less are the learned agreed as to the degree of authority to be conceded to the works of the Fathers of the Christian church: by some they are depreciated beyond measure, while on the other hand they are estimated as repositories of every thing that is valuable in sacred literature.

It is, however, a singular circumstance, that, in almost all theological controversies, both parties are desirous of having the fathers on their side. Considering the question, then, without prejudice or predilection, we may safely assume, that the primitive fathers were men eminent for their piety and zeal, though occasionally deficient in learning and judgment; that they may be relied upon in general for their statements of facts, but not invariably for the constructions which they put upon them, unless in the expositions (by the Greek fathers) of the New Testament, with the language of which they were intimately acquainted; and that they are faithful reporters of the opinions of the Christian church, but not always the most judicious interpreters of Scripture. As repositories, therefore, of Christian antiquity, as preachers of Christian virtue, and as defenders of the true Christian doctrine, they may still be very advantageously consulted; especially if we do not expect that from them which they could not have. The fathers applied themselves to the reading of the Scriptures with undivided attention, with intense thought, and with holy admiration, as to that which was alone worthy to be studied. No part of Scripture was neglected by them; they were so earnestly intent upon it, that not a jot or tittle escaped them. This, with the advantages which they had (especially the Ante-Nicene fathers) in point of languages and antiquities, could not fail to produce remarks which it must be very imprudent in any age to neglect. The mistakes, charged upon the fathers in their expositions of the Old Testament, originated in their being misled by the Septuagint version, which their ignorance of Hebrew, together with their contempt of the Jews, and their unwillingness to be taught that language by them, induced them to trust implicitly. And that excess of allegorical interpretation into which some of the ancients ran, was probably occasioned by their studying, with a warm imagination, prophecies and types, parables and allusions, and by our Saviour's not developing the whole of his plan during his lifetime.

³ In all matters relating to the temple at Jerusalem, and to the religion of the Jews, there is a remarkable agreement between the authors of the New Testament and Josephus; who had in person beheld that sacred edifice, and was himself an eyewitness of the solemn rites performed there. Hence it is obvious, that his statements are unquestionably more worthy of credit than the unsupported assertions of the Talmudists, who did not flourish until long after the subversion of the city and temple, and of the whole Jewish polity, both sacred and civil. A single instance, out of many which might be adduced, will suffice to illustrate the importance of this remark. The Talmudical writers affirm that the priests only killed the paschal lambs; but Josephus (whose testimony is confirmed by Philo) relates that it was lawful for the master of every family to do it, without the intervention of any priest; and they further relate, that at the time of the passover, there were so many families at Jerusalem, that it was utterly impossible for the priests to kill the paschal lamb for every family. In the New Testament we read that Jesus Christ sent his disciples to a private house, that the passover might be prepared by its possessor and by them, without the presence of any priest, or previously taking the lamb to the temple. As the statements of Philo and Josephus are corroborated by the relation in the New Testament, they are undoubtedly correct.

It is obvious that the contemporary friends of any body of men must know the sentiments of those men more accurately and perfectly than even the most sagacious inquirers who flourish many ages posterior to them. Such of the primitive fathers, therefore, as conversed with the apostles, or with their immediate followers, are the most likely to know the true sense of their writings; and it is highly probable that the works of these fathers must contain traits and sentiments strongly illustrative of the doctrines of the Bible. The use, then, which is to be made of their writings, is precisely that which a discreet lawyer would make of all the best contemporary authors, who lived when Magna Charta was obtained. If in that celebrated code of civil rights any thing appeared obscure and difficult to be understood, he would consult the best authors of the age who had written upon the same, or upon any collateral subject; and he would especially consult contemporary authors, or those who immediately followed, if any of them had undertaken to illustrate and explain the whole or any part of that invaluable instrument. Magna Charta is to us, as Englishmen, what the Word of God is to us as Christians: the one contains a copy of our civil rights and privileges; the other, of our religious privileges and duties. Nor is it any diminution of the just and absolute authority of the Holy Scriptures in our religious concerns, to consult the contemporary and subsequent writings of the fathers, in order to see how the Bible was understood in the several ages in which they lived; any more than it would be a diminution of the just and absolute authority of Magna Charta, in our civil concerns, to consult the contemporary and subsequent writings of lawyers and historians, in order to see how it was understood in the several ages in which they lived. Similar to this is the conduct of every prudent person in all the common occupations and concerns of life. Accordingly, Christians in all ages, and of every denomination, have eagerly claimed the verdict of the fathers in their own behalf; and no one ever lightly esteemed their testimony, but those whose principles and doctrines the writings of the fathers condemned.¹

The important testimony in behalf of the genuineness of the Sacred Writings of the New Testament, borne by the fathers of the Christian church, and especially by the Greek fathers, has been exhibited in detail in pp. 41—45, 280, 281., and 288, 289. of the present volume, the value of their writings as a source of the text of Scripture, and also as aids for determining various readings, has been stated. It now remains to show, by one or two examples, the value of such of the fathers as are not professed commentators,² in determining the meaning of words and phrases, and in whose writings passages of the Old and New Testaments incidentally occur, in such a connection, or with such adjuncts, that we may clearly perceive what meaning was attached to them in the age when those fathers respectively flourished. Such interpretations we find in the writings of Barnabas, Clemens Romanus, Ignatius, Justin Martyr, and others; whose testimonies to the divinity of Christ have been collected by Dr. Burton. The evidence of the early fathers on this fundamental topic of Christian doctrine (to omit others which might be adduced relative to the discipline and practice of the Christian church) is peculiarly important; for "if the doctrine of the real nature of Christ was corrupted in the first three centuries, the writings of that period must show the progress of that corruption." And, on the other hand, "if no variation appears in the opinions of Christians, during that period, but the fathers of the first three centuries all deliver the same doctrine," and, "with one consent speak of Christ as having existed from all eternity as very God, and that he took our human nature into the divine, we have surely good grounds for saying, that there never was a time when this was not the doctrine of the church, and that it was the true and genuine doctrine which the apostles themselves preached."³

1. In John i. 3. the work of creation is expressly ascribed to Jesus Christ. To evade the force of this testimony to his deity, Faustus Socinus affirms that τα πάντα, all things, in this verse, means the moral world—the Christian church: but to this exposition there are two objections. First, a part of these τα πάντα is in verse 10. represented as κτιστος, the world; a term nowhere applied in the New Testament to the Christian church, nor to men as morally amended by the Gospel. Secondly, this very world (ὁ κόσμος) which he created did not know or acknowledge him, αὐτὸν οὐκ ᾔγνω: whereas the distinguishing trait of Christians is, that they know Christ; that they know the only true God and Jesus Christ whom he hath sent. Τα πάντα, then, which the Logos created, means (as common usage and the exigency of the passage require) the universe, the worlds, material and immaterial.⁴ In this passage, therefore, Jesus Christ is unquestionably called God; and this interpretation of it is corroborated by the following passage of Irenæus, who wrote A. D. 185:—

"Nor can any of those things, which have been made, and are in subjection, be compared to the word of God, by whom all things were made. For that angels or archangels, or thrones or dominations, were appointed by him, who is God over all, and made by his word, John has thus told us; for, after he had said of the Word of God, that he was in the Father, he added, all things were made by him, and without him was not any thing made."⁵

2. In Heb. i. 2. God is said to have created the world by his Son—δι' οὗ καὶ τῶν αἰώνων ἡτοκισθη. To evade the force of this testimony, some opposers of our Lord's divinity expound αἰῶνας as meaning new times, or that God by Christ created anew the world of mankind. But the construction will not justify either of these renderings: for, it is evident, in the first place, from Heb. xi. 3. that αἰῶνας does signify the worlds or world. Secondly, it is an undeniable fact, that the tenth verse of this chapter does ascribe the creation of the world to Christ. Thirdly, that διὰ does not denote merely an instrumental cause, is evident from those passages in which it is also said of the Father, that all things were created δι' αὐτοῦ, by him (Heb. ii. 10. Rom. xi. 36.), as also from the fact that διὰ and καὶ are used interchangeably for each other. But as Heb. i. 1, 2. relates to the person through whom God instructed us, namely, the incarnate Logos or Word, the words "by whom also he made the worlds" must be understood thus:—God created the world by the same person through whom he hath spoken unto us, in as much as this person is God himself and one with the Father, i. e. He created the world by himself.⁶ That this is the correct interpretation is confirmed by the testimony of Justin Martyr (who flourished about A. D. 150.), or the author of the epistle to Diognetus, which is commonly ascribed to him. Speaking of the special revelation of his will which God had made to Christians, he says, "This is no earthly invention which has been handed down to them, neither is it a mortal notion which they are bent upon observing so carefully, nor have they a system of human mysteries committed to them: but the omnipotent and all-creative and invisible God hath Himself from heaven established amongst men the truth and the holy and incomprehensible word, and rooted it in their hearts: not, as you might suppose, by sending to men any of His servants, either an angel or a prince, or one of those who administer the affairs of earth, or one of those who have the management of heavenly things intrusted to them, but the Framer and Creator of the universe himself, by whom He created the heavens, by whom He shut up the sea in its own bounds."⁷

On this passage, Dr. Burton remarks:—"We have here an express declaration that Jesus Christ was the Framer and Creator of the World. God created them by Jesus Christ, as is said in the Epistle to the Hebrews, i. 2.; and if the words quoted above are not sufficiently strong to exclude the idea of God having employed any subordinate agent, we find in the very next chapter the expression of 'God the Lord and Creator of the universe, who made all things and arranged them in order.' Thus, according to Justin's own words, God created the world by His Son, and His Son, by whom he created them, was God."¹

3. We have a striking confirmation of all those passages of the New Testament, in which the appellation and attributes of Deity are given to Jesus Christ, in the practice of the Christian church, mentioned by the father and ecclesiastical historian Eusebius; who, opposing the followers of Artemon (who asserted the mere humanity of Christ), first appeals to the evidence of Scripture and to the works of Justin, Miltiades, Tatian, Clement, and many other fathers, in all of which divinity is ascribed to Christ, and then states the following fact:—"Moreover, all the psalms and hymns of the brethren, written from the beginning by the faithful, celebrate the praises of Christ, the word of God, and attribute DIVINITY to him."²

It were not difficult to add other examples: but the preceding may suffice to show the value of the fathers, as aids for ascertaining the meaning of particular passages. The reader who is desirous of examining their important evidence on the cardinal doctrine of Christ's Divinity is referred to Dr. Burton's "Testimonies," already cited: of whose elaborate and judicious work it has been truly said, that he "has brought before us a cloud of witnesses to prove that the faith delivered by our Lord to his apostles, and by the apostles to their successors, was essentially that which our church professes and cherishes."³

§ 8. ON HISTORICAL CIRCUMSTANCES.

Historical circumstances defined.—I. Order.—II. Title.—III. Author.—IV. Date of the several books of Scripture.—V. The place where written.—VI. Occasion on which they were written.—VII. Ancient sacred and profane history.—VIII. Chronology.—IX. Biblical Antiquities, including, 1. The political, ecclesiastical, and civil state;—2. Coins, medals, and other ancient remains;—3. Geography; 4. Genealogy;—5. Natural History; and, 6. Philosophical sects and learning of the Jews and other nations mentioned in the Scriptures.

HISTORICAL CIRCUMSTANCES are an important help to the correct understanding of the sacred writers. Under this term are comprised—1. The Order; 2. The Title; 3. The Author; 4. The Date of each of the several books of Scripture; 5. The Place where it was written; 6. The Occasion upon which the several books were written; 7. Ancient Sacred and Profane History; 8. The Chronology or period of time embraced in the Scriptures generally, and of each book in particular; 9. Biblical Antiquities, including the Geography, Genealogy, Natural History and Philosophy, Learning and Philosophical Sects, Manners, Customs, and private Life of the Jews and other nations mentioned in the Bible. How important a knowledge of these particulars is, and how indispensably necessary to a correct interpretation of the inspired volume, we are now to consider.

I. A knowledge of the ORDER OF THE DIFFERENT BOOKS, especially such as are historical, will more readily assist the student to discover the order of the different histories and other matters discussed in them, as well as to trace the divine economy towards mankind under the Mosaic and Christian dispensations.

This aid, if judiciously exercised, opens the way to a deep acquaintance with the meaning of an author; but, when it is neglected, many things necessarily remain obscure and ambiguous.

II. The TITLES are further worthy of notice, because some of them announce the chief subject of the book;—

As Genesis, the generation of heaven and earth—Exodus, the departure of the Israelites from Egypt, &c.; while other titles denote the churches or particular persons for whose more immediate use some parts of the Scriptures were composed, and thus afforded light to particular passages.⁴

III. A knowledge of the AUTHOR of each book, together with the age in which he lived, his peculiar character, his sect or religion, and also his peculiar mode of thinking and style of writing, as well as the testimonies which his writings may contain concerning himself, is equally necessary to the historical interpretation of Scripture. Thus,

1. The consideration of the testimonies concerning himself, which appear in the second Epistle of St. Peter, will show that he was the author of that book:

For he expressly says, 1. That he was present at the transfiguration of Jesus Christ (2 Pet. i. 13.); 2. That this was his second epistle to the believing Jews (iii. 1.); and that Paul was his beloved brother (iii. 15.); all which circumstances quadrate with Peter. In like manner, the coincidence of style and of peculiar forms of expression, which exist between the second and third epistles of Saint John, and his other writings, prove that those epistles were written by him. Thus we shall be able to account for one writer's omitting some topics and expatiating upon others—as Saint Mark's silence concerning actions honourable to Saint Peter, and enlarging on his faults, he being the companion of the latter, and writing from his information. A comparison of the style of the Epistle to the Hebrews, with that of Saint Paul's other epistles, will show that he was the author of that admirable composition.⁵

2. *In order to enter fully into the meaning of the sacred writers, especially of the New Testament, it is necessary that the reader in a manner identify himself with them, and invest himself with their affections or feelings; and also familiarize himself with the sentiments, &c. of those to whom the different books or epistles were addressed.*⁶

This canon is of considerable importance, as well in the investigation of words and phrases as in the interpretation of the sacred volume, and particularly of the prayers and imprecations related or contained therein. If the assistance, which may be derived from a careful study of the affections and feelings of the inspired writers be disregarded or neglected, it will be scarcely possible to avoid erroneous expositions of the Scriptures. Daily observation and experience prove how much of its energy and perspicuity familiar discourse derives from the affections of the speakers; and also that the same words, when pronounced under the influence of different emotions, convey very different meanings. Franzius has paid particular attention to this subject in the examples adduced in his treatise De Interpretatione Sacra Scriptura; and Franck has written a distinct essay on the same topic, which, being already extant in our language, it is not necessary to abridge in this place.⁷

IV. Knowledge of the TIME when each book was written sometimes shows the reason and propriety of things said in it.⁸

Upon this principle, the solemn adjuration in 1 Thess. v. 27., which at first sight may seem unnecessary, may be explained. It is probable that, from the beginning of the Christian dispensation, the Scriptures of the Old Testament were read in every assembly for divine worship. Saint Paul, knowing the plenitude of the apostolic commission, now demands that the same respect should be paid to his writings which had been given to those of the ancient prophets: this, therefore, is a proper direction to be inserted in the first epistle written by him; and the manner, in which it is given, suggests an argument that the first Epistle to the Thessalonians was the earliest of his epistles. An accurate knowledge of the date of a book is further of peculiar importance in order to understand the prophecies and epistles; for not only will it illustrate several apparently obscure particulars in a prediction, but it will also enable us to ascertain and to confute a false application of such prediction. Grotius, in his preface to the second Epistle to the Thessalonians, has endeavoured to prove that the Emperor Caligula was the man of sin and Simon Magus the wicked one, foretold in the second chapter of that epistle; and has fruitlessly laboured to show that it was written A. D. 38; but its true date, A. D. 52, explodes that application, as also Dr. Hammond's hypothesis that Simon Magus was the man of sin, and the wicked one.

said or done, will materially facilitate its historical interpretation, especially if regard be had, 3. To the NATURE OF THE PLACE, and the customs which obtained there.

1. For instance, it is evident that Saint Paul's second Epistle to the Thessalonians was written, shortly after the first, at Corinth, and not at Athens, as its subscription would import, from this circumstance, viz. that Timothy and Silvanus or Silas, who joined him in his first letter, were still with him, and joined him in the second. (Compare 2 Thess. i. 1. with 1 Thess. iii. 6. and Acts xvii. 1—5.) And as in this epistle he desired the brethren to pray that he might be delivered from unreasonable and wicked men (2 Thess. iii. 2.), it is probable that he wrote it soon after the insurrection of the Jews at Corinth, in which they dragged him before Gallio the proconsul of Achaia, and accused him of persuading men to worship contrary to the law. (Acts xviii. 13.) But this consideration of the place where a book was written will supply us with one or two observations that will more clearly illustrate some passages in the same epistle. Thus it is manifest from 2 Thess. iii. 8. that Saint Paul could appeal to his own personal labours for his subsistence with the greater confidence, as he had diligently prosecuted them at Corinth (compare Acts xviii. 3. with 1 Cor. ix. 11, 12, 13.); and, to mention no more examples, it is clear, from 2 Thess. iii. 1, 2., that the great Apostle of the Gentiles experienced more difficulty in planting a Christian church at Corinth and in some other places, than he did at Thessalonica. In a similar manner, numerous beautiful passages in his Epistle to the Ephesians will be more fully understood, by knowing that they were written at Rome during his first captivity.

2. Our Lord's admirable discourse, recorded in the sixth chapter of St. John's Gospel, which so many disregarded, is said (v. 59.) to have been delivered in the synagogue at Capernaum, consequently in a public place, and in that very city which had witnessed the performance of so many of his miracles. And it is this circumstance of place which so highly aggravated the malice and unbelief of his hearers. (Compare Matt. xi. 23.)

3. The first Psalm being written in Palestine, the comparison (in v. 4.) of the ungodly to chaff driven away by the wind will become more evident, when it is recollected that the threshing-floors in that country were not under cover as those in our modern barns are, but that they were formed in the open air, without the walls of cities, and in lofty situations, in order that the wheat might be the more effectually separated from the chaff by the action of the wind. (See Hosea xiii. 3.) In like manner, the knowledge of the nature of the Arabian desert, through which the children of Israel journeyed, is necessary to the correct understanding of many passages in the Books of Exodus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy, which were written in that desert.

VI. We find it to be no small help to the understanding of ancient profane writings, if we can discover the OCCASION on which, as well the time when, they were penned; and for want of such knowledge many passages in such writings are become obscure and unintelligible. The same may be observed in the books of the Old and New Testament (especially in the Book of Psalms and the Apostolical Epistles), the right understanding of the design of which, as well as of their phraseology, is most essentially promoted by a careful observance of the OCCASION upon which they were written.

To some of the Psalms, indeed, there is prefixed a notice of the occasion on which they were composed: and, by comparing these with one another, and with the sacred history, great light may be, and has been, thrown upon the more difficult passages; and the meaning, beauty, and energy of many expressions have been set in a clearer point of view. But where no such titles are prefixed, the occasion must be sought from internal circumstances.

Psalm xlii. was evidently written by David, when he was in circumstances of the deepest affliction: but if we compare it with the history of the conspiracy of Absalom, aided by Ahithophel, who had deserted the councils of his sovereign, as related in 2 Sam. xv., and also with the character of the country whither David fled, we shall have a key to the meaning of that psalm, which will elucidate it with equal beauty and propriety.¹

VII. ANCIENT SACRED AND PROFANE HISTORY.—An acquaintance with the history of the Israelites, as well as that of the Moabites, Ammonites, Philistines, Egyptians, Assyrians, Medes, Babylonians, Persians, Arabians, Greeks, Romans, and other ancient nations, is of the greatest importance to the historical interpretation of the Bible: for, as the Jewish people were connected with those nations, either in a hostile or in a pacific manner, the knowledge of their history, customs, arts, and literature, becomes the more interesting; as it is well known that the Israelites, notwithstanding they were forbidden to have intercourse with the heathen, did nevertheless borrow and adopt some of their institutions. More particularly, regardless of the severe prohibitions delivered by Moses and the prophets against idolatry, how many idols did they borrow from the Gentiles at different times, previously to the great Babylonish captivity, and associate them in the worship of Jehovah! Their commercial intercourse with the Egyptians and Arabs, and especially with the Phœnicians, was very considerable; and at the same time, they were almost incessantly at war with the Philistines, Moabites, and other neighbouring nations, and afterwards with the Assyrians and Egyptians, until they were finally conquered, and carried into captivity by the Assyrians and Babylonians. Further, the prophets, in their denunciations or predictions, not only address their admonitions and threatenings to the Israelites and Jews, but also frequently accost foreign nations, whom they menace with destruction. The writings of Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel contain very numerous predictions relative to the heathen nations, which would be utterly unintelligible without the aid of profane history. The same remark will apply to the divisions of time and forms of government that obtained at different periods, which cannot be ascertained from the perusal of the Sacred Writings merely.

In proportion, however, as the history of the ancient nations of Asia becomes necessary to the interpretation of the Bible, it is to be regretted that it is for the most part involved in so much obscurity and confusion as to require no small labour before we can extricate it from the trammels of fable, and arrive at any thing like certainty. As the histories of ancient Egypt have perished, with the exception of a few fragments preserved in the writings of Josephus, Eusebius, and other authors, our knowledge of the earliest state of that country (which is sufficiently confused and intricate) can only be derived from Herodotus, Diodorus, and some other Greek writers, who cannot always be depended on. The writings of Sanchoniatho, with the exception of a few fragments, as well as the works of Histiasus, and other Phœnician historians, have long since perished; and, for our accounts of the Assyrians, recourse must chiefly be had to the Scriptures themselves, as no confidence whatever can be placed in the narrations of Ctesias, whose fidelity and veracity have justly been questioned by Aristotle, Strabo, and Plutarch. The history of the Ammonites, Moabites, Idumæans, Philistines, and other petty neighbouring nations, who had no historians of their own, is involved in equal obscurity; for the little that is known of them, with certainty, we are exclusively indebted to the Holy Scriptures.

The sources, therefore, of that historical knowledge, which is so essential to an interpreter of the Sacred Writings, are, in the first place, the Old and New Testaments, and next the works of Josephus and profane authors. It is, however, to be observed, that where the latter speak of the Jews, they wilfully misrepresent them, as is done by Justin and Tacitus. With a view to reconcile these various contradictions, and to overcome the difficulties thus interposed by the uncertainty of ancient profane history, various learned men have at different times employed themselves in digesting the remains of ancient history, and comparing it with the Scriptures, in order to illustrate them as much as possible; and the Connections of Sacred and Profane History, by Drs. Shuckford, Prideaux, and Russell, Stackhouse's History of the Bible, and Dr. Lardner's Credibility of the Gospel History, are particularly worthy of notice.²

VIII. CHRONOLOGY, or the science of computing and adjusting periods of time, is of the greatest importance towards understanding the historical parts of the Bible, not only as it shows the order and connection of the various events therein recorded, but likewise as it enables us to ascertain the accomplishment of many of the prophecies. Chronology is further of service to the biblical critic, as it sometimes leads to the discovery and correction of mistakes in numbers and dates, which have crept into particular texts. As considerable differences exist in the chronology of the Hebrew Scriptures, the Samaritan Pentateuch, the Septuagint version, and Josephus, different learned men have applied themselves to the investigation of these difficulties, and have communicated the result of their researches in elaborate systems. Some one of these, after examining their various claims, it will be desirable to have constantly at hand. The principal systems of Chronology are those of Cappel, Vossius, Archbishop Usher, Bedford, Jackson, and Dr. Males; of which an account will be found in the BIBLIOGRAPHICAL APPENDIX to the second Volume.

IX. A knowledge of BIBLICAL ANTIQUITIES (including the Sacred and Profane History, Geography, Genealogy, Natural History, Coins, Medals, and other ancient remains, and Philosophy, Learning and Philosophical Sects, Manners, Customs, and private Life, of the Jews and other nations mentioned in the Bible) is indispensably necessary to the right understanding of the sacred volume.

1. What the peculiar rites, manners, and customs of the Hebrews and other nations actually were, that are either alluded to or mentioned in the Scriptures, can only be ascertained by the study of their POLITICAL, ECCLESIASTICAL, and CIVIL STATE; without an accurate knowledge of which, all interpretation must be both defective and imperfect.

If, in order to enter fully into the meaning, or correctly apprehend the various beauties, of the Greek and Roman classics, it be necessary to be acquainted with the peculiar forms of government which prevailed—the powers of magistrates—modes of executing the laws—the punishments of criminals—tributes or other duties imposed on subjects—their military affairs—sacred rites and festivals—private life, manners, and amusements—commerce, measures, and weights, &c. &c.—how much greater difficulties will be interposed in his way, who attempts to interpret the Scriptures without a knowledge of these topics! For, as the customs and manners of the oriental people are widely different from those of the western nations; as, further, their sacred rites differ most essentially from every thing with which we are acquainted, and as the Jews in particular, from the simplicity of their language, have drawn very numerous metaphors from the works of nature, from the ordinary occupations and arts of life, from religion and things connected with it, as well as from their national history;—there are many things recorded, both in the Old and New Testament, which must appear to Europeans either obscure, unintelligible, repulsive, or absurd, unless, forgetting our own peculiar habits and modes of thinking, we transport ourselves in a manner to the East, and diligently study the customs, whether political, sacred, or civil, which obtained there. In the second volume of this work, the author has attempted to compress the most important facts relative to biblical antiquities.

2. With regard to COINS, MEDALS, AND OTHER ANCIENT REMAINS, considered as a source of interpretation, a few remarks and illustrations may be here introduced. The examples given in pp. 88—92. supra, as collateral testimonies to the credibility of the sacred writers, may indeed be considered as so many elucidations of the passages there referred to. Two or three additional instances shall now be subjoined, which will serve to show the important hermeneutical aid, which may be derived from these remains of ancient art.

1. Acts xi. 26. It came to pass that the disciples were called (Χρηματισται) Christians, first in Antioch.

Commentators and critics are much divided in opinion concerning the origin of the appellation Christian. Some are of opinion that it was first invented by the enemies of religion, and was fixed upon the disciples of Christ as a stigma of reproach. In confirmation of this opinion, they refer to Acts xxvi. 28, and 1 Pet. iv. 16. Others imagine, that the Christians themselves assumed this appellation. Others, with more propriety, conceive that it was given to them by divine appointment, or by an oracle from God. In every other passage of the New Testament (with perhaps one exception only), where the word Χρηματισται occurs, as well as in the Septuagint version, it uniformly means being warned by a divine oracle; and when we consider, that it had been predicted by Isaiah (lxii. 2.) that the future church should be called by a NEW NAME, which the mouth of the Lord shall name, we shall be justified in adopting the third interpretation, and render the passage thus:—And the disciples were called Christians by divine appointment, first at Antioch. The correctness of this interpretation is confirmed, not only by the fact, that the verb Χρηματίζω is used in this sense among Greek writers, and is especially understood concerning the manifestation of the heathen gods, in which responses were given to those who consulted them; but also by the fact of its occurring on an ancient votive tablet found at Rome, which was formerly seen in the temple of Æsculapius, on an island in the Tiber: from which the following passages are selected:—

ΑΥΤΑΙΣ ΤΑΙΣ ΗΜΕΡΑΙΣ ΤΑΙΣΙ
ΤΙΝΙ ΤΥΦΛΩΙ ΕΦΗΜΑΤΙΣΕΝ (5 θεός).

In those days (the god) DIVINELY ANSWERED (or gave an oracular response to), one Gaius, a blind man.

ΑΟΥΚΙΩΙ ΠΑΤΥΡΤΙΚΩΙ . . .
ΕΦΗΜΑΤΙΣΕΝ Ο ΘΕΟΣ.

The God DIVINELY ANSWERED Lucius, who laboured under a palsy.³

2. John xi. 19. Εληλυθυσαν ΠΡΟΣ ΤΑΣ ΠΕΡΙ Μαρθαν και Μαρην.

The expressions, οι περι τινος, and οι αμφι τινος, are used by the best Greek writers for the persons themselves: the same mode of construction obtains in this passage of St. John's Gospel, which is correctly rendered in our authorized version, They came to Martha and Mary. The same expression occurs in an inscription found at Olbiopolis: ΕΠΙ ΑΡΧΟΝΤΟΣ ΜΑΡΚΟΥ ΟΥΛΙΠΟΥ ΠΥΡΡΟΥ ΑΡΕΗΧΟΥ, ΟΙ ΠΕΡΙ ΠΟΣΕΙΔΩΝΗΝ ΖΗΘΟΥ ΤΟ Γ ΑΓΟΡΟΝΟΜΟΙ, ΚΟΥΝΟΣ ΑΘΗΝΑΙΟΥ, &c. That is, during the archonship of Marcus Ulpus Pyrrhus (the son of) Arsechus, the Agoronomi (or inspectors of markets) Poseidis the son of Zethus for the third time, Kunus [the son of] Athenæus, &c. &c.⁴

3. Acts xix. 35. Commentators have been much perplexed concerning the functions of the Γραμματεως, or Town-clerk of Ephesus.

As the Ephesians were at this time solemnizing games in honour of Diana (whose celebrated temple was erected at the common expense of all the cities of Asia) under the presidency of the Asiarchs, that is, principal officers or high-priests chosen by the community of Asia for that purpose, it is highly probable that this Γραμματεως was a person of greater authority than the clerk or recorder of Ephesus. Dominus, an ancient author, cited by the chronologer Malela* (who, being a native of Ephesus, could not but be acquainted with the public transactions of his own city), relates that, besides the Syriarch, there were the Aityarch, who represented Jupiter, the Γραμματεως, who represented Apollo, and the Amphitales, who represented Mercury; and that suitable honours were paid to them by all the people. Apuleius* also states, that a Γραμματεως presided over certain sacred rites in Egypt. The presumption, therefore, is, that the Γραμματεως of Ephesus was not a civil officer, as is commonly supposed, but a sacred officer; and this presumption is converted into certainty by the fact that, among the various coins of that city, which are still extant, there are several containing the names of persons who bore the title of ΑΡΧΙΕΡΕΥΣ, ΓΡΑΜΜΑΤΕΥΣ, or High Priest-Scribe, particularly one which was struck during the triumvirate of Augustus, Anthony, and Lepidus (no very long time before the transaction related in Acts xix.), which has the following inscription:—

ΑΡΧΙΕΡΕΥΣ ΓΡΑΜ ΓΛΑΥΚΩΝ ΕΥΘΥΚΡΑΤΗΣ ΕΦΕΣΙΩΝ.

Glaucon Euthycrates, the High Priest-Scribe of the Ephesians.⁵

Now, as this officer was the representative of Apollo, who could be more proper to address the infuriated populace, or more likely to have weight and influence with them, and the force of an oracle in what he said to them, than that officer to whom they paid the honours due to Apollo?⁶ The good sense of his address, and the happy effect it produced upon the Ephesian populace, confirm this conclusion.

It were not difficult to adduce many additional instances, in which the comparatively untried application of coins and inscriptions is calculated to elucidate particular words and forms of expression in the New Testament: but the preceding instances may suffice; and the student who is desirous of prosecuting this subject further will find ample materials in the publications of Bishop Minter, already cited.

In the application of Biblical Antiquities to the interpretation of the Sacred Writings, it is, however, of the utmost importance, that we should be guided by the exercise of a sober and cautious judgment, and by the influence of a correct taste; lest we ascribe to the inspired authors sentiments which perhaps never entered their minds, or imagine customs which never had any existence. From this mistake, that acute biblical critic, and most diligent investigator of oriental manners and customs, Michaelis, is not exempt.

In Prov. x. 14. we read, Wise men lay up knowledge, that is, treasure it up, and reserve it for a proper opportunity to make use of it: but the mouth of the foolish is near destruction; such a one is always talking, and seldom

Syria, and not Rome in Italy; and this circumstance annihilates the proud pretensions of that corrupt section of the universal professing Christian church, which, in direct opposition to the evidence of history and fact, arrogantly assumes to be the mother and mistress of all the churches of Christ.

* Gruteri Thesaurus Inscriptionum, p. lxxi. Munteri Symbolæ ad Interpretationem Nov. Test. ex Marmoribus, in Misc. Hafnicensia, vol. i. part i. pp. 8, 9. The oracular responses above mentioned were given in the temple of Æsculapius, in the night-time, and for the most part to persons while asleep.

* Minter, Symbolæ, p. 23. It is, however, proper to remark, that the reading τας περι Μαρθαν και Μαρην is not fully established. The Code Beza omits the words τας περι, and the Codices Vaticanus, Ephremi, Regius 62* (Stephani 8.), and Colbertinus, simply read προς την Μαρθαν και Μαρην to Martha and Mary; and the Syriac version has only the names of the two sisters. ² The place where this divine appellation was given to the disciples of Christ is too important to be altogether passed by. It was at Antioch, the metropolis of Syria, at that time pre-eminent for the splendour of its edifices, and the riches, luxury, and profligacy of its inhabitants; and in this seemingly little circumstance we may recognise an additional triumph of the Gospel, that that venerable name, which obliges every one who bears it to depart from all iniquity (2 Tim. ii. 19.), should have commenced in a city where every kind of iniquity prevailed. Further, it was at Antioch in opens his mouth but it proves a present mischief to himself and others. By changing the points in the latter clause of this verse, Michaelis reads: the mouth of the foolish is as a censor near at hand (thurbu un propinquum); and he illustrates this expression by the oriental custom of offering perfumes to a guest, which (it is well known) is an intimation to him that it is time for him to depart. The sense which this profound scholar puts upon the passage is as follows: the foolish man alienates every one from him by his silly and insipid discourses. Is not this torturing words, and ascribing to the sacred penman an allusion which he never designed to make?

But, more particularly,

(1.) We should investigate the laws, opinions, and principles of those nations among whom the Hebrews resided for a long time, or with whom they held a close intercourse, and from whom it is probable they received some of them.

From the long residence of the Hebrews in Egypt, it has been conjectured by some learned men that they derived by far the greater part of their institutions from the Egyptians: but this hypothesis appears untenable, to its full extent, the Israelites being separated from the Egyptians by their pastoral habits, which rendered them abominable in the eyes of the latter. At the same time, from their having passed four hundred years in that country, it is not unlikely that they derived some things from their oppressors. A few instances will elucidate this remark.

1. Under the Jewish theocracy, the judges are represented as holy persons, and as sitting in the place of Jehovah.¹ The Egyptians regarded their sovereigns in this light.² Hence Michaelis, to whom we are indebted for this fact, conjectures that the Israelites just on their exit from Egypt, called their rulers gods, not only in poetry, but also in the common language of their laws (see Exod. xxi. 6.), where the word judges is, in the original Hebrew, gods.³ Again, agriculture was the basis of the whole Mosaic policy; and it was probably from the Egyptians that the Jewish legislator borrowed the principle on which his polity was thus founded: though indeed we find, that the state of the ancient Romans was accidentally established on a similar plan.⁴ The priests, and especially the Levites, united the profession of ministers of religion with that of hierati among the Jews, in the same manner as the Egyptian priests had partitioned literature among themselves, so that their institution was wholly Egyptian in its origin.⁵ And, to mention no further instances of this kind, the molten calf which the Israelites required of Aaron seems to have been an exact resemblance of the celebrated Egyptian god Apis, who was worshipped under the form of an ox.⁶

2. At a subsequent period, during their captivity, some of the Jews appear to have imbibed the absurd notion of the Persians, that there were two supreme beings, an evil and a good one, representing light and darkness; and that according to the ascendancy of one or other of these, good and happiness prevailed among men, or evil and misery abounded. Such, at least, was the absurd opinion held by the person to whom Isaiah addressed his prophecy (ch. xlv.), and which he refutes in the most significant and pointed manner.⁷

3. In our Saviour's time the learning of the Greeks was cultivated by the Jews, who adopted the peculiar tenets of some of their most eminent philosophers. The Pharisees, it was well known, believed the immortality of the soul: but it appears from Josephus, that their notion of such immortality was the Pythagorean metempsychosis.⁸ From the Pharisees this tenet was generally received by the Jewish people; and, notwithstanding the benefit derived from hearing the discourses and conversations of our Lord, it appears to have been held by some of his disciples.

(2.) We must take care not to ascribe comparatively modern rites and customs to the ancient Hebrews.

From not attending to this rule, the Jewish teachers and those Christian doctors who have implicitly followed them, have caused much perplexity in the antiquities of the Jews, having attributed to the ancient Hebrews rites and ceremonies that did not exist till later times; and, from not distinguishing the different ages, they have consequently confounded ancient manners and customs with those which are of modern date. The Talmudists, and other Jewish writers, should not be consulted without the greatest caution; for, living as they did long after the destruction of the Jewish polity, they not only were imperfectly acquainted with it, but they likewise contradict each other, as well as Josephus and Philo, authors every way more worthy of confidence, as being contemporary with that event; not unfrequently indeed do they contradict the Scriptures themselves, and, indulging their own speculations, they produce commentaries which are truly ridiculous. The necessary consequence is, that those learned men, who have implicitly followed the Talmudists, have been precipitated into various errors. From these mistakes, not even Reland and Ikenius are exempt—two of the best writers, perhaps, who have applied themselves to the investigation of Jewish antiquities.⁹

(3.) Lastly, our knowledge of biblical antiquities must be derived from pure sources.

The first and most important source is unquestionably the Old and New Testaments; the careful collation of which will enable us to collect accounts of the modes of living which obtained among the ancient Jews. Much light will further be obtained into the state of Jewish affairs, from consulting the apocryphal books, among which the first book of Maccabees is particularly valuable. To these may be added the writings of Philo, Josephus and the Talmudists. Further, a judicious comparison of the notions that obtained among ancient, and comparatively uncultivated nations, with those entertained by the Hebrews or Jews, will, from their similitude, enable us to enter more fully into the meaning of the sacred writers. Thus many pleasing illustrations of patriarchal life and manners may be obtained by comparing the writings of Homer and Hesiod with the accounts given by Moses. The Iliad, for instance, illustrates Abraham's manner of dividing the sacrifice.¹⁰ The patriarchal hospitality is similar to that described in the Odyssey.¹¹ How early a belief in the ministry of angels obtained among the heathen nations, is evident from comparing the account of Hesiod¹² with that of Moses,¹³ and it furnishes an additional proof to the many others which have been collected by learned men, to show that all the knowledge of the ancients was traditionally derived, though with innumerable corruptions, from the Hebrews.

Finally, if to these sources we add an acquaintance with the modern customs and manners which prevail in the East, as they are related by travellers of approved character, we shall have a sure and easy access to the knowledge of sacred antiquities: for, as the Orientals, from their tenacious adherence to old usages, are not likely to differ materially from their ancestors,¹⁴ we have no very great reason to be apprehensive, from comparing the manners, &c. of the modern Syrians, Arabs, and other inhabitants of the East, with those of the ancient Hebrews, that we should attribute customs to them which never obtained among them. Where, indeed, any new usage does exist among the Orientals, it may be discovered without much difficulty by men of learning and penetration. The interpretation of the Bible, therefore, is not a little facilitated by the perusal of the voyages and travels of those who have explored the East. Among these valuable contributors to the promotion of Biblical science, the names of D'Arvieux, Mandrell, Thompson, Chardin, Shaw, Hasselquist, Pocock, Niebuhr, Setzen, Dr. E. D. Clarke, Lord Valentia, Walpole, Ouseley, Morier, Light, Russel, Chateaubriand, Burckhardt, Buckingham, Belzoni, Dr. Richardson, the Rev. Mr. Jowett, Sir R. K. Porter and others, are justly celebrated: but as many of their works are voluminous and costly, various writers have judiciously applied themselves to selecting and arranging the most material passages of their travels, which are calculated to elucidate the Holy Scriptures. In this department of sacred literature, the compilations of Harmer, Burder, and the editor of Calnet's Dictionary of the Bible, are particularly distinguished. Of these works, as well as of the principal writers on Jewish Antiquities, the reader will find a notice in the BIBLIOGRAPHICAL APPENDIX to the second Volume.

3. Intimately connected with history and chronology is ancient GEOGRAPHY, especially that of Palestine and the neighbouring countries; the knowledge of which, it is universally confessed, tends to illustrate almost innumerable passages of Scripture. The principal sources of sacred geography are the Scriptures themselves, and the ancient Greek and other writers, who have treated on the different countries mentioned in the Bible; and to these may be added the voyages and travels of Chardin, Seetzen,¹⁵ and others, mentioned above, who have explored the East, and whose narratives contain many very happy elucidations of the physical and political geography of the Bible.—These sources have been diligently consulted by most of the learned men who have applied themselves to the illustration of this important topic. The principal works on sacred geography are those of Bochart Michaelis, Spanheim, Reland, and Wells.¹⁶

4. Next to History and Geography, GENEALOGY holds an important place in the study of the Sacred Writings. The evidences of Christianity cannot be correctly, if at all under-

They even believe that it is not without the peculiar care of Providence that they arrive at supreme power; and that those, who have the will and the power to perform deeds of the greatest beneficence, are partakers of the divine nature."

At first sight, this account appears to contradict the statement of St. Paul (Acts xiv. 15.): but the repugnance is easily obviated, when it is considered that Josephus is speaking of the Pharisees only, but the apostle of the Jews in general, and of himself in particular.

Bath and London, 1810. Many places in Palestine, particularly beyond the Jordan, which are in great degree unknown, are satisfactorily described in this little tract.

stood, unless the genealogy of the Messiah, and his descent from Abraham and David, be distinctly traced. This is obvious from the prophecies, which, ages before his advent, determined the line of his descent; and left nothing to chance or imposture on the important subject of the promised seed, that, in the fulness of time, was to "bruise the serpent's head," and by his one oblation of himself, once offered, was to make a full and perfect atonement for the sins of the whole world. Many neat genealogical tables are to be found in some of the earlier and larger editions of the Bible. Some of the most useful treatises on this subject are noticed in the BIBLIOGRAPHICAL APPENDIX.

5. Of equal importance with either of the preceding branches of knowledge is NATURAL HISTORY; by which alone many, otherwise obscure, passages of Scripture can be explained. Thus, frequent direct mention is made of animals, trees, plants, and precious stones; sometimes the Scripture expresses sentiments either in allusion to, or by metaphors taken from, some fact in natural history; and sometimes characters are described in allusion to natural objects; and without the knowledge of these, we cannot perceive the nature of the characters intended. Much information concerning this important topic may be derived from the labours of the oriental travellers already mentioned, and especially those of Shaw, Russell, Hasselquist, Forskål, and Niebuhr. The most successful investigations of this interesting topic are to be found in the writings of Bochart, Celsius, Scheuchzer, Professor Paxton, and especially of the Rev. Dr. Harris, of Dorchester, Massachusetts.

6. Lastly, in perusing the sacred volume, the attentive reader cannot fail to be struck with allusions to PHILOSOPHICAL NOTIONS and SECTS, as well as to certain branches of learning, which were cultivated by the nations or people therein mentioned: it is impossible fully to apprehend the force, propriety, and beauty of these allusions without a knowledge of the notions, &c. referred to. A short sketch of the principal Jewish sects occurs in the second volume of this work; but the only writer, to the best of the author's recollection, who has discussed this subject in a separate treatise, is the learned and indefatigable Professor Buddeus, in his Introductio ad Historiam Philosophiæ Hebræorum, Halle, 1720, 8vo.; of whose labours he has availed himself. The philosophical notions which obtained among the Jews are also incidentally treated in most of the larger commentaries, as well as in most of those works which profess to be Introductions to the Bible.

§ 9. ON COMMENTARIES.

I. Different classes of Commentaries.—II. Nature of Scholia.—III. Commentaries.—IV. Modern versions and paraphrases.—V. Homilies.—VI. Collections of observations on Holy Writ.—VII. The utility and advantage of Commentaries.—VIII. Design to be kept in view, when consulting them.—IX. Rules for consulting Commentaries to the best advantage.

I. THE labours of expositors and commentators have been divided into various classes, according to the nature of their different works; for, although few confine themselves to one method of interpretation, exclusively, yet each generally has some predominant character, by which he is peculiarly distinguished. Thus, some are,

1. Wholly Spiritual or Figurative; as Cocceius, and those foreign commentators who have followed his untenable system, viz. that the Scripture is every where to be taken in the fullest sense it will admit; and in our own country, Dr. Gill, Dr. Hawker, and some minor writers.

2. Literal and Critical; such are Ainsworth, Wetstein, Dr. Blayney, Bishop Patrick, Lowth, and Whitby, Calmet, Chais, Bishop Lowth, Archbishop Newcome, Wall, Dr. Campbell, Dr. Priestley, and others.

3. Wholly Practical; as Musculus, Zuingle, Baxter, Henry, Ostervald, Dr. Fawcett, the "Reformer's Bible, &c. &c."

4. Those who unite critical, philological, and practical observations: such are the commentaries of Dr. Dodd, Bishop Mant and Dr. D'Oly, Poole, Scott, M. Martin, Dr. A. Clarke, Mr. Benson, &c. on the entire Bible, and the paraphrases of Pyle, and of Mr. Orton, on the Old Testament; on the New Testament, Dr. S. Clarke and Pyle, Dr. Doddridge, Mr. Locke, Dr. Benson, Dr. Macknight, Mr. Gilpin, &c. &c.

A more correct classification of expository writings may be into Scholia, Perpetual Annotations, Commentaries, and Paraphrases; whose united design is, to lead their readers to the right understanding of the author whom they undertake to explain. Hence their province is, to illustrate obscure passages, to reconcile apparent contradictions, to obviate difficulties, whether verbal or real, and, in short, to remove every thing that may tend to excite doubts in the minds of the readers of the Bible.

II. SCHOLIA are short explanatory notes on the sacred writers; whose authors, termed scholiasts, particularly aim at brevity. In this kind of expository writings, obscure words and phrases are explained by such as are more clear; figurative by such as are proper; and the genuine force of each word and phrase is pointed out. Further, the allusions to ancient manners and customs are illustrated, and whatever light may be thrown upon the sacred writer from history or geography is carefully concentrated, and concisely expressed: nor does the scholiast fail to select and introduce the principal and most valuable various readings, whose excellence, antiquity, and genuineness, to the best of his judgment, give them a claim to be noticed. The discordant interpretations of difficult passages are stated and examined, and the most probable one is pointed out, but without exhibiting the grounds of the exposition. These various topics, however, are rather touched upon, than treated at length: though no material passages are (or at least ought to be) left unnoticed, yet some very obscure and difficult passages are left to be discussed and expounded by more learned men. Such was the method, according to which the ancient scholiasts composed their scholia for illustrating Homer, Sophocles, Aristophanes, Horace, Virgil, and other Greek and Latin classics; and the same mode has been adopted by those Christian writers who have written scholia on the Bible.¹

III. The various topics, which engage the attention of the scholiast, are also discussed, but more at length, by COMMENTATORS; whose observations form a series of continuous annotations on the sacred writers, and who point out more clearly the train of their thoughts, as well as the coherence of their expressions, and all the various readings which are of any importance. The commentator, therefore, not only furnishes summaries of the argument, but also resolves the expressions of his author into their several parts, and shows in what respects they agree, as well as where they are apparently at variance. He further weighs and examines different passages, that admit of different interpretations; and while he offers his own views, he confirms them by proper arguments or proofs, and solves any doubts which may attend his own interpretation. Further, a judicious commentator will avoid all prolix, extraneous, and unnecessary discussions, as well as far-fetched explanations, and will bring every philological aid to bear upon passages that are in any degree difficult or obscure. Commentators ought not to omit a single passage that possesses more than ordinary difficulty, though the contrary is the case with many, who expatiate very copiously on the more easy passages of Scripture, while they scarcely touch on those which are really difficult, if they do not altogether omit to treat of them. In a word, it is the commentator's province to remove every difficulty that can impede the biblical reader, and to produce whatever can facilitate his studies, by rendering the sense of the sacred writings more clear and easy to be apprehended.

IV. A peculiar and important method of exposition is that of MODERN VERSIONS and PARAPHRASES. Neither can be properly executed unless their authors have previously mastered the book or passage which they intend to translate or paraphrase, and are well versed in the language. Versions of different books and with different designs should not all be conducted upon the same plan.

1. A VERSION is the rendering fully, perspicuously, and faithfully, of the words and ideas of an author into a different language from that which he used. The properties of a good version are—correctness and fidelity in expressing the precise manner in which the idea is presented, the figures, order, connection, and mode of writing; yet without being always literal and expressing word for word. Further, it should be accommodated to the idiom of the language, which the translator is using, and at the same time be perspicuous and flowing.

In reference to versions it may be inquired, 1. Under what circumstances it may be lawful to depart from the style and manner of the original author? (There are words, figures, and modes of construction, which cannot be literally expressed in a different language.) 2. Whether the Hebrew construction is to be retained? It seems by no means proper, that the peculiar manner of an ancient author should be entirely obliterated; much less, that a different manner be obtruded upon him. 3. Whether the technical terms which occur in the New Testament should be changed for others.

2. A PARAPHRASE is the expression, in greater extent, of the meaning of the sacred author; in which is inserted whatever is necessary to explain the connection and exhibit the sense: so that what is obscure is thus rendered more perspicuous, in one continued and unbroken narrative. Provided the integrity of his author's sense be observed, the paraphrast is at liberty to abridge what is narrated at length, to enlarge on what is written with brevity, to supply supposed omissions, to fill up chasms, to illustrate obscure and apparently involved passages, by plain, clear, and neatly turned expressions, to connect passages which seem too far asunder, or not disposed in order either of time or subject, and to arrange the whole in a regular series. These, indeed, it must be admitted, are important liberties, not to be taken with the Scriptures by any paraphrast without the utmost caution, and even then only in the most sparing manner.

Paraphrases have been divided by Professor Rambach,¹ and other writers on the interpretation of the Bible, into two classes—historical and textual. In the former class of paraphrases, the argument of a book or chapter is pursued historically; and the paraphrast endeavours to give his author's meaning in perspicuous language. In the latter instance, the paraphrast assumes, as it were, the person of the sacred writer, closely pursues the thread of his discourse, and aims at expressing every word and phrase, though in circumscribed limits, yet in terms that are both clear and obvious to the capacities of his readers. Hence it would appear, that a paraphrase is the most difficult species of expository writing; and, as the number of paraphrasts on the Scriptures is, comparatively, small (probably from this circumstance), the ingenious classification of them proposed by Rambach is not sufficiently important to render it necessary that we should form them into a separate class of interpreters. It is of infinitely greater moment to Bible readers, when purchasing works of this description, that they select those which are neither too prolix nor too expensive, and whose authors avoid every thing like party-spirit; neither extolling beyond measure any thing ancient, merely because it is of remote antiquity, nor evincing a spirit of dogmatical innovation; but who, "rightly dividing the word of truth," while they express themselves in clear and perspicuous terms, show themselves to be well skilled both in the theory and application of sound principles of scriptural interpretation, and who have diligently availed themselves of every internal and external aid for ascertaining the sense of the sacred writers.

The utility of both versions and paraphrases is great; but neither can supersede the necessity of more extended and minute interpretation.

V. HOMILIES are another kind of interpretation in which either larger portions of Scripture or single texts are explained and practically applied to the several purposes of instruction, admonition, or consolation; and properly destined to the service of the church. Homilies answered to our discourses on detached texts of Scripture, but they were filled with pious fables and the philosophy of the times when their authors lived. The best homilies extant are those of Origen and Chrysostom.

VI. Closely allied to commentaries are the collections of OBSERVATIONS ILLUSTRATIVE OF THE SACRED WRITINGS, which have been formed of late years, and require to be consulted with similar cautions, and in the same manner. These books of observations are either grammatical and philological, or miscellaneous; sometimes they discuss only a few passages which are peculiarly difficult and obscure, and sometimes they appear in the form of a grammatical and philological commentary, following the order of the sacred books. On this account, as well as to facilitate reference, we have classed them with expositions of the Bible: of the best editions of all these, the reader will find some account in the BIBLIOGRAPHICAL APPENDIX to the second Volume, PART II. CHAP. V. SECTIONS II. and III., occasionally interspersed with concise bibliographical and critical observations.²

VII. Opinions widely different have been entertained respecting the utility and advantage resulting from commentaries, annotations, and other expositions of the Sacred Writings. By some, who admire nothing but their own meditations, and who hold all human helps in contempt, commentaries are despised altogether, as tending to found our faith on the opinions of men rather than on the divine oracles: while others, on the contrary, trusting exclusively to the expositions of some favourite commentators, receive as infallible whatever views or opinions they may choose to deliver, as their expositions of the Bible. The safest way in this case, as in all others, is to take the middle path, and occasionally to avail ourselves of the labours of commentators and expositors, while we diligently investigate the Scriptures for ourselves, without relying exclusively on our own wisdom, or being fascinated by the authority of a distinguished name.

The late eminent divine and theological tutor, Dr. Campbell, was of opinion that the Bible should be first read and studied without a commentary; but his advice was addressed to students who were previously acquainted with the originals; and though the design of the present work is to facilitate to studious inquirers the understanding of the Scriptures, yet the author presumes not to suppose that his labours will supersede the necessity of commentaries; or that he can furnish them with all that information which renders such works desirable to the generality of Bible readers. A sensible writer has observed, that the Bible is a learned book, not only because it is written in the learned languages, but also as containing allusions to various facts, circumstances, or customs of antiquity, which, to a common and unlettered reader, require explanation. So far, indeed, as relates to the way of salvation, "he that runs may read:" but there are many important points, if not of the first importance, in which we may properly avail ourselves of the labours of inquirers who have preceded us; especially in clearing difficulties, answering objections, and reconciling passages which at first sight appear contradictory.

Further, "the Bible is a large book, and we are under no small obligations to those who have collated its different parts,—the New Testament with the Old,—the prophetic with the historical books, &c.; and to reject their assistance, in making the Scriptures their own interpreter, is to throw away the labours of many ages. As well might we reject all our historians, and insist on believing nothing but what we derive immediately from state papers, original records, or other documents, on which all history is founded." Once more, "the Bible is intended as a directory for our faith and practice. Now to have an experienced friend who has long been in the habit of perusing it with patient study and humble prayer,—to have such a friend at hand, to point out in every chapter what may be useful or important, and especially to disclose its latent beauties, may be no less desirable and useful, than it is, when travelling in a foreign country, to have with us a companion who has passed the same route, and is acquainted both with the road, and with the objects most worthy of notice. It is granted, however, that there are extremes; and that it is no less wrong to place implicit confidence in commentators than it is to treat them with contempt: to derive advantage from them, we should treat them as commentators only, and not as inspired writers."³

VIII. THE USE to be made of interpreters and commentators is twofold:—

FIRST, that we may acquire from them a method of interpreting the Scriptures correctly.

It is not sufficient that we be enabled rightly to understand the Bible ourselves, but it is essentially necessary that those who are destined for the sacred office should be able to explain it with facility, and also to communicate its sense and meaning with perspicuity to others. As, however, this faculty is not to be attained merely by studying rules for the interpretation of the Scriptures, habitual and constant practice must be superadded; and it will further prove of singular advantage to place before us some good expositors, as models for our imitation. In order to accomplish this desirable object, we must not accumulate and read every interpreter or commentator indiscriminately, but should select one or two, or a few at most of acknowledged character for learning and piety; and by frequent perusal of them, as well as by studying their manner of expounding, should we labour to form ourselves after them, until we are completely masters of their method. But the reading of commentaries will further assist us, SECONDLY, to understand whatever passages appear to us to be difficult and obscure.

It is not to be denied that there are many passages in the Sacred Writings both difficult and obscure, in consequence of the various times when the different books were written, the different topics of which they treat, and their allusions to ancient customs, &c. The helps, by which most of these difficulties may be removed, have already been stated in the course of the present work. But we cannot suppose that the solitary and unassisted researches even of the most learned expositor are adequate to the removal of every difficulty, or to the elucidation of every obscurity, or that he is not liable to mistake the sense of the sacred penman. By the united labours, however, of many learned and pious men, of different ages and countries, we are put in possession of accumulated information relative to the Bible; so that we may derive large accessions of important knowledge from the judicious use of the writings of commentators and expositors.

IX. In order, then, that we may avail ourselves of their valuable labours to the utmost advantage, the following hints are submitted to the consideration of the reader:—

1. We should take care that the reading of commentators does not draw us away from studying the Scriptures for ourselves, from investigating their real meaning, and meditating on their important contents.

This would be to frustrate the very design for which commentaries are written, namely, to facilitate our labours, to direct us aright where we are in danger of falling into error, to remove doubts and difficulties which we are ourselves unable to solve, to reconcile apparently contradictory passages, and, in short, to elucidate whatever is obscure or unintelligible to us. In the first instance, therefore, no commentators should be consulted until we have previously investigated the Sacred Writings, for ourselves, making use of every grammatical and historical help, comparing the scope, context, parallel passages, the analogy of faith, &c.; and even then commentaries should be resorted to only for the purpose of explaining what was not sufficiently clear, or of removing our doubts. This method of studying the sacred volume will, unquestionably, prove a slow one: but the student will proceed with certainty; and, if he have patience and resolution enough to persevere in it, he will ultimately attain greater proficiency in the knowledge of the Scriptures, than those who, disregarding this method, shall have recourse wholly to assistances of other kinds. From the mode of study here recommended many advantages will result. In the first place, the mind will be gradually accustomed to habits of meditation: without which we cannot reasonably hope to attain even a moderate, much less a profound, knowledge of the Bible;—secondly, those truths will be more readily as well as indelibly impressed on the memory, which have thus been “marked, learned, and inwardly digested” in the mind by silent thought and reflection;—and, thirdly, by pursuing this method, we shall perceive our own progress in sacred literature more readily, than if (like idle drones in a bee-hive) we devour and exhaust the stores provided by the care and labour of others.¹

2. We should not inconsiderately assent to the interpretation of any expositor, or commentator, or yield a blind and servile obedience to his authority.

The canon given by Saint Paul (1 Thess. v. 21).—Prove all things, hold fast that which is good—is therefore particularly worthy of our notice; for since no man is an infallible judge of the sense of Scripture, not only the expositions given by commentators ought to be carefully examined, but we should also particularly investigate the proofs by which they support their interpretations, uninfluenced by the celebrity of their names, the semblance of ingenuity and novelty, the appearance of learning, or the excellency of speech.² Commentators, in fact, are witnesses, not judges: their authority is merely human, and does not surpass the sphere of human belief. But we should not read, exclusively, commentators of a particular school, to which we are perhaps attached, and to whose opinions we subscribe; and though the writings of those who inculcate erroneous doctrines are to be received with the greatest suspicion, yet they are not to be altogether disregarded, as they sometimes contain valuable and important hints for the elucidation of difficult passages of Scripture. That he may not be misunderstood, the author will explain himself by a single example. The variety of erroneous theological notions, asserted in different publications by the late Dr. Priestley, has justly excited suspicions in the minds of all, who cherish a regard for what they conscientiously believe to be the peculiar doctrines of the Christian dispensation: so that any theological or expository writings, bearing his name, are by them received with caution, and subjected to the most rigorous examination. His “Notes on all the Books of Scripture” are, nevertheless, well worthy of being consulted: for “though the Doctor keeps his own creed (unitarianism) continually in view, especially when considering those texts which other religious people adduce in favour of theirs, yet his work contains many invaluable notes and observations, particularly on the philosophy, natural history, geography, and chronology of the Scriptures; and to these subjects few men in Europe were better qualified to do justice.”³

3. The best commentators and interpreters only are to be read.

So numerous are the commentaries at present extant on the Sacred Writings, that to notice them all would require a distinct volume. Not to mention the magnitude of their cost, the labour and fatigue of turning over and examining such a multitude of massy volumes, is sufficient to deter any one from the study of them; and must necessarily prevent an ingenious student from deriving any real advantage. For the perplexity of mind, arising from so great a variety of conflicting opinions, will either disgust him altogether with sacred studies, or he will so bewilder himself, that he will not be able to determine which to follow or embrace.

Although the more ancient commentators and expositors did not possess those peculiar facilities for interpreting the Scriptures, with which we are now happily favoured, yet they are not to be altogether despised by those, who may have leisure and opportunity to consult them, for the purpose of tracing the time when, and the authors by whom, particular expositions of certain passages were first introduced. The more ancient interpreters, being coeval or nearly so with the sacred writers, and also living in the neighbouring countries, are thus rendered good evidence, for the received sense of certain words in their day. Hence the Jews frequently throw much light on the meaning of Hebrew words and usages, as may be seen in the extracts from their writings which are to be found in all the larger commentaries; and in like manner the Greek fathers, the value of whose labours it has been the fashion unduly to depreciate, are excellent evidence for the meaning attached to Greek words, particularly in controversies relating to the deity of Jesus Christ, the reality and efficacy of his atonement, &c. And since there are some expositions of very important passages, in which all or nearly all expositors, both ancient and modern, are agreed, these have a high claim to our attention.⁴

The more ancient interpreters erred in mingling too many doctrinal discussions in their expositions; in introducing too much of history and archaeology, not immediately connected with the passage under consideration; and in investigating too exclusively the arguments of the sacred writers. Modern interpreters, on the contrary, have erred, in too frequently and copiously disputing about the events of Scripture, and also in applying so extensively to morals the passages which they undertook to elucidate. For although the methods of exposition may be different, as authors have different objects in view, yet the office of the critic, the interpreter, the theologian, and the popular teacher, ought never to be confounded.⁵

Of the more modern commentators, the best only must be selected, whom we may consult as guides; and those may be considered as the best commentators, who are most deeply furnished with the requisite critical skill; who most diligently investigate the literal sense, and do not attempt to establish a mystical sense until the literal sense is most clearly ascertained; who do not servilely copy the remarks of preceding commentators, but, while they avail themselves of every help for the interpretation of the Scriptures, elicit what appears to be the true meaning, and support it by such clear and cogent arguments, and state it with such perspicuity, as convinces the reader's judgment. To these acquirements, it is scarcely necessary to add, that deep yet sober piety and uprightness are indispensably necessary to a commentator on Holy Writ.

On the subject of commentaries it is an excellent advice of Ernesti,⁶ that we shall find considerable advantage in making memoranda of the more difficult passages of the Sacred Writings, which have been variously explained by expositors, as well as of those in which there is any remarkable diversity of reading, but concerning which our own researches, or those of others, have failed in procuring satisfactory information. Thus, whenever any professedly new commentary falls into our hands, we can in a short time ascertain whether it contains any thing intrinsically new or valuable, or that may lead us to ascertain the genuine sense of a passage. By consulting commentators and expositors in this manner, we shall be able to distinguish ideas of things from ideas of sounds; and, thus becoming habituated to the investigation and consideration of the Sacred Writings, we shall, under divine teaching, be enabled to understand the mind of the Spirit in the Scriptures.

4. Where it does not appear that either ancient or modern interpreters had more knowledge than ourselves respecting particular passages; and where they offer only conjectures,—in such cases their expositions ought to be subjected to a strict examination. If their reasons are then found to be valid, we should give our assent to them: but, on the contrary, if they prove to be false, improbable, and insufficient, they must be altogether rejected.

5. Lastly, as there are some commentaries which are either wholly compiled from the previous labours of others, or which contain observations extracted from their writings, if any thing appear confused or perplexed in such commentaries, the original sources whence they were compiled must be referred to, and diligently consulted.

BOOK II.

ON THE SPECIAL INTERPRETATION OF SCRIPTURE.

HAVING stated and illustrated the general principles of interpretation in the preceding chapters, it remains that we show in what manner the sense, when discovered, is to be communicated, expounded, and applied. The consideration of this topic will lead us to notice the interpretation of the Figurative and the Poetical Language of the Bible, and also the interpretation of the Spiritual and Typical, Prophetical, Doctrinal, and Moral parts of the Bible, as well as the interpretation of the Promises and Threatenings contained in the Scriptures, and of Passages alleged to be contradictory, together with that Inferential Reading, and that Practical Application of them to the heart and conscience, without which all knowledge will be in vain. If, indeed, the previous investigation of the sense of Scripture be undertaken with those moral and devout qualifications which have been stated in the early part of this volume,¹ it is scarcely possible that we can fail to understand the meaning of the word of God.

CHAPTER I.

ON THE INTERPRETATION OF THE FIGURATIVE LANGUAGE OF SCRIPTURE.

FIGURATIVE language had its rise in the first ages of mankind: the scarcity of words occasioned them to be used for various purposes: and thus figurative terms, which constitute the beauty of language, arose from its poverty; and it is still the same in all uncivilized nations. Hence originated the metaphorical diction of the Indians, and the picture-writing of the Mexicans.

The Bible, though too commonly regarded as containing only lessons of morality and plain statements of facts, abounds with the most beautiful images, and with every ornament of which style is susceptible. Yet these very ornaments are sometimes occasions of difficulty; for the books, which contain the revelations of God, being more ancient than any others now extant, are written either in the language used by mankind in the first ages, or in a language nearly allied to it. The style of these writings, therefore, being very different from that of modern compositions, to interpret them exactly as they are usually expounded, is without doubt to mis-interpret them; accordingly, persons ignorant of the character of the primitive languages, have, by that method of interpretation, been led to imagine that the Scriptures contain notions unworthy of God: and thus have not only exposed these venerable writings to the scorn of infidels, but have also framed to themselves erroneous notions in religion.² To prevent similar mistakes, and, it is hoped, to render more delightful the study of the sacred volume by an explanation of its figurative language, is the design of the present chapter.

Figures, in general, may be described to be that language, which is prompted either by the imagination or by the passions. Rhetoricians commonly divide them into two great classes, figures of words and figures of thought.

Figures of Words are usually termed *trope*s, and consist in the advantageous alteration of a word or sentence, from its original and proper signification to another meaning; as in 2 Sam. xxiii. 3. The rock of Israel spake to me. Here the trope lies in the word rock which is changed from its original sense, as intending one of the strongest works and most certain shelters in nature; and is employed to signify, that God, by his faithfulness and power, is the same security to the soul which trusts in him, as the rock is to the man who builds upon it, or flees for safety to its impenetrable recesses. So, in Luke xiii. 32. our Lord speaking of Herod, says Go ye, and tell that fox: here the word fox is diverted from its proper meaning, which is that of a beast of prey and of deep cunning, to denote a mischievous, cruel, and crafty tyrant; and the application of the term gives us a complete idea of his hypocrisy.

The other class, called Figures of Thought, supposes the words to be used in their literal and proper meaning, and the figure to consist in the turn of the thought; as is the case in exclamations, apostrophes, and comparisons, where, though we vary the words that are used, or translate them from one language into another, we may nevertheless still preserve the same figure in the thought. This distinction, however, Dr. Blair remarks, is of no great use, as nothing can be built upon it in practice; neither is it always very clear. It is of little importance, whether we give to some particular mode of expression the name of a trope or of a figure, provided we remember that figurative language always imports some colouring of the imagination, or some emotion of passion expressed in our style; and perhaps, figures of imagination, and figures of passion, might be a more useful distribution of the subject.³

Without regarding, therefore, the technical distinctions which have been introduced by rhetorical writers, we shall first offer some hints by which to ascertain and correctly interpret the tropes and figures occurring in the Sacred Writings; and in the following sections we shall notice the principal of them, illustrated by examples, to which a diligent reader may easily subjoin others.

SECTION I.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS ON THE INTERPRETATION OF TROPEs AND FIGURES.

"ALL languages are more or less figurative; but they are most so in their earliest state. Before language is provided with a stock of words, sufficient in their literal sense to express what is wanted, men are under the necessity of extending the use of words beyond the literal sense. But the application, when once begun, is not to be limited by the bounds of necessity. The imagination, always occupied with resemblances, which are the foundation of figures, disposes men to seek for figurative terms, where they might express themselves in literal terms. Figurative language presents a kind of picture to the mind, and thus delights while it instructs: whence its use, though more necessary when a language is poor and uncultivated, is never wholly laid aside, especially in the writings of orators and poets."⁴ The language of the Scriptures is highly figurative, especially in the Old Testament. For this, two reasons have been assigned; one is, that the inhabitants of the East, naturally possessing warm and vivid imaginations, and living in a warm and fertile climate, surrounded by objects equally beautiful and agreeable, delight in a figurative style of expression: and as these circumstances easily impel their power of conceiving images, they fancy similitudes which are sometimes far fetched, and which to the chastised taste of European readers do not always appear the most elegant. The other reason is, that many of the books of the Old Testament are poetical; now it is the privilege of a poet to illustrate the productions of his muse, and to render them more animated, by figures and images drawn from almost every subject that presents itself to his imagination. Hence David, Solomon, Isaiah, and other sacred poets, abound with figures, make rapid transitions from one to another, every where scattering flowers, and adorning their poems with metaphors, the real beauty of which, however, can only be appreciated by being acquainted with the country in which the sacred poets lived, its situation and peculiarities, and also with the manners of the inhabitants and the idioms of their language.

The language of the New Testament, and especially the discourses and speeches of our Saviour, are not less figurative; and numerous mistakes have been made by a literal application of what was figuratively meant. When our Saviour said to the Jews, 'Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up,' the Jews understood the word temple in its natural sense, and asked him, Whether he could raise again in three days what had taken six-and-forty years to build? They did not perceive that his language was figurative, and that he spake of the temple of his body.¹²

In order, then, to understand fully the figurative language of the Scriptures, it is requisite, first, to ascertain and determine what is really figurative, lest we take that to be literal which is figurative, as the disciples of our Lord and the Jews frequently did, or lest we pervert the literal meaning of words by a figurative interpretation; and, secondly, when we have ascertained what is really figurative, to interpret it correctly, and deliver its true sense. For this purpose, Ernesti has given it the following general rule:—We may ascertain whether any expression is to be taken literally or figuratively, by recalling the thing spoken of to its internal or external sense, that is, by seeking out its internal or external meaning; and this may in general be readily ascertained. Hence it is, that in human compositions we are very rarely in doubt, whether a thing be spoken literally or figuratively; because the thing or subject spoken of being human, and capable both of external and internal senses, may be recalled to a human sense, that is, to a sense intelligible by man. To understand this subject more particularly:

1. The literal meaning of words must be retained, more in the historical books of Scripture than in those which are poetical.

For it is the duty of an historian to relate transactions simply as they happened; while a poet has license to ornament his subject by the aid of figures, and to render it more lively by availing himself of similes and metaphors. Hence we find, that the style of narration in the historical books is simple and generally devoid of ornament, while the poetical books abound with images borrowed from various objects: not, indeed, that the historical books are entirely destitute of figurative expressions; for, whatever language men may use, they are so accustomed to this mode of expression, that they cannot fully convey their meaning in literal words, but are compelled by the force of habit to make use of such as are figurative. But we must not look for a figurative style in the historical books, and still less are historical narratives to be changed into allegories, and parables, unless these be obviously apparent. From inattention to this important rule, some interpreters, in ancient and modern times, have turned into allegory the whole Jewish ceremonial law. So, formerly and recently, the history of the creation of the world, the fall of man, the flood, the account of the tower of Babel, &c. have been explained either as poetical, or as philosophical allegories, i. e. philosophical speculations on these subjects, clothed in the garb of narration. By the same principles of exegesis, the Gospels are treated as poetical, which exhibit an imaginary picture of a perfect character, in the person of Jesus. In a word, every narration in the Bible, of an occurrence which is of a miraculous nature in any respect, is poetical; which means, as its abettors say, that some real fact or occurrence lies at the basis of the story, which is told agreeably to the very imperfect conceptions and philosophy of ancient times, or has been augmented and adorned by tradition and fancy.

"But that such liberties with the language of Scripture are utterly incompatible with the sober principles of interpretation, is sufficiently manifest from the bare statement of them. The object of the interpreter is, to find out what the sacred writers meant to say. This done, his task is performed. Party philosophy or skepticism cannot guide the interpretation of language."¹³

2. *The literal meaning of words is to be given up, if it be either improper, or involve an impossibility, or where words, properly taken, contain any thing contrary to the doctrinal or moral precepts delivered in other parts of Scripture.*¹⁴

(1.) The expressions in Jer. i. 18, are necessarily to be understood figuratively. God is there represented as saying to the prophet, I have made thee a defenced city, and an iron pillar, and brazen walls against the whole land. Now, it is obvious that these expressions are figurative; be cause, if taken literally, they involve an impossibility. The general import of the divine promise is, that God would defend Jeremiah against all open assaults, and secret contrivances of his enemies, who should no more be able to prevail against him than they could against an impregnable wall or fortress. So the literal sense of Isa. i. 25, is equally inapplicable; but in the following verse the prophet explains it in the proper words.

(2.) In Psal. xviii. 2. God is termed a rock, a fortress, a deliverer, a huckler, a horn of salvation, and a high tower: it is obvious that these predicates are metaphorically spoken of the Almighty.

(3.) Matt. viii. 22. Let the dead bury their dead cannot possibly be applied to those who are really and naturally dead; and, consequently, must be understood figuratively, "Leave those who are spiritually dead to perform the rites of burial for such as are naturally dead." In Psal. cxxx. 1. David is said to have cried unto the Lord out of the depths, by which word we are metaphorically to understand a state of the deepest affliction: because it nowhere appears from Scripture, nor is it probable, that the Jewish monarch was ever thrown into the sea, even in his greatest adversity, as we read that the prophet Jonah was, who cried to the Lord out of the depth, or midst of the sea. (Jon. i. 15. 17. ii. 2, 3, 5.) Similar expressions occur in 1 Cor. iii. 13. and Rev. vi. 13.

(4.) The command of Jesus Christ, related in Matt. xviii. 8, 9, if interpreted literally, is directly at variance with the sixth commandment (Exod. xx. 13.), and must consequently be understood figuratively. So, the declaration of Jesus Christ in John xiv. 28. (My Father is greater than I) is to be understood of himself, as he is man. This is evident from the context and from the nature of his discourse. In John xiv. 24. Christ tells his disciples that the Father had sent him; that is, in his quality of Messiah, he was sent by the Father to instruct and to save mankind. Now as the sender is greater than he who is sent (xiii. 16.); so, in this sense, is the Father greater than the Son. It certainly requires very little argument, and no sophistry, to reconcile this saying with the most orthodox notion of the deity of Christ; as he is repeatedly speaking of his divine and of his human nature. Of the former he says (John x. 30.), I and the Father are one; and of the latter he states with the same truth, the Father is greater than I.

(5.) Whatever is repugnant to natural reason cannot be the true meaning of the Scriptures; for God is the original of natural truth, as well as of that which comes by particular revelation. No proposition, therefore, which is repugnant to the fundamental principles of reason, can be the sense of any part of the word of God; hence the words of Christ, This is my body, and This is my blood (Matt. xxvi. 26, 28.), are not to be understood in that sense, which makes for the doctrine of transubstantiation, or of the conversion of the bread and wine, in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, into the actual body and blood of Christ: because it is impossible that contradictions should be true; and we cannot be more certain that any thing is true, than we are that that doctrine is false. Yet it is upon a forced and literal construction of our Lord's declaration, that the Romish church has, ever since the thirteenth century, erected and maintained the doctrine of transubstantiation:—a doctrine which is manifestly "repugnant to the plain words of Scripture, overthroweth the nature of a sacrament, and hath given occasion to many superstitions."¹⁵ In fact, if the words—this is my body—must be literally understood, why are not other words of similar import also to be taken literally? In which case Jesus Christ must be a vine, a door, and a rock; for so he is expressly termed in John x. 9. xv. 1. and 1 Cor. x. 4. And in the other part of the sacrament, the cup must be transubstantiated, not into the blood of Christ, but into the New Testament: for he said,—"This cup is the New Testament" or covenant (Luke xxii. 20.), that is, the representation or memorial of it. Further, as the words—"This is my body," and "This is my blood,"—were spoken BEFORE Christ's body was broken upon the cross, and BEFORE his blood was shed, he could not pronounce them with the intention that they should be taken and interpreted literally by his disciples. He could not take his body in his hands, nor offer them his blood in the cup, for it had not yet been shed. If the bread which he broke had been changed, he would have had two bodies, one of which would have been instrumental in presenting the other to the apostles. Of such a transformation they do not appear to have had the smallest idea; and if it did not take place in this first sacrament, what reason can we have to believe that it has been effected in any other? Hence it is clear that the doctrine of transubstantiation has no foundation in the words of Christ, which must necessarily be understood, not literally and properly, but figuratively, agreeably to the well known metonymy, common in all languages, but peculiar to the Hebrew (the impression of which the Greek here naturally takes), in which the sign is put for the thing signified. Thus in Gen. xii. 12. the three branches are three days, and in v. 13. the three baskets are three days; in xli. 26. the seven gold kine are seven years, and the seven gold ears are seven years; and in Ezek. xxxii. 11. the dry bones are the whole house of Israel.¹⁶

* Art. xxviii. of the Confession of the Anglican Church. The term—"transubstantiation"—was not invented until the thirteenth century; the first idea of Christ's bodily presence in the eucharist was started in the beginning of the eighth century; the first writer who maintained the doctrine was Paschasius Radbertus, in the ninth century, before it was firmly established: and the first public assertion of it was, at the third Lateran Council, in the year 1215, after it had been for some time avowed by the Roman popes, and inculcated by the clergy dependent on them, in obedience to their injunctions. But the term itself was not known before the thirteenth century, when it was invented by Stephen bishop of Autun Mosheim's Eccl. Hist. vol. iii. p. 217. 231.

Augustini Quæstiones in Leviticum. lib. iii. Quæst. 27. (Opera, tom. iii. pars i. p. 516. Paris, 1680.) In another place the same writer says,—"Inde est, quod ait Apostolus, Petra autem erat Christus (1 Cor. x. 4.), non ait, Petra significabit Christum." (Ibid. Quæst. in Genesis. c. xli Op. tom. iii. pars i. p. 335.)

³ "I hold it," says the learned and venerable Hooker, "for a most infallible rule in expositions of sacred Scripture, that, where a literal construction will stand, the farthest from the letter is commonly the worst. There is nothing more dangerous than this licentious and deluding art, which changes the meaning of words, as alchemy doth or would do the substance of metals, making of any thing what it pleases, and bringing in the end all truth to nothing." Ecclesiastical Polity, book v. cc. 58–60. or p. 211. of Mr. Collinson's Analysis.

The same metonymy exists in the service for the celebration of the pass-over among the modern Jews; in which the masters of the family and all the guests take hold of the dish containing the unleavened bread which he had previously broken, and say,—“Lo! This is the bread of affliction, which all our ancestors ate in the land of Egypt.”¹ The same phraseology is of frequent occurrence in the New Testament. Thus, in Matt. xiii. 35, 39. “The field is [represents] the world; the good seed is [represents] the children of the kingdom; the tares are [represents] the children of the wicked one. The enemy is [represents] the devil; the harvest is [represents] the end of the world; the reapers are the angels.” And in 1 Cor. x. 4. “That rock was [represented] Christ.” Similar modes of expression occur in Luke vii. 9. xv. 26. Gr. and xviii. 36. Gr. John vii. 36. and x. 6. Acts x. 17. Gal. iv. 21. and Rev. i. 20. Gr. It is evident, therefore, from the context, from biblical usage, and from the scope of the passage,—(it might also be added, if the limits necessarily prescribed to this paragraph would permit, from the testimonies of the fathers of the Christian church and of other ecclesiastical writers, both Greek and Latin),—that the literal interpretation of Matt. xxi. 25, 26, must be abandoned, and with it necessarily falls the modern Romish tenet of transubstantiation.

(5.) To change day into night (Job xvii. 12.) is a moral impossibility, contrary to common sense, and must be a figurative expression. In Isa. i. 5, 6. the Jewish nation are described as being sorely stricken or chastised, like a man mortally wounded, and destitute both of medicine as well as of the means of cure. That this description is figurative, is evident from the context; for in the two following verses the prophet delineates the condition of the Jews in literal terms.

(7.) If a passage of Scripture be a precept, prohibiting some heinous wickedness or crime, or commanding us to do good, it is not figurative; but if it seem to command any heinous wickedness or crime, or to forbid that which is profitable or beneficial to others, it is figurative, and must be interpreted accordingly.

In John vi. 53. Christ says, Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you. Now this sentence seems to command a heinous wickedness or crime; consequently it is figurative, commanding us to communicate of the passion of our Lord, and with delight and advantage to lay up in our memory, that his flesh was wounded and crucified for us.²

It is not, however, sufficient to know whether an expression be figurative or not, but, when this point is ascertained, another of equal importance presents itself; namely, to interpret metaphorical expressions by corresponding and appropriate terms. In order to accomplish this object, it is necessary,

3. That we inquire in what respects the thing compared, and that with which it is compared, respectively agree, and also in what respects they have any affinity or resemblance.

For, as a similitude is concealed in every metaphor, it is only by diligent study that it can be elicited, by carefully observing the points of agreement between the proper or literal and the figurative meaning. For instance, the prophetic writers, and particularly Ezekiel, very frequently charge the Israelites with having committed adultery and played the harlot, and with deserting Jehovah, their husband. From the slightest inspection of these passages, it is evident that spiritual adultery, or idolatry, is intended. Now the origin of this metaphor is to be sought from one and the same notion, in which there is an agreement between adultery and the worship paid by the Israelites to strange gods. That notion or idea is unfaithfulness; by which as a wife deceives her husband, so they are represented as deceiving God, and as violating their fidelity, in forsaking him.

To explain this general remark more particularly.

(1.) The sense of a figurative passage will be known, if the resemblance between the things or objects compared be so clear as to be immediately perceived.

Thus, if any one be said to walk in the way of the ungodly, or of the godly, we readily apprehend that the imitation of the conduct of those cha-

That the same construction exists in the Syriac Language is evident from the examples given by Bishop Beveridge in his Grammatica Syriaca, p. 30. by John in his Elementa Aramaica seu Chaldaeo-Syriacæ Linguae, pp. 24, 25. by Michaelis in his Grammatica Syriaca, §§ 79, 132. and by Hoffman in his Grammatica Syriaca, pp. 314, 377. Finally, the same idiom of using the pronoun in place of the verb substantive prevails in the Arabic Language; and examples of it are given by Richardson in his Arabic Grammar, chap. viii. and by Rosenmüller in his Institutiones Linguae Arabicæ, lib. v. § 83.

² Archbishop Tillotson in his Discourse on Transubstantiation (pp. 14—23, 12mo. edit.) and Bishop Burnet (on art. xxviii.) have given numerous passages from the fathers and other ecclesiastical writers, from the second to the sixth century, in which the Protestant—or true—interpretation of Matt. xxvi. 26. is maintained. But the fullest view of Christian antiquity on this subject will be found in a collection of testimonies from the second to the thirteenth century inclusive, translated and published by Archbishop Wake, entitled “An Historical Treatise written by an Author of the Communion of the Church of Rome, touching Transubstantiation. Wherein is made appear, that, according to the Principles of that Church, this Doctrine cannot be an Article of Faith. London, 1688.” 4to. ³ The preceding rule and illustration are designedly taken from Augustine, bishop of Hippo in Africa, an ecclesiastical writer, in the fifth century, of the greatest celebrity in the Roman church, in the catalogue of whose supposed works he is enrolled: because John vi. 53. is one of the passages urged by that church in support of her novel dogma of transubstantiation. The attentive reader will not fail to observe, how completely Augustine refutes and condemns that dogma. See his treatise de Doctrina Christiana, lib. iii. c. 16. On. tom. ii. p. 52. Paris, 1680.

acters is the idea designed to be expressed. In like manner, when any one is compared to a lion, who does not immediately understand that strength of limbs, firmness of nerve, and magnanimity, are the ideas intended to be conveyed? In Gen. xlix. 9. Judah is styled a lion's whelp, and is compared to a lion and lioness couching, whom no one dares to rouse. The warlike character and the conquests of this tribe are here prophetically described; but the full force of the passage will not be perceived, unless we know that a lion is, among the orientals, used figuratively to denote a hero, and also that a lion or lioness, when lying down after satisfying its hunger, will not attack any person. Mr. Park has recorded an instance of his providential escape from a lion thus circumstanced, which he saw lying near the road, and passed unhurt.*

(2.) As, in the sacred metaphors, one principal is generally the principal thing thereby exhibited, the sense of a metaphor will be illustrated by considering the context of a passage in which it occurs

This rule particularly applies to images, which do not always convey one and the same meaning. Thus, light and darkness not only denote happiness and misery, but also knowledge and ignorance; which of these two significations is to be preferably adopted, the context alone can show. In Psal. cxii. 4. we read: Unto the upright there is light in the darkness. Bishop Horsley thinks that this is an allusion to what happened in Egypt, when the Israelites had light in all their dwellings in Goshen, while the rest of Egypt was enveloped in darkness. Be this, however, as it may, since the design of the psalm in question is, to show the blessedness of the righteous and the final perdition of the ungodly, the context will plainly indicate that happiness is the idea intended in this verse; for, if we consult what precedes, we shall find that temporal prosperity is promised to the righteous, and that, among the particulars in which his prosperity is stated to consist, it is specified that his seed shall be mighty upon earth; the generation of the upright shall be blessed; wealth and riches shall be in his house. On the contrary, in Psal. xix. 8. where the commandment of Jehovah is said to enlighten the eyes, the idea of spiritual knowledge is intended, and this phrase corresponds to that in the preceding verse, where the testimony of Jehovah is said to make wise the simple. In the New Testament, light and darkness are of frequent occurrence, and in like manner designate a state of knowledge and a state of ignorance. It may be sufficient to refer to Luke i. 78, 79. Acts xxvi. 18. Rom. i. 21. Eph. iv. 18. and v. 8. 1 Pet. ii. 9.

(3.) The sense of a figurative expression is often known from the sacred writer's own explanation of it.

In common with profane writers, whether in prose or verse, the inspired penmen of the Old Testament frequently subjoin to figurative expressions proper or literal terms, and thus explain the meaning intended to be conveyed by the images they employ. Thus, in Esther viii. 16. it is said that the Jews had light and gladness, and joy and honour; here the explanatory synonymes mark the greatness of their prosperity and joy. In Psal. cxviii. 11. light is said to be sown for the righteous: the exposition immediately follows, and joy for the upright in heart. In like manner, when the prophet Hosea complains that a spirit of lasciviousness had driven the Israelites astray (Hos. iv. 12.), he explains his meaning not only by subjoining that they forsook their God, but in the following verse he states in clear and literal terms the eagerness with which they committed idolatry; upon the tops of the mountains they sacrifice, and upon the hills they burn incense, &c.

(4.) The sense of a figurative expression may also be ascertained by consulting parallel passages; in which the same thing is expressed properly and literally, or in which the same word occurs, so that the sense may be readily apprehended.

The Hebrew prophets very often represent Jehovah as holding in his hand a cup, and presenting it to men who are compelled to drink it up to the very dregs. The intoxicated stagger, and, falling prostrate on the ground, shamefully vomit forth the wine they have drunk. This metaphor is frequently repeated in various ways by the sacred poets, who sometimes only glance at it, while at others they more fully illustrate it. Compare Obad. 16. Nahum. iiii. 1. Habak. ii. 16. Psal. lxxxv. 3. Jer. xxv. 15—27. and Ezekiel xxiii. 33, 34. Now, if there were any doubt as to the meaning of the image occurring in these passages, its sense might be immediately ascertained by comparing the following parallel passage in Isaiah li. 17—23, in which the prophet portrays Jerusalem as a woman so intoxicated as to be unable to stand; but in which he introduces some words that clearly mark the sense of the metaphor. The passage itself, Bishop Lowth justly remarks, is poetry of the first order, sublimity of the highest proof.

Rouse thyself, rouse thyself up; arise, O Jerusalem!

Who hast drunken from the hand of JEHOVAH the cup of his fury;

The dregs of the cup of trembling thou hast drunken, thou hast wrung them out.

There is not one to lead her, of all the sons which she hath brought forth;

Neither is there one to support her by the hand, of all the sons which she hath educated.

These two things have befallen thee; who shall bemoan thee?

Desolation and destruction; the famine and the sword; who shall comfort thee?

Thy sons lie astounded; they are cast down:

At the head of all the streets, like the *oryx taken in the toils;

Drenched to the full with the fury of JEHOVAH, with the fury of thy God

Wherefore hear now this, O thou afflicted daughter;

And thou drunken, but not with wine.

Thus saith thy Lord JEHOVAH;

And thy God, who avengeth his people;

Behold I take from thy hand the cup of trembling;

The dregs of the cup of my fury;

Thou shalt drink of it again no more.

But I will put it into the hand of them who oppress thee;

Who said to thee, Bow down thy body, that we may go over;

And thou layest down thy back, as the ground:

And as the street to them that pass along.

Bishop LOWTH's Version.

(5.) Consider History.

A consideration of events recorded in history will very frequently show, how far and in what sense any expression is to be understood figuratively. Thus many and various things are said relative to the coming of Christ,

* Travels in the Interior of Africa, p. 310. London, 1807, 8vo. or in Pinkerton's Collection of Voyages, vol. xvi. p. 843.

* Or wild bull.

his kingdom, government, and adversaries. Now history informs us, that he came, at the destruction of Jerusalem, to rule and govern far and wide by the spreading of the Gospel. In Matt. x. 34. Christ says that he came not to send peace on earth, but a sword. In the parallel passage, Luke xii. 51, he says that he came to cause division. The general import of these two passages is, that he would cause discord, and as it were sow dissensions. But in what sense could the blessed Saviour mean that he would cause discord? We learn from history, that in consequence of the diffusion of the Christian religion, nations and families became divided, so that some embraced it while others rejected it, and the former were persecuted by the latter on account of their Christian profession. A further exposition of this passage is given in p. 457. infra.

(6.) Consider the connection of doctrine, as well as the context of the figurative passage.

A consideration of the connection of doctrine, as well as of the context, will often lead to the origin of the figurative expressions employed by the sacred writers, and consequently enable us to ascertain their meaning: for very frequently some word precedes or follows, or some synonyme is annexed, that plainly indicates whether the expression is to be taken properly or figuratively. For instance, the words sin and iniquity, which are of such frequent occurrence in the law of Moses, are tropically put for punishment; and that the phrase, to bear one's sin or iniquity, is equivalent to the suffering of the punishment due to sin, appears from the synonymous expressions of being cut off from the people, and dying being very often annexed. As in Levit. xix. 8. Exod. xxviii. 43. Num. xiv. 34. and xviii. 22, 32, &c. Thus also diseases and infirmities are called sins, because they are considered as the punishment of sin (as in Isa. liii. 4. with Matt. viii. 17.), the figure in which passage is subsequently explained in verse 5. Compare also verse 12. and Psalm xxxviii. 3—5. Ezek. xxxiii. 10. and John ix. 2, 3. So likewise in Gen. xxi. 42, 53, the context manifestly shows that the fear of Isaac, and the fear of his father, are put for Jehovah, the object of fear and reverence. Once more; when in 1 Pet. i. 5. believers are said to be living stones, a spiritual house, and a royal priesthood, as these expressions are derived from the Old Testament, we must recur to Exodus ix. 5, 6. in order to ascertain the full extent of their privileges. The general tenor of the Apostle's address then will be, "Consider yourselves as forming part of a nobler temple than that of the Jews, in which a much more spiritual sacrifice is offered to God through Christ—You, who have embraced the Gospel, are considered by God as inheritors of all those holy blessings which were promised to the Jews."

(7.) In fixing the sense exhibited by a metaphor, the comparison ought never to be extended too far, or into any thing which cannot be properly applied to the person or thing represented.

In other words, a comparison which ordinarily has but one particular view ought not to be strained, in order to make it agree in other respects, where it is evident that there is not a similitude of ideas. For instance, in Isa. xl. 6. we read all flesh is grass; that is, all mankind are liable to wither and decay, and will wither and decay like grass. But this metaphor would be tortured to a meaning, which, as it is foolish and absurd, we may be sure was never intended by the inspired writer, if we were to say that mankind were like grass, or were grass in colour or shape. What wild, and indeed what wicked, abuse, would be made of the Scripture expression concerning our Lord that he will come as a thief in the night (Rev. xvi. 15), if we were not to confine the sense to the suddenness and surprise of the thief, but should extend it to the temper and designs of the villain who breaks open houses in the night? Hence, though one metaphor may be brought to signify many things with respect to some different qualities, and diverse attributes, it nevertheless is very evident that that sense ought chiefly to be attended to, which appears to be designed by the Spirit of God, and which is obviously figured out to us in the nature, form, or use of the thing, from which the metaphor is taken. Thus, Christ is called a lion (Rev. v. 5.) because he is noble, heroic, and invincible; Satan, the grand adversary of souls, is called a lion in 1 Pet. v. 8. because he is rapacious, roaring, and devouring. And wicked men are termed lions in Job. iv. 10, 11. and 2 Tim. iv. 17. because they are fierce, outrageous, and cruel to weaker men.

(8.) In the interpretation of figurative expressions generally, and those which particularly occur in the moral parts of Scripture, the meaning of such expressions ought to be regulated by those which are plain and clear.

All mere maxims, whether plain or figurative, must be understood in a manner consistent with possibility and the rules of humanity. The rule just stated is especially applicable to the right interpretation of Matt. v. 39—42, which enjoins us not to retaliate, but to bear small injuries, and Matt. vi. 19, 31, 34, which prohibits thoughtfulness about worldly concerns; which injunctions have been objected to, as being impracticable general duties, inconsistent with natural instinct and law, and altogether destructive of society. If, however, the present rule be kept in view, and if we attend to the auditors and occasion of this discourse and to the context, the true sense of the precepts before us will be evident.

The auditors were the multitude and the disciples of Christ, as appears from the context both preceding and following the sermon, and also from the conclusion of it. The multitude and the disciples were likewise the auditors of the same, or a similar, discourse recorded by Luke. They were both, therefore, intended for general instruction to all Christians. Particular appropriate instructions to his apostles, and to the seventy during his ministry, Christ gave to them when he sent them forth to preach and work miracles; and upon other occasions when they were in private. After Jesus had been delivering some similar instructions to those in the sermon on the mount, he tells Peter that they were designed for general use. Our Lord, therefore, probably delivered the precepts we are considering in such language as was intelligible to the multitude. Now they, instead of viewing them as "impracticable, inconsistent with natural law, and destructive of society," expressed their great admiration of the wisdom and dignity with which he taught.

The occasion of this sermon was, towards the beginning of his ministry, to teach the true nature of the Messiah's kingdom, to give laws suitable to it, and to correct the false and worldly notions of it, which the Jews in general entertained. They were filled with ideas of conquest, and revenge against the Romans, and of enriching themselves by plunder. But Christ, instead of countenancing a vindictive temper, enjoins lenity, forbearance, and kindness to those who injure us. These directions accord with the dispositions which, in the introduction to the sermon, he pronounces to be requisite to true happiness; with his plain injunctions to forgive injuries, with the general strain of his discourses, with the condition of humanity, and with the context, both in Matthew and Luke. In connection with the precepts we are considering, in both evangelists, "doing to others as we would have them do to us," and, "doing good to our enemies, in imitation of our heavenly Father," are enjoined. These plain comprehensive rules are introduced as including the figurative ones here specified, which point out small injuries. And trivial instances are here specified, probably to point out the necessity of extending a lenient and forbearing disposition to small circumstances, in order to pervade every social sentiment and action with the temper of kindness, and to prevent a vindictive spirit from insinuating itself by the smallest avenues into our hearts. That these commands are not to be taken literally, as enjoining the particular actions here specified, but the disposition of forgiveness and benevolence, is apparent, not only from its being usual in the East to put the action for the disposition, and from the manner in which the precepts are introduced, but also from our Lord's own conduct. For he mildly reproved the officer who struck him at his trial. Though he had before voluntarily given himself up to the persons who were sent to take him, bade Peter sheathe the sword with which he had maimed one of them, and himself miraculously cured him, yet even here he gently reproved them for the manner in which they came to apprehend him. These instances of Christ's different behaviour under a variation of circumstances, show that he meant these precepts to be interpreted, according to the nature and reason of the case. He might express them the more strongly in order to contradict Eccles. xii. 4, 5, 7, and similar improper sentiments and practices which at that time prevailed in Judea. Neither did Paul act agreeably to the literal sense of the commands in question.

The injunction not to lay up your treasures upon earth, but in heaven, according to the Hebrew idiom, means, to prefer heavenly to earthly treasures. The reason given for it is, because, making earthly treasures the chief object, beclouds the moral eye, the guide of life, and is inconsistent with the love and service of God. Christ adds, "therefore take no thought," or, as it should be translated, "be not anxious about food, drink, or clothing," but with moderate care only about them, trust the providence of your heavenly Father. Let your first and chief care be to do your duty. Do not anxiously anticipate the cares of the morrow. All this accords with our best natural sentiments, and with the other instructions of our Lord. The auditors and occasion of the discourse, together with the language and connection in which the directions are given, show these to be the ideas which Jesus meant to convey.

4. Lastly, in explaining the figurative language of Scripture, care must be taken that we do not judge of the application of characters from modern usage; because the inhabitants of the East have very frequently attached a character to the idea expressed, widely different from that which usually presents itself to our views.

The inhabitants of the East, from their lively imaginations, very often make use of far-fetched comparisons, and bring together things which, in our judgments, are the most dissimilar. Besides, since the Hebrew mode of living differed greatly from ours, and many things were in use and commended by the Israelites which to us are unknown, we ought not to be surprised, if there be a very wide difference subsisting between the metaphorical expressions of the Hebrews, and those which are familiar to us, and if they should sometimes appear harsh, and seem to convey a different meaning from that which we are accustomed to receive. Thus, in Deut. xxiii. 17. the glory of the tribe of Joseph is compared to the firstling of a bullock; in like manner Amos (iv. 1.) compares the noble women of Israel to the kine of Bashan, and Hosea compares the Israelites to refractory kine that shake off the yoke. The patriarch Jacob in his prophetic and valedictory address to his children (Gen. xlix. 14.), in which he foretells their own and their descendants' future condition, terms Issachar a strong ass, literally a strong-boned or strong-limbed ass. Now, if we take these metaphors according to their present sense we shall greatly err. The ox tribe of animals, whose greatest beauty and strength lie in its horns, was held in very honour among the ancient nations, and was much esteemed on account of its aptitude for agricultural labour: hence Moses especially enacts, that the ox should not be muzzled while treading out the corn. The ass tribe, in the East, is robust and more handsome, as well as much quicker in its pace, than those animals are in our country; and therefore princes and persons of noble birth thought it no degradation to ride on asses. Hence, in the opinion of the inhabitants of the East, it is not reckoned disgraceful to be compared with oxen and asses; nor, if a metaphor be derived from those animals, do they intend to convey the same meaning which we should express by a figure drawn from them. In the comparison of the tribe of Joseph to the firstling of a bullock, the point of resemblance is strength and power. In the comparison of the matrons of Samaria to the kine of Bashan, the point of resemblance is luxury and wantonness flowing from their abundance: in the comparison of Issachar to an ass, the point of resemblance is bodily strength and vigour; for in that animal the Hebrews were accustomed to regard strength, though we usually associate with it the idea of slowness and stupidity.

SECTION II.

ON THE INTERPRETATION OF THE METONYMIES OCCURRING IN THE SCRIPTURES.

Nature of a Metonymy.—1. Metonymy of the cause.—2. Metonymy of the effect.—3. Metonymy of the subject.—4. Metonymy of the adjunct, in which the adjunct is put for the subject.

A METONYMY is a trope, by which we substitute one appellation for another,¹ as the cause for the effect, the effect for the cause, the subject for the adjunct, or the adjunct for the subject.

A Metonymy of the cause is used in Scripture, when the person acting is put for the thing done, or the instrument by which a thing is done is put for the thing effected, or when a thing or action is put for the effect produced by that action.

A Metonymy of the effect occurs, when the effect is put for the efficient cause.

A Metonymy of the subject is, when the subject is put for the adjunct; that is, for some circumstance or appendage belonging to the subject: when the thing or place containing is put for the thing contained or placed; when the possessor is put for the thing possessed; when the object is put for the thing conversant about it; or when the thing signified is put for its sign.

A Metonymy of the adjunct is, when that which belongs to any thing serves to represent the thing itself.

I. METONYMY OF THE CAUSE.

1. Frequently the person acting is put for the thing done.

1. Thus, Christ is put for his Doctrine in Rom. xvi. 9.

Salute Urbanus our helper in Christ, that is, in preaching the doctrines of the Gospel, he having been a fellow-labourer with the apostles. Similar instances occur in 1 Cor. iv. 15. and Eph. iv. 20.

2. The Holy Spirit is put for His Effects, as in 2 Cor. iii. 6.

Who hath made us able ministers of the new covenant, not of the letter but of the spirit; for the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life. Here, by the word letter we are to understand the law written on tables of stone, which required perfect obedience, and which no man can perform because of the corruption of his nature; therefore the law or letter killeth, that is, can pronounce nothing but a sentence of condemnation and eternal death against man. But by the spirit is intended the saving doctrine of the Gospel, which derives its origin from the Holy Spirit, the Comforter, who teaches or instructs, and prepares man for eternal life. In the same sense, Jesus Christ says, John vi. 63. The words that I speak they are spirit and life, that is, they are from the Spirit of God, and, if received with true faith, will lead to eternal life. A similar mode of expression occurs in Rom. viii. 2. Here, by the law of the spirit of life is meant the doctrine of the Gospel, because it is a peculiar instrument of the operation of the Holy Spirit; who, by a divine efficacy, changes the heart, and writes his law there, which now is not only inscribed on tablets or parchments, but also penetrates the very heart of man, and quickens the soul to spiritual motions and actions.²

3. The Holy Spirit is put for His Operations:

For renewing, Psal. li. 10. Ezek. xxxvi. 26, 27. compared with Eph. iv. 23. Rom. xii. 2. which passages imply nothing less than a radical change, both external or moral, and internal or spiritual, wrought in the soul by the influence of divine grace.

4. The Holy Spirit is put for the Influences or Gifts of the Spirit, as in 1 Thess. v. 19. Quench not the Spirit.

The similitude is borrowed from the ancient altar of burnt-offering, in which the fire was to be kept continually burning. The Holy Spirit is here represented as a fire, because it is His province to enlighten, quicken, purify, and refine the soul, and to excite and maintain every pious and devout affection. The Christian, therefore, must not quench the sacred flame of the Holy Spirit in any of his influences by committing any act, uttering any word, or indulging any sensual or malevolent disposition, which may provoke Him to withdraw both His gifts and graces. Neither must the Christian extinguish the gifts of the Spirit, but keep them in constant exercise, as love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, fidelity, meekness, &c. So, in 2 Tim. i. 6. Saint Paul's advice, Stir up the gift of God which is in thee, means the gift of the Holy Spirit. See also 1 Tim. iv. 14.

Again, when our Saviour "exhorts us to ask with confidence for spiritual aid, appealing to the conduct of men, he adds, 'If ye, then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him?' (Luke x. 13). By which he would have us distinctly understand that if man, with all his imperfections and all his unkindness, can yet be tender-hearted to his children, and seasonably bestow on them beneficial gifts, much more will God, who is perfection and benignity itself, most assuredly impart the blessing of his Holy Spirit to those who earnestly and anxiously implore divine help,—that help which can illumine what is dark; can strengthen what is irresolute; can restrain what is violent; can comfort what is afflicted; in such a manner, and to such a degree, as may be requisite for the soul when struggling under different but difficult temptations; that help, without which man, unassisted, cannot persevere in rectitude of thought and action."³

5. Spirit also denotes a Divine Power or energy, reigning in the soul of a renewed man.

Compare Luke i. 46, 47. with 1 Thess. v. 23.; and for other places, where the word spirit is put for the new man and spiritual strength, see Isa. xxi. 9. Ezek. xviii. 31. Matt. xxvi. 41. Rom. i. 9. 1 Cor. v. 3—5. and vi. 20 Gal. iii. 3, &c.

6. More especially the Holy Spirit is put for those peculiar and extraordinary Gifts of the Spirit, which, for various uses, whether public or private, spiritual or temporal, are bestowed on man.

Thus, in 2 Kings ii. 9. Elisha earnestly requests of Elijah, Let a double portion of thy spirit rest upon me; that is, an extraordinary measure of the gifts of prophecy, and of power in working miracles, which are here called the portion of the spirit. See also Num. xi. 17, 25. Dan. v. 12. The prophet Daniel had a more excellent spirit, that is a more eminent gift of the spirit, more knowledge, and more understanding.

7. The Spirit is also put for revelations, visions, or ecstasies, whether really from the Holy Spirit, or pretended to be so.

Ezek. xxxvii. 1. The hand of the Lord carried me out in the Spirit of the Lord, that is, by a vision or rapture of spirit. 2 Thess. ii. 2. That ye be not shaken in mind,—neither by spirit, &c. that is, by revelations pretending to come from the spirit. Rev. i. 10. I was in the spirit that is, in an ecstasy and peculiar revelation of the Holy Spirit, as is described in Rev. iv. 2. xvi. 3. xxi. 10. and 2 Cor. xii. 2. To this head may also be referred those passages where spirit is put for doctrines, whether really revealed or pretended to be so; as in 1 Tim. iv. 1. where by seducing spirits are intended false teachers who pretend to receive their doctrine from the Spirit of God; and 1 John iv. 1. where spirit is put for doctrine pretended to be received by the false teachers from God.

8. Parents or Ancestors are put for their Posterity: this mode of speaking is of very frequent occurrence in the Sacred Writings.

Thus Shem, Japhet, and Canaan, are put for their posterity, in Gen. ix. 27. Jacob and Israel for the Israelites, in Exod. v. 2. Num. xxiii. 21. xxi. 5. 17. Deut. xxxiii. 28. 1 Kings xviii. 17, 18. Psal. xiv. 7. and cxxxv. 1. Amos vi. 9. in which verse Isaac, as in verse 16, the House of Isaac, means the same people. The seed of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, (of whom according to the flesh, Christ came, Rom. ix. 5.) is put for Christ himself, in Gen. xii. 3. xviii. 18. xxi. 13. xvi. 4. xviii. 14. and Gal. iii. 8., as is evident by comparing Acts iii. 25. and Gal. xii. 14, 16. In 2 Chron. xxx. 24. Obed-edom is put for his descendants, who, it appears from 1 Chron. xxv. 15., were porters and keepers of the sacred treasures. In Ezek. xxxiv. 23. David is put for David's Lord, the illustrious Messiah.

9. The Writer or Author is put for his Book or Work:

As in Luke xvi. 29. xxi. 27. Acts xv. 21, xxi. 21. and 2 Cor. iii. 15.; in which passages Moses and the Prophets respectively mean the Mosaic and Prophetic Writings, composed by them under divine inspiration, and transmitted to posterity as the rule of faith.

To this first species of metonymy may be appropriately referred, FIRST, all those passages where the soul of man is put for his life, which is its effect, as in Gen. ix. 5. (Heb.) Exod. iv. 19. (Heb.) Lev. xvii. 11. Judg. ix. 17. (Heb.) 1 Sam. xxvi. 21. 1 Kings ii. 23. (Heb.) 2 Kings vii. 7. (Heb.) Psal. xxxiii. 19. xxxviii. 12. (Heb.) lvi. 13. Jer. xlv. 5. (Heb.) Lam. v. 9. (Heb.) Jonah ii. 6. (Heb.) Matt. ii. 20. (Gr.) x. 39. (Gr.) xvi. 25. (Gr.) xx. 28. (Gr.) John x. 17. (Gr.) xiii. 37, 38. (Gr.) xv. 13. (Gr.) &c. SECONDLY, those passages also, where the soul is put for the will, affections, and desires, which are its operations, as in the original of the following passages, where the metonymy is correctly rendered in our authorized version; viz. Gen. xxiii. 8. Exod. xxiii. 9. Deut. xxiii. 24. Psalm xvii. 10. xxvii. 12. xii. 2. cv. 22. Prov. xxiii. 2. and John x. 24. (literally, hold our soul in suspense.) And, THIRDLY, all such passages where the spirit (which is frequently synonymous with the soul of man) is used to express the motions or affections of the soul, whether good or evil. Examples of this kind occur in Gen. xlv. 27. Num. xiv. 24. Judg. viii. 3., where, in the Hebrew, anger is soul, as is heart in Exod. xxiii. 9. 2 Chron. xxi. 16. xxxvi. 22. Psal. lxxvi. 12. lxxvii. 3. Prov. i. 23. xviii. 14. xxix. 1. Eccles. vii. 9. Isa. xxix. 10. xxxvii. 7. Jer. li. 11. Ezek. xiii. 3. Dan. v. 20. Hag. i. 14. Hab. i. 11. Rom. xi. 8. (Gr.) 1 Cor. i. 12. (Gr.) &c.

II. Sometimes the cause or instrument is put for the thing effected by it. Thus,

1. The Mouth, the Lips, and the Tongue, are respectively put for the Speech.

Thus, Deut. xvii. 6. by the mouth of two or three witnesses (that is, their speech or testimony) shall he that is worthy of death be put to death. So Deut. xix. 15. Matt. xviii. 16. Prov. xxv. 15. A soft tongue breaketh the bone; that is, a mild and courteous way of speaking softens the hardest heart and most obstinate resolutions. Similar instances occur in Psal. v. 9. Prov. x. 20. Jer. xviii. 18. Acts ii. 4. 11. Tongue is also put for the gift of foreign languages, in Mark xvi. 17. and 1 Cor. xiv. 9. Gen. xi. 1. The whole earth was of one language (Heb. lip), and of one speech (Heb. word). In the book of Proverbs, the lip is very frequently put for speech. See Prov. xii. 19. 22. xiv. 7. xvii. 7. xviii. 7. 20. Job xii. 20. (Marginal renderings.)

² Flaccus Illyricus, in Clav. Script. pars 1. col. 1162.

³ Bishop Huntingford's Charge, entitled "Preparations for the Holy Order of Deacons," p. 14.

2. The Mouth is also put for Commandment in Gen. xiv. 21. (marginal rendering) (Heb. mouh). Num. iii. 16. 39. xx. 24. xxvii. 14. Deut. i. 26. 43. and in Prov. v. 3. the Palate (marginal rendering) is also put for Speech.

3. The Throat is also put for Loud Speaking, in Isa. lviii. 1. Cry aloud (Heb. with the throat).

4. The Hand is ordinarily put for its Writing, 1 Cor. xvi. 21. Col. iv. 18.

By the same form of speech also Labour is put for Wages, or the fruit of labour, Ezek. xxiii. 29; and things that are sold for the price at which they are sold. Thus, in Matt. xxvi. 9. it is said the ointment might have been sold for so much and given to the poor. See likewise Exod. xxi. 21. The sword is put for war or slaughter. Exod. v. 3. Lev. xvi. 6. Psal. cxlv. 0. Isa. i. 20. Jer. xliii. 11. Rom. viii. 35.

5. The Sword, Famine, and Pestilence likewise respectively denote the effects of those scourges.

Ezek. vii. 15. The sword is without, and the pestilence and the famine within; that is, death and ruin are every where scattered by those terrible agents. So in Matt. x. 34. I came not to send peace (or temporal prosperity) but a sword; that is, variance, death, and persecution. Our Saviour's meaning is, not that his coming was the necessary and proper cause of such unhappiness, but that so it should eventually happen on his appearance in our nature; because his kingdom was of another world, and consequently, opposed to all the designs and interests of the present world. This remark will satisfactorily explain Luke xii. 51—53, where Jesus foretells the effects that would follow from preaching the Gospel.

2. METONYMY OF THE EFFECT.

III. Sometimes, on the contrary, the effect is put for the cause.

Thus, God is called Salvation, that is, the author of it, Exod. xv. 2, our life and the length of our days, Deut. xxx. 20, our strength, Psal. xviii. 1. So, Christ is termed Salvation, Isa. xlix. 6. Luke ii. 30.—Life, John xi. 25, and the resurrection in the same place. See also Col. iii. 4. Peace, Eph. ii. 14. So he is said to be made unto us wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption, that is, the author of all these, in 1 Cor. i. 30. So, in Luke xi. 14. compared with Matt. ix. 32, a dumb devil or demon is one that made the person whom he possessed dumb. In like manner the Gospel is called the power of God unto salvation, in Rom. i. 16, that is, the instrument of his power. Faith is called our Victory, because by it we overcome the world, 1 John v. 4. That which is the means of sustaining or preserving life is called our life, Deut. xxiv. 6, or our living, Mark xii. 44. Luke viii. 43. and xv. 12. So, glad tidings, are such as make glad, Rom. x. 15. A lively hope is that which revives or enlightens, 1 Pet. i. 3.—Wine is a mocker and strong drink is raging, Prov. xx. 1, that is, they make men such. There is the same form of speech likewise in Heb. vi. 1. and ix. 14. where dead works are deadly works, that is, such as make men obnoxious to death. Deut. xxx. 15. I have set before thee this day life and death, that is, have clearly showed thee what is the cause and original of each. John xiii. 19. This is the condemnation, that is, the cause of it, Rom. vii. 7. Is the law sin? that is the cause of sin, in itself. Rom. vii. 6. To be carnally minded is death, that is, its cause, but to be spiritually minded is life and peace, or the cause of those blessings. A like expression occurs in Rom. vi. 23. Bread is put for the seed of which bread is made, Eccl. xi. 1. Shame is put for that which is the cause of it, or the idols worshipped by the Israelites, which proved their shame. Jer. iii. 24. Hos. ix. 10.

3. METONYMY OF THE SUBJECT.

IV. Sometimes the subject is put for the adjunct; that is, for some circumstance or appendage belonging to or depending upon the subject.

Thus, the HEART is frequently used for the will and affections, as in Deut. iv. 29. vi. 5. x. 12. Psal. ix. 1. xxiv. 4. li. 10. lxii. 10. cv. 25. cxix. 10. 32. 112. Prov. xxi. 1. xxiii. 26. Acts iv. 32. For the understanding, mind, thoughts, and memory, Deut. iv. 39. vi. 6. xi. 16. 18. xxix. 4. 1 Sam. i. 13. 2 Chron. vi. 3. Job xxii. 22. Psal. iv. 4. lxiv. 6. Prov. xix. 21. xxviii. 26. and Luke ii. 51. For the conscience, 2 Sam. xxiv. 10. 2 Kings xxi. 19. Eccles. vii. 22. and 1 John iii. 20, and for the desires of the soul expressed in prayer, in Psal. lxxi. 8. Lam. ii. 19. The reins are also frequently put for the thoughts, as in Psal. vii. 9. xxvi. 2. li. 6. lxiii. 21. Prov. xxiii. 16. Jer. xi. 20. xvii. 10. and xx. 12. So, the new or inward man is put for the condition or state of a regenerated soul, to which the old or outward man is opposed. See Rom. vi. 6. and xii. 2. Eph. iv. 22. 24. 2 Cor. v. 17.

V. Sometimes the place or thing containing denotes that which is contained in such place or thing.

Thus, the EARTH and the WORLD are frequently put for the men that dwell therein, as in Gen. vi. 11. Psal. xcvi. 13. Hab. ii. 14. John i. 29. iii. 16. 17. xv. 18. and xvii. 21. 1 Cor. vi. 2. as also in very many passages. In like manner, countries, islands, cities, and houses, are respectively put for their inhabitants, Gen. xli. 57. Psal. c. 1. cv. 38. Isa. xli. 5. xlii. 4. xliii. 3. li. 5. Matt. iii. 5. viii. 34. xi. 21. 22. Gen. vii. 1. Exod. i. 21. 2 Sam. vii. 11. 1 Chron. x. 6. Acts x. 2. 1 Tim. ii. 4. Heb. xi. 7. So the houses of Levi and Israel denote their several families. Exod. ii. 1. Ezek. iii. 1. The basket, Deut. xxvii. 5. 17. is the fruit of the basket; a table, Psal. xlix. 5. lxix. 22. and lxxviii. 19. denotes the meat placed on it; the cup, the wine or other liquor in it, Jer. xlii. 12. Ezek. xliii. 32. Matt. xxvi. 27, 28. Mark xiv. 23. Luke xxii. 17. 20. 1 Cor. x. 16. 21. and xi. 26, 27; ships, Isa. xliii. 14. the men in them; the grave, those who are buried in it, as in Isa. xxxvii. 13. compared with verse 19. and in Psal. vi. 6. In like manner heaven is put for God himself, in Psal. lxxiii. 9. Psal. xxi. 25. Luke xx. 4. and xv. 18.

VI. Sometimes the possessor of a thing is put for the thing possessed.

Thus, Deut. ix. 1. To possess nations greater and mightier than thyself, means to possess the countries of the Gentiles. See also Psal. lxxix. 7. where Jacob means the land of the Israelites. In like manner, the name of God is put for the oblations made to him. Josh. xiii. 33. with verse 14. Josh. xiii. 7. and Deut. x. 9. Christ is put for his church (or believers, who are termed his peculiar people, Tit. ii. 14. 1 Pet. ii. 9.) in Matt. xxv. 35. explained in verse 40. 1 Cor. xii. 12; and the afflictions of Christ are put for the afflictions of the faithful, in Col. i. 24.

VII. Frequently the object is put for that which is conversant about it.

Thus glory and strength are put for the celebration of the divine glory and strength, in Psal. viii. 2. explained by Matt. xxi. 16; see also Psal. xcvi. 7. 8. A burthen is a prediction of divine judgments or punishments about to be inflicted on sinners. Isa. xlii. 1. xvi. 1. xvi. 1. xxi. 1. xxii. 1. and xxiii. 1. Promise is put for faith which receives the gracious promise of God, in Rom. ix. 8. and Gal. iv. 23. Sin denotes a sacrifice for sin or sin-offering, Gen. iv. 7. Exod. xxix. 14. (Heb. sin) Lev. x. 17. (Heb. sin) Hos. iv. 8. Isa. liii. 10. (Heb. sin) and 2 Cor. v. 21.

VIII. Sometimes the thing signified is put for the sign.

So, the strength of God, in 1 Chron. xvi. 11. and Psal. cv. 4. is the ark, which was a sign and symbol of the divine presence and strength, whence it is expressly called the ark of the strength of God in Psal. cxxxii. 8. Thus, in Ezek. vii. 27. desolation denotes a mourning garment as a token of it.

IX. When an action is said to be done, the meaning frequently is, that it is declared or permitted, or foretold that it shall be done.

Thus, in the original of Lev. xiii. 3. the priests shall look on him and pollute him; in our version, shall pronounce him unclean or polluted. The original of Ezek. xiii. 22. is, by quickening or enlivening him; in our translation it is rendered by promising him life. So Gen. xii. 13. he restored, means, foretold or declared that I should be restored. Jer. iv. 10. Ah, Lord God! thou hast greatly deceived this people, that is, hast permitted them to be deceived by their false prophets. Ezek. xiii. 19. to slay the souls which should not die, denotes the prophesying falsely that they should die. So Jer. i. 10. I have set thee over the nations to root out and to pull down, that is, to prophesy or declare them pulled down. Ezek. xx. 25. 26. I gave them statutes which were not good, and polluted them in their own gifts, that is, I gave them up to themselves, and permitted them to receive such statutes of the heathen, and suffered them to pollute themselves in those very gifts, which, by the law, they were to dedicate to my service, and dealt with them accordingly. Hos. vi. 5. I have hearkened them by the prophets, or foretold that they should be hewn or slain. So in Acts x. 15. the original rendering is, what God hath cleansed, that do not thou pollute (compare Matt. xv. 11), that is, as in our version, call not thou common or defiled. Hence in Matt. xvi. 19. whatsoever thou shalt bind or loose on earth, &c. means, whatsoever thou shalt declare to be my will on earth shall be confirmed in heaven. And in like manner, the meaning of John xxi. 23. is, whose sins ye shall declare to be remitted or retained by the word of God. Matt. vi. 13. lead us not into temptation, that is, suffer us not to be overcome by temptation.

X. Further, an action is said to be done, when the giving of an occasion for it is only intended.

Thus, the literal rendering of Jer. xxxviii. 23. is, thou shalt burn this city, that is (as translated in our version), thou shalt cause it to be burnt. Hence Jeroboam is recorded in 1 Kings xvi. 16. to have made Israel to sin, that is, to have occasioned it, by his example and command. In Acts i. 13. Judas is said to have purchased a field, that is, occasioned it to be purchased by the money which he cast down in the temple. Rom. xiv. 15. destroy not him, that is, be not the cause or occasion of his destruction. And in 1 Cor. vii. 16. whether thou shalt save thy husband, means, whether thou shalt be the cause of his conversion, and, consequently, of his salvation.

4. METONYMY OF THE ADJUNCT, IN WHICH THE ADJUNCT IS PUT FOR THE SUBJECT.

XI. Sometimes the accident, or that which is additional to a thing, is put for its subject in kind.

The abstract is put for the concrete. So grey hairs (Heb. hoariness, or grey-headedness), in Gen. xli. 33. denote me, who am now an old man, grey and decrepit with age. So also, days, and multitude of years, in Job xxiii. 7. are old men. The strength of Israel, 1 Sam. xv. 29. is the strong God of Israel. Circumcision and uncircumcision, in Rom. iii. 30. signify the circumcised and uncircumcised. The election, Rom. x. 13. is the elect. Abomination, in Gen. xvi. 34. and Luke xvi. 15. is an abominable thing. A curse, Gal. iii. 13. is accursed. Light and darkness, Eph. v. 8. denote the enlightened and the ignorant.

XII. Sometimes the thing contained is put for the thing containing it, and a thing deposited in a place for the place itself.

Thus, Gen. xxviii. 22. means this place, where I have erected a pillar of stone, shall be God's house. Josh. xv. 19. Springs of water denote some portion of land, where there may be springs. Matt. ii. 11. Treasures are the cabinets or other vessels containing them. A similar expression occurs in Psal. cxxxv. 7. Outer darkness, in Matt. xxii. 13. means hell, the place of outer darkness. Matt. xxv. 10. Marriage denotes the place where the nuptial feast was to be celebrated. Mark iii. 11. Unclean spirits are men

1 Dr. A. Clarke, in his commentary on this verse, has adduced one hundred and eight instances from the Old and New Testaments, in which the word sin is put for a sin-offering; Dr. Whitby (in loc.) has specified only twenty-two examples.

2 On a forced interpretation of these two clauses (among others) has the papal church erected the dangerous notion that priests may grant particular absolution to individuals. See it briefly but ably confuted in Bishop Porteus's Confutation of the Errors of the Church of Rome, pp. 44, 45.

possessed by them. In Luke vi. 12. and Acts xvi. 13. 16. Prayer evidently means the place of prayer. Rev. viii. 3. Golden incense, ἡ χρυσή θυμίαμα, means golden censer, and so it is rendered in our authorized English version.

XIII. Time is likewise put for the things which are done or happen in time.

This is to be understood both of the word time itself, and of names, expressing portions of time, whether divided naturally or by human institution. Thus, in 1 Chron. xii. 32. xxxix. 30. Esth. i. 13. 2 Tim. iii. 1. Dent. iv. 32. Mark xiv. 35. and John xii. 27. times, day, and hour respectively denote the transactions that took place in them. Again, days are said to be good or evil, according to the events which happen in them, as in Gen. xlvii. 9. Eccles. vii. 10. and Eph. v. 16; and that is called a person's day, in which any thing notorious or remarkable befalls him, whether it be good, as in Hos. i. 11. and Luke xix. 42-44., or evil, as in Job xviii. 20. Psal. cxxxvii. 7. Ezek. xxii. 1. Obad. 12. Micah vii. 4. Psal. xxxvii. 13. The days of the Lord, in Job xxiv. 1. Isa. xlii. 6. Joel i. 15. and ii. 1, 2. Amos v. 20. Zeph. i. 14-16. 18. and ii. 2. respectively denote the days when divine punishments were to be inflicted; and hence, by way of eminence, the day of the Lord is appropriated to the day of judgment, in Joel ii. 31. Acts ii. 20. 1 Cor. i. 8. 2 Thess. i. 2. &c. In the same manner, the harvest and summer are put for the fruits gathered at those seasons. Deut. xxi. 19. Isa. xvi. 9. [Jer. xl. 10. Amos viii. 1. 2. 2 Sam. xvi. 2. in which three passages, as also in Isa. xvi. 9. the Hebrew is only summer]. And also the passover is put for the lamb which was slain and eaten on that solemn festival. Exod. xii. 21. 2 Chron. xxx. 17. Mark xiv. 12. 14. Matt. xxvi. 17-19. Luke xxii. 8. 11. 13. 15.

XIV. In the Scriptures, things are sometimes named or described according to appearances, or to the opinion formed of them by men, and not as they are in their own nature.

Thus, Hananiah, the opponent of Jeremiah, is called a prophet, not because he was truly one, but was reputed to be one, Jer. xxviii. 1. 5. 10. In Ezek. xxi. 3. the righteous mean those who had the semblance of piety, but really were not righteous. So in Matt. ix. 13. Christ says, I am not come to call the righteous (that is, such as are so in their own estimation), but sinners to repentance. See further Luke xviii. 9. and Rom. x. 2, 3, &c.

In Luke ii. 48. Joseph is called the father of Christ, and in v. 41. is mentioned as one of his parents, because he was reputed to be his father, as the same evangelist states in ch. iii. 23. Compare John vi. 42. &c. The preaching of the Gospel is in 1 Cor. i. 21. termed foolishness; not that it was really such, but was accounted to be so by its opponents. In like manner false teaching is called another Gospel in Gal. i. 6. and Epimenides, the Cretan philosopher, is termed a prophet in Tit. i. 12. because his countrymen regarded him as such, and after his death offered sacrifices to him.²

His enemies shall lick the dust, Psal. lxxii. 9. means that they shall prostrate themselves so low towards the earth, that they shall seem to lick the dust. Similar expressions occur in Isa. xlix. 23. Micah vii. 17, &c. The phrase, coming from a far country and from the end of heaven, in Isa. xlii. 5, is taken from the opinion which anciently obtained, and was founded on the appearance to the eye, viz. that the heavens are not spherical but hemispherical, ending at the extremities of the earth, upon which the extremities of heaven appear to rest. Hence the ends of the earth denote the remotest places. The same phrase occurs in Deut. iv. 32. and xxx. 4. Neh. i. 9. Matt. xxiv. 31.

XV. Sometimes the action or affection, which is conversant about any object, or placed upon it, is put for the object itself.

Thus, the Senses are put for the objects perceived by them, as hearing for doctrine or speech, in Isa. xxviii. 9. (marg. rend.) and liii. 1. (Heb.) In John xii. 38. and Rom. x. 16. the Greek word xxx, translated report, literally means hearing, and so it is rendered in Gal. iii. 2. 5. Hearing is also put for fame or rumour in Psal. cxi. 7. (Heb.) Ezek. vii. 26. Obad. 1. Hab. ii. 2. (Heb.) Matt. iv. 24. xvi. 1. and xiv. 6. Mark i. 28. and xiii. 7. &c. The eye in the original of Num. xii. 7. Lev. xxi. 55. Prov. xxiii. 31. Ezek. i. 4. vii. 2. and x. 9. is put for colours which are seen by the eye. Faith denotes the doctrine, received and believed by faith, in Acts vi. 7. Gal. i. 23. and iii. 23. 25. Eph. iv. 5. 1 Tim. iv. 1. Tit. i. 13. Jude 3. Rev. ii. 13. — Hope, in Psal. lxxv. 5. and lxxii. 5. Jer. xiv. 7. 13. is God, in whom we have hope, or place our confidence. Hope also denotes Christ, or the benefits which we receive by him, in Acts xvii. 6-8. xxvii. 20. Col. i. 27. 1 Tim. i. 1. Hope is sometimes also put for men, in whom we confide, or from whom we expect some good, as in Isa. xxi. 5. 6. and for the thing hoped for, as in Prov. xii. 12. Rom. viii. 24. and Gal. v. 5. in which last place the hope of righteousness by faith means eternal life, which is promised to the just by faith, and also in Tit. ii. 13. — Love is put for the object of affection, Jer. ii. 33. and xii. 7. (marginal rendering.) — Desire, Ezek. xxiv. 16. 21. is the thing desired. In like manner, the lust or desire of the eyes, 1 John ii. 16. is the object of the eyes which we eagerly desire. — So, Fear is put for the object that is feared, in Psal. liii. 5. Prov. i. 26. Isa. viii. 13.

XVI. Sometimes the sign is put for the thing signified.

Thus, Sovereign Power and authority are expressed by a Sceptre, Crown, Diadem, Throne, and Shutting and opening without resistance, in Gen. xlix. 10. Isa. xxii. 22. Ezek. xxi. 26. Zech. x. 11. and Rev. iii. 7. War is denoted by bows, spears, chariots, and swords, Psal. xli. 9. Lam. v. 9. Ezek. xxi. 3. 4. Matt. x. 31. So, to lift up the hand is sometimes to swear, Gen. xiv. 22. Deut. xxxii. 40., and sometimes to pray, Lam. iii. 41. 1 Tim. ii. 8. In like manner, to stretch forth the hand is to call for audience, Psal. xlv. 20. Prov. i. 24.

To kiss the hand, or to kiss another, is to yield reverence, Job xxxi. 27. 1 Sam. x. 1. Psal. ii. 12. 1 Kings xiv. 18. Hos. xiii. 2. To bore the knee, is to worship, Isa. xlv. 23. Phil. ii. 10. Eph. iii. 14. To give the hand, or to strike hands, is to swear, join in fellowship, engage, or become surety for another, Ezek. xvii. 18. Gal. ii. 9. Job xvii. 3. Prov. vi. 1. To put on sackcloth, is to mourn, Psal. lxxix. 11. To beat swords into ploughshares, and spears into pruning-hooks, is to live in peace and security, Isa. ii. 4.

XVII. Lastly, the names of things are often put for the things themselves.

Thus, the Name of God denotes the Almighty himself, Psal. cx. 1. cxv. 1. Prov. xviii. 10. Isa. xxx. 27. Jer. x. 25. So, in Joel ii. 32. Acts ii. 21. and Rom. x. 13. the name of the Lord denotes Jesus Christ. Names are likewise put for persons, Acts i. 15. Rev. iii. 4. and xi. 13. (Gr.) In like manner we find, that names are given to persons to express their state or condition, although they are not ordinarily called by such names, as in Isa. i. 26. Thou shalt be called the city of righteousness or justice, that is, thou shalt be so. Similar expressions occur in Isa. lxii. 4. and Jer. iii. 17.

SECTION III.

ON THE INTERPRETATION OF SCRIPTURE METAPHORS.

Nature of a Metaphor.—Sources of Scripture Metaphors.—I. The works of nature.—II. The occupations, customs, and arts of life.—III. Sacred topics, or religion and things connected with it.—IV. Sacred history.

A METAPHOR is a trope, by which a word is diverted from its proper and genuine signification to another meaning for the sake of comparison, or because there is some analogy between the similitude and the thing signified. Of all the figures of rhetoric, the metaphor is that which is most frequently employed, not only in the Scriptures, but likewise in every language; for, independently of the pleasure which it affords, it enriches the mind with two ideas at the same time, the truth and the similitude. Two passages will suffice to illustrate this definition. In Deut. xxxii. 42. we read, I will make mine arrows drunk with blood, and my sword shall devour flesh. Here, the first metaphor is borrowed from excessive and intemperate drinking, to intimate the very great effusion of blood, and the exceeding greatness of the ruin and destruction which would befall the disobedient Israelites. the second metaphor is drawn from the voracious appetite of a hungry beast, which in a lively manner presents to the mind the impossibility of their escaping the edge of the sword, when the wrath of God should be provoked. Again, in Psal. cxxxix. 2. we read, Thou understandest my thoughts afar off. In this verse the metaphor is taken from the prospect of a distant object: but in a proper sense the phrase assures us, that Jehovah, by his prescience, knows our thoughts, before they spring up in our souls.

In order to understand metaphors aright, it should be observed that the foundation of them consists in a likeness or similitude between the thing from which the metaphor is drawn, and that to which it is applied. When this resemblance is exhibited in one or in a few expressions, it is termed a single metaphor. When it is pursued with a variety of expressions, or there is a continued assemblage of metaphors, it is called an allegory. When it is couched in a short sentence, obscure and ambiguous, it is called a riddle. If it be conveyed in a short saying only, it is a proverb, and if the metaphorical representation be delivered in the form of a history, it is a parable. When the resemblance is far-fetched, as to see a voice (Rev. i. 12.), it is termed a catachresis. This last-mentioned species of figure, however, is of less frequent occurrence in the Scriptures than any of the preceding.

The metaphor is of indispensable necessity in the Scriptures; for the sacred writers, having occasion to impart divine and spiritual things to man, could only do it by means of terms borrowed from sensible and material objects, as all our knowledge begins at our senses. Hence it is, especially in the poetical and prophetic parts of the Old Testament, that the sentiments, actions, and corporeal parts, not only of man, but also of inferior creatures, are ascribed to God himself; it being otherwise impossible for us to form any conception of his pure essence and incommunicable attributes. The various sources, whence the sacred writers have drawn their metaphors, have been discussed at great length by Bishop Lowth,¹ and his annotator Michaelis, and also by Glassius;² from whose elaborate works the following observations are abridged. The sources of Scripture metaphors may be classed under the four following heads, viz. natural, artificial, sacred, and historical.

I. The works of nature furnish the first and most copious, as well as the most pleasing, source of images in the Sacred Writings.

¹ ἡ προσκύνησις. From 1 Macc. vii. 37. it appears that the Jews had a similar place of prayer at Mizpah. See Wolfius, Rosenmüller, Schindler, and others, on Luke vi. 12.

³ Deeg. Laert. lib. i. c. 10. § 11. tom. i. p. 123. ed. Longolii.

Thus the images of light and darkness are commonly made use of, in all languages, to denote prosperity and adversity; and an uncommon degree of light implies a proportionate degree of joy and prosperity, and vice versa. Isa. xlii. 10. lix. 19. 20. xxx. 26. Jer. xv. 9. Amos viii. 9. Micah iii. 6. Joel ii. 10. The same metaphors are also used to denote knowledge and ignorance. Isa. viii. 20. ix. 2. Matt. iv. 16. Eph. v. 8. The sun, moon, and stars, figuratively represent kings, queens, and princes or rulers, as in Isa. xxiv. 23. Ezek. xxxii. 7.

"The lights of heaven," says a late pious and learned writer,¹ "in their order are all applied to give us conceptions of God's power and the glory of his kingdom. In the lxxxivth Psalm (verse 11.) the Lord is said to be a sun and shield; a sun to give light to his people, and a shield to protect them from the power of darkness. Christ, in the language of the prophet, is the sun of righteousness; who, as the natural sun revives the grass and renews the year, brings on the acceptable year of the Lord, and is the great restorer of all things in the kingdom of grace; shining with the new light of life and immortality to those who once sat in darkness and in the shadow of death. And the church has warning to receive him under this glorious character. Arise, shine; for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee! (Isa. lx. 1.) When he was manifested to the eyes of men he called himself the light of the world, and promised to give the same light to those that follow him. In the absence of Christ as the personal light of the world, his place is supplied by the light of the Scripture, which is still a lamp unto our feet, and a light unto our paths. The word of prophecy is as a light shining in a dark place; and as we study by the light of a lamp, so we must give heed to this light, as if we would see things to come.

"The moon is used as an emblem of the church, which receives its light from Christ, as the moon from the sun: therefore the renovation of the moon signifies the renovation of the church. The angels or presiding ministers in the seven churches of Asia (Rev. ii. and iii.) are signified by the seven stars, because his ministers hold forth the word of life, and their light shines before men in this mortal state, as the stars give light to the world in the night season; of which light Christians in general partake, and are therefore called children of the light."

Nothing is more grateful to the inhabitants of the East than springs, rivers, and rain; for, as showers rarely fall in their countries, the grass and flowers of the field become consumed by the intolerable heat, unless watered by showers or canals. Hence, flowing springs, copious showers, and nightly dews, which fertilize the fields, furnish them with a variety of pleasing images. Isa. xli. 18. and xxxv. 1. 6, 7. The blessings of the Gospel are delineated under the metaphors of dew, Isa. xxvi. 19., moderate rains, Hos. vi. 3., gentle streams and running waters, Isa. xxvii. 3. and xlv. 3. On the other hand, no metaphor is more frequent than that by which sudden and great calamities are expressed under the figure of a deluge of waters. With this metaphor the Hebrews appear to have been extremely familiar, as if it were directly taken from the nature and state of their country. Immediately before their eyes was the river Jordan,² which annually overflowed its banks; for the snows of Lebanon and the neighbouring mountains, being melted in the beginning of summer, the waters of the river were often suddenly augmented by the descending torrents. The whole country, also, being mountainous, was exposed to frequent floods after the great periodical tempests of rain. To this David alludes, Psal. xlii. 7. Immoderate rains, hail, floods, inundations, and torrents, denote judgments and destructions, Isa. viii. 7. Jer. xlvii. 2. Ezek. xxxviii. 22.

To the class of metaphors derived from natural objects we may refer the anthropopathy, a metaphor by which things belonging to creatures, and especially to man, are ascribed to God, and the prosopopeia or personification, that is, the change of things to persons. Both these figures are nearly allied to the metaphor, and still more to the metonymy; but they are noticed in this place, as being upon the whole the most convenient arrangement.

1. In the consideration of anthropopathies, the two following important rules must be constantly kept in mind; viz.

[i.] That we understand them in a way and manner suitable to the nature and majesty of the Almighty, refining them from all that imperfection with which they are debased in the creatures, and so attribute them to the Deity.

Thus when the members of a human body are ascribed to God, we are not to conceive of him as a venerable old man, sitting gravely in heaven to observe and censure the things done on earth; but must understand those perfections, of which such members in us are the instruments. The eye, for instance, being that member by which we discern or observe any thing, is employed to denote God's perfect and exact knowledge of all things, Job xxiv. 21. Psal. xl. 4. and Heb. iv. 13.; as also his watchful providence, Deut. xi. 12. 1 Kings ix. 3. Psal. xxxiv. 15. In like manner, ears are attributed to him, to signify his gracious acceptance of his people's prayers, Psal. xxxi. 2. or the exact notice which he takes of the sins of others, James v. 4. By his arm we are to understand his power and strength, Exod. xv. 16, which is also expressed by his right hand, Exod. xv. 6, and Psal. cxviii. 15, 16. So, his work is expressed by his fingers, Exod. vii. 19. and Psal. viii. 3. and his love and compassion by his bowels, Isa. lixiii. 13. Jer. xxxi. 20. Luke i. 78., through the bowels of the mercy of our God (ὁ ἐκ τῆς ἰσχυρίας τοῦ Θεοῦ), whereby the day-spring from on high hath visited us. There are a thousand similar instances in the Scriptures.

[ii.] Further, when human affections are attributed to Jehovah, we must be careful not to interpret them in a manner that shall imply the least imperfection in Him; but must thereby conceive, (1.) Either a pure act of his will, free from all perturbation to which men are liable, or else, (2.) The effect of such human affections, the antecedent being put for the consequent, that is, one thing being expressed while another thing is understood, which is usually its effect, or at least follows it—a figure of very frequent occurrence in the Sacred Writings.

Thus, when God is said to repent, we are not to imagine any change of mind in Him with whom there is no variableness or shadow of turning, or any sorrow or trouble that is inconsistent with his perfect happiness; but, either his purpose to undo what he has done, or desist from what he is doing, which are the ordinary effects of repentance in man: so that the change is not in the disposition of the Supreme Mind, but in the dispensations of his providence; as in Gen. vi. 6. 1 Sam. xv. 11. 35. 2 Sam. xiv. 16. Psal. cvi. 45. Again, God is said in very many passages to be angry, to have fury, &c. in order to make us apprehend how much he hates sin, and will punish sinners. The same remark will apply to other affections which are attributed to Him.

In a similar manner we are to understand all those passages in which human actions are ascribed to God, as in Gen. xviii. 21. To go down and see what is done in Sodom, is to regard well, and proceed justly, orderly, and leisurely, to their punishment; though in the divine promise to be with Jacob, Gen. xxviii. 15. it means that the divine favour and protection should accompany him all the way. To search the heart and try the reins, is to discern exactly, as in Psal. vii. 9. and Jer. xvii. 10.—Lastly, human relations are likewise ascribed to God, to express the properties of such relations: thus, he is called a King, Psal. xc. 3., a Father, Psal. ciii. 13. Rom. vii. 15., a Husband, Isa. liv. 5. Hosea ii. 19., a Shepherd, Psal. xxiii. 1. to express his power and authority, his love, pity, tender care, and watchful providence.

2. Of the prosopopeia or personification, there are two kinds; one, when actions and character are attributed to fictitious, irrational, or even inanimate objects; the other, when a probable but fictitious speech is assigned to a real character:

[i.] The former, Bishop Lowth remarks, evidently partakes of the nature of the metaphor, and is by far the boldest of that class of figures: it is most frequently and successfully introduced by the sacred writers.

In Psalm lxxxv. 10. how admirable is the personification of the divine attributes!

Mercy and truth are met together;
Righteousness and peace have kissed each other.

How just, elegant, and splendid does it appear, if applied only (according to the literal sense) to the restoration of the Jewish nation from the Babylonish captivity! But if we consider it in a most sacred and mystical sense, which is not obscurely shadowed under the ostensible image, viz. that of the method of redemption by the sacrifice and mediation of Jesus Christ, in which the divine perfections were so harmoniously displayed, it is beyond measure grand and elevated. Again, what can be more sublime or graceful than the personification of wisdom, so frequently introduced in the Proverbs of Solomon, particularly in chapter viii. verses 22–31. She is not only exhibited as the directress of human life and morals, as the inventress of arts, as the dispenser of honours and riches, as the source of true felicity, but also as the eternal daughter of the omnipotent Creator, and as the eternal associate in the divine counsels. Similar passages, exquisitely imagined, and from the boldness of the fiction extremely forcible, occur in Job xviii. 13. xxviii. 22. Isa. v. 14. xlvii. 1. 5. Lam. i. 6. 17. Jer. xlvii. 6, 7. Hos. xiii. 14. and 1 Cor. xv. 54.

[ii.] The second kind of prosopopeia, by which a probable but fictitious speech is assigned to a real person,—though less calculated to excite admiration and approbation by its novelty, boldness, and variety, than the former,—is nevertheless possessed of great force, evidence, and authority. It would, as Bishop Lowth remarks, be an infinite task to specify every instance in the sacred poems, which on this occasion might be referred to as worthy of notice; or to observe the easy, natural, bold, and sudden personifications; the dignity, importance, and impassioned severity of the characters. It would be difficult to describe the energy of that eloquence which is attributed to Jehovah himself, and which appears so suitable in all respects to the Divine Majesty; or to display the force and beauty of the language which is so admirably and peculiarly adapted to each character; the probability of the fiction; and the excellence of the imitation.

² Josh. iii. 15. 1 Chron. xii. 15. Eccles. xxiv. 26.

³ The late benevolent and learned Mr. Gilpin has pointed out many very striking personifications and other metaphorical allusions used by St. Paul. See his Sermons, vol. iv. p. 405. et seq.

One example, therefore, is sufficient for the present; one more perfect it is not possible to produce. It is expressive of the eager expectation of the mother of Sisera, from the inimitable ode of the prophetess Deborah. (Judg. v. 28-30.)

The first sentences exhibit a striking picture of maternal solicitude, both in words and actions; and of a mind suspended and agitated between hope and fear.

Through the window she looked and cried out,
The mother of Sisera, through the lattice:
Wherefore is his chariot so long in coming?
Wherefore linger the wheels of his chariot?

Immediately, impatient of his delay, she anticipates the consolations of her friends; and her mind being somewhat elevated, she boasts with all the levity of a fond female:—

(Vast in her hopes, and giddy with success;)

Her wise ladies answer her;
Yea, she returns answer to herself:
Have they not found?—Have they not divided the spoil?

Let us now observe how well adapted every sentiment, every word, is to the character of the speaker. She takes no account of the slaughter of the enemy, of the valour and conduct of the conqueror, of the multitude of the captives, but burns with a female thirst of prey and spoils.

Nothing is omitted which is calculated to attract and engage the passions of a vain and trifling woman—slaves, gold, and rich apparel. Nor is she satisfied with the bare enumeration of them; she repeats, she amplifies, she heightens every circumstance; she seems to have the very plunder in her immediate possession; she pauses and contemplates every particular:—

Have they not found?—Have they not divided the spoil?
To every man a damsel, yea, a damsel or two?
To Sisera a spoil of divers colours?
Yea, she returns answer to herself:
A spoil of needlework of divers colours,
A spoil for the neck of divers colours of needlework on either side.

To add to the beauty of this passage, there is also an uncommon neatness in the versification, great force, accuracy, and perspicuity in the diction, the utmost elegance in the repetitions, which, notwithstanding their apparent redundancy, are conducted with the most perfect brevity. In the end, the fatal disappointment of female hope and credulity tacitly insinuated by the sudden and unexpected apostrophe, is expressed more forcibly by this very silence of the person who was just speaking, than it could possibly have been by all the powers of language.

So let all thine enemies perish, O JEHOVAH!

But whoever wishes to understand the full force and excellence of this figure, as well as the elegant use of it in the Hebrew ode, must apply to Isaiah, whom we may justly pronounce to be the sublimest of poets. Bishop Lowth considers his fourteenth chapter as the grandest specimen of that prophet's poetry, and as exemplifying almost every form of the prosopopeia, and indeed of all that constitutes the sublime in composition.

II. The Hebrews derived many of their figures from the ordinary occupations and customs of life, as well as from such arts as were practised at that time.

This source, indeed, is common to all nations; and in proportion as they are more polished, and cultivate more numerous arts, they are supplied with a greater variety of images. The whole course and method of common and domestic life among the ancient Hebrews was simple in the highest degree. There did not exist that variety of studies and pursuits, of arts, conditions, and employments, which afterwards obtained among other nations. The Hebrews were a nation of husbandmen and shepherds; the patriarchs were possessed of great flocks and herds which they tended, though their descendants afterwards applied themselves to agriculture. Every Israelite, on the conquest of Canaan, received his allotted portion of land, which he cultivated, and which, as it could not be alienated by sale, descended without diminution to his posterity, who enjoyed unmolested the produce of his land and labour. Hence, very numerous metaphors in the Sacred Writings are derived from pastoral and rural occupations. Thus, kings are said to feed their people, who again are compared to a flock of sheep, which the shepherd conducts to pasture, and guards from danger. It would extend the limits of this section too far, to instance particularly with what embellishments of diction, derived from one low and trivial object (as it may appear to some)—the barn or threshing-floor—the sacred writers have added a lustre to the most sublime, and a force to the most important subjects. Yet the following passages we cannot omit to notice, on account of their uncommon force and beauty:—

Thus, Jehovah threshes out the heathen, and tramples them beneath his feet. (Hab. iii. 12.) He delivers the nations to Israel to be beaten in pieces by an indented flail, or to be crushed by their brazen hoofs. (Joel iii. 14. (Heb.) Jer. li. 33. Isa. xxi. 10. Mic. vi. 13.) He scatters his enemies like chaff upon the mountains, and disperses them with the whirlwind of his indignation. (Psalm lxxiii. 13-15. Isa. xlvii. 13.) But nothing can surpass the magnificent delineation of the Messiah coming to take vengeance on his adversaries expressed by imagery taken from the wine-press, which is of frequent occurrence with the sacred poets, and which no other poet has presumed to introduce. See Isa. lxiii. 1-3.

The pastoral and rural allusions in the New Testament are almost equally numerous with those of the Old Testament. Thus the world is compared to a field, the children of the kingdom to the wheat, and the children of the wicked to tares. (Matt. xiii. 38.) The end of the world is the harvest, and the angels are reapers. (Matt. xiii. 39.) A preacher of the word is the sower. (Matt. xiii. 3.) The word of God is the seed. The heart of man is the ground. (Luke viii. 15. Heb. vi. 7.) The cares, riches, and pleasures of life are the thorns. (Luke viii. 14. Heb. vi. 8.) The preparation of the heart by repentance is ploughing and breaking up the fallow ground. (Hos. x. 12.) Death, which cuts down the fairest flower of the field, is a mower. (Psalm xc. 6.) The minister, who serves under God in his husbandry is the labourer. (Matt. ix. 37, 38. 1 Cor. iii. 9.) The wicked are stubble. (Isa. xlvii. 11.) And the temptations and trials of the godly are the sifting of the wheat. (Luke xxii. 31.)

III. Sacred Topics, that is to say, Religion, and Things connected with it, furnished many images to the sacred writers.

Numerous and diversified sacred rites were enjoined to the Israelites by Moses, and their religious worship was conducted with great pomp and splendour.

Thus the images derived from the temple and its magnificent service chiefly serve to denote the glory of the Christian church, the excellency of its worship, God's favour towards it, and his constant presence with it: the propheta speaking to the Jews in terms accommodated to their own ideas, as in Ezek. xxxvi. 25, 26. compared with Heb. vii. 10. Further, much of the Jewish law is employed in discriminating between things clean and unclean; in removing and making atonement for things polluted or proscribed; and under these ceremonies, as under a veil or covering, a meaning the most important and sacred is concealed, as would appear from the nature of them, even if we had not other clear and explicit authority for this opinion. Among the rest are certain diseases and infirmities of the body, and some customs in themselves evidently indifferent: these, on a cursory view, seem light and trivial; but, when the reasons of them are properly investigated, they are found to be of considerable importance. We are not to wonder, then, if the sacred poets have recourse to these topics for imagery, even on the most momentous occasions; as when they display the universal depravity of the human heart (Isa. lxiv. 6.), or upbraid their own people for the corruptness of their manners (Isa. i. 5, 6, 16. Ezek. xxxvi. 17.), or when they deplore the abject state of the virgin, the daughter of Zion, polluted and exposed. (Lam. i. 8, 9, 17. and ii.) If we consider these metaphors, without any reference to the religion of their authors, they will doubtless appear in some degree disgusting and inelegant; but if we refer them to their genuine source, the peculiar rites of the Hebrews, they will not be found wanting either in force or dignity.

The pontifical vestments, which were extremely splendid, suggested a variety of images expressive of the glory both of the Jewish and Christian church. We have an instance of this in Ezek. xvi. 10, 13, 15. and particularly in the following passage of the evangelical prophet:—

I will greatly rejoice in JEHOVAH:

My soul shall exult in my God,

For he hath clothed me with the garments of salvation,

He hath covered me with the mantle of righteousness:

As the bridegroom decketh himself with a priestly crown;

And as the bride adorneth herself with her costly jewels;

Isa. lxi. 10.

In this verse, the elegant Isaiah is describing, in his peculiar and magnificent manner, the exultation and glory of the church, after her triumphant restoration. Pursuing the allusion, he decorates her with the vestments of salvation, and clothes her in the robe of righteousness; he afterwards compares the church to a bridegroom dressed for the marriage, to which comparison incredible dignity is added by the word Kohen, a metaphor plainly taken from the priest's apparel, the force of which, therefore, no modern language can express. No imagery, Bishop Lowth further remarks, which the Hebrew writers could employ, was equally adapted with this to the display (as far as human powers can conceive or depict the subject) of the infinite majesty of God. JEHOVAH is, therefore, introduced by the Psalmist as clothed with glory and with strength (Psalm xciii. 1.), and he is girded with power (Psalm lxxvi. 6.), which are the very terms appropriated to the description of the dress and ornaments of the priests. The epistle to the Hebrews is an admirable comment on many parts of the Mosaic ritual.

IV. The Hebrews derived many of their Metaphors from Sacred History.

Thus, as the devastation of the land of Israel is frequently represented by the restoration of ancient chaos (as in Jer. iv. 23-26. Isa. xxxiv. 4, 11. and Joel iii. 15, 16), so the same event is sometimes expressed in metaphors suggested by the universal deluge (as in Isa. xxiv. 1. 18-20.), and also from the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah. (Isa. xxxiv. 9.) See also Psalm xi. 6.

The departure of the Israelites from Egypt, while it affords materials for many magnificent descriptions, is commonly applied, in a metaphorical manner, to represent other great deliverances: as in Isa. xi. 15, 16. xliii. 16-19. xlviii. 21. and li. 10. But the figurative application of the history of the exodus is much plainer in the New Testament. There we see Zacharias, in his prophetic hymn, on occasion of the birth of John the Baptist, celebrating the blessings of the Christian redemption in terms borrowed from the past redemption of Israel out of Egypt.²

Lastly, when Jehovah is described as coming to execute judgment, to deliver the pious, and to destroy his enemies, or in any manner to display his divine power upon earth, the description is embellished from that tremendous scene which was exhibited on

SECTION IV.

ON THE INTERPRETATION OF SCRIPTURE ALLEGORIES.

1. The Allegory defined.—Different species of Allegory.—II. Rules for the interpretation of Scripture Allegories.

ANOTHER branch of the figurative language of Scripture is the allegory; which, under the literal sense of the words, conceals a foreign or distant meaning. Of this species of figure Bishop Lowth³ has three kinds, viz.

1. The ALLEGORY⁴ properly so called, and which he terms a continued metaphor;—

2. The PARABLE, or similitude, which is discussed in the following section;—and,

3. The MYSTICAL ALLEGORY, in which a double meaning is couched under the same words, or when the same predication, according as it is differently interpreted, relates to different events, distant in time, and distinct in their nature.

The Mystical Allegory differs from the two first-mentioned species in the nature of its materials: it being allowable in the former to make use of imagery from different objects, while the mystical allegory is exclusively derived from things sacred. There is likewise this further distinction, that in those other forms of allegory, the exterior or ostensible imagery is fiction only; the truth lies altogether in the interior or remote sense, which is veiled as it were under this thin and pellucid covering. But, in the mystical allegory, each idea is equally agreeable to truth. The exterior or ostensible image is not a shadowy colouring of the interior sense, but is in itself a reality; and, although it sustains another character, it does not wholly lay aside its own. As, however, the interpretation of the mystical and typical parts of Scripture is treated of in a subsequent part of this volume,⁵ we shall, in the present section, direct our attention to the allegory, properly and strictly so called.

As every such allegory is a representation of real matters of fact under feigned names and feigned characters, it must be subjected to a two-fold examination. "We must first examine the immediate representation, and then consider what other representation it was intended to excite. Now, in most allegories the immediate representation is made in the form of a narrative; and since it is the object of an allegory to convey a moral, not an historical truth, the narrative itself is commonly fictitious. The immediate representation is of no further value, than as it leads to the ultimate representation. It is the application or moral of the allegory which constitutes its worth."⁶ In the investigation, then, of an allegory, the following rules may assist us to determine its ultimate meaning:—

I. Allegorical Senses of Scripture are not to be sought for, where the literal sense is plain and obvious.

This rule is of the greatest importance; from not attending to it, the ancient Jews, as the Therapeutæ, the author of the book of Wisdom, Josephus, and Philo, and, in imitation of them, Origen⁷ and many of the fathers (whose example has also been followed by some modern expositors), have respectively turned even historical passages of Scripture into allegories, together with such other passages as already had a proper and literal sense. Hence many ridiculous interpretations have been imposed on passages of Scripture, the proper moral sense of which has been either greatly enervated, or entirely frittered away, by such misnamed spiritual expositions.

II. The proper or literal meaning of the Words must be ascertained, before we attempt to explain an Allegory.

For this purpose the primary word itself must first be ascertained, and its force expressed, by an appropriate literal word; and to this sense all the other figurative words of the passage should be referred, and explained agreeably to it. The primary word in an allegory is that which contains the foundation and reason why the passage under consideration is expressed by that particular image; and such primary word is to be ascertained both from the scope as well as from the explanation which may be subjoined, and also from the subject or thing itself which is treated of. Thus in 1 Cor. v. 6—8. the apostle speaks of leaven in such a manner, that the whole of that passage contains an earnest exhortation to a holy life; for the context shows that the design of the allegorical admonition was, that the Corinthians should not be tainted with wickedness and depravity of life. The occasion of the allegory was their admittance of an incestuous person into the church at Corinth. Now, as the apostle says, Know ye not that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump? and accommodates the remaining sentence of the passage to the same image, the consideration of the primary word will readily lead us to this sense: one man may be injurious to the whole congregation by his corrupt example. St. Paul further adds an explanation of his meaning, when he says, Let us keep the feast, not with old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness, &c. Here the meaning of ἐσθίετε (keep the feast) is not to celebrate the festival of the passover as it literally means, but to serve and worship God in Christ: in other words, to be a sincere Christian, and in such a manner that, being cleansed from all former sins, we should serve and worship God in true holiness.⁸ In like manner we are to understand the expression, Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up. (John ii. 19.) The primary word temple must be changed into a proper or literal one, namely, the body of Christ, as the evangelical history suggests; and to this the rest of the passage must be referred.

III. The Design of the whole Allegory must be investigated.

The consideration of this rule will embrace a variety of particulars.

1. In investigating the Design of an Allegory, the CONTEXT is first to be examined and considered,⁹ by comparing the preceding and subsequent parts of the discourse.

In 2 Tim. ii. 20. we read thus:—In a great house there are not only vessels of gold and silver, but also of wood and of earth; and some to honour and some to dishonour. Now, since the apostle did not intend to say what these words literally mean of themselves, it is evident that he employed an allegory, the design of which is to be ascertained by the aid of the context. In the preceding verses, 15. and 16. he had exhorted Timothy to study to show himself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth, and to shun vain and profane babblings. Hence it appears that Saint Paul was speaking of the qualifications of a teacher. The great house then, in which are vessels of several kinds, will signify the Christian church, in which are various teachers, and of different value. In the following verses, 21. and 22. Timothy is exhorted to avoid novel doctrines, to separate himself from false teachers, and to make himself a vessel fitted for the master's use, prepared for every good work. Here, again, the apostle is not speaking literally of household goods, but of teachers. The design of the allegory, therefore, in the passage above cited, is to intimate, that, as in a great house there is a variety of utensils, some of a more precious and others of a coarser material, so in the church of God, which is the house of God, there are teachers of different characters and capacities. Some of them, being faithful, are employed in the honourable work of leading men in the paths of truth and piety; while others, being unfaithful, are permitted to follow the dishonourable occupation of seducing those who love error, that the approved may be made manifest.

2. The OCCASION which gave rise to the Allegory, and which is indicated by the context, is also to be considered.

Thus, in the Gospels, we meet with numerous instances of persons who asked questions of our Saviour, or who entertained erroneous notions; an allegory is delivered by way of reply, to correct the error, and at the same time to instruct the inquirer. In John vi. 25—35. many things are announced relative to the eating of bread: these are to be understood of spiritual food, the doctrines of Christ, which are to be received for the same purpose as we take food, namely, that we may be nourished and supported. The occasion of this allegorical mode of speaking is related in verse 31. Our fathers, said the Jews, did eat manna in the desert, as it is written, He gave them bread from heaven to eat. I say Christ, as it is written, bread, which cometh down from heaven. The meaning of the whole evidently is, that by eating the flesh of Christ we are to understand the same idea as is implied in eating bread, namely, to derive support from

• Mr. Gilpin has given the following lucid exposition of this, in some respects, difficult passage:—"I hear," says the apostle to the Corinthians, "that there hath been practised among you a very enormous kind of wickedness, which is not heard of even among Gentiles—that one of you hath had connection with his father's wife; and that others, instead of making it a cause of general mourning, and separating themselves from so vile a person, seem rather to defend him in his wickedness.—Though absent, I take upon me, through the authority of the Holy Ghost, to decide in this matter. I command, therefore, that, on receipt of this epistle, you gather the congregation together, and in the name of Jesus Christ solemnly expel this person from your communion; and that he may see the heinousness of his sin, and after a sincere repentance be restored to God's favour.—Your defending him in his wickedness is an immediate step towards being corrupted yourselves. You are under a necessity, therefore, on your own account, to remove this pernicious example. Consider your blessed Saviour's death, and preserve yourselves as free as possible from sin, which was the cause of it." See the New Testament, vol. ii. p. 165.

• On the investigation of the context, see pp. 337, 338. supra.

² The learned Professor Michaelis, in his additions to Bishop Lowth's ninth lecture, has endeavoured to prove that the sacred writers drew largely from poetic fable, which they derived from the Egyptians, in common with the Greeks and Romans. As it respects the latter, his argument is convincing and satisfactory; but with regard to the Hebrews, as it depends chiefly on his own Latin versions, which (the excellent English translator of the bishop's lectures remarks) are by no means so faithful to the original as our common version, his point does not appear to be demonstrated. On this account the present brief notice of Michaelis's hypothesis may be deemed sufficient: it is, however, adopted by Bauer in his Hermeneutica Sacra, pp. 209, 210.

⁴ Ἀλληγορία of Allegory is derived from ἄλλος ἀγορεύει: i. e. a different thing is said from that which is meant. It differs from a metaphor, in that it is not confined to a word, but extends to a whole thought, or it may be, to several thoughts. An allegory may be expressed moreover by pictures, by actions, as in Ezek. iii. iv. v. and Luke xii. 36. or, by any significant thing.

⁶ Bishop Marsh's Lectures, part iii. p. 80. The seventeenth and eighteenth lectures, in which the subject of figurative interpretation is ably discussed at considerable length, are particularly worthy of perusal.

⁷ Dr. A. Clarke (note on Exod. i. 22.) has given a curious specimen of Origen's mode of allegorizing, to which the reader is referred on account of its length.

it. The argument of our Lord, then, may be thus expressed:—"The manna which our fathers did eat in the wilderness could only preserve a mortal life. That is the true bread of life which qualifies every one who eats it for everlasting happiness. I call myself this bread, not only on account of my doctrine, which purifies the soul, and fits it for a state of happiness, but also because I shall give my own life to procure the life of the world."¹

3. As the context frequently indicates the meaning of an Allegory, so likewise its SCOPE and INTERPRETATION are frequently pointed out by some explanation that is subjoined.

In Luke v. 29, it is related that our Lord sat down to eat with publicans and sinners. When questioned by the Pharisees for this conduct, he replied, They that are whole need not a physician, but they that are sick; and added the following explanation—I am not come to call the righteous, those who arrogantly presume themselves to be such, but sinners to repentance. The scope, occasion, and explanation being severally known, the meaning of the allegory becomes evident. Sometimes, however, this explanation of an allegory is conveyed in a single word, as in 1 Thess. v. 8. Here we are commanded to put on a breast-plate and helmet; it is added, by way of exposition, the breast-plate of faith and love, and the helmet of hope. The sense of the figure is—Prepare yourself for your spiritual warfare with faith, love, and hope, lest you suffer loss.

4. Sometimes the Allegory proposed is explained in its several parts by the person speaking.

Thus, in Eph. vi. 11—19, many things are said of the Christian's armour; and the girdle, breast plate, greaves, shield, and sword, are distinctly specified. That these terms are allegorical is evident. In the tenth verse the exhortation, to be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might, precedes; in the eleventh and following verses the apostle explains what he intended to be understood in its several parts: thus, the sword is the word of God, the girdle is integrity, the shield is faith, &c. In such passages as this, an explanation is desirable, otherwise the allegory it contains could not be interpreted upon any certain principle.

5. Sometimes also the CONTEXT incidentally presents some proper word, by which the meaning of the whole allegory may be discerned.

In John xxi. 35, our Lord says—Yet a little while is the light with you. A single proper word is almost immediately subjoined—believe in the light. (Ver. 36.) Hence it appears that by light is meant himself, the divine teacher: it is equally plain that to continue in darkness means to continue in ignorance. Another instance occurs in Matt. v. 14. Ye are the light of the world: a city that is set on a hill cannot be hid, &c. It is afterwards subjoined, that men may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven. From this expression, good works, which is the key to the whole passage, we perceive that our Lord's discourse treats of that example of a holy life and conversation, which it is the duty of Christians to set before others.

IV. In the explanation of an Allegorical Passage, HISTORICAL CIRCUMSTANCES should be consulted.

For it sometimes happens that history alone can throw any light on the passage.

1. Thus, in John xxi. 18, the evangelist evidently refers us to history for an explanation. Our Lord is there represented as saying to Peter—When thou wast young thou girdedst thyself, and walkedst whither thou wouldest: but, when thou shalt be old, thou shalt stretch forth thy hands, and another shall gird thee, and carry thee whither thou wouldest not. This, adds the historian, spoke he signifying by what death he should glorify God. Now there is nothing related in the New Testament which can afford any clue to this passage: but, if we consult ecclesiastical history, we shall find that Peter suffered a violent death; and thus every sentence becomes clear.

2. So, in Matt. xiii. 31—34, the kingdom of God is likened unto a grain of mustard seed which gradually springs up and becomes a large plant; and also to leaven, which gradually ferments the whole mass, into which it is put. History shows that the church of Christ has arisen from small beginnings, and is spreading itself through the earth.

3. In Prov. v. 15—18, we have the following beautiful allegory:—Drink waters out of thine own cistern, and running waters out of thine own well. Let thy fountains be dispersed abroad, and rivers of waters in the streets. Let them be only thine own, and not strangers with thee. Let thy fountain be blessed, and rejoice with the wife of thy youth. That this passage is allegorical, is evident from the same figure being continued through several sentences and verses. Its sense is to be investigated both according to the oriental mode of speaking (for the inhabitants of the East, who draw most of their metaphors from natural objects, are accustomed to compare their wives to a cistern or pool, whence rivers flow), and also from the proper words subjoined towards the close, rejoice with the wife of thy youth; as likewise from the series of the discourse, since the author of the book of Proverbs, in the beginning of this chapter, is dissuading from illicit intercourse. From these circumstances collectively considered, the sense of the allegory plainly is that no man should follow strange women, but live content with the wife whom he hath espoused; lest, influenced by his example, she should deviate from the path of virtue.

V. The Nature of the Thing spoken of is also to be considered in the Exposition of an Allegory.

It is necessary that the nature of the thing should be considered, in order that the tendency of every comparison may appear, and also the literal meaning which is concealed under the figurative expressions.

1. Thus in Matt. v. 13, we read, Ye are the salt of the earth; but if the salt have lost its savour, wherewith shall it be salted? It is therefore good for nothing but to be cast out, and to be trodden under foot of men. Now, what is the meaning of this admonition? What is the primary word? Salt. But with what proper word can it be interpreted? Here the nature of the thing is to be consulted, which shows that it is the property of salt to render food savoury, as well as to correct the taste: hence it is clear in what sense the disciples are said to be the salt of the earth; for they were teachers by whom some were corrected and made better. The general meaning of the passage is,—Ye who embrace my religion, like salt shall purify the world but ye must first be pure yourselves.

2. In Luke v. 36, the following passage occurs:—No man putteth a piece of a new garment upon an old; if otherwise, then both the new maketh a rent, and the piece that was taken out of the new agreeth not with the old. Nothing is adduced by way of explanation: in a preceding verse the Pharisees had asked Christ why his disciples did not fast, but lived more cheerfully than those of John. Our Saviour replied in the words above cited; nothing, then, can lead us to understand the passage but the nature of the subject. Now, in common life we know that no one voluntarily and readily acts indiscreetly, or in an unbecoming manner. Therefore, says Christ, since no one in common life acts thus indiscreetly, neither do I require my disciples to do so, since there is no need for them to undergo such austerities. The time will come (ver. 35) when they will fare hardly enough; then they will have sufficient trials. At present, neither circumstances, time, nor place require it; things must be accommodated to circumstances. The passage being thus considered, the meaning of the allegory becomes very evident.

VI. Comparison is not to be extended to all the Circumstances of the Allegory.

"Thus, in the parable of the good Samaritan, the point to be illustrated is, the extent of the duty of beneficence. Most of the circumstances in the parable go to make up merely the verisimilitude of the narration, so that it may give pleasure to him who hears or reads it. But how differently does the whole appear, when it comes to be interpreted by an allegorizer of the mystic schools! The man going down from Jerusalem to Jericho is Adam wandering in the wilderness of this world; the thieves, who robbed and wounded him, are evil spirits; the priest, who passed by without relieving him, is the Levitical Law; the Levite is good works; the good Samaritan is Christ; the oil and wine are grace, &c. What may not a parable be made to mean, if imagination is to supply the place of reason and philology? And what riddle or oracle of Delphos could be more equivocal, or of more multifarious significance, than the Bible, if such exegesis be admissible? It is a miserable excuse, which interpreters make for themselves, that they render the Scriptures more edifying and significant by interpreting them in this manner. And are the Scriptures then to be made more significant than God has made them? Or to be mended by the skill of the interpreter so as to become more edifying than the Holy Spirit has made them? If there be a semblance of piety in such interpretations, a semblance is all. Real piety and humility appear to advantage in receiving the Scriptures as they are, and expounding them as simply and skillfully as the rules of language will render practicable, rather than by attempting to amend and improve the revelation which God has made."¹

VII. We must not explain one Part literally, and another Part figuratively.

Thus, the whole of 1 Cor. iii. 9—13, is allegorical: a comparison is there instituted between the office of a teacher of religion and that of a builder. Hence a Christian congregation is termed a building; its ministers are the architects, some of whom lay the foundation on which others build; some erect a superstructure of gold and silver; others of wood, hay, and stubble. The sense concealed under the allegory is apparent: a Christian congregation is instructed by teachers, some of whom communicate the first principles, others impart further knowledge; some deliver good and useful things (the truth), while others deliver useless things (erroneous doctrines, such as at that time prevailed in the Corinthian church). That day (the great day of judgment) will declare what superstructure a man has raised; that is, whether what he has taught be good or bad. And as fire is the test of gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble, so the great day will be the test of every man's work. Though the whole of this passage is obviously allegorical, yet it is understood literally by the church of Rome, who has erected upon it her doctrine of the fire of purgatory. How contrary this doctrine is to every rule of right interpretation is too plain to require any exposition.²

It falls not within the plan of this work to enumerate all the allegories occurring in the Sacred Writings: some have been incidentally mentioned in the present section; yet, before we proceed to other topics, we cannot but notice the admirable allegorical delineation of old age by Solomon, Eccl. xii. 2—6. It is, perhaps, one of the finest allegories in the Old Testament: the inconveniences of increasing years, the debility of mind and body, the torpor of the senses, are expressed most learnedly and elegantly indeed, but with some degree of obscurity, by different images derived from nature and common life; for by this enigmatical composition, Solomon, after the manner of the oriental sages, intended to put to trial the acuteness of his readers. It has on this account afforded much exercise to the ingenuity of the learned; many of whom have differently, it is true, but with much learning and penetration, explained the passage.

There is also in Isaiah (xxvii. 23—29.) an allegory, which, with no less elegance of imagery, is perhaps more simple and regular, as well as more just and complete in the colouring, than any of those above cited. In the passage referred to, the prophet is examining the design and manner of the divine judgments, and is inculcating the principle, that God adopts different modes of acting in the chastisement of the wicked, but that the most perfect wisdom is conspicuous in all; that he will, as before urged, “exact judgment by the sinner, and righteousness by the plumbet;” that he ponders, with the most minute attention, the distinctions of times, characters, and circumstances, as well as every motive to lenity or severity. All this is expressed in a continued allegory, the imagery of which is taken from the employments of agriculture and threshing, and is admirably adapted to the purpose.¹

SECTION V.

ON THE INTERPRETATION OF SCRIPTURE PARABLES.

I. Nature of a Parable.—II. Antiquity of this mode of instruction.—III. Rules for the interpretation of Parables.—IV. Parables, why used by Jesus Christ.—V. Remarks on the distinguishing excellencies of Christ's Parables, compared with the most celebrated fables of antiquity.

A PARABLE (Παράβολον, from παρὰβállω, to collate, compare together, assimilate)² is a similitude taken from natural things in order to instruct us in things spiritual. The word, however, is variously used in the Scriptures, to denote a proverb or short saying (Luke iv. 23.); a famous or received saying (1 Sam. x. 12.³ Ezek. xviii. 2.); a thing gravely spoken, and comprehending important matters in a few words (Job xxvii. 1. Num. xxiii. 7. 18. xxiv. 3. 15. Psal. xlix. 4. and lxxviii. 2.); a thing darkly or figuratively expressed (Ezek. xx. 49. Matt. xv. 15.); a visible type or emblem, representing something different from and beyond itself (Heb. ix. 9. and xi. 19. Gr.); a special instruction (Luke xiv. 7.); and a similitude or comparison. (Matt. xxiv. 32. Mark iii. 23.)⁴

According to Bishop Lowth, a parable is that kind of allegory which consists of a continued narration of a fictitious event, applied by way of simile to the illustration of some important truth. By the Greeks, allegories were called αἰναι or apologues, and by the Romans fabulæ or fables,⁵ and the writings of the Phrygian sage, or those composed in imitation of him, have acquired the greatest celebrity. Nor did our Saviour himself disdain to adopt the same method of instruction; of whose parables it is doubtful whether they excel most in wisdom and utility, or in sweetness, elegance, and perspicuity. As the appellation of PARABLE has been applied to his discourses of this kind, the term is now restricted from its former extensive signification to a more confined sense. This species of composition also occurs very frequently in the prophetic poetry, and particularly in that of Ezekiel.

II. The use of parables is of very great antiquity. In the early ages of the world, when the art of reasoning was little known, and the minds of men were not accustomed to nice and curious speculations, we find that the most ancient mode of instruction was by parable and fable: its advantages, indeed, are many and obvious. It has been remarked by an acute observer of men and morals, that “little reaches the understanding of the mass but through the medium of the senses. Their minds are not fitted for the reception of abstract truth. Dry argumentative instruction, therefore, is not proportioned to their capacity: the faculty, by which a right conclusion is drawn, is in them the most defective; they rather feel strongly than judge accurately: and their feelings are awakened by the impression made on their senses.”⁶ Hence, instruction by way of parable is naturally adapted to engage attention; it is easily comprehended, and suited to the meanest capacity; and while it opens the doctrine which it professes to conceal, it gives no alarm to our prejudices and passions; it communicates unwelcome truths in the least disagreeable manner; points out mistakes, and insinuates reproof with less offence and with greater efficacy than undisguised contradiction and open rebuke. Of this description, we may remark, are the parables related by Nathan to David (2 Sam. xii. 1—9.), and by the woman of Tekoah to the same monarch. (2 Sam. xiv. 1—13.) The New Testament abounds with similar examples. “By laying hold on the imagination, parable insinuates itself into the affections; and by the intercommunication of the faculties, the understanding is made to apprehend the truth which was proposed to the fancy.”⁷ In a word, this kind of instruction seizes us by surprise, and carries with it a force and conviction which are almost irresistible. It is no wonder, therefore, that parables were made the vehicle of national instruction in the most early times; that the prophets, especially Ezekiel, availed themselves of the same impressive mode of conveying instruction or reproof; and that our Lord, following the same example, also adopted it for the same important purposes.

III. Although a parable has some things in common with an allegory, so that the same rules which apply to the latter are in some degree applicable to the former, yet, from its peculiar nature, it becomes necessary to consider the parable by itself, in order that we may understand and interpret it aright.

1. The first excellence of a parable is, that it turns upon an image well known and applicable to the subject, the meaning of which is clear and definite; for this circumstance will give it that perspicuity which is essential to every species of allegory.

How clearly this rule applies to the parables of our Lord is obvious to every reader of the New Testament. It may suffice to mention his parable of the Ten Virgins (Matt. xvi. 1—13.), which is a plain allusion to those things which were common at the Jewish marriages in those days: the whole parable, indeed, is made up of the rites used by the Orientals, as well as by the Roman people, at their nuptials; and all the particulars related in it were such as were commonly known to the Jews, because they were every day practised by some of them. In like manner the parables of the lamp (Luke viii. 16.), of the sover and the seed, of the tares, of the mustard seed, of the leaven, of the net cast into the sea, all of which are related in Matt. xiii. as well as of the householder that planted a vineyard, and let it out to husbandmen (Matt. xxi. 33—41.), are all representations of usual and common occurrences, and such as the generality of our Saviour's hearers were daily conversant with, and they were, therefore, selected by him as being the most interesting and affecting.

If the parables of the sacred prophets be examined by this rule, they will not appear deficient; being in general founded upon such imagery as is frequently used; and similarly applied by way of metaphor and comparison in Hebrew poetry. Examples of this kind occur in the deceitful vineyard (Isa. v. 1—7.), and in the useless vine which is given to the fire (Ezek. xv. and xix. 10—14.); for, under this imagery, the ungrateful people of God are more than once described. Similar instances of apposite comparison present themselves in the parable of the lion's whelps falling into the pit (Ezek. xxi. 1—9.), in which is displayed the captivity of the Jewish princes; and also in that of the fair, lofty, and flourishing cedar of Lebanon (Ezek. xxxi. 3—17.), which once raised its head to the clouds, at length cut down and neglected:—thus exhibiting, as in a picture, the prosperity and the fall of the king of Assyria. To these may be added one more example, namely, that in which the love of God towards his people, and their piety and fidelity to him, are expressed by an allusion to the solemn covenant of marriage. Ezekiel has pursued this image with uncommon freedom in two parables (Ezek. xvi. and xxiii.); and it has been alluded to by almost all the sacred poets.

2. The image, however, must not only be apt and familiar, but must also be elegant and beautiful in itself, and all its parts must be perspicuous and pertinent; since it is the purpose of a parable, and especially of a poetic parable, not only to explain more perfectly some proposition, but frequently to give it animation and splendour.

Of all these excellences there cannot be more perfect examples than the parables which have just been specified: to which we may add the well-known parables of Jotham (Judges ix. 7—15.), of Nathan (2 Sam. xii. 1—14.).

and of the woman of Tekoah. (2 Sam. xiv. 4-7.) The admirably devised parable of Nathan is perhaps one of the finest specimens of the genuine pathetic style that can be found in the Old Testament; and David's eager condemnation of the unsuspected offender at the same time displays a striking instance of the delusion of sin and the blindness of self-love. "He, who had lived a whole year in the unrepented commission of one of the blackest crimes in the decalogue—and who, to secure to himself the object for which he had committed it, perpetrated another almost more heinous, and that with an hypocrisy suited to his character—he could in an instant denounce death on the imaginary offender for a fault comparatively trifling!"—"Seeing, he saw not, and hearing, he heard not;" he immediately saw the iniquity and barbarity of the rich man's proceedings; his heart was in a moment fired with indignation at the thought of it; "the vehemence of his resentment even overstepped the limits of his natural justice, in decreeing a punishment disproportionate to the crime, while he remained deaf to his own delinquency. A pointed parable instantly surprised him into the most bitter self-reproach. A direct accusation might have inflamed him before he was thus prepared; and in the one case he might have punished the accuser, by whom, in the other, he was brought into the deepest self-abasement. The prudent prophet did not rashly reproach the king with the crime which he wished him to condemn; but placed the fault at such a distance, and in such a point of view, that he first procured his impartial judgment, and afterwards his self-condemnation:—an important lesson, not only to the offender, but also to the reprover."¹

3. Every parable is composed of three parts; 1. The sensible similitude, which has variously been termed the bark and the protasis, and consists in its literal sense;—2. The explanation or mystical sense, also termed the apodosis and the sap or fruit, or the thing signified by the similitude proposed. This is frequently not expressed; for though our Saviour sometimes condescended to unveil the hidden sense, by disclosing the moral meaning of his parables (as in Matt. xiii. 3-8, 18-23, compared with Luke viii. 4-15, and Matt. xiii. 21-30, 36-43.), yet he usually left the application to those whom he designed to instruct by his doctrine. Of this description are the parables of the grain of mustard seed, of leaven, of the hidden treasure, and the pearl of great price (Matt. xiii. 31-33, 44-46.), between which and the kingdom of heaven a comparison is instituted, the mystical sense of which is to be sought in the similitudes themselves;—3. The third constituent part of a parable is the root or scope to which it tends.²

4. For the right explanation and application of parables, their general scope and design must be ascertained.

Where our Saviour has not himself interpreted a parable, its immediate scope and design are to be sought with great attention; this, indeed, will generally appear from the context, being either expressed at its commencement or at its conclusion; or it is sufficiently evident from the occasion on which it was delivered. More particularly the scope of a parable may be ascertained,

(1.) From the clear declaration prefixed to it:

As in the parable of the rich glutton (Luke xii. 16-21), which is prefaced by the following caution in verse 15:—Take heed and beware of covetousness, for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth. Thus, in Luke xviii. 2-5, the parable of the unjust judge is preceded by this declaration, which plainly points out one of its senses:—He spake a parable unto them, that men ought always to pray, and not to faint. And again, in verse 9. He spake this parable (of the Pharisee and publican, verses 10-14) unto certain which trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised others.

(2.) From the declaration subjoined to a parable:

Thus our Saviour concludes the parable of the unmerciful creditor, who would not forgive his debtor the minutest portion of his debt, though much had been forgiven him (Matt. xviii. 23-35), by the following explanation:—So likewise shall my heavenly Father do also unto you, if ye forgive not every one his brother their trespasses. Similar declarations are annexed to the parables of the wedding feast (Matt. xxv. 1-13, Luke xiv. 11.), of the rich glutton (Luke xii. 21.), and of the unjust steward. (Luke xvi. 9.) The prophetic writings will furnish similar instances: thus Isaiah (v. 1-7.) having delivered the parable of a vineyard—planted with the choicest vines, and cultivated with the utmost care, yet which produced only wild fruit—announces at its close, that by the vineyard were intended the Jews, and by the wild fruit their enormous wickedness, for which they deserved the severest judgments. Nathan, also, in the beautiful parable already cited, subjoined a declaration of its scope to the criminal sovereign. In the short parable, or apologue, communicated from Jehoash king of Israel to Amaziah king of Judah (2 Kings xiv. 9, 10.), the application of it to the latter is explicitly stated at its conclusion.

(3.) Where no declaration is prefixed or subjoined to a parable, its scope must be collected from a consideration of the subject-matter, context, or the occasion on account of which the parable was delivered.

Thus, in the parable of the barren fig tree (Luke xiii. 6-9.), Jesus Christ has indicated nothing concerning its scope. But from the consideration of the context of his discourse, and of the occasion of the parable, we learn that it was designed to teach the Jews, that unless they repented within the space of time allotted to them by Infinite Mercy, severe punishments would await them, and their civil and religious polity be destroyed. The immediate occasion of the parable was, his disciples telling him of certain Galileans, who had come up to the temple at Jerusalem, to worship, and whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices. On hearing this circumstance, Christ said, Suppose ye, that these Galileans were sinners above all the Galileans, because they suffered these things? I tell you, nay;

but except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish. Having repeated the last sentence a second time, he delivered the parable of the barren fig tree.

In like manner, to the parable of the prodigal son nothing is prefixed or subjoined; but the relation occurs immediately after two others, in which it was declared that the return of penitent sinners affords joy in heaven. This, however, is an important topic, and will require to be more particularly considered. From the observations already made on the general nature of parables, it will be easily perceived that the objects of our Lord's parables were various; such as the conveying either of instruction or reproof, the correcting or preventing of errors; the instructing of men in the knowledge of some truths which could be viewed with advantage only at a distance, or of others, which would have startled them when plainly proposed. Further, there were truths which were necessary to be conveyed, respecting the establishment of his religion, and the conduct of his disciples on occasion of that event. These subjects required to be touched with a delicate hand; and a few instances will show that each of them was conducted with the highest grace and propriety.

Thus, the worldly spirit of the Pharisees is delicately yet strikingly reproofed in the parables of the rich man whose grounds brought forth plentifully (Luke xii. 15-21.); which was spoken to show the folly of covetousness,—of the unjust steward (Luke xvi. 1.), to show the proper use of wealth,—and of the rich man and the beggar (Luke xvi. 19-31.), to show the danger of abusing it.—The selfishness and bigotry of the same sect, which characteristic in some degree applied to the whole Jewish nation, who "trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised others," are convicted in the parables of the Pharisee and the publican praying in the temple, of the two sons commanded to work in the vineyard, of the guest who chose the highest seat at the table, of the lost sheep and money, of the prodigal son, and of the good Samaritan. In several of these parables the comparative merit of the Jew and Gentile world is justly though faintly stated, on purpose to abase the pride of the one and to exalt the humble hopes of the other.

Another class of parables is designed to deliver some general lessons of wisdom and piety: such are the parables of the ten virgins and the talents. The parables of the sower and of the tares, and many of the lesser parables, are designed to show the nature and progress of the Gospel dispensation, together with the opposition which would be made to it from the malice of Satan, and the folly and perverseness of mankind. With these are closely connected such parables as have for their object the rejection of the Jews, and the calling of the Gentiles: under this head are comprised the parables of the murmuring labourers, of the cruel and unjust husbandmen, the barren fig tree, and the marriage-feast. By considering the occasions upon which these and other parables were delivered by the Redeemer of the world, we shall be enabled, not only to ascertain their scope and design, but also to perceive their wisdom, beauty, and propriety.

5. Wherever the words of Jesus seem to be capable of different senses, we may with certainty conclude that to be the true one which lies most level to the apprehension of his auditors.

Allowing for those figurative expressions which were so very frequent and familiar with them, and which, therefore, are no exceptions to this general rule, this necessary canon of interpretation, of all others, demands the most attention.

6. As every parable has two senses, the LITERAL or external, and the MYSTICAL or internal sense, the literal sense must be first explained, in order that the correspondence between it and the mystical sense may be the more readily perceived.

For instance, "the parable of the unforgiving servant represents, literally, that his lord forgave him a debt of ten thousand talents;—mystically or spiritually, that God remits to the penitent the punishment of innumerable offences. Literally, it states that this servant, on his refusal to exercise forbearance towards his fellow-servant, was delivered over to the tormentors: mystically, that God will inflict the severest judgments on all who do not forgive others their trespasses. The unity of sense in both interpretations is easily perceptible;" whence it follows that every parable must be consistent throughout, and that the literal sense must not be confounded with the mystical sense. Hence also it follows, that, since the scope and application of parables are the chief points to be regarded,

7. It is not necessary, in the interpretation of parables, that we should anxiously insist upon every single word; nor ought we to expect too curious an adaptation or accommodation of it in every part to the spiritual meaning inculcated by it; for many circumstances are introduced into parables which are merely ornamental, and designed to make the similitude more pleasing and interesting.

Inattention to this obvious rule has led many expositors into the most fanciful explanations; resemblances have been accumulated, which are for the most part futile, or at best of little use, and manifestly not included in the scope of the parable. Where, indeed, circumstantial resemblances (though merely ornamental) will admit of an easy and natural application, they are by no means to be overlooked; and it is worthy of remark, that in those parables which our Lord himself explained to his disciples, there are few, if any, of the circumstantial points left unapplied; but here great judgment is necessary neither to do too little, nor to attempt too much. In the application, then, of this rule, there are two points to be considered:—

(1.) Persons are not to be compared with persons, but things with things. part is not to be compared with part, but the whole of the parable with itself.

Thus, we read in Matt. xiii. 24. The kingdom of heaven is likened unto a man which sowed good seed in his field; and in verse 45. The kingdom of heaven is likened unto a merchant man seeking goodly pearls. The similitude here is not with the men, but with the seed and the pearl; and the construction is to be the same as in verses 31. and 33., where the progress of the Gospel is compared to the grain of mustard-seed, and to leaven.

(2.) In parables it is not necessary that all the actions of men, mentioned in them, should be just actions, that is to say, morally just and honest. For instance, the unjust steward (Luke xvi. 1-8.) is not proposed either to justify his dishonesty, or as an example to us in cheating his lord (for that is merely ornamental, and introduced to fill up the story), but as an example of his care and prudence, in providing for the future. From the conduct of this man, our Lord took occasion to point out the management of worldly men, as an example of attention to his followers in their spiritual affairs; and at the same time added an impressive exhortation to make the things of this life subservient to their everlasting happiness; assuring them, that if they did not use temporal blessings as they ought, they could never be qualified to receive spiritual blessings. So again, in Luke xii. 39. and Rev. iii. 3. the coming of Christ is compared to the coming of a thief, not in respect of theft, but of the sudden surprise. "It is not necessary," says a great master of eloquence, "that there should be a perfect resemblance of one thing in all respects to another; but it is necessary that a thing should bear a likeness to that with which it is compared."¹

8. Attention to HISTORICAL CIRCUMSTANCES, as well as an acquaintance with the nature and properties of the things whence the similitudes are taken, will essentially contribute to the interpretation of parables.

(1.) Some of the parables related in the New Testament are supposed to be true histories: in the incidental circumstances of others, our Saviour evidently had a regard to historical propriety. Thus, the scene of that most beautiful and instructive parable of the good Samaritan (Luke x. 30–37.) is very aptly placed in that dangerous road which lay between Jerusalem and Jericho; no way being more frequented than this, both on account of its leading to Perea, and especially because the classes or stations of the Priests and Levites were fixed at Jericho as well as at Jerusalem: and hence it is that a Priest and a Levite are mentioned as travelling this way.² It further appears, that at this very time Judæa in general was overrun by robbers, and that the road between Jericho and Jerusalem (in which our Lord represents this robbery to have been committed) was particularly infested by banditti, whose depredations it favoured, as it lay through a dreary solitude. On account of these frequent robberies, we are informed by Jerome that it was called the Bloody Way.³

(2.) Again, in the parable of a nobleman who went into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom, and to return (Luke xix. 12.), our Lord alludes to a case, which, no long time before, had actually occurred in Judæa. Those who, by hereditary succession, or by interest, had pretensions in the Jewish throne, travelled to Rome, in order to have it confirmed to them. Herod the Great first went that long journey to obtain the kingdom of Judæa from Antony, in which he succeeded; and having received the kingdom,⁴ he afterwards travelled from Judæa to Rhodes in order to obtain a confirmation of it from Cæsar, in which he was equally successful.⁵ Archelaus, the son and successor of Herod, did the same; and to him our Lord most probably alluded. Every historical circumstance is beautifully interwoven by our Saviour in this instructive parable.

(3.) Of the further benefit to be derived from history in the interpretation of parables, the similes in Matt. xiii. 31, 32. will afford a striking illustration: in these parables the progress of the Gospel is compared to a grain of mustard-seed, and to leaven: nothing is subjoined to these verses by way of explanation. What then is their scope? Jesus Christ was desirous of accustoming his disciples to parabolic instruction: from this design, however, we cannot collect the sense of the parables; we have therefore, no other resource but history. Since, then, Jesus Christ is speaking of the progress of the Christian church, we must consult ecclesiastical history, which informs us that, from small beginnings, the church of Christ has grown into a vast congregation, that is, spread over the whole world. In order, however, that we may enter fully into the meaning of this parable of our Lord, it may not be irrelevant to observe that in eastern countries the mustard-plant (or, at least, a species of the styrax, which the Orientals comprehended under that name) attains a greater size than with us. It appears that the Orientals were accustomed to give the denomination of trees to plants growing to the height of ten or twelve feet, and having branches in proportion.⁶ To such a height the mustard-plant grows in Judæa; and its branches are so strong and well covered with leaves, as to afford shelter to the feathered tribe. Such is the image by which Jesus Christ represents the progress of his Gospel. The kingdom of heaven, said he, is like to a grain of mustard-seed—small and contemptible in its beginning; which is indeed the least of all seeds, that is, of all those seeds, with which the Jews were then acquainted (for our Lord's words are to be interpreted by popular use; and we learn from Matt. xvii. 20. that like a grain of mustard-seed was a proverbial expression to denote a small quantity): but when it is grown, it becometh a tree, so that the birds of the air come and lodge in the branches thereof. Under this simple and beautiful figure does Jesus Christ describe the admirable development of his Gospel from its origin to its final consummation.

(4.) We have said that the understanding of parables is facilitated by an acquaintance with the properties of the things whence the similitudes are derived. Besides the diffusive effects of leaven already adverted to, which sufficiently indicate the certain spread of the Gospel, we may adduce an example from the prophet Jeremiah; who, parabolically describing a furious invader (xlix. 19.), says, He shall come up like a lion from the swelling of Jordan against the habitation of the strong. The propriety of this will appear, when it is known that in ancient times the river Jordan was particularly infested with lions, which concealed themselves among the thick reeds upon its banks.⁷ Let us then imagine one of these monarchs of the desert asleep among the thickets upon the banks of that river: let us further suppose him to be suddenly awakened by the roaring, or dislodged by the overflowing, of the rapid tumultuous torrent, and in his fury rushing into the upland country; and we shall perceive the admirable propriety and force of the prophet's allusion.

9. Lastly, although in many of his parables Jesus Christ has delineated the future state of the church, yet he intended that they should convey some important moral precepts, of which we should never lose sight in interpreting parables.

Thus, the parable of the sower (Matt. xiii. 3–24. Mark iv. 3–20. and Luke xii. 4–16.) has a moral doctrine, for our Lord himself soon after subjoins the following important caution:—Take heed how ye hear. Again, the parable of the tares (Matt. xiii. 24. et seq.) refers to the mixture of the wicked with the good in this world; when, therefore, our Lord intimated (in verses 27–29.) that it is not our province to judge those whom he has reserved for his own tribunal, and in the 30th verse added, let both grow together, he evidently implied that, since God tolerates incorrigible sinners, it is the duty of men to bear with them: the propagation of false doctrines is an offence against God, who alone is the judge and punisher of them;—man has no right to punish his brethren for their sentiments.⁸ The parables which are delivered in the same chapter of Saint Matthew's Gospel, and also in Luke xiii. 19, 21. delineate the excellence of the religion of Jesus, and are admirably adapted to inspire us with love and admiration for its Divine Author. Further, the parable of the labourers in the vineyard (Matt. xx. 1–17.), besides predicting the future reception of the Gospel, teaches us that no one should despair of the divine mercy so long as he lives, and that God will bestow upon the faithful a larger measure of blessedness than they can venture to expect, and also that we should not be moved with envy, if others enjoy a greater portion of gifts or talents than are bestowed upon ourselves. In fact, as an able expositor⁹ has remarked, since our Saviour's parables frequently have a double view, this parable seems not only to illustrate the case of the Jews and Gentiles, but also the case of all individuals of every nation, whom God accepts according to their improvement of the opportunities they have enjoyed. In like manner, the parable of the royal nuptials, related in Matt. xxii. verses 1–15. was designed chiefly to show the Jews, that the offers of grace which they rejected would be made to the Gentiles. But the latter part of it also seems intended to check the presumption of such as pretend to the divine favour without complying with the conditions on which it is promised. It was customary for the bridegroom to prepare vestments for his guests; and the man mentioned in verses 11–13. is said to have intruded without the requisite garment.¹⁰

IV. From the preceding remarks it will have been seen that parables are of more frequent occurrence in the New than in the Old Testament; and although some hints have been already offered,¹¹ to account for the adoption of this mode of instruction, yet as some persons have taken occasion, from the prophecy of Isaiah (vi. 9, 10.), as cited by Matthew (xiii. 13–15.), to insinuate that our Lord spake in parables in order that the perverse Jews might not understand, it may not be irrelevant if we conclude the present strictures on parabolic instruction, with a few remarks on the reasons why it was adopted by our Lord.

1. The practice was familiar to the Jews in common with the other inhabitants of the East, as already stated; and some of our Lord's parables were probably taken from Jewish customs, as the royal nuptials (Matt. xxii. 1–15.), the rich glutton (Luke xvi. 19–31.) and the wise and foolish virgins. (Matt. xxv. 1–13.)¹² This method of teaching, therefore, was intelligible to an attentive and inquiring auditory. See Matt. xv. 10. and Mark iv. 13.

2. It was customary for the disciples of the Jewish doctors, when they did not understand the meaning of their parables, to request an explanation from their teachers; in like manner, Christ's hearers might have applied to him, if they had not been indisposed to receive the doctrines he taught, and had they not preferred to be held in error by the Scribes and Pharisees, rather than to receive instruction from his lips.

3. Parabolic instruction was peculiarly well calculated to veil offensive truths or hard sayings, until, in due season, they should be disclosed with greater evidence and lustre, when they were able to hear and to bear them, lest they should revolt at the premature disclosure of the mystery. Compare Mark iv. 33. with John xvi. 12, 25.

4. It was a necessary screen from the malice of his inveterate enemies, the chief priests, Scribes and Pharisees; who would not have failed to take advantage of any express declaration which they might turn to his destruction (John

This second bank is so heet with bushes and trees, such as tamarisks, willows, oleanders, &c. that you can see no water, till you have made your way through them. In this thicket anciently, and the same is reported of it at this day, several sorts of wild beasts were wont to harbour themselves; whose being washed out of wild beasts were the overflows of the river gave occasion to that allusion. He shall come up like a lion from the swelling of Jordan." &c. x. 24.); but yet they could not lay hold of the most pointed parables, which, they were clear-sighted enough to perceive, were levelled against themselves. See Matt. xxi. 45. Mark xi. 12. and Luke xx. 19.¹

5. The parables did not contain the fundamental precepts and doctrines of the Gospel, which were delivered in the audience of the people with sufficient perspicuity in Matt. v.—vii. and elsewhere, but only the mysteries relative to its progress among both Jews and Gentiles.

6. Lastly, the Jews were addressed in parables, because as their wickedness and perverseness disposed them to receive profit from his more plain discourses, Jesus Christ would not vouchsafe to them a clearer knowledge of these events. To “have ears and hear not,” is a proverbial expression, to describe men who are so wicked, and slothful, that they either do not attend to, or will not follow the clearest intimations and convictions of their duty. See instances of this expression in Jer. v. 21. and Ezek. xii. 2.² To this remark we may add, with reference to the quotations from Isaiah vi. 9, 10, that it is common for God to speak, by his prophets, of events that would happen, in a manner as if he had enjoined them.³

V. Whoever attentively considers the character of our Saviour: merely as a moral teacher and instructor of mankind, will clearly perceive his superiority to the most distinguished teachers of antiquity. Through the whole of his Gospel, he discovers a deep and thorough insight into human nature, and seems intimately acquainted with all the subtle malignities and latent corruptions of the human heart, as well as with all the illusions and refinements of self-idolatry, and the windings and intricacies of self-deceit. How admirably the manner, in which he conveyed his instructions, was adapted to answer the end and design of them, we have already seen; we might, indeed, almost venture to appeal to his parables alone for the authenticity of our Lord’s mission as a divine teacher: all of them, indeed, are distinguished by a dignity of sentiment, and a simplicity of expression, perfectly becoming the purity and excellence of that religion which he came to establish. The whole system of heathen mythology was the invention of the poets; a mere farrago of childish and romantic stories, chiefly calculated to amuse the vulgar. As the far greater part of their fables and allegories are founded on this fictitious history of the gods, so they were plainly subservient to the support of that system of idolatry and polytheism which the Gospel was designed to overthrow. If any secret meaning was conveyed under these allegorical representations (which seems, however, to be very doubtful), it was too refined and philosophical to be understood by the common people, whose religious knowledge and belief extended no farther than the literal sense of the words. The moral instruction, if any was intended, must be dug out of the rubbish of poetical images and superstitious conceits. And, as these were founded on a false system of the universe, and on unworthy sentiments of God, and his moral government, they could never contribute to the religious improvement of mankind either in knowledge or in practice. Let any man of true taste and judgment compare the abstruse allegories of Plato, or the monstrous fables of the Jewish Talmuds, with the parables of our Saviour, and he will be at no loss which to prefer; while, tired and disgusted with the one, he will be struck with admiration at the beauty, elegance, and propriety of the other.

Further, the parables of Jesus far excel the fables of antiquity in clearness and perspicuity, which made them remarkably fit for the instruction of the ignorant and prejudiced, for whom they were originally designed. Our Saviour’s images and allusions are not only taken from nature, but especially from those objects and occurrences which are most familiar to our observation and experience. It requires no laborious search, no stretch of imagination, to discover his meaning, in all cases where he intended instruction or reproof, as appears evident from the impressions immediately produced on the minds of his hearers, according to their different tempers and dispositions. Such of his parables, indeed, as predicted the nature and progress of the Gospel dispensation, and the opposition which it would meet from the malice of Satan and the folly of mankind,⁴ were purposely left to be explained by the events to which they refer, and with which they so exactly correspond, that their meaning soon became plain and obvious to all. It is, moreover, particularly worthy of observation, that the moral instructions conveyed by the parables of the Gospel are of the most important nature, and essential to our duty and best interests. They do not serve merely to amuse the imagination, but to enlighten the understanding, and to purify the heart. They aim at no less an object than the happiness of mankind in a future and eternal state. The doctrines of the soul’s immortality and a future judgment are the ground-work of our Lord’s parables; and to illustrate and confirm these fundamental principles is their main and leading design. They all terminate in this point, and describe the awful scenes of eternity, and the interesting consequences of that decisive trial, in a language, though simple and unadorned, yet amazingly striking and impressive. But the fabulous representations of the heathen poets on this subject were more fitted to amuse than to instruct: they served rather to extinguish than revive the genuine sentiments of nature, and, consequently, to weaken the influence of this doctrine as a principle of virtuous conduct.

There is, also, a pleasing variety in the parables of Jesus. Some of them comprehend no dialogue, and scarcely any action, and are little more than a simple comparison between the subject to be investigated and something very well known. In others may be traced the outlines of a complete drama. The obscurity which may be thought to lie in some of them wholly arises from our not clearly understanding his character, or that of his audience, or the occasion on which he spoke; except where the subject itself rendered some obscurity unavoidable.

Conciseness is another excellence of the parables of Christ. Scarce a single circumstance or expression can be taken away from any of them, without injuring the whole. They also comprehend the most extensive and important meaning in the shortest compass of narration; and afford at the same time the largest scope to the judgment and reflection of the reader. An extraordinary candour and charity likewise pervade all the parables of Jesus. He gives the most favourable representations of things. In the parable of the lost sheep, he supposes but one of a hundred to go astray; yet the good shepherd leaves the rest, to go in quest of this. In the parable of the ten virgins, he supposes the number of the wise to be equal to that of the foolish. In that of the prodigal, for one son that takes a riotous course, there is another that continued in his duty. In that of the ten talents, two are supposed to improve what is committed to them, for one that does not improve it. In the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, Abraham uses the term son to the former, though in the place of punishment; and he is represented as still retaining kind regards to his brethren. A name is delicately withheld from the character that is blamable, while one is given to the good.

An exact propriety and decorum is observed in all the parables of Christ, and every thing that is spoken is suited to the character of the person who speaks it. His parables surpass all others, in being so natural and probable, that they have the air of truth rather than of fiction.⁵ Generosity and decorum are so strongly manifested in the character of the compassionate Samaritan, that the Jewish lawyer, whose prejudices and passions would be all excited by the very name, could not withhold his approbation of it. There is also great candour and propriety in the selection and adjustment of the two characters. Had a Jew or a Samaritan been represented as assisting a fellow-countryman, or a Jew assisting a Samaritan, the story would have been less convincing and impressive. “In the parable of the murmuring labourers, the proprietor of the vineyard assembles the labourers in the evening all together to receive their wages, begins to pay those who were called at the latest hour, and proceeds gradually to the first invited. This circumstance with the greatest propriety introduces their complaint. It also discovers candour and integrity in the judge, in allowing them to be witnesses of his distribution, in attentively hearing their objections, and calmly pointing out how groundless and unreasonable they were. In the parable of the barren fig tree, the keeper of the vineyard is with great propriety and candour introduced as interceding earnestly for a further respite and trial to the tree, and enforcing his plea from weighty considerations.” In what an amiable and proper light is the generous creditor in the parable represented, and with what natural simplicity! “Then the lord of that servan was moved with compassion, and loosed him, and forgave him the debt." What ingenuous sorrow appears in the character of the prodigal! What natural affection, generosity, and forwardness to forgive, in the parent!

Besides the regard paid by Jesus Christ to historical propriety in the incidental circumstances (which has been already noticed in p. 368.), it is a peculiar excellence of the parables of Christ, that the actors in them are not the inferior creatures, but men. He leads us sometimes to draw instruction from the inferior animals, and the process of things in the vegetable world, as well as nature in general. But men are the more proper actors in a scene, and speakers in a dialogue, formed for the instruction of mankind. Men add to the significance without diminishing the ease and familiarity of the narration. In the fables of Æsop, and of the Hindoos,¹ as well as of the Jewish prophets, inferior creatures, and even vegetables, are introduced as actors.

Another distinguishing character of our Lord's parables is, the frequent introduction of his own character into them, as the principal figure, and in views so various, important, and significant: for instance, the sower; the vine-dresser; the proprietor of an estate; the careful shepherd; the just master; the kind father; the splendid bridegroom; the potent nobleman; the heir of a kingdom; and the king upon his throne of glory judging the whole world of mankind. A striking contrast hence arises between the simplicity of the descriptions and dignity of the speaker.

A further material circumstance which characterizes the parables of Christ is, that he spake them just as occasions were offered; in the ordinary course of his conversation and instruction; privately as well as publicly; to his own disciples; to the multitude; and to the Pharisees and chief rulers. An accidental question or unexpected event appears to have been the occasion of some of them. For instance, that of the good Samaritan, when he was asked, "Who is my neighbour?" that of the rich man, whose ground brought forth plentifully, when he was desired to determine a suit concerning an estate; that of the barren fig tree, when he was told of the Galileans whom Pilate had massacred; that of a certain man who made a great supper, when he was present at a splendid entertainment; and those of the careful shepherd, the prodigal son, the unjust steward, and the inhuman rich Jew, when a great number of publicans and sinners, and of Pharisees and Scribes, happened to be present, and the latter murmured against him, and insulted him. No man, except Jesus, ever did speak in parables, unpremeditated, and on various occasions. No man is now capable of conveying instruction in like manner. No instructor can ever presume to be equal to him, nor so much as to imitate or resemble him.

Again: the parables of our Lord were admirably adapted to the time when, the place in which, and the persons to whom, they were delivered; while they were also fitted for the general instruction of mankind in all ages. These compositions of Christ were likewise all original. Dr. Lightfoot and others have shown that Jesus often borrowed proverbs and phrases from the Jews. But an inspired teacher would not surely propose whole parables, that were in common use, for his own. Nor does it appear that any body used the parables of Christ before his time; for those which are alleged out of the Talmudical or other Jewish writers were all penned some ages after his birth. For instance, the parable of the householder and the labourers,² which is extant in the Jerusalem Gemara, was written an age and a half at least after the destruction of the temple. It is more probable, therefore, that it was written in imitation of Christ, than borrowed from any ancient tradition. The same may be said of many others; as Matt. xviii. 17. out of the book of Musar; and of another parable like that, Matt. xxv. 1. of the ten virgins.³

If Jesus had borrowed whole parables, or discourses, it would scarcely have been remarked so often, that he spake as one who had authority, and not as the Scribes; nor would the extraordinary wisdom of his instructions have so much astonished his auditors. Further; the Scribes and Pharisees would have been glad to have exposed him, by proclaiming to the people that he was indebted to the Rabbis for what gained him the reputation of superior sagacity. This, also, would have been a plausible argument to have retorted upon him, when he opposed their traditions.

To conclude, it is a singular excellency in the Gospel parables, that, though they were for the most part occasional! and wisely adapted by our Saviour to the characters and circumstances of the persons to whom they were originally addressed, yet they contain most wholesome instructions and admonitions for all ages of the world, and for every future period of his church. They are at once excellently accommodated to the comprehensions of the vulgar, and capable of instructing and delighting the most learned and judicious. In short, all the parables of Christ "are beautiful; the truest delineation of human manners, embellished with all those graces which an unaffected lovely simplicity of diction is able to bestow,—graces beyond the reach of the most elaborate artifice of composition. But two of the number shine among the rest with unrivalled splendour; and we may safely challenge the genius of antiquity to produce, from all his stores of elegance and beauty, such specimens of pathetic unlaboured description, as the parables of the prodigal son and the good Samaritan."⁴

SECTION VI.

ON SCRIPTURE PROVERBS.

I. Nature of Proverbs.—Prevalence of this mode of instruction.—II. Different kinds of Proverbs.—III. The Proverb occurring in the New Testament, how to be interpreted.

I. THE inhabitants of Palestine, in common with other oriental nations, were much in the use of PROVERBS, or detached aphorisms; that is, concise and sententious common sayings, founded on a close observance of men and manners.

This method of instruction is of very remote antiquity, and was adopted by those who, by genius and reflection, exercised in the school of experience, had accumulated a stock of knowledge, which they were desirous of reducing into the most compendious form, and comprising, in a few maxims, such observations as they apprehended to be most essential to human happiness. Proverbial expressions were peculiarly adapted to a rude state of society, and more likely to produce effect than any other: for they professed not to dispute, but to command,—not to persuade, but to compel; they conducted men, not by circuitous argument, but led them immediately to the approbation and practice of integrity and virtue. That this kind of instruction, however, might not be altogether destitute of attraction, and lest it should disgust by an appearance of harshness and severity, the teachers of mankind added to their precepts the graces of harmony; and decorated them with metaphors, comparisons, allusions, and other embellishments of style.

Proverbial instruction was a favourite style of composition among the Jews, which continued to the latest ages of their literature; and obtained among them the appellation of Mashalim, or parables, partly because it consisted of parables strictly so called (the nature of which has been discussed in the preceding section), and partly because it possessed uncommon force and authority over the minds of the auditors. The proverbs of the Old Testament are classed by Bishop Lowth among the didactic poetry of the Hebrews, of which many specimens are extant, particularly the book of Proverbs, composed by Solomon, of which an account is given in the subsequent part of this work.⁵ The royal sage has, in one of his proverbs, himself explained the principal excellences of this form of composition; exhibiting at once a complete definition of a proverb, and a very happy specimen of what he describes:

Apples of gold in a net-work of silver
Is a word seasonably spoken.

Prov. xxv. 11.

Thus intimating, that grave and profound sentiments should be set off by a smooth and well-turned phraseology; as the appearance of the most beautiful and exquisitely-coloured fruit, or the imitation of it, perhaps, in the most precious materials, is improved by the circumstance of its shining (as through a veil) through the reticulations of a silver vessel exquisitely carved. In the above-cited passage he further insinuates, that it is not merely a neat turn and polished diction by which proverbs must be recommended; but that truth itself acquires additional beauty when partially discovered through the veil of elegant fiction and imagery.

1. The first excellence of a proverb is Brevity,¹ without which it can retain neither its name nor its nature. The discriminating sentiment should be expressed in a few words, not exceeding ten or at most twelve words, otherwise it is no longer a proverb, but a declamation; and it should force itself upon the mind by a single effort, not by a tedious process. Accordingly, the language must be strong and condensed, rather omitting some circumstances which may appear necessary, than admitting any thing superfluous. Horace himself insists on this as one of the express rules of didactic poetry, and has assigned the reason on which it is founded:

Short be the precept, which with ease is gained
By docile minds, and faithfully retained.²

Solomon expresses the same sentiment in his own parabolic manner:

The words of the wise are like goads,
And like nails that are firmly fixed. Eccles. xii. 11.

That is, they instantaneously stimulate or affect the mind; they penetrate deeply and are firmly retained. Even the obscurity, which is generally attendant on excessive brevity, has its use; as it sharpens the understanding, keeps alive the attention, and exercises the genius by the labour of investigation, while no small gratification results from the acquisition of knowledge by our own efforts.

2. Another excellence, essential to a proverb, is Elegance; which is neither inconsistent with brevity, nor with some degree of obscurity. Elegance in this connection respects the sentiment, the imagery, and the diction; and those proverbs, which are the plainest, most obvious, and simple, or which contain nothing remarkable either in sentiment or style, are not to be considered as destitute of their peculiar elegance, if they possess only brevity, and that neat, compact form, and roundness of period, which alone are sufficient to constitute a proverb. Examples of this kind occur in the maxim of David, recorded in 1 Sam. xxiv. 13. and in that of Solomon, Prov. x. 12.³

II. Proverbs are divided into two classes, viz. 1. Entire Sentences; and, 2. Proverbial Phrases, which by common usage are admitted into a sentence.

1. Examples of Entire Proverbial Sentences occur in Gen. x. 9. and xxii. 14. 1 Sam. x. 12. and xxiv. 13. 2 Sam. v. 8. and xx. 18. Ezek. xvi. 44. and xviii. 2. Luke iv. 23. John iv. 37. and 2 Peter ii. 22.; in which passages the inspired writers expressly state the sentences to have passed into proverbs.

2. Examples of Proverbial Phrases, which, indeed, cannot be correctly termed proverbs, but which have acquired their form and use, are to be found in Deut. xxv. 4. 1 Kings xx. 11. 2 Chron. xxv. 9. Job vi. 5. xiv. 19. and xxviii. 18. Psal. xlii. 7. and lxix. 9. Of this description also is that beautiful and memorable sentence, THE FEAR OF THE LORD IS THE BEGINNING OF WISDOM, Psal. xli. 10., which is repeated in Prov. i. 7. ix. 10. and in Job xxviii. 28. The book of Proverbs likewise contains very many similar sentences; from among which it may suffice to refer to Prov. i. 17. 32. iii. 12. vi. 6. 27. x. 5. 13. 19. 25. xi. 15. 22. 27. xii. 11. 15. xv. 2. 33. xvii. 1. 10. 19. 28. xix. 2. 24. xx. 4. 11. 14. 21. 25. xxii. 6. 13. xxv. 11. 16. 27. xxvi. 4. 10. 11. 14. 17. 28. xxvii. 6. 7. 8. 10. 14. 17. 22. xxviii. 21. So in the book of Ecclesiastes, ch. i. 15. 18. iv. 5. 12. v. 2. 6. 8. 9. 10. vi. 9. vii. 17. ix. 4. 18. x. 1. 2. 8. 15. 19. 20. xi. 3. 4. 6. 7. xii. 12. And in the Prophets, Jer. xiii. 23. xxiii. 28. Ezek. vii. 5. Micah vii. 5. 6. Habak. ii. 6. Mal. ii. 10. &c. And likewise in the New Testament, as in Matt. v. 13—15. v. 31. 32. 34. vii. 2. 5. 16. ix. 12. 16. x. 10. 22. 24. 26. xii. 34. xiii. 12. 57. xv. 14. xiii. 24. xxiv. 28. Mark ix. 50. Luke ix. 62. xii. 48. xiii. 31. Acts ix. 5. xx. 35. 1 Cor. v. 6. x. 12. xv. 33. 2 Cor. ix. 6. 7. 2 Thess. iii. 10. Tit. i. 15.

III. The Proverbs occurring in the New Testament are to be explained, partly by the aid of similar passages from the Old Testament, and partly from the ancient writings of the Jews, especially from the Talmud; whence it appears how much they were in use among that people, and that they were applied by Christ and his apostles, agreeably to common usage. The proverbs, contained in the Old and New Testaments, are collected and illustrated by Drusius, and Andreas Schottus; whose works are comprised in the ninth volume of the Critici Sacri, and also by Joachim Zehner, who has elucidated them by parallel passages from the fathers as well as from the heathen writers, in a treatise published at Leipsic in 1601. The proverbs which are found in the New Testament have been illustrated by Vorstius⁴ and Viser,⁵ as well as by Lightfoot and Schoetgenius in their Horæ Hebraicæ et Talmudicæ, and by Buxtorf in his Lexicon Chaldaicum Talmudicum et Rabbinicum; from which last-mentioned works Rosenmüller, Kuinöel, Dr. Whitby, Dr. A. Clarke, and other commentators, both British and foreign, have derived their illustrations of the Jewish parables and proverbs.

SECTION VII.

CONCLUDING OBSERVATIONS ON THE FIGURATIVE LANGUAGE OF SCRIPTURE.

I. Synecdoche.—II. Irony.—III. Hyperbole.—IV. Paronomasia.

BESIDES the figures already discussed, and the right understanding of which is of the greatest importance for ascertaining the sense of Scripture, Glassius, and other writers, who have treated expressly on the tropes and figures of the Sacred Writings, have enumerated a great variety of other figures which are to be found in them. As, however, many of these are merely rhetorical; and though they are admirably calculated to show how vastly superior the inspired volume is to all the productions of the human mind, for the beauty and sublimity of its compositions; yet as it would lead us into too wide a field of discussion, were we to introduce such figures at length, our attention must be directed to a few of those principal figures which have not been mentioned in the preceding pages.

The most important of these figures, which remain to be noticed, are, 1. Synecdoche; 2. Irony; 3. the Hyperbole; and, 4. the Paronomasia.

I. Synecdoche.

A SYNECDOCHE is a trope in which, 1. The whole is put for a part; 2. A part is put for the whole; 3. A certain number for an uncertain one; 4. A general name for a particular one; and, 4. Special words for general ones. A very few examples will suffice to illustrate this figure.

1. The whole is sometimes put for a part.

As, the world for the Roman empire, which is but a small though very remarkable part of the world, in Acts xxiv. 5. and Rev. iii. 10. The world for the earth, which is a part of it, 2 Pet. iii. 6. Rom. i. 8. 1 John v. 19. Thus the whole person is put for a part, as man for the soul, Luke xvi. 23. where the rich man Abraham, and Lazarus, are respectively put for their souls; man, for the body, John xix. 42. xx. 2. 13. with Luke xxiv. 3. in which passages Jesus is put for his dead body. Time for a part of time, as Dan. ii. 4. which simply means, we wish you a long life and reign. Gen. xvii. 19. where the words everlasting covenant denote while the Jewish polity subsists, that is, until Messiah come. (Gen. xlix. 10.)—See also Exod. xxi. 6. where the expression for ever means the year of jubilee.

To this class of Synecdoche may be referred those instances, in which the plural number is sometimes put for the singular: as the mountains of Ararat (Gen. viii. 4.), which term might refer to the bi-topped form of that mountainous range. The cities where Lot dwelt, Gen. xix. 29.; the sides of the house, Amos vi. 10.; the sides of the ship, Jonah i. 5.; the ass and foal, on which Jesus Christ was set, Matt. xxi. 7. compared with Zech. ix. 9.; the prophets, Mark i. 2. John vi. 45. Acts xiii. 40.; in all which places only one of those things or persons mentioned is to be understood. So, children is put for child, Gen. xxi. 7.; so daughters and sons' daughters, Gen. xvi. 7., when Jacob had but one daughter (verse 15.) and one grand daughter. (verse 17.) So the sons of Dan (verse 23.), when he had but one. So the cities of Gilead are mentioned in Judg. xii. 7.; whereas Jephthah was buried in one city in that region. In like manner, by the sons of Jehoiada is intended only Zechariah, 2 Chron. xxiv. 25. compared with verses 20. and 21.; and our Saviour speaks of himself in the plural number, John iii. 11.

2. Sometimes the part for the whole.

Thus in Gen. i. 5. 8. 13. 19. 23. 31. the evening and morning, being the principal parts of the day, are put for the entire day. So the soul comprehends the entire man, Acts xxvii. 37. See similar expressions in Gen. xii. 8. xvii. 14. Exod. xii. 19. Lev. iv. 2. Psal. iii. 2. xi. 1. xxv. 13. Isa. lviii. 5. Ezek. xviii. 4. Acts ii. 41. &c.

² Viser, Hermeneutica Sacra Novi Testamenti, part ii. sect. ix. cap. 2. pp. 132—150.

² Art of Poetry, by Francis, verse 455.

³ Lowth, Prælect. xiv. pp. 312—318. (edit. 1763.) or vol. ii. pp. 162—173. of Dr. Gregory's translation.

So, the singular number is sometimes put for the plural.

This chiefly takes place when the Scriptures speak of the multitude collectively, or of an entire species. Thus in Gen. iii. 8. tree in the Hebrew is put for trees. Exod. xiv. 17. (Heb.) I will get me honour upon Pharaoh and upon all his host, upon his chariots, and upon his horsemen, that is, the whole multitude of his chariots which are enumerated in verse 7. So in Exod. xv. 1. 21. the horse and his rider are put collectively for the horses and horsemen who were in the Egyptian army. So the Hivite, Canaanite, and Hittite, Exod. xxiii. 23, the ox and the ass, Isa. i. 3., the stork, the turtle, the crane, the swallow, Jer. viii. 7., the palmer-worm, Joel i. 4., street, Rev. xxi. 21., are respectively put for the Hivites, oxen, storks, &c. &c. It is proper to remark, that in very many instances the learned and pious translators of our authorized version have justly rendered the singular words in the plural number where the sense evidently required it.

3. Very frequently a certain or definite number is put for an uncertain and indefinite number.

Thus we find double for much or sufficient, in Isa. xl. 2. lxi. 7. Jer. xvi. 18. Zech. ix. 12. Rev. xviii. 6. Twice for several times, in Psal. lxii. 11. Five for a few, 1 Cor. xiv. 19, in which verse ten thousand are put for many. Ten for many, Gen. xxi. 7. and 1 Sam. i. 8. But most frequently we have seven for an indefinite number. See Gen. iv. 15. Lev. xxvi. 18. 21. 24. 28. Ruth iv. 15. 1 Sam. ii. 5. Psal. cxix. 164. Prov. xxiv. 16. xxvi. 25. Isa. iv. 1. Jer. xv. 9. Ezek. xxxix. 9. 12. Zech. iii. 9. Matt. xii. 45. One hundred for many, indefinitely, in Eccl. vi. 3. viii. 12. Prov. xvii. 10. Matt. xix. 29. Luke viii. 8. A thousand for a great many, Exod. xx. 6. xxxiv. 7. Deut. i. 11. 1 Sam. xviii. 7. Psal. cxix. 72. Ten thousand for an immense number, 1 Sam. xvi. 7. Psal. lxxv. 4. and ten thousand thousand for a countless host, in Num. x. 36. (Heb.) Dan. vii. 10. Rev. v. 11., &c.

4. A general name is put for a particular one,

As in Mark xvi. 15. where every creature means all mankind; as flesh also does in Gen. vi. 12. Psal. cxlv. 21. Isa. xl. 5, 6. lxxvi. 23. Matt. xxiv. 22. Luke iii. 6. and Rom. iii. 20.

5. Sometimes special words or particular names are put for such as are general:

Thus Jehovah is, in Psal. xli. 9., said to break the bow, and cut the spear in sunder, and to burn the chariot in the fire: that is, God destroys all the weapons of war, and blesses the world with peace. Again, in Dan. xii. 2., we read, Many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake; some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt. Here many is put for all. So man, generally, is put for all mankind, both male and female, Psal. i. 1. Mark xvi. 16. Numerous similar passages might be adduced. So, father is put for any ancestor, Psal. xlii. 4. xlv. 1. cvi. 6. Father for grandfather, 2 Sam. ix. 7. Dan. v. 11. Mother for grandmother, 1 Kings xv. 10. 13. compared with verses 2. 8. Brother for kinsman, Gen. xiii. 8. and xiv. 14. with Gen. xii. 5. Matt. xii. 46. John vii. 3. 5. In the same manner, son is put for any of the posterity: thus Laban is said to be Nahor's son, in Gen. xxix. 5., when he was the son of Bethuel, and grandson or nephew of Nahor. Compare Gen. xxii. 20. 23. with xiv. 29. So Rebekah is called Abraham's brother's daughter, Gen. xxiv. 48. Father and mother intend all superiors, Exod. xx. 12. In like manner the Greeks, who are the most eminent of the heathen nations, are put for the whole Gentile world, in Rom. i. 16. Gal. iii. 28. and Col. iii. 11. So bread denotes all the necessities of life, in Matt. vi. 11. and numerous other places. The fatherless and widows are put for any who are in distress or affliction, Isa. i. 17. 23. James i. 27., &c.

II. Irony.

An Irony is a figure, in which we speak one thing and design another, in order to give the greater force and vehemence to our meaning. An irony is distinguished from the real sentiments of the speaker or writer, by the accent, the air, the extravagance of the praise, the character of the person, or the nature of the discourse.

Very numerous instances of irony are to be found in the Scripture, which might be produced; but the following will suffice to show the nature of this figure.

Thus, the prophet Elijah speaks in irony to the priests of Baal—Cry aloud; for he is a God: either he is talking, or he is pursuing, or he is in a journey, or peradventure he sleepeth, and must be awaked. (1 Kings xviii. 27.) So the prophet Micah bids Ahab go to battle against Ramoth-Gilead and prosper, (1 Kings xxii. 15.) We meet with an irony in Job xii. 2. No doubt but ye are the people, and wisdom shall die with you. That well-known passage in Eccles. xi. 9. may also be considered as an irony: Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth; and let thine heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the way of thine heart and in the sight of thine eyes. Nay, the Almighty himself appears to speak ironically in Gen. iii. 22.: And the Lord God said, Behold the man is become as one of us, to know good and evil; and also in Judges x. 14. Go and cry unto the gods which ye have chosen: let them deliver you in the time of your tribulation. And in the same manner we may apprehend Christ's rebuke to the Jewish doctors, when he says (Mark vii. 9.), Full well ye reject the commandment of God, that ye may keep your own tradition; where, by the word καλώς, which our translators render full well, it is evident that our Saviour intends quite the contrary of what his language seems to import. Saint Paul also has a fine example of irony in 1 Cor. iv. 8. Now ye are full, now ye are rich, ye have reigned as kings without us; and I would to God ye did reign, that ye also might reign with you.

Under this figure we may include the SARCASM, which may be defined to be an irony in its superlative keenness and asperity. As an instance of this kind, we may consider the soldier's speech to our Lord; when, after they had arrayed him in mock majesty, they bowed the knee before him, and said, Hail, King of the Jews. (Matt. xxvii. 29.) So, again, while our Redeemer was suspended on the cross, there were some who thus derided him, Let Christ, the King of Israel, descend now from the cross, that we may see and believe. (Mark xv. 32.)

III. Hyperbole.

This figure, in its representation of things or objects, either magnifies or diminishes them beyond or below their proper limits: it is common in all languages, and is of frequent occurrence in the Scripture.

Thus, things, which are very lofty, are said to reach up to heaven. Deut. i. 28. ix. 1. Psal. cvii. 26. So, things which are beyond the reach or capacity of man, are said to be in heaven, in the deep, or beyond the sea, Deut. xxx. 12. Rom. x. 6, 7. So, a great quantity or number is commonly expressed by the sand of the sea, the dust of the earth, and the stars of heaven, Gen. xiii. 16. xli. 49. Judges vii. 12. 1 Sam. xiii. 5. 1 Kings iv. 29. 2 Chron. i. 9. Jer. xv. 8. Heb. xi. 12. In like manner, we meet, in Num. xiii. 33. with smaller than grasshoppers, to denote extreme diminutiveness: 2 Sam. i. 23. swifter than eagles, to intimate extreme celerity. Judges v. 4. the earth trembled, verse 5, the mountains melted. 1 Kings i. 40. the earth rent. Psal. vi. 6. I make my bed to swim. Psal. cxix. 136. rivers of tears run down mine eyes. So we read of angels' food, Psal. lxxviii. 25. The face of an angel, in Acts vi. 15.; the tongue of an angel, in 1 Cor. xiii. 1. See also Gal. i. 8. and iv. 14. In Ezek. xxi. 6. we read, Sigh with the breaking of thy loins, that is, most deeply. So in Luke xix. 40. we read that the stones would cry out, and in verse 44. They shall not leave in thee one stone upon another; that is, there shall be a total desolation.¹

IV. Paronomasia.

PARONOMASIA is the name given to an expression, which contains two words, that are purposely chosen, so that they may resemble each other in sound, while they may differ in sense. It is a very favourite figure of rhetoric among the Hebrews, and is common among the oriental languages in general. Paronomasia differs from our rhyme, inasmuch as the words which constitute it do not necessarily stand at the end of parallelisms or strophes, but may be placed together in any part of a sentence, and are found in prose as well as in poetry. Professor Stuart² has given numerous examples of this figure in the Old Testament, which the limits of this work do not permit us to insert. The paronomasia also occurs very frequently in the New Testament, especially in the writings of Saint Paul, where it seems to be sometimes unpremeditated, and sometimes to be the result of design on the part of the writer. Professor Winer, to whom we are indebted for this paragraph, divides the paronomasia into two kinds, viz.:—

1. Where words of a like sound are employed in the same sentence, without regard to their sense.

In Rom. i. 29. we have πορνεία, πονηρία—φθόνος, φθόνος:—31. αυσεβείας, ασεβείας—1 Cor. ii. 13. ἐν δίδακτοῖς πνεύματος, πνευματικῶς πνευματικῶς συγκρινόμενοι—Luke xxi. 11. καὶ λίθοι καὶ λοιμοὶ ἰσχύονται. These instances of paronomasia cannot be equivalently expressed in English.

In order to form a paronomasia of this kind, unusual words or forms of words are sometimes employed: as in Gal. v. 7. πεισθήσεται—ἡ πεισμονή.

2. Where the words are not only the same in sound, but there is also a resemblance or antithesis in the sense. Thus:

Gal. iv. 17. Ζηλοῦσιν ἑαυτοὺς... ἵνα αὐτοὺς ζηλοῦσι.—They ZEALOUSLY AFFECT you... that ye might (ZEALOUSLY) affect them; that is, they earnestly desire to draw you over to their party,—that you may be devoted to their interests.

Rom. v. 19. Ὡςπερ διὰ τῆς παρανομίας τοῦ ἑνὸς ἀνθρώπου ἀμαρτωλοὶ κακίστην ἔργον οἱ πολλοί, οὕτως καὶ διὰ τῆς ὑπακοῆς:—As by one man's DISOBEDIENCE many (or multitudes) were made sinners, so by the OBEEDIENCE of one shall many (or multitudes) be made righteous.

Other instances of this kind of paronomasia occur in Phil. iii. 2. 3. 2 Cor. iv. 8. 2 Cor. v. 4. 2 Thess. iii. 11. Philem. 10. 20. Acts viii. 20. 1 Cor. iii. 17. vi. 2. xi. 29. 31. 2 Cor. x. 2. (Gr.)

In this manner a paronomasia is sometimes formed by repeating the same word in a different sense; as in Matt. viii. 22. Let the DEAD bury their dead. See the proper import of this passage explained in page 356. supra

Similar instances of paronomasia occur in the Greek Apocryphal writings of the Old Testament. Compare particularly Dan. xiii. 54, 55.³

General Observations for better understanding the Compositions of the Sacred Poets.

I. It is obvious to the most cursory reader of the Holy Scriptures, that among the books of the Old Testament there is such an apparent diversity in style, as sufficiently discovers which of them are to be considered as poetical, and which are to be regarded as prose compositions. While the historical books and legislative writings of Moses are evidently prosaic in their composition, the book of Job, the Psalms of David, the Song of Solomon, the Lamentations of Jeremiah, a great part of the prophetic writings, and several passages occasionally scattered through the historical books, bear the most plain and distinguishing marks of poetical writing.¹ We can have no reason to doubt that these were originally written in verse, or in some kind of measured numbers; though, as the ancient pronunciation of the Hebrew language is now lost, we can only very imperfectly ascertain the nature of the Hebrew verse.

From the manner, however, in which Josephus, Origen, and Jerome have spoken of the Hebrew poetry, it should seem that in their time its beauty and rules were well known. Josephus repeatedly affirms² that the songs composed by Moses are in heroic verse, and that David composed several sorts of verses and songs, odes and hymns, in honour of God: some of which were in trimeters or verses of three metrical feet, and others in pentameters or verses of five metrical feet. Origen and Eusebius are said to have espoused the same notion: and Jerome, probably influenced by the manner in which he found the poetical parts of the Old Testament exhibited in the manuscripts of the Septuagint version, fancied that he perceived iambic, alcaic, and sapphic verses in the Psalms, similar to those occurring in the works of Pindar and Horace: hexameters and pentameters in the songs of Deuteronomy and Isaiah, the book of Job, and those of Solomon; and sapphic verses in the Lamentations of Jeremiah.³ Among modern writers, the nature and genius of Hebrew poetry have been warmly contested;⁴ but by no one have these subjects been illustrated with more elegance and ability than by the eminently learned Bishop of London, Dr. Robert Lowth. In the third of his justly admired Lectures on Hebrew Poetry,⁵ he has collected much and very valuable information concerning the much litigated question, respecting the nature of Hebrew metre; but many of his arguments are successfully controverted by Bishop Jebb, in his Sacred Literature;⁶ to which work, and to Bishop Lowth's Lectures, the reader is necessarily referred, as the discussion of this very difficult question would extend this chapter to an inordinate length. The construction, characteristics, and different kinds of Hebrew Poetry, including also the poetical style of the New Testament, are the subjects now to be considered: and our account of them is chiefly abridged from the Lectures of Bishop Lowth, and from his preliminary dissertation prefixed to his version of the prophet Isaiah, together with Bishop Jebb's elegant and instructive volume above cited.

The peculiar excellence of the HEBREW POETRY will appear when we consider that its origin and earliest application have been clearly traced to the service of religion. To celebrate in hymns and songs the praises of Jehovah—to decorate the worship of the Most High with all the charms and graces of harmony—to give force and energy to the devout affections—was the sublime employment of the sacred muses: and it is more than probable, that the very early use of sacred music in the public worship of the Hebrews, contributed not a little to the peculiar character of their poetry, and might impart to it that appropriate form, which, though chiefly adapted to this particular purpose, it nevertheless preserves on every other occasion. In the Old Testament we have ample evidence that music and poetry were cultivated from the earliest ages among the Hebrews. In the days of the Judges, mention is made of the schools or colleges of the prophets; in which the candidates for the prophetic office, under the direction of some superior prophet, being altogether removed from intercourse with the world, devoted themselves entirely to the exercises and study of religion: and though the sacred history affords us but little information concerning their institutes and discipline, yet it is manifest from 1 Sam. x. 5—10. and xix. 20—24., that a principal part of their occupation consisted in celebrating the praises of Jehovah in hymns and poetry, with choral chants accompanied with various musical instruments. But it was during the reign of David that music and poetry were carried to the greatest perfection. For the service of the tabernacle he appointed four thousand Levites, divided into twenty-four courses, and marshalled under several leaders, whose sole business it was to sing hymns, and to perform instrumental music in the public worship. Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun were the chief directors of the music, and from the titles of some of the psalms, we may also infer that they were excellent composers of hymns

⁴ Carpzov (Introduct. ad Libros Canonicos Vet. Test. pars ii. pp. 28, 29.) has given a list of ancient and modern writers who have treated on Hebrew Poetry: and in pp. 2—27. he has noticed the various discordant opinions on this topic. The hypothesis of Bishop Hare on Hebrew metre was refuted by Bishop Lowth at the end of his lectures, and also in his "Larger Confulatun," published in 1766, in 8vo. in answer to Dr. Edwards's Latin Letter in defence of Hare's system, published in the preceding year. The general opinion of the learned world has coincided with the arguments of Lowth.

1801, under the title of Oriental Dialogues. Both these publications are distinguished by that bold criticism, which for the last fifty or sixty years has characterized too many of those German divines, to whose researches in other respects biblical literature is so largely indebted. Sir William Jones has a few observations on Hebrew metres in his Poesos Asiaticæ Comment. cap. ii. (Works, vi. pp. 22—59.) See also "An Essay on Hebrew Poetry, Ancient and Modern. By Philip Sarchi, LL.D. London, 1824;" the latter portion of the volume, which treats on modern Hebrew poetry, is both curious and interesting. Professor Pareau has also given an abstract of the most material observations on Hebrew Poetry, in his Institutio Interpretis Veteris Testamenti, pp. 426—457.

or sacred poems. In the first book of Chronicles (ch. xxv.) we have an account of the institutions of David: which were more costly, splendid, and magnificent than any that ever obtained in the public service of other nations.

II. According to Bishop Lowth, there are four principal CHARACTERISTICS OF HEBREW POETRY, viz.—1. The acrostical or alphabetical commencement of lines or stanzas;—2. The admission of foreign words and certain particles, which seldom occur in prose composition, and which thus form a distinct poetical dialect;—3. Its sententious, figurative, and sublime expressions; and, 4. Parallelism, the nature of which is fully illustrated in a subsequent page. But the existence of the first three of these characteristics has been disproved by Bishop Jebb; who observes, that the grand characteristic of Hebrew poetry does not appear to belong peculiarly to the original language of the Old Testament, as contradistinguished from that of the New. “It is not the acrostical, or regularly alphabetical, commencement of lines or stanzas; for this occurs but in twelve poems of the Old Testament: it is not the introduction of foreign words, and of what grammarians call the paragogic or redundant particles; for these licenses, though frequent, are by no means universal, in the poetical books of Scripture; and they are occasionally admitted in passages merely historical and prosaic: it is not the rhyming termination of lines; for no trace of this artifice is discoverable in the alphabetical poems, the lines or stanzas of which are defined with infallible precision; and every attempt to force it on the text, has been accompanied by the most licentious mutilation of Scripture: and finally, this grand characteristic is not the adoption of metre, properly so called, and analogous to the metre of the heathen classics; for the efforts of the learned, to discover such metre in any one poem of the Hebrews, have universally failed; and while we are morally certain, that even, though it were known and employed by the Jews, while their language was a living one, it is quite beyond recovery in the dead and unpronounceable state of that language; there are also strong reasons for believing, that, even in the most flourishing state of their literature, the Hebrew poets never used this declaration.

“Again, it is most certain, that the proper characteristic of Hebrew poetry is not elation, grandeur, or sublimity, either of thought or diction. In these qualities, indeed, a large portion of the poetical Scriptures is not only distinguished, but unrivalled: but there are also many compositions in the Old Testament, indisputably poetical, which, in thought and expression, do not rise above the ordinary tone of just and clear conceptions, calmly, yet pointedly delivered.”

The grand, and, indeed, the sole characteristic of Hebrew Poetry, is what Bishop Lowth entitles PARALLELISM, that is, a certain equality, resemblance, or relationship, between the members of each period; so that in two lines, or members of the same period, things shall answer to things, and words to words, as if fitted to each other by a kind of rule or measure. Such is the general strain of the Hebrew poetry; instances of which occur in almost every part of the Old Testament, particularly in the ninety-sixth psalm.

It is in a great measure owing to this form of composition that our admirable authorized version, though executed in prose, retains so much of a poetical cast; for, that version being strictly word for word after the original, the form and order of the original sentences are preserved; which, by this artificial structure, this regular alternation and correspondence of parts, makes the ear sensible of a departure from the common style and tone of prose.

The origin of this form of poetical composition among the Hebrews, Bishop Lowth has satisfactorily deduced from the manner in which they were accustomed to sing or chant their sacred hymns. They were accompanied with music, and were alternately sung by opposite choirs: sometimes one choir performed the hymn itself, while the other sang a particular distich, which was regularly interposed at stated intervals. In this manner we learn that Moses with the Israelites chanted the ode at the Red Sea (Exod. xv. 20, 21.); and the same order is observable in some of the psalms which are composed in this form. On some occasions, however, the musical performance was differently conducted, one of the choirs singing a single verse to the other, while the other constantly added a verse in some respect correspondent. Of this the following distich is an example:—

Sing praises to Jehovah, for he is good,
Because his mercy endureth for ever. Psal. cxxxvi. 1.

¹ Bp. Jebb's Sacred Literature, pp. 4, 5.

Which Ezra informs us (iii. 10, 11.) was sung by the priests and Levites in alternate choirs, “after the ordinance of David, king of Israel;” as indeed may be collected from the hundred and thirty-sixth psalm itself, in which the latter verse sung by the latter choir forms a perpetual epode. Of the same nature is the song of the women concerning Saul and David (1 Sam. xviii. 7.); and in the very same manner does Isaiah describe the seraphim as chanting the praises of Jehovah—“they cried one to another,” that is, alternately, Holy, holy, holy, Jehovah, God of hosts!

The whole earth is filled with his glory! Isa. vi. 3.

But the fullest example, perhaps, of this style of composition is to be found in the twenty-fourth psalm, composed on occasion of the induction of the ark to Mount Zion: the mode of performing which is particularly illustrated by Bishop Lowth,² and must have had a most noble and impressive effect.

In determining the length of his lines, Bishop Lowth considers only that relation and proportion of one verse to another which arises from the correspondence of terms, and from the form of construction, whence results a rhythmus of propositions, and a harmony of sentences. From this correspondence of the verses one with another, arises a certain relation also between the composition of the verses, and the composition of the sentences, so that generally periods coincide with stanzas, members with verses, and pauses of the one with pauses of the other. This correspondence is called parallelism, the corresponding lines are called parallel lines, and the words or phrases answering one to another in the corresponding lines, parallel terms.

A single example will illustrate the above definition of parallelism:—In Luke i. 52, 53. we read, He (God) hath put down the mighty from their seats, and exalted them of low degree. He hath filled the hungry with good things, and the rich he hath sent empty away. In this passage the same thing is expressed, viz. that God changes the conditions of men: and this same thing is also expressed in corresponding members that represent it in various points of view. Thus the Almighty changes adversity into prosperity, and prosperity into adversity. The words answer to each other, the mighty—those of low degree; put down—exalted; the hungry (or poor)—the rich; filled with good things—sent empty away. Lastly, the things or subjects stated answer to each other by a contrast sufficiently obvious; the former (the powerful and rich) are depressed; the latter (the humble and poor) are exalted.

The nature of parallelism, thus defined and illustrated, is sometimes so evident as to strike even a careless reader, and sometimes so subtle and obscure as to require considerable practice, and some familiarity with the system, in order to distribute the pauses and develop the different members of the sentences in probable order and connection. Thus, much doubt has arisen not only as to what books, but as to what parts of books, are to be accounted poetical. Sometimes, according to Bishop Jebb, it is continuous and unmixed, as in the Psalms, Proverbs, and Canticles; sometimes it characterizes the main body of a work with a prosaic introduction and conclusion, as in the book of Job; sometimes it predominates throughout a whole book with an occasional mixture of prose, as in most of the prophets; sometimes the general texture is prose, with an occasional mixture of verses, as in the historical books, and the book of Ecclesiastes.

This parallelism has hitherto been confined principally to the poetical books of the Old Testament; and to them chiefly, in the first edition of this work, the author had restricted it. Bishop Jebb, however, has demonstrated that this grand characteristic of Hebrew poetry pervades the New Testament as well as the Old.

The poetical parallelism has much variety and many gradations, being sometimes more accurate and manifest, sometimes more vague and obscure: it may, however, on the whole, be said to consist of four species, viz. Parallel Lines Gradational,³ Parallel Lines Antithetic, Parallel Lines Synthetic, and Parallel Lines Introverted.

² Lecture xxvii. Bishop Horsley, in his translation of the book of Psalms, has divided them so as to exhibit the construction of those divine compositions to the best possible advantage.

³ Bishop Lowth has ranged the different kinds of parallelism under three classes only, viz.: parallelism synonymous, parallelism antithetic, and parallelism synthetic. The last two terms, it will be perceived, we have retained, and in lieu of parallelism synonymous we have adopted the term parallel lines gradational. Bishop Jebb has assigned satisfactory reasons for changing the bishop's phraseology. According to Lowth, parallel lines synonymous are those which correspond one to another by expressing the same sense

1. PARALLEL LINES GRADATIONAL are those in which the second or responsive clause so diversifies the preceding clause, as generally to rise above it, sometimes by a descending scale in the value of the related terms and periods, but in all cases with a marked distinction of meaning. 'This species of parallelism is the most frequent of all: it prevails chiefly in the shorter poems, in many of the psalms, and very frequently in the prophecies of Isaiah. Three or four instances will suffice to show the nature of parallel lines gradational. The first example shall be taken from the first psalm.

O the happiness of that man
Who hath not walked in the counsel of the ungodly;
And hath not stood in the way of sinners;
And hath not sat in the seat of the scornful. Psalm i. 1.

"The exclamation with which the psalm opens, belongs equally to each line of the succeeding triplet. In the triplet itself, each line consists of three members; and the lines gradually rise, one above the other, not merely in their general sense, but specially throughout their corresponding members. To walk, implies no more than casual intercourse; to stand, closer intimacy; to sit, fixed and permanent connection; the counsel, the ordinary place of meeting, or public resort; the way, the select and chosen footpath; the seat, the habitual and final resting place; the ungodly, negatively wicked; sinners, positively wicked; the scornful, scoffers at the very name or notion of piety and goodness."

The following passages will supply additional examples:—

Who shall ascend the mountain of Jehovah?
And who shall stand within his holy place?
The clean of hands, and the pure in heart.

Psalm xxiv. 3, 4.

"To ascend marks progress; to stand, stability and confirmation: the mountain of Jehovah, the site of the divine sanctuary; his holy place, the sanctuary itself; and, in correspondence with the advance of the two lines which form the first couplet, there is an advance in the members of the third line: the clean of hands; and the pure in heart: the clean of hands, shall ascend the mountain of Jehovah: the pure in heart, shall stand within his holy place."

O Jehovah, in thy strength the king shall rejoice;
And in thy salvation, how greatly shall he exult!
The desire of his heart thou hast granted him;
And the request of his lips thou hast not denied.

Psalm xxi. 1, 2.

"The gradation of member above member, and line above line, in each couplet of this stanza, is undeniable: 'salvation' is an advance upon 'strength'; and 'how greatly shall he exult,' an advance upon 'He shall rejoice'; again, 'the request of the lips,' is something beyond 'the desire of the heart';—it is desire brought into act. The gradation in the last members of the last two lines may not be equally obvious; but it is by no means certain: 'thou hast granted;—thou hast not denied.' The negative form is here much stronger than the positive; for it is a received canon of biblical philology, that verbs of negation, or what amounts to the same thing, adverbs of negation prefixed to verbs, have, in such cases, the force of expressing the opposite affirmative with peculiar emphasis:—for example, The Lord will not hold him guiltless who taketh his name in vain: that is, WILL ASSUREDLY HOLD HIM GUILTY. Exod. xx. 7."

The prophetic muse is no less elegant and correct. Isaiah especially abounds in beautiful instances of this mode of gradation. Thus he says,

Seek ye Jehovah, while he may be found
Call ye upon him, while he is near;
Let the wicked forsake his way;
And the unrighteous man his thoughts;
And let him return to Jehovah, and he will compassionate him;
And unto our God, for he aboundeth in forgiveness.

Isa. lv. 6, 7.

"In the first line, men are invited to seek Jehovah, not knowing where he is, and on the bare intelligence that he may be found; in the second line, having found Jehovah, they are encouraged to call upon him by the assurance that he is near. In the third line, the wicked, the positive, and presumptuous sinner is warned to forsake his way, his habitual course of iniquity; in the fourth line, the unrighteous, the negatively wicked, is called to renounce the very thought of sinning. While in the last line, the appropriate and encouraging title our God, is substituted for the awful name of Jehovah; and simple compassion is heightened into overflowing mercy and forgiveness."

In Isa. li. 1. 4. 7. there is another singularly fine example of moral gradation, which is admirably illustrated by Bishop Jebb, to whose "Sacred Literature" the reader is referred. But excellent as Isaiah confessedly is, he is not unrivalled in this kind of composition: the other prophets contain abundant examples; we shall, however, only adduce two instances. The first, which is from Hosea, is exquisitely pathetic, and will speak for itself:—

How shall I give thee up, O Ephraim?
Abandon thee, O Israel?
How shall I make thee as Admah,
Place thee in the condition of Zeboim?

ment in different but nearly equivalent terms. But Bp. Jebb proves, from an examination of the bishop's examples, that this definition does not hold good; he therefore proposes that of cognate parallels as preferably applicable to this kind of parallels. (Sacred Literature, pp. 31–50.) A learned critic, however, has suggested the term gradational parallelism, as being most expressive, and also most applicable to the examples adduced by these eminent prelates. (British Critic for 1830. vol. xiv. pp. 583, 586.) We have, therefore, adopted this term in the present chapter. Bp. Jebb had further considered the introverted parallel as a variety of the Hebrew parallelism; but as the same critic has assigned good reasons for constituting it a distinct class, we have availed ourselves of his authority, and have accordingly adopted it.

2 Ibid. pp. 37, 38.

Vol. I.

3 Ibid. p. 40.

4 Ibid. pp. 46–49.

My heart is turned upon me;
My bowels yearn all together;
I will not execute the fury of mine anger;
I will not return to make destruction of Ephraim;
For God I am, and not man;
The Holy One in the midst of thee, although I am no frequenter of cities. Hosea xi. 9, 9. (Hp. Horsley's Translation.)

The other passage is from Joel, and is highly animated.

Like mighty men shall they rush on;
Like warriors shall they mount upon the wall;
And, every one in his way, shall they march;
And they shall not turn aside from their path.

Joel ii. 7.

The prophet is denouncing a terrible judgment on the land of Judah, by the devastation of locusts; and all naturalists and travellers, who have witnessed the desolation caused by those destructive insects, attest and confirm the fidelity of Joel's description of their progress and ravages.

2. PARALLEL LINES ANTITHETIC are those, in which two lines correspond one with another, by an opposition of terms and sentiments; when the second is contrasted with the first, sometimes in expressions, sometimes in sense only. This is not confined to any particular form. Accordingly the degrees of antithesis are various, from an exact contraposition of word to word, sentiment to sentiment, singulars to singulars, plurals to plurals, down to a general disparity, with something of a contrariety in the two propositions.

This species of parallelism is of less frequent occurrence in the prophetic poems of the Old Testament, especially those which are elevated in the style, and more connected in the parts; but it is admirably adapted to adages, aphorisms, proverbs, and detached sentences. Much, indeed, of the elegance, acuteness, and force, of a great number of the proverbs of Solomon, arises from the antithetic form, the opposition of diction, and sentiment, as in the following examples:—

A wise son rejoiceth his father;
But a foolish son is the grief of his mother.

Prov. x. 1.

Here every word has its opposite, the terms father and mother being relatively opposite;

The memory of the just is a blessing;
But the name of the wicked shall rot.

Prov. x. 7.

In this instance there are only two antithetic terms, for memory and name are synonymous. See also Prov. xi. 21. xvi. 32. and xxix. 25.

But, though the antithetic parallel be of comparatively rare occurrence in the superior kinds of Hebrew poetry, it is not inconsistent with them. Thus, we have a beautiful instance of it in the thanksgiving ode of Hannah, 1 Sam. ii. 4.—7., and in some of the Psalms, as in Psalm xx. 7, 8. xxx. 5. and xxxvii. 10, 11. Isaiah, also, by means of it, without departing from his usual dignity, greatly increases the beauty of his composition.

For the mountains shall be removed;
And the hills shall be overthrown;
But my kindness from thee shall not be removed;
And the covenant of my peace shall not be overthrown.

Isa. liv. 10.

See likewise Isa. liv. 7, 8. ix. 10. and lxx. 13, 14.

3. PARALLEL LINES SYNTHETIC or CONSTRUCTIVE are those in which the parallelism consists only in the similar form of construction: in which word does not answer to word, and sentence to sentence, as equivalent or opposite; but there is a correspondence and equality between the different propositions, in respect of the shape and turn of the whole sentence, and of the constructive parts; such as noun answering to noun, verb to verb, member to member, negative to negative, interrogative to interrogative. This species of parallelism includes such as do not come within the two former classes. Accordingly, Bishop Lowth remarks, that the variety of this form is very great; the parallelism being sometimes more, sometimes less exact, and sometimes hardly at all apparent. The nineteenth psalm will furnish a beautiful instance of parallel lines constructive:—

The law of JEHOVAH is perfect, restoring the soul;
The testimony of JEHOVAH is sure, making wise the simple;
The precepts of JEHOVAH are right, rejoicing the heart;
The commandment of JEHOVAH is clear, enlightening the eyes;
The fear of JEHOVAH is pure, enduring for ever;
The judgments of JEHOVAH are truth, they are just altogether,
More desirable than gold, or than much fine gold,
And sweeter than honey, or the dropping of honey-combs.

Psal. xix. 7–11.

Additional instances of the constructive parallelism occur in Psalm cxlviii. 7–13. Job xii. 13–16. Isa. xiv. 4–9. and lviii. 5–8.

Respecting the three preceding species of parallelism, Bishop Jebb remarks that, separately, "each kind admits many subordinate varieties, and that, in combinations of verses, the several kinds are perpetually intermingled; cir cumstances which at once enliven and beautify the composition, and frequently give peculiar distinctness and precision to the train of thought." He has illustrated this observation by some instances of such subordinate varieties. The six following are taken partly from his volume, and partly from the nineteenth of Bishop Lowth's Lectures on Hebrew Poetry. Thus :

(1.) Sometimes the lines are bi-membral; that is, they consist each of double members, or two propositions (or sentiments, as Lowth terms them).—For example,

The nations raged; the kingdoms were moved;
He uttered a voice; the earth was dissolved;
Be still, and know that I am God;
I will be exalted in the nations; I will be exalted in the earth.
Psal. xlv. 6. 10.

Bow thy heavens, O JEHOVAH, and descend;
Touch the mountains, and they shall smoke;
Dart forth thy lightning, and scatter them;
Shoot out thine arrows, and destroy them.
Psal. cxliv. 5. 6.

Isaiah has two striking instances of these bi-membral lines.

When thou passest through waters, I am with thee;
And through rivers, they shall not overwhelm thee;
When thou walkest in the fire, thou shalt not be scorched;
And the flame shall not cleave to thee.
Isa. xliii. 2.

And they shall build houses, and shall inhabit them;
And they shall plant vineyards, and shall eat the fruit thereof;
They shall not build, and another inhabit;
They shall not plant, and another eat.
Isa. lxxv. 21, 22.

(2.) "Parallels are sometimes formed by a repetition of part of the first sentence :

My voice is unto God, and I cry aloud;
My voice unto God, and he will hearken unto me:
I will remember the works of Jehovah;
Yea, I will remember thy works of old:—
The waters saw thee, O God;
The waters saw thee; they were seized with anguish.
Psal. lxxviii. 1. II. 16.

(3.) "Sometimes, in the latter line, a part is to be supplied from the former, to complete the sentence:—

The mighty dead tremble from beneath:
The waters, and they that dwell therein.
Job xxvi. 5.

(4.) "There are parallel triplets; where three lines correspond together, and form a kind of stanza; of which, however, only two lines are commonly synonymous:—

The wicked shall see it, and it shall grieve him;
He shall gnash with his teeth and pine away;
The desire of the wicked shall perish.
Psal. cxii. 10."

Another instance of parallel triplets occurs in Job iii. 4., and Micah vi. 15.

(5.) "There are parallels consisting of four lines; two distichs being so connected together by sound and construction, as to make one stanza :

The ox knoweth his owner;
And the ass the crib of his lord;
But Israel does not know;
My people doth not consider.
Isa. i. 3. See also Psal. xxvii. 1, 2.

In stanzas of four lines, sometimes the parallel lines answer to one another, alternately; the first to the third, and the second to the fourth:—

As the heavens are high above the earth
So high is his goodness over them that fear him:
As remote as the east is from the west;
So far hath he removed from us our transgressions.
Psal. ciii. 11, 12."

Sometimes, however, in the alternate quatrain, by a peculiar artifice in the distribution of the sentences, the third line forms a continuous sense with the first, and the fourth with the second:—

From the heavens JEHOVAH looketh down:
He seeth all the children of men;
From the seat of his rest he contemplateth
All the inhabitants of the earth.
Psal. xxxiii. 13, 14.

Isaiah with great elegance uses this form of composition:—

For thy husband is thy Maker;
JEHOVAH God of hosts is his name:
And thy Redeemer is the Holy One of Israel;
The God of the whole earth shall he be called.
Isa. liv. 5.

(6.) Some periods also may be considered as forming stanzas of five lines; in which the odd line or member usually either comes in between two distichs; or the line that is not parallel is generally placed between the two distichs; or, after two distichs makes a full close :

Who is wise, and will understand these things?
Prudent, and will know them?
For right are the ways of JEHOVAH:
And the just shall walk in them:
And the disobedient shall fall therein.
Hos. xiv. 9.

Like as a lion growleth,
Even the young lion over his prey;
Though the whole company of shepherds be called together against him:
At their voice he will not be terrified,
Nor at their tumult will he be humbled.
Isa. xxxi. 4.

Who established the word of his servant:
And accomplisheth the counsel of his messenger;
Who saith to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be inhabited,
And to the cities of Judah, Ye shall be built;
And her desolate places I will restore.
Isa. xlv. 26.

The preceding are the chief varieties of the parallel lines, gradational, antithetic, and constructive: a few others of less note are discussed both by Bishops Lowth and Jebb; for which the reader is necessarily referred to their respective works. We now proceed to notice,

4. PARALLEL LINES INTROVERTED.—These are stanzas so constructed, that, whatever be the number of lines, the first line shall be parallel with the last; the second with the penultimate, or last but one; and so throughout, in an order that looks inward, or, to borrow a military phrase, from flanks to centre. This may be called the introverted parallelism.

Bishop Jebb has illustrated this definition with several apposite examples, from which we have selected the three following.

My son, if thy heart be wise;
My heart also shall rejoice;
Yea, my reins shall rejoice:
When thy lips speak right things.
Prov. xxiii. 15, 16.

"And it shall come to pass in that day;
JEHOVAH shall make a gathering of his fruit
From the flood of the river:
To the stream of Egypt:
And ye shall be gleaned up, one by one;
O ye sons of Israel.

"And it shall come to pass in that day;
The great trumpet shall be sounded;
And those shall come, who were perishing in the land of Assyria;
And who were dispersed in the land of Egypt;
And they shall bow themselves down before Jehovah;
In the holy mountain, in Jerusalem.
Isaiah xxvii. 12, 13.

"In these two stanzas of Isaiah, figuratively, in the first, and literally in the second, is predicted the return of the Jews from their several dispersions. The first line of each stanza is parallel with the sixth; the second with the fifth; and the third with the fourth; also on comparing the stanzas one with another, it is manifest, that they are constructed with the utmost precision of mutual correspondence; clause harmonizing with clause, and line respectively with line; the first line of the first stanza with the first line of the second, and so throughout."

"The idols of the heathen are silver and gold:
The work of men's hand;
They have mouths, but they speak not;
They have eyes, but they see not;
They have ears, but they hear not;
Neither is there any breath in their mouths;
They who make them are like unto them;
So are all they who put their trust in them.
Psal. cxxxv. 15—18."

The parallelisms here marked are very accurate. In the first line of this example we have the idolatrous heathen;—in the eighth, those who put their trust in idols;—in the second line, the fabrication;—in the seventh, the fabricators;—in the third line, mouths without articulation;—in the sixth, mouths without breath;—in the fourth line, eyes without vision; and, in the fifth line, ears without the sense of hearing.

The parallelism of the extreme members, Bishop Jebb proceeds to state, may be rendered yet more evident, by reducing the passage into two quatrains; thus:

The idols of the heathen are silver and gold;
The work of men's hand;
They who make them are like unto them;
So are all they who put their trust in them.

They have mouths, but they speak not;
They have eyes, but they see not;
They have ears, but they hear not;
Neither is there any breath in their mouths."

III. Such is the nature, and such are the species, of the parallelisms which are variously distributed throughout the Old Testament. With the exception of a few partial failures, it is worthy of remark, that the character and complexion of Hebrew poetry have been very competently preserved in that body of Greek translations, composed at different times, by different persons, and known under the name of the Septuagint version. Nor should it be omitted, that the Hebraic parallelism occurs also, with much variety, in the Apocrypha: the book of Ecclesiasticus, for example, is composed of pure parallelisms: the book of Wisdom, too, affords fine specimens of this manner, though it is commonly overlaid by the exuberant and vicious rhetoric of the Alexandrine Platonists; while, not to mention other parts of the Apocryphal writings, in Tobit and the books of Maccabees there are examples both of lyric and didactic poetry, clothed in parallelisms which will hardly shrink from comparison with several in the genuine Hebrew Scriptures. One other fact remains: namely, that in the sententious formule of the Rabbinical writers, the manner of Hebrew poetry is frequently observed, with much accuracy, though with a manifest declension of spirit.¹

Such being the fact, we are authorized by analogy to expect a similar parallelism in the New Testament, particularly when the nature of that portion of the Holy Scriptures is considered. It is a work supplementary to and perfective of the Old Testament; composed under the same guidance that superintended the composition of the latter; written by native Jews, Hebrews of the Hebrews,—by men whose minds were moulded in the form of their own Sacred Writings, and whose sole stock of literature (with the exception of Paul, and probably also of Luke and James) was comprised in those very writings. Now, it is improbable in the extreme, that such men, when they came to write such a work, should, without any assignable motive, and in direct opposition to all other religious teachers of their nation, have estranged themselves from a manner, so pervading the noblest parts of the Hebrew Scriptures, as the sententious parallelism. But we are not left to analogical reasoning. The Greek style of the New Testament leads us to expect a construction similar to that which we find in the Old. The New Testament, as we have already shown,² is not written in what is termed strictly classical Greek, but in a style of the same degree of purity as the Greek which was spoken in Macedonia, and that in which Polybius wrote his Roman History. From the intermixture of Oriental idioms and expressions with those which are properly Greek, the language of the New Testament has been termed Hellenistic or Hebraic Greek. The difference in style and manner which subsists between the writers of the New Testament and the Greek classic authors is most strongly marked: and this difference is not confined to single words and combination of words, but pervades the whole structure of the composition: and in frequent instances, a poetical manner is observable, which not only is not known, but would not be tolerated, in any modern production, purporting to be prose. This poetical style has been noticed briefly by Boecler, Ernesti, Michaelis, Schleusner, Dr. Campbell, and other critics, and also by the author of this work, in the first edition; but none of these writers were aware, to how great an extent it pervades the New Testament. It was reserved for Bishop Jebb, to whose "Sacred Literature" this chapter is so deeply indebted, to develop the existence of the poetical parallelism in the New Testament, and to place its numerous beauties in a point of view equally novel and delightful to the biblical student.

The proofs of the existence of the poetical dialect in the New Testament, are disposed by this critic under the following four divisions, viz.:—1. Simple and direct quotations in the New Testament, of single passages from the poetical parts of the Old Testament;—2. Quotations of a more complex kind, when fragments are combined from different parts of the poetical Scriptures, and wrought up into one connected whole; and, 3. Quotations mingled with original matter. We shall give one or two examples of each of these proofs.

1. Simple and direct Quotations of single passages from the poetical parts of the Old Testament, in which the parallelism has been preserved by the writers of the New Testament.

καὶ σὺ Βηθλέεμ, γῆ Ιουδα, οὐδὲ μὴν ἐλκήσῃσιν ἐν τοῖς ὕμνοις σου ὡς σὺ γὰρ ἐξέλιυσται τὸν ἄνθρωπον, ἐν τῇ πόλει σου τὸν ἄνθρωπον τὸν Ἰσραήλ.

¹ Sacred Literature, p. 76. Bp. Jebb has illustrated the remarks in the text by numerous apposite examples from the apocryphal and rabbinical writings, for which the reader is referred to his work, pp. 84–90.

² See pp. 194–196. of this volume, for an account of the Greek style of the New Testament.

And thou, Bethlehem, territory of Judah,
Art by no means least among the captains of Judah.
For from thee shall come forth a leader,
Who will guide my people Israel. Matt. ii. 6.

ὡς ἐγὼ, οὐκ ἐλπίσθησιν οὐδὲν ἐν ὑμῖν καὶ σὺ γὰρ ἐξέλιυσται τὸν ἄνθρωπον,
ἐν τῇ πόλει σου τὸν ἄνθρωπον τὸν Ἰσραήλ.

My son, despise not thou the chastening of the Lord,
Nor faint when thou art rebuked by him:
For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth,
But scourgeth every son whom he receiveth.

Heb. xii. 5, 6.

This passage is taken from Proverbs iii. 11, 12: thus rendered in our authorized translation:—

My son, despise not the chastening of the Lord:
Neither be weary of his correction:
For whom the Lord loveth, he correcteth;
Even as a father the son in whom he delighteth.

In this last line the parallelism is completely spoiled. But Hp. Jebb shows, that Saint Paul's reading is afforded without altering a letter in the Hebrew text, by a slight departure from the Masoretic punctuation. The original passage in Prov. iii. 11, 12, therefore, may be thus rendered in strict conformity with the apostle.

The chastening of JEHOVAH, my son, do not despise;
Neither be weary at his rebuking;
For, whom JEHOVAH loveth, he chasteneth,
But scourgeth the son in whom he delighteth.

In the corrected version of this quatrain, the parallelism is not only preserved, but there is also a beautiful climax in the sense: both of which are excellently illustrated by Hp. Jebb.³

2. Quotations of a more complex kind, in which fragments are combined from different parts of the Poetical Scriptures, and wrought up into one connected or consistent whole.

Of this class of quotations, the following is a short but satisfactory specimen:

ὁ οἶκος μου, οἶκος προσευχῆς ἀληθινῆς πατρὶ τοῖς ἰσραηλῖταις ὅμοιος δὲ ἐποίησεν αὐτὸν σπηλαῖον ληστῶν.

My house shall be called the house of prayer for all the nations;
But ye have made it a den of thieves. Mark xi. 17.

This antithetical couplet is composed of two independent passages, very remotely connected in their subject matter; of which the first stands in the Septuagint version of Isaiah lvi. 57. exactly as it is given above from Saint Mark's Gospel. The substance of the second line occurs in the prophet Jeremiah. (vii. 11.)

μη σπηλαῖον ληστῶν ὁ οἶκος μου;
Is my house a den of thieves?⁴

ὡς βάθος σπλάνων, καὶ σοφίας, καὶ γνῶσεως Θεοῦ ὡς ἀνεξιχνίαστα τὰ κρίματα αὐτοῦ, καὶ ἀνεξήγητοι οἱ δόξαι αὐτοῦ·
τὰς γὰρ ἰσχύων σου Κυρίου· ἡ τίς συστήσας αὐτοῦ ἐλπίστον, ἡ τίς προέδικεν αὐτῷ;
καὶ ἀνταποδοθήσεται αὐτῷ;

O the depth of the riches, and the wisdom, and the knowledge of God!

How inscrutable are his judgments;
And untraceable his ways!
For who hath known the mind of the Lord?
Or who hath been his counsellor?
Or who hath first given unto him,
And it shall be repaid him again?

Rom. xi. 33–35.

On this passage Bishop Jebb remarks, that, although the quotation is not always so uniformly direct as in the preceding example, yet the marks of imitation are unquestionable; the probable sources of imitation are numerous; the continuity of the parallelism is maintained unbroken; and the style, both of thought and of expression, is remarkable alike for elegance, animation, and profundity. He supposes the apostle to have had the following texts (which are given at length by Dr. J.) present in his recollection when composing this noble epiphonema: Psal. xxxvi. 6. Job xli. 7, 8. v. 9 xxxvi. 22. Jer. xxiii. 18. Isa. xl. 13. 15. Job xxiii. 18. and xli. 2.

"The first line proposes the subject:

O the depth of the riches, and the wisdom, and the knowledge of God!

"The notion of depth, as a quality attributed alike to God's riches, and wisdom, and knowledge, is first expanded in the next couplet:

How inscrutable are his judgments;
And untraceable his ways!

Riches, wisdom, and knowledge are then, in a fine epianodos, enlarged upon in the inverted order; first, knowledge:

For who hath known the mind of the Lord?

secondly, wisdom:

Or who hath been his counsellor?

thirdly, riches:

Or who hath first given unto him,
And it shall be repaid him again?

"Let, now, the most skilfully executed cento from the heathen classics be compared with this finished scriptural mosaic of St. Paul: the former, however imposing at the first view, will on closer inspection infallibly betray its patchwork jointing and incongruous materials; while the latter, like the beauties of creation, not only bears the microscope glance, but, the more minutely it is examined, the more fully its exquisite organization is disclosed. The fathers, also, often quote and combine Scripture: let their complex quotations be contrasted with those of the apostle; the result may be readily anticipated."⁵

³ Sacred Literature, pp. 93. 109–113.—In pp. 99–108. other examples are given, with suitable philological illustrations.

⁵ Ibid. pp. 114. 117. 120. Other examples of complex quotations are given in pp. 121–123.

3. Quotations mingled with original matter, in which one or more passages derived from the Hebrew Scriptures, are so connected and blended with original writing, that the compound forms one homogeneous whole; the sententious parallelism equally pervaded all the component members, whether original or derived.

ὡς γὰρ ἔλεγε· ἀν' ἐπικαλεσθῆται τὸ ὄνομα Κυρίου σωθήσεται· ὡς οὖν ἐπικαλεσθόντες οὐκ ἐν οὐκ ἐπίστευσαν;
ὡς δὲ ἐπίστευσαν οὐκ ἐν οὐκ κηρύσσον;
ὡς δὲ κηρύσσουσιν χωρὶς κηρύσσοντες;
ὡς δὲ κηρύσσουσιν ἐν μὴ ἀποσταλμένοι;
ὡς γὰρ ἔλεγε·
ὡς ἄρα οἱ πόδες των εὐαγγελίζομένων εἰσηνῇ, των εὐαγγελίζομένων τὰ ἀγαθὰ.

For whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord, shall be saved:
But how shall they call on him, in whom they have not believed?
And how shall they believe in him, of whom they have not heard?
And how shall they hear without a preacher?
And how shall they preach, if they be not sent?
As it is written;
How beautiful the feet of those who bring good tidings of peace!
Who bring good tidings, of good things!

Rom. x. 13-18.

The first line of this passage is literally taken from the Septuagint version of Joel ii. 32, the next quotation is original, and affords an exact, though somewhat peculiar specimen of parallelism, its composition nearly resembling that of the logical sortes, in which the predicate of each preceding line becomes the subject of the line next in order. Similar instances of this logical construction occur in the prophetic writings, and abound in the epistles of St. Paul. The last couplet is from Isa. lii. 7, the Septuagint rendering of which is both confused and inaccurate. St. Paul, however, has quoted so much as it answered his purpose to quote, but has carefully maintained the parallelism uninjured.

λίθον ὃν ἀπεδοκιμασαν οἱ οἰκοδομοῦντες οὗτος ἐγένετο εἰς κεφαλὴν γωνίας· παρὰ Κυρίου ἐγένετο αὐτῇ, καὶ ἐν θαυμασμίᾳ ἐν ὀφθαλμοῖς ἡμῶν·
διὰ τοῦτο λέγω ὑμῖν·
ὅτι ἀδοξάζεται αὐτῇ ὁ ὕμνος ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ, καὶ δόξάζεται ἡ δυνάμις τοῦτον κληροῦσιν αὐτῆς· καὶ ὁ πῶς ἐπὶ τὸν λίθον τούτον, συνδόξασθῃται, ἐφ' ὃν ὅτι ἐν πίστει, λίθισται αὐτὸν.

The stone which the builders rejected;
The same has become the head of the corner;
From the Lord hath this proceeded;
And it is marvellous in our eyes;
Wherefore I say unto you:
That from you shall be taken away the kingdom of God;
And it shall be given to a nation producing the fruits thereof:
And he who falleth upon this stone, shall be sorely bruised.
But upon whomsoever it shall fall, it will grind him to powder.

Matt. xxi. 42-44.

The first four lines are literally taken from the Septuagint version of Psal. cxviii. 22, 23. The last four are original; and Bp. Jebb asks, with great reason, whether the parallelism is not more striking in the latter portion than in the former.

IV. The preceding examples will sufficiently exemplify the manner in which the inspired writers of the New Testament were accustomed to cite, abridge, amplify, and combine passages from the poetical parts of the Old Testament; and also to annex to, or intermingle with, their citations, parallelisms by no means less perfect, of their own original composition. These examples further corroborate the argument from analogy for the existence of the grand characteristic of Hebrew poetry,—the sententious parallelism,—in the New Testament. We shall, therefore, now proceed to give a few examples of the original parallelisms, which pervade that portion of the Holy Scriptures. They are divided by Bishop Jebb into, 1. Parallel Couplets;—2. Parallel Triplets;—3. Quatrains, of which the lines are either directly, alternately, or inversely parallel: 4, 5. Stanzas of five and six lines;—6. Stanzas of more than six parallel lines.

1. Of PARALLEL COUPLETS the two following examples will give the reader an adequate idea:

τῷ αἰτοῦντι σὲ, δίδου·
καὶ τὸν θέλοντα ἀπο σοῦ δανεισάσθαι, μὴ ἀποστρέφῃς.

To him that asketh thee, give;
And him that would borrow from thee, turn not away.

Matt. v. 42.

μεγαλυνεῖ ἡ ψυχὴ μου τὸν Κύριον·
καὶ ἡ ἡλιθία μου τὸ πνεῦμα μου ἐπὶ τῷ Θεῷ τῷ σωτῆρι μου.

My soul doth magnify the Lord;
And my spirit hath exulted in God my Saviour.

Luke i. 46, 47.

"The second line of the latter couplet, it is well observed, clearly rises above the first in all its terms; μεγαλυνεῖ is simply to magnify, to praise;

1 Sacred Literature, p. 124. In p. 125. and also in his nineteenth section (pp. 388-390.), Bp. Jebb has given several of the instances above referred to.
2 Ibid. p. 127. In pp. 128-142. Bp. Jebb has given additional examples of his class of mingled quotations; one of which (Acts iv. 24-30.) is particularly worthy of the reader's attention, on account of the very striking evidence which it affords (on the principles of sententious parallelism) of the supreme Deity of Jesus Christ.
3 Ibid. p. 143. In pp. 144-148. are given numerous other instances of parallel couplets.

ἡ ἡλιθία denotes exultation or ecstasy; ψυχὴ is the animal soul; πνεῦμα the immortal spirit; τὸν Κύριον is the simplest and most general expression of the Godhead, the Lord of all men; τῷ Θεῷ τῷ σωτῆρι μου is a considerable amplification in terms, and personally appropriate in meaning, the God who is my Saviour.¹

2. PARALLEL TRIPLETS consist of three connected and correspondent lines, which are constructively parallel with each other, and form within themselves a distinct sentence or significant part of a sentence.

αἱ ἀληθεῖες φωτισμοὶ ἔχουσιν· καὶ τὰ πτεῖνα τοῦ οὐρανοῦ κατασκηνώσουσιν·
ὁ δὲ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου οὐκ ἔχει τούτῳ τὴν κιστῆν κλίην·

The foxes have dens;
And the birds of the air have nests;
But the Son of man hath not where to lay his head.

Matt. viii. 20

ὁ πιστεύων εἰς τὸν Υἱόν, ἔχει ζωὴν αἰώνιον·
ὁ δὲ ἀπειθῶν τῷ υἱῷ, οὐκ ὀφείλει ζωὴν. ἀλλ' ἡ ὀργὴ τοῦ Θεοῦ μένει ἐπ' αὐτόν.

He who believeth in the Son, hath life eternal;
But he who disobeyeth the Son, shall not see life;
But the wrath of God abideth on him.

John iii. 36.

In this passage, Bishop Jebb justly remarks, the translators of our authorized version "have not preserved the variation of the terms, ὁ πιστεύων, ὁ ἀπειθῶν;" rendering the former, 'he that believeth'; the latter, 'he that believeth not.' The variation, however, is most significant; and should on no account be overlooked: as Dr. Doddridge well observes, 'the latter phrase explains the former; and shows, that the faith to which the promise of eternal life is annexed, is an effectual principle of sincere and unreserved obedience.' The descending series is magnificently awful; he who, with his heart believeth in the Son, is already in possession of eternal life: he, whatever may be his outward profession, whatever his theoretic or historical belief, who obeyeth not the Son, not only does not possess eternal life; he does not possess any thing worthy to be called life at all; nor, so persisting, ever can possess, for he shall not even see it: but this is not the whole; for, as eternal life is the present possession of the faithful, so the wrath of God is the present and permanent lot of the disobedient; it abideth on him.²

3. In QUATRAINS, two parallel couplets are so connected as to form one continued and distinct sentence; the pairs of lines being either directly, alternately, or inversely parallel:

ἐὰν τὰς ἐντολάς μου τηρήσῃς, μένειτε ἐν τῇ ἀγάπῃ μου·
καθὼς ἐγὼ τὰς ἐντολάς τοῦ πατρὸς μου τηρήκα, καὶ μένω αὐτοῦ ἐν τῇ ἀγάπῃ.

If ye keep my commandments,
Ye shall abide in my love;
Even as I have kept my Father's commandments,
And abide in his love.

John xv. 10

τίς γὰρ οἶδεν ἀνθρώπων, τὰ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, εἰ μὴ τὸ πνεῦμα τοῦ ἀνθρώπου τὸ ἐν αὐτῷ;
οὕτω καὶ τὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ οὐδεὶς οἶδεν,
εἰ μὴ τὸ πνεῦμα τοῦ Θεοῦ.

For who, of men, knoweth the depth of any man,
Save only the spirit of that man which is in him?
Even so, the depths of God, knoweth no person;
Save only the Spirit of God.³

I Cor. ii. 11.

In this last cited passage, our authorized version reads the things of a man; the things of the Spirit of God; an awkward mode of supplying the ellipsis, which ought to be filled up from the τὰ θεῶν of the preceding verse. This ellipsis is supplied by Bishop Jebb from Dr. Macknight.

4. FIVE-LINED STANZAS admit of considerable varieties of structure, which it would exceed the limits of this work to specify. One or two instances must suffice to exemplify them.

οὐκ ἔστι δώδεκα εἰσὶν ὥραι τῆς ἡμέρας;
ἐὰν τις περιπατῇ ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ, οὐ προσκοπτεῖ·
ὅτι τὸ φῶς τοῦ κόσμου τούτου ἐλείπει.
ἐὰν δὲ τις περιπατῇ ἐν τῇ νυκτί, προσκοπτεῖ ὅτι τὸ φῶς οὐκ ἐστὶν ἐν αὐτῷ.

Are there not twelve hours in the day?
If a man walk in the day, he stumbleth not;
Because he seeth the light of this world:
But if a man walk in the night he stumbleth;
Because the light is not in him.

John xi. 9, 10.

In this instance, the odd line or member (which commences the stanza) lays down a truth which is illustrated in the remaining four lines. A similar disposition is observable in the first of the two following stanzas, in which the odd line lays down the proposition to be illustrated, viz. By their fruits ye shall thoroughly know them. In the second stanza, on the contrary, the odd lines make a full close, reasserting with authority the same proposition, as undeniably established by the intermediate quatrains—By their fruits, THEREFORE, ye shall thoroughly know them.

ἀπο τῶν καρπῶν αὐτῶν ἐπιγινώσκουσιν αὐτούς· μηδὲ συλλέγουσιν ἀπὸ ἀκανθῶν σαφάνην;
ἢ ἀπὸ τριβέλων συκῆς;
οὕτω πάντες ἀγαθὸν καρπὸν καλοῦς ποιεῖ·
τὸ δὲ σκαπρὸν δένδρον καρπὸς πονηρὸς ποιεῖ·
οὐ δύναται δένδρον ἀγαθὸν καρπὸς πονηρὸς ποιεῖν·

1 Sacred Literature, p. 310.
2 Ibid. pp. 149, 150. In pp. 151-167. are given numerous other examples, in which are interspersed some admirable quotations from the writings of the fathers.
3 Ibid. p. 169. See also pp. 170-192. for further examples of the quatrain.

οὐδὲ δυνδὺν σπάρων καρπὸς καλὸς ποιεῖν, οὐδὲ δυνδὺν μὴ ποιοῦν καρπὸν καλόν, ἐκκοπτεται, καὶ εἰς πυρὶ ὀλλαίται·
ἀραγὶ ἀπὸ τῶν καρπῶν αὐτῶν ἐπιγινώσκει αὐτοὺς.

By their fruits ye shall thoroughly know them :
Do men gather from thorns the grape ?
Or from thistles the fig ?
Thus, every sound tree beareth good fruit ;
But every corrupt tree beareth evil fruit.
A sound tree cannot bear evil fruit ;
Nor a corrupt tree bear good fruit.
Every tree not bearing good fruit
Is hewn down, and cast into the fire :
By their fruits, therefore, ye shall thoroughly know them.¹

Matt. vii. 16—20.

5. The SIX-LINED STANZAS likewise admit of a great variety of structure. Sometimes they consist of a quatrain, with a distich annexed; sometimes of two parallel couplets, with a third pair of parallel lines so distributed, that one occupies the centre, and the other the close; and occasionally of three couplets alternately parallel; the first, third, and fifth lines corresponding with one another; and, in like manner, the second, fourth, and sixth. Of these six-lined stanzas, Bishop Jebb has adduced numerous examples. We subjoin two.

ὁ οὐρανὸς ὡς ἐσπέρηται, λέγει, Ἐὐδία, πυρεταίη γὰρ ὁ οὐρανός·
καὶ ὡς πῦρ, Σαμαριτῶν χιμῶν, πυρεταίη γὰρ συνηχῶν ὁ οὐρανός· ὕποκριται· τὸ μὴ προσώπων τοῦ οὐρανοῦ ἡνικαταὶ διακρίνουν· τὰ δὲ σημεῖα τῶν κριθῶν οὐ δύνασθαι.

When it is evening, ye say, "A calm !
For the sky is red."
And in the morning, "To-day a tempest :
For the sky is red and lowering !"
Hypocrites ! the face of the sky ye know how to discern !
But ye cannot [discern] the signs of the times !

Matt. xvi. 2, 3.

This stanza consists of a quatrain with a distich annexed. In the following passage, the stanza begins and ends with parallel lines, a parallel triplet intervening.

ἐκείνος δὲ ὁ δούλος δὲ γυνὸς τοῦ δαίμονα τοῦ κυρίου αὐτοῦ, καὶ μὴ ἰστούσας, μὴδὲ ποικίλως φέρεται τοῦ δαίμονα αὐτοῦ, ἀπερρίπτεται πολλὰς·
ὁ δὲ μὴ γυνὸς, ποικίλως δὲ πᾶσι ψαλγῶν,
ἀπερρίπτεται ὀλίγας.

And that servant who knew the will of his lord,
And who prepared not, neither did according to his will,
Shall be beaten with many stripes :
And he who did not know,
And did things worthy of stripes,
Shall be beaten with few stripes.²

Luke xii. 47, 48.

6. STANZAS OF MORE THAN SIX PARALLEL LINES.—It frequently happens that more than six parallel lines are so connected by unity of subject or by mutual relationship, as to form a distinct stanza. Of the numerous examples of this kind of distribution, given by Bishop Jebb, one specimen must suffice.

τὰς οὐδὲς ἀκούει μου τοὺς λόγους τούτους, ἀλλὰ ποιεῖ αὐτοὺς, ὁμοιωθεὶς αὐτὸν ἀνδρὶ προφῶν, ὅστις ἀκούσκει τὴν οἰκίαν αὐτοῦ ἐπὶ τὴν πέτραν·
καὶ κατεβῆ ἡ βροχὴ,
καὶ ἤλθον οἱ ποταμοί,
καὶ ἐπινύσαν οἱ ἀνέμοι,
καὶ ὤρριπτον τὴν οἰκίαν ἐκείνην,
καὶ οὐκ ἔστη· τῆδε μάλιστα γὰρ ἐπὶ τὴν πέτραν· καὶ τὰς δὲ ἀκούων μου τοὺς λόγους τούτους, καὶ μὴ ποιοῦν αὐτοὺς, ὁμοιωθεῖται ἀνδρὶ μωρῷ, ὅστις ἀκούσκει τὴν οἰκίαν αὐτοῦ ἐπὶ τὴν ἀμῶν·

καὶ κατεβῆ ἡ βροχὴ,
καὶ ἤλθον οἱ ποταμοί,
καὶ ἐπινύσαν οἱ ἀνέμοι,
καὶ ὤρριπτον τὴν οἰκίαν ἐκείνην,
καὶ ἐπέσκει καὶ ἡ ἡρώς αὐτῆς μετὰ αὐτήν.

Whoever, therefore, heareth these my words, and doeth them,
I will liken him to a prudent man,
Who built his house upon the rock :
And the rain descended,
And the floods came,
And the winds blew,
And fell upon that house :
And it fell not ; for it was founded upon the rock.

² Ibid. pp. 201, 204. We cannot withhold from our readers Bishop Jebb's beautiful remarks on the last cited passage. "The antithesis in this passage has prodigious moral depth: he who sins against knowledge, though his sins were only sins of omission, shall be beaten with many stripes; but he who sins without knowledge, though his sins were sins of commission, shall be beaten only with few stripes. Mere negligence against the light of conscience shall be severely punished: while an offence, in itself comparatively heinous, if committed ignorantly, and without light, shall be mildly dealt with. This merciful discrimination, however, is full of terror: for, whatever may be the case, respecting past, forsaken, and repented sins of ignorance, no man is entitled to take comfort to himself from this passage, respecting his present, or future course of life: the very thought of doing so, proves that the person entertaining that thought has sufficient knowledge to place him beyond its favourable operation." Ibid. p. 205. Other examples of the six-lined stanza are given on pp. 204—211.

And every one hearing these my words, and loing them not
Shall be likened to a foolish man,
Who built his house upon the sand :
And the rain descended,
And the floods came,
And the winds blew,
And struck upon that house ;
And it fell ; and the fall thereof was great.¹

Matt. vii. 24—27.

V. Further, several stanzas are often so connected with each other as to form a paragraph or section. Luke xvi. 9—13. James iii. 1—12. iv. 6—10. and v. 1—6. and 1 John iv. 15—17. afford striking examples of this sort of distribution; for the detail and illustration of which we must refer our readers to Bishop Jebb's elegant and instructive volume, which has been so often cited. It only remains that we notice briefly the gradational parallelism, and the epanodos, in the New Testament, which he has discovered and elucidated.

1. PARALLEL LINES GRADATIONAL (or as Bishop Jebb terms them COGNATE PARALLELISMS), we have already remarked, are of most frequent occurrence in the poetical books of the Old Testament. The poetical parallelisms exhibited in the preceding pages, while they fully prove his position, that the poetical dialect pervades the New Testament, will prepare the reader to expect to find there similar instances of parallel lines gradational. The second example of parallel couplets, given in page 378. supra, affords a concise but beautiful specimen of the ascent or climax in the terms, clauses, or lines which constitute the parallelism. One or two additional instances, therefore, will suffice, to show the existence of the gradational parallelism in the New Testament.

ὃν ὁ Κύριος ἰσχυρὸς ἀναλυσθεῖ, τὰ πνεύματα τοῦ ὀργισμοῦ αὐτοῦ· καὶ καταργησὶ τὴν ἐπιφανεῖαν τῆς παρουσίας αὐτοῦ.

Whom the Lord Jesus will waste away, with the breath of his mouth,
And will utterly destroy, with the bright appearance of his coming.

2 Thess. ii. 8.

"The first words, ὃν ὁ Κύριος ἰσχυρὸς, are common to both lines; ἀναλυσθεῖ implies no more, in this place, than gradual decay; καταργησὶ denotes total extermination; while, in terror and magnificence, no less than in the effects assigned, the breath of his mouth must yield to the bright appearance of his coming. The first line seems to announce the ordinary diffusion, gradually to be effected, of Christian truth: the second, to foretell the extraordinary manifestation of the victorious Messiah, suddenly, and overwhelmingly, to take place in the last days."¹

εἰς ὁδὸν ἐθνῶν μὴ ἀπελθῆτε· καὶ εἰς πόλιν Σαμαριτῶν μὴ ἐισέλθῃτε·
πоришди же μαλλον προς τα προβατα τα ἀπολωλοτα οἰκου Ἰσραηλ.

To the way of the Gentiles go not off ;
And to a city of the Samaritans go not in ;
But proceed rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel.

Matt. x. 5, 6.

"This is a gradation in the scale of national and religious proximity; the Gentiles, the Samaritans, Israel. In the remaining terms, there is a correspondent progress: the way, or road, to foreign countries, a city of the Samaritans; the house of Israel, a phrase conveying the notion of home; go not off,—go not from Palestine, towards other nations; go not in to a city of the Samaritans; though, in your progresses between Judaea and Galilee, you must pass by the walls of many Samaritan cities; but, however great your fatigue, and want of refreshment, proceed rather not merely to the house of Israel, but to the lost sheep of that house. Thus, by a beautiful gradation, the apostles are brought from the indefiniteness of a road leading to countries remote from their own, and people differing from themselves in habits, in language, and in faith, to the homely, individual, and endearing relationship of their own countrymen; children of the same covenant of promise, and additionally recommended to their tender compassion, as morally lost."

Bishop Jebb has given additional examples of the gradational parallelism from Matt. v. 45. vii. 1, 2. xx. 26, 27. xxiv. 17, 18. Mark iv. 24. Luke vi. 35. Rom. v. 7. James i. 12. iv. 8. and v. 5. Rev. ix. 6. and xxii. 14.

2. The nature of the INTROVERTED PARALLELISM, or Parallel Lines Introverted, has been stated in page 376., and confirmed by suitable examples. Closely allied to this is a peculiarity or artifice of construction, which Bishop Jebb terms an Epanodos, and which he defines to be literally "a going back, speaking first to the second of two subjects proposed : or if the subjects be more than two, resuming them precisely in the inverted order, speaking first to the last, and last to the first." The rationale of this artifice of composition he explains more particularly in the following words:—"Two pair of terms or propositions, containing two important, but not equally important notions, are to be so distributed, as to bring out the sense in the strongest and most impressive manner: now, this result will be best attained, by commencing, and concluding, with the notion to which prominence is to be given; and by placing in the centre the less important notion, or that which, from the scope of the argument, is to be kept subordinate.¹ Having established the justice of this explanation by examples of epanodos, derived from the Scriptures, as well as from the best classic authors, Bishop Jebb has accumulated many examples proving its existence in the New Testament, the doctrines and precepts of which derive new force and beauty from the application of this figure. The length to which this chapter has unavoidably extended, forbids the introduction of more than one or two instances of the epanodos.

μη δῶτε το ἅγιον τοῖς κυσὶ·
μηδὲ βάλητε τοὺς μαργαρίτας ὑμῶν ἐμπροσθέν των χοίρων· μητοὶ καταπατήσωσιν αὐτοὺς ἐν τοῖς ποσὶν αὐτῶν.
καὶ ἐσθιάτωσιν τῆς βρῆξ ὑμῶν.

Give not that which is holy to the dogs;
Neither cast your pearls before the swine;
Lest they trample them under their feet;
And turn about and rend you.

Matt. vii. 6.

"The relation of the first line to the fourth, and that of the second to the third, have been noticed by almost all the commentators. A minor circumstance is not altogether undeserving of attention: the equal lengths, in the original, of each related pair of lines; the first and fourth lines being short, the second and third lines long. The sense of the passage becomes perfectly clear, on thus adjusting the parallelism:

Give not that which is holy to the dogs
Lest they turn about and rend you:
Neither cast your pearls before the swine,
Lest they trample them under their feet.

"The more dangerous act of imprudence, with its fatal result, is placed first and last, so as to make, and to leave, the deepest practical impression."²

Χρῆσθαι εὐωδίᾳ ἵσμεν τῷ Θεῷ· ἐν τοῖς σωζομένοις, καὶ ἐν τοῖς ἀπολλυμένοις·
οἷς μὲν ὁσμὴ θανάτου, εἰς θάνατον·
οἷς δὲ ὁσμὴ ζωῆς, εἰς ζωὴν.

We are a sweet odour of Christ;
To those who are saved;
And to those who perish;
To the one, indeed, an odour of death, unto death;
But to the other, an odour of life, unto life.³

2 Cor. ii. 15, 16.

In this specimen of the epanodos, the painful part of the subject is kept subordinate; the agreeable is placed first and last.

The preceding examples are sufficient to show the existence of the grand characteristic of Hebrew poesy,—the sententious parallelism, with all its varieties, in the New Testament. The reader, who is desirous of further investigating this interesting topic (and what student who has accompanied the author of the present work thus far, will not eagerly prosecute it?) is necessarily referred to Bishop Jebb's "Sacred Literature," to which this chapter stands so deeply indebted;—a volume, of which it is but an act of bare justice in the writer of these pages to say, that, independently of the spirit of enlightened piety which pervades every part, it has the highest claims to the attention of EVERY biblical student for its numerous beautiful and philological criticisms and elucidations of the New Testament; for the interpretation of which this learned prelate has opened and developed a new and most important source, of which future commentators will, doubtless, gladly avail themselves.

VI. The sacred writers have left us DIFFERENT KINDS of poetical composition: they do not, however, appear to have cultivated either the epic or the dramatic species, unless we take these terms in a very wide sense, and refer to these classes, those poems in which several interlocutors are introduced. Thus, M. Ilgen⁴ and (after him) Dr. Good⁵ conceive the book of Job to be a regular epic poem: while Messieurs Velthusen and Ammon think that the Song of Songs exhibits traces of a dramatic or melo-dramatic structure. Bishop Lowth, however, reduces the various productions of the Hebrew poets to the following classes; viz.

1. PROPHECIC POETRY.—Although some parts of the writings of the prophets are clearly in prose, of which instances occur in the prophecies of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Jonah, and Daniel, yet the other books, constituting by far the larger portion of the prophetic writings, are classed by Bishop Lowth among the poetical productions of the Jews; and (with the exception of certain passages in Isaiah, Habakkuk, and Ezekiel, which appear to constitute complete poems of different kinds, odes as well as elegies) form a particular species of poesy, which he distinguishes by the appellation of Prophetic.

The predictions of the Hebrew Prophets are pre-eminently characterized by the sententious parallelism, which has been discussed and exemplified in the preceding pages. The prophetic poesy, however, is more ornamented, more splendid, and more florid than any other. It abounds more in imagery, at least that species of imagery, which, in the parabolic style, is of common and established acceptance. And which, by means of a settled analogy always preserved, is transferred from certain and definite objects to express indefinite and general ideas. Of all the images peculiar to the parabolic style, it most frequently introduces those which are taken from natural objects and sacred history: it abounds most in metaphors, allegories, comparisons, and even in copious and diffuse descriptions. It possesses all that genuine enthusiasm which is the natural attendant on inspiration; it excels in the brightness of imagination, and in clearness and energy of diction, and, consequently, rises to an uncommon pitch of sublimity; hence, also, it is often very happy in the expression and delineation of the passions, though more commonly employed in exciting them.⁶

The following passage from one of Balaam's prophecies (which Bishop Lowth ranks among the most exquisite specimens of Hebrew poetry) exhibits a prophetic poem complete in all its parts. It abounds in gay and splendid imagery, copied immediately from the tablet of nature; and is chiefly conspicuous for the glowing elegance of the style, and the form and diversity of the figures. The translation is that of the Rev. Dr. Hales.⁷

How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob,
And thy tabernacles, O Israel!
As streams do they spread forth,
As gardens by the river side;
As sandal-trees which the Lord hath planteu,
As cedar-trees beside the waters.

There shall come forth a man of his seed,
And shall rule over many nations:
And his king shall be higher than Gog,
And his kingdom shall be exalted.⁸

(God brought him forth out of Egypt,
He is to him as the strength of a unicorn.)
He shall devour the nations, his enemies,
And shall break their bones,
And pierce them through with arrows

He lieth down as a lion,
He coucheth as a lioness,
Who shall rouse him?
Blessed is he that bleaseth thee,
And cursed is he that curseth thee.

Num. xxiv. 5—9.

The eighteenth chapter and the first three verses of the nineteenth chapter of the Apocalypse present a noble instance of prophetic poesy, in no respect inferior to the finest productions of any of the Hebrew bards.⁹

2. ELEGIAC POETRY.—Of this description are several passages in the prophetic books,¹⁰ as well as in the book of Job,¹¹ and many of David's psalms that were composed on occasions of distress and mourning: the forty-second psalm in particular is in the highest degree tender and plaintive, and is one of the most beautiful specimens of the Hebrew elegy. The lamentation of David over his friend Jonathan (2 Sam. i. 17—27.) is another most beautiful elegy: but the most regular and perfect elegiac composition in the Scriptures, perhaps in the whole world, is the book entitled The Lamentations of Jeremiah, of which we have given a particular analysis, infra, Vol. II. p. 276.

² Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book i. pp. 224—226.

³ In the rendering of this quatrain, Dr. Hales has followed the Septuagint version, which he vindicates in a long note. In our authorized translation, made from the Masoretic text, the seventh verse of Num. xxiv stands thus:—

He shall pour the water out of his buckets,
And his seed shall be in many waters;
And his king shall be higher than Agag,
And his kingdom shall be exalted.

This is confessedly obscure.—Dr. Boothroyd, in his New Version of the Old Testament, with a slight departure from the common rendering, translates the verse in the following manner:—

Water shall flow from the urn of Jacob,
And his seed shall become as many waters;
Their king shall be higher than Agag,
And his kingdom more highly exalted.

3. DIDACTIC POETRY is defined by Bishop Lowth to be that which delivers moral precepts in elegant and pointed verses, often illustrated by a comparison expressed or implied, similar to the Tragœdi, or moral sentences, and adages, of the ancient sages. Of this species of poetry the book of Proverbs is the principal instance. To this class may be referred the book of Ecclesiastes.

4. OF LYRIC POETRY, or that which is intended to be accompanied with music, the Old Testament abounds with numerous examples. Besides a great number of hymns and songs which are dispersed through the historical and prophetic books, such as the ode of Moses at the Red Sea (Exod. xv.), his prophetic ode (Dent. xxxii.), the triumphal ode of Deborah (Judg. v.), the prayer of Habakkuk (iii.), and many similar pieces, the entire book of Psalms is to be considered as a collection of sacred odes, possessing every variety of form, and supported with the highest spirit of lyric poetry,—sometimes sprightly, cheerful, and triumphant; sometimes solemn and magnificent; and sometimes tender, soft, and pathetic.

5. OF THE IDYL, or short pastoral poem,¹ the historical psalms afford abundant instances. The seventy-eighth, hundred and fifth, hundred and sixth, hundred and thirty-sixth, and the hundred and thirty-ninth psalms, may be adduced as singularly beautiful specimens of the sacred idyl: to which may be added Isa. ix. 8.—x. 4.

6. OF DRAMATIC POETRY, Bishop Lowth² adduces examples in the book of Job and the Song of Solomon, understanding the term in a more extended sense than that in which it is usually received. Some critics, however, are of opinion, that the Song of Solomon is a collection of sacred idyls: and M. Bauer is disposed to consider the former book as approximating nearest to the Mekama, that is, “the assemblies,” moral discourses, or conversations of the celebrated Arabian poet Hariri.³

In another part of this work some reasons are offered in confirmation of this conjecture.

Many of the psalms (and, according to Bishop Horsley,⁴ by far the greater part) are a kind of dramatic ode, consisting of dialogues between persons sustaining certain characters.⁵ This dramatic or dialogue form admits of considerable variety. Its leading characteristic, however, is an alternate succession of parts, adapted to the purpose of alternate recitation by two semi-choruses in the Jewish worship. Bishop Jebb considers the sublime hymn of Zacharias (Luke i. 67—79.) as a dramatic ode of this description; and, in confirmation of his opinion, he remarks that Zacharias must have been familiar with this character of composition, both as a pious and literate Jew, much conversant with the devotional and lyric poetry of his country, and also as an officiating priest, accustomed to bear his part in the choral service of the temple. Dr. J. has accordingly printed that hymn in Greek and English, in the form of a dramatic ode: and by this mode of distribution has satisfactorily elucidated its true meaning and grammatical construction in many passages, which have hitherto in vain exercised the acumen of critics.⁶

To the preceding species of Hebrew poetry, we may add,

7. THE ACROSTIC OR ALPHABETICAL POEMS. Bishop Lowth considered this form of poetry as one of the leading characteristics of the productions of the Hebrew muse: but this, we have seen,⁷ is not the fact. It may rather be viewed as a subordinate species, the form of which the bishop thus defines:—“The acrostic or alphabetical poem consists of twenty-two lines, or of twenty-two systems of lines, or periods, or stanzas, according to the number of the letters of the Hebrew alphabet; and every line, or every stanza, begins with each letter in its order, as it stands in the alphabet; that is, the first line, or first stanza, begins with א (aleph), the second ב (beth), and so on. This was certainly intended for the assistance of the memory, and was chiefly employed in subjects of common use, as maxims of morality, and forms of devotion; which, being expressed in detached sentences, or aphorisms (the form in which the sages of the most ancient times delivered their instructions), the inconvenience arising from the subject, the want of connection in the parts, and of a regular train of thought carried through the whole, was remedied by this artificial contrivance in the form. There are still extant in the books of the Old Testament twelve⁸ of these poems: three of them perfectly alphabetical,⁹ in which every line is marked by its initial letter; the other nine less perfectly alphabetical, in which every stanza only is so distinguished. Of the three former it is to be remarked, that not only every single line is distinguished by its initial letter, but that the whole poem is laid out into stanzas; two¹⁰ of these poems each into ten stanzas, all of two lines except the two last stanzas in each, which are of three lines; in these the sense and the construction manifestly point out the division into stanzas, and mark the limit of every stanza. The third¹¹ of these perfectly alphabetical poems consists of twenty-two stanzas of three lines: but in this the initial letter of every stanza is also the initial letter of every line of that stanza: so that both the lines and the stanzas are infallibly limited. And in all the three poems the pauses of the sentences coincide with the pauses of the lines and stanzas. It is also further to be observed of these three poems, that the lines, so determined by the initial letters in the same poem, are remarkably equal to one another in length, in the number of words nearly, and, probably, in the number of syllables; and that the lines of the same stanza have a remarkable congruity one with another, in the matter and the form, in the sense and the construction.

Of the other nine poems less perfectly alphabetical, in which the stanzas only are marked with initial letters, six¹² consist of stanzas of two lines, two¹³ of stanzas of three lines, and one¹⁴ of stanzas of four lines: not taking into the account at present some irregularities, which in all probability are to be imputed to the mistakes of transcribers. And these stanzas likewise naturally divide themselves into their distinct lines, the sense and the construction plainly pointing out their limits: and the lines have the same congruity one with another in matter and form, as was above observed, in regard to the poems more perfectly alphabetical.

Another thing to be observed of the three poems perfectly alphabetical is, that in two¹⁵ of them the lines are shorter than those of the third¹⁶ by about one third part, or almost half; and of the other nine poems the stanzas only of which are alphabetical, that three¹⁷ consist of the longer lines, and the six others of the shorter.

VII. We have already had occasion to remark, that the poetry of the Hebrews derives its chief excellence from its being dedicated to religion. Nothing can be conceived more elevated, more beautiful, or more elegant, than the compositions of the Hebrew bards; in which the sublimity of the subject is fully equalled by the energy of the language and the dignity of the style. Compared with them, the most brilliant productions of the Greek and Roman muses, who often employed themselves on frivolous or very trifling themes, are infinitely inferior in the scale of excellence. The Hebrew poet, who worshipped Jehovah as the sovereign of his people—who believed all the laws, whether sacred or civil, which he was bound to obey, to be of divine enactment—and who was taught that man was dependent upon God for every thing—meditated upon nothing but Jehovah; to Him he devoutly referred all things, and placed his supreme delight in celebrating the divine attributes and perfections. If, however, we would enter fully into the beauties of the sacred poets, there are two GENERAL OBSERVATIONS, which it will be necessary to keep in mind whenever we analyze or examine the Songs of Sion.

1. The first is, that we carefully investigate their nature and genius.

For, as the Hebrew poems, though various in their kinds, are each marked by a character peculiar to itself, and by which they are distinguished from each other, we shall be enabled to enter more fully into their elegance and beauty, if we have a correct view of their form and arrangement. For instance, if we wish critically to expound the Psalms, we ought to investigate the nature and properties of the Hebrew ode, as well as the form and structure of the Hebrew elegies, &c., and ascertain in what respects they differ from the odes, elegies, &c. of the Greek poets. In like manner, when studying the Proverbs of Solomon, we should recollect that the most ancient kind of instruction was by means of moral sentences, in which the first principles of ancient philosophy were contained; and, from a comparison of the Hebrew, Greek, and other gnostic sentences, we should investigate the principal characters of a proverb. In the book of Job we are to be observed the utility of action, delineation of manners, the external form and construction of the poem, &c.

¹ Bishop Lowth defines an idyl to be a poem of moderate length, of a uniform middle style, chiefly distinguished for elegance and sweetness; regular and clear as to the plot, conduct, and arrangement.

2. Further, in interpreting the compositions of the Hebrew bards, it ought not to be forgotten, that the objects of our attention are the productions of poets, and of oriental poets in particular.

It is therefore necessary that we should be acquainted with the country in which the poet lived, its situation and peculiarities, and also with the manners of the inhabitants, and the idiom of the language. Oriental poetry abounds with strong expressions, bold metaphors, glowing sentiments, and animated descriptions, portrayed in the most lively colours. Hence the words of the Hebrew poets are neither to be understood in too lax a sense, nor to be interpreted too literally. In the comparisons introduced by them, the point of resemblance between the object of comparison, and the thing with which it is compared, should be examined, but not strained too far and the force of the personifications, allegories, or other figures that may be introduced, should be fully considered. Above all, it should be recollected, that as the sacred poets lived in the East, their ideas and manners were totally different from ours, and, consequently, are not to be considered according to our modes of thinking. From inattention to this circumstance, the productions of the Hebrew muse have neither been correctly understood, nor their beauties duly felt and appreciated.

The reader will find some hints for the special study of the book of Psalms, in Vol. II. pp. 244, 245., and also a copious analysis of the book of Job, with observations for the better understanding of it, in pp. 235, 236. of the same volume.

CHAPTER III.

ON THE SPIRITUAL INTERPRETATION OF THE SCRIPTURES.¹

SECTION I.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS ON THE SPIRITUAL INTERPRETATION OF THE SCRIPTURES.

It has been a favourite notion with some divines, that the mystical or spiritual interpretation of the Scriptures had its first origin in the synagogue, and was thence adopted by our Lord and his apostles, when arguing with the Jews: and that from them it was received by the fathers of the Christian church, from whom it has been transmitted to us. The inference deduced by many of these eminently learned men is, that no such interpretation is admissible: while other commentators and critics have exaggerated and carried it to the extreme. But, if the argument against a thing from the possibility of its being abused be inadmissible in questions of a secular nature, it is equally inadmissible in the exposition of the Sacred Writings. All our ideas are admitted through the medium of the senses, and consequently refer in the first place to external objects: but no sooner are we convinced that we possess an immaterial soul or spirit, than we find occasion for other terms, or, for want of these, another application of the same terms to a different class of objects; and hence arises the necessity of resorting to figurative and spiritual interpretation. Now, the object of revelation being to make known things which "eye hath not seen nor ear heard, nor have entered into the heart of man to conceive," it seems hardly possible that the human mind should be capable of apprehending them, but through the medium of figurative language or mystical representations.

"The foundation of religion and virtue being laid in the mind and heart, the secret dispositions and genuine acts of which are invisible, and known only to a man's self; therefore the powers and operations of the mind can only be expressed in figurative terms and external symbols. The motives also and inducements to practice are spiritual, such as affect men in a way of moral influence, and not of natural efficiency; the principal of which are drawn from the consideration of a future state; and, consequently, these likewise must be represented by allegories and similitudes, taken from things most known and familiar here. And thus we find in Scripture the state of religion illustrated by all the beautiful images we can conceive; in which natural unity, order, and harmony consist, as regulated by the strictest and most exact rules of discipline, taken from those observed in the best ordered temporal government. In the interpretation of places, in which any of these images are contained, the principal regard is to be had to the figurative or spiritual, and not to the literal sense of the words. From not attending to which, have arisen absurd doctrines and inferences, which weak men have endeavoured to establish as Scripture truths; whereas, in the other method of explication, the things are plain and easy to every one's capacity, make the deepest and most lasting impressions upon their minds, and have the greatest influence upon their practice. Of this nature are all the rites and ceremonies prescribed to the Jews, with relation to the external form of religious worship; every one of which was intended to show the obligation or recommend the practice of some moral duty, and was esteemed of no further use than as it produced that effect. And the same may be applied to the rewards and punishments peculiar to the Christian dispensation, which regard a future state. The rewards are set forth by those things, in which the generality of men take their greatest delight, and place their highest satisfaction in this life; and the punishments are such as are inflicted by human laws upon the worst of malefactors; but they can neither of them be understood in the strictly literal sense, but only by way of analogy, and corresponding in the general nature and intention of the thing, though very different in kind."²

But independently of the able argument à priori, here cited, in favour of the mediate, mystical, or spiritual interpretation of the Scriptures, unless such interpretation be admitted, we cannot avoid one of two great difficulties: for, either we must assert that the multitude of applications, made by Christ and his apostles, are fanciful and unauthorized, and wholly inadequate to prove the points for which they are quoted; or, on the other hand, we must believe that the obvious and natural sense of such passages was never intended, and that it was a mere illusion. The Christian will not assent to the former of these positions; the philosopher and the critic will not readily assent to the latter.³ It has been erroneously supposed that this mediate, or mystical interpretation of Scripture is confined to the New Testament exclusively; we have, however, clear evidence of its adoption by some of the sacred writers of the Old Testament, and a few instances will suffice to prove its existence.

1. In Exod. xxviii. 38. Moses says, that the diadem or plate of gold, worn upon certain solemn festivals upon the high priest's forehead, signified that he bore in a vicarious and typical manner the sin of the holy things, and made an atonement for the imperfection of the Hebrew offerings and sacrifices.

2. In Lev. xxvi. 41. and Deut. x. 16. and xxx. 6., he mentions the circumcision of the heart, which was signified by the circumcision of the flesh. (Compare Jer. iv. 4. vi. 10. and ix. 25, 26. with Exod. vi. 12. 30.)

3. Further, the great lawgiver of the Jews explains the historical and typical import of all their great festivals.

Thus, in Exod. xlii. 13. and Num. iii. 12, 13. 41—51. and xviii. 14—16., he shows the twofold meaning of the redemption of their first-born sons, viz. that the first-born of the Hebrews were preserved while Egypt groaned beneath the plague inflicted by divine vengeance, and that the first-born sons were formerly consecrated to the priesthood; which being afterwards transferred to the tribe of Levi, the first-born sons were exchanged for the Levites, and were thenceforth to be redeemed. The whole of the sacrificial law showed that the bloody sacrifices morally signified the punishment of the person for or by whom they were offered; and that the other sacred rites of the Hebrews should have a symbolical or spiritual import will be obvious to every one, who recollects the frequent use of symbols which obtained in Egypt, from which country Moses brought out the Hebrews.

The precepts delivered in the New Testament concerning the sacraments plainly intimate that those very sacred rites were then about to receive their real accomplishment, and their symbolical or spiritual meaning is explained.

1. See, for instance, Rom. vi. 3—11. Col. ii. 12. 1 Cor. vi. 11. xi. 23—27. Eph. v. 26. and Tit. iii. 5. In which last passage baptism (by immersion in water probably) is said to signify not only the moral ablution of sin, but also the death and burial of guilty man, and (by his emersion from the water) his resurrection to a pious and virtuous life; in other words, our death unto sin, and our obligation to walk in newness of life. The spiritual import of the Lord's supper is self-evident.

2. Lastly, since we learn from the New Testament that some histories, which in themselves convey no peculiar meaning, must be interpreted allegorically or mystically (as Gal. iv. 22—24.), and that persons and things are there evidently types and emblems of the Christian dispensation, and its divine founder, as in Matt. xii. 40. John iii. 14, 15. 1 Cor. x. 4. and Heb. vii. 2, 3. it is plain that the mystical sense ought to be followed in the histories and prophecies¹ of the Old Testament, and especially in such passages as are referred to by the inspired writers of the New Testament; who having given us the key by which to unlock the mystical sense of Scripture, we not only may but ought cautiously and diligently to make use of it.

Where the inspired writers themselves direct us to such an interpretation, when otherwise we might not perceive its necessity, then we have an absolute authority for the exposition, which supersedes our own conjectures, and we are not only safe in abiding by that authority, but should be unwarranted in rejecting it.

SECTION II.

CANONS FOR THE SPIRITUAL INTERPRETATION OF SCRIPTURE.

THE Spiritual Interpretation of the Bible, "like all other good things, is liable to abuse; and that it hath been actually abused, both in ancient and modern days, cannot be denied. He, who shall go about to apply, in this way, any passage, before he hath attained its literal meaning, may say in itself what is pious and true, but foreign to the text from which he endeavoureth to deduce it. St. Jerome, it is well known, when grown older and wiser, lamented that, in the fervours of a youthful fancy, he had spiritualized the prophecy of Obadiah, before he understood it. And it must be allowed that a due attention to the occasion and scope of the Psalms would have pared off many unseemly excrescences, which now deform the commentaries of St. Augustine and other fathers upon them. But these and other concessions of the same kind being made, as they are made very freely, men of sense will consider, that a principle is not therefore to be rejected, because it has been abused; since human errors can never invalidate the truths of God."²

The literal sense, it has been well observed, is, undoubtedly, first in point of nature as well as in order of signification; and consequently, when investigating the meaning of any passage, this must be ascertained before we proceed to search out its mystical import: but the true and genuine mystical or spiritual sense excels the literal in dignity, the latter being only the medium of conveying the former, which is more evidently designed by the Holy Spirit. For instance, in Num. xxi. 8, 9. compared with John iii. 14. the brazen serpent is said to have been lifted up, in order to signify the lifting up of Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world; and, consequently, that the type might serve to designate the antitype.³

Though the true spiritual sense of a text is undoubtedly to be most highly esteemed, it by no means follows that we are to look for it in every passage of Scripture; it is not, however, to be inferred that spiritual interpretations are to be rejected, although they should not be clearly expressed. It may be considered as an axiom in sacred hermeneutics, that the SPIRITUAL MEANING OF A PASSAGE IS there only TO BE SOUGHT, WHERE IT IS EVIDENT, FROM certain CRITERIA, THAT SUCH MEANING WAS DESIGNED BY THE HOLY SPIRIT.

The criteria, by which to ascertain whether there is a latent spiritual meaning in any passage of Scripture, are two fold: either they are seated in the text itself, or they are to be found in some other passages.

1. Where the criteria are seated in the text, vestiges of a spiritual meaning are discernible, when things, which are affirmed concerning the person or thing immediately treated of, are so august and illustrious that they cannot in any way be applied to it, in the fullest sense of the words.

The word of God is the word of truth: there is nothing superfluous, nothing deficient in it. The writings of the prophets, especially those of Isaiah, abound with instances of this kind. Thus, in the 14th, 40th, 41st, and 49th chapters of that evangelical prophet, the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity is announced in the most lofty and magnificent terms. He describes their way as levelled before them, valleys filled up, mountains reduced to plains, cedars and other shady trees, and fragrant herbs, as springing up to refresh them on their journey, and declares that they shall suffer neither hunger nor thirst during their return. The Jews, thus restored to their native land, he represents as a holy people, chosen by Jehovah, cleansed from all iniquity, and taught by God himself, &c. &c. Now, when we compare this description with the accounts actually given of their return to Palestine, by Ezra and Nehemiah, we do not find any thing corresponding with the events predicted by Isaiah: neither do they represent the manners of the people as reformed, agreeably to the prophet's statement. On the contrary, their profligacy is frequently reproved by Ezra and Nehemiah in the most pointed terms, as well as by the prophet Haggai. In this description, therefore, of their deliverance from captivity, we must look beyond it to that infinitely higher deliverance, which in the fulness of time was accomplished by Jesus Christ: "who by himself once offered, hath thereby made a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and atonement for the sins of the whole world," and thus "hath opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers."

We proceed to show in what cases it will be proper to have recourse to other passages of Scripture.

II. Where the spiritual meaning of a text is latent, the Holy Spirit (under whose direction the sacred penmen wrote) sometimes clearly and expressly asserts that one thing or person was divinely constituted or appointed to be a figure or symbol of another thing or person: in which case the INDISPUTABLE TESTIMONY OF ETERNAL TRUTH removes and cuts off every ground of doubt and uncertainty.

For instance, if we compare Psalm cx. 4. with Heb. vii. 1. we shall find that Melchisedec was a type of Messiah, the great high-priest and king. So Hagar and Sarah were types of the Jewish and Christian churches. (Gal. iv. 22—24.) Jonah was a type of Christ's resurrection (Matt. xii. 40.): the manna, of Christ himself, and of his heavenly doctrine. (John vi. 32.) The rock in the wilderness, whence water issued, on being struck by Moses, represented Christ to the Israelites (1 Cor. x. 4.); and the entrance of the high-priest into the holy of holies, on the day of expiation, with the blood of the victim, is expressly stated by Saint Paul to have prefigured the entrance of Jesus Christ into the presence of God, with his own blood. (Heb. ix. 7—20.)

III. Sometimes, however, the mystical sense is intimated by the Holy Spirit in a more obscure manner; and without excluding the practice of sober and pious meditation, we are led by various intimations (which require very diligent observation and study) to the knowledge of the spiritual or mystical meaning. This chiefly occurs in the following cases.

1. When the antitype is proposed under figurative names taken from the Old Testament.

Thus, in 1 Cor. v. 7. Christ is called the Paschal Lamb:—in 1 Cor. xv. 45. he is called the last Adam; the first Adam, therefore, was in some respect a type or figure of Christ, who in Ezekiel xxxiv. 23. is further called David. In like manner, the kingdom of Antichrist is mentioned under the appellations of Sodom, Egypt, and Babylon, in Rev. xi. 8. and xvi. 19.

2. When, by a manifest allusion of words and phrases, the Scripture refers one thing to another; or, when the arguments of the inspired writers either plainly intimate it to have a spiritual meaning, or when such meaning is tacitly implied.

(1) Thus, from Isa. ix. 4., which alludes to the victory obtained by Gideon (Judges vii. 22.), we learn that this represents the victory which Christ should obtain by the preaching of the Gospel, as Vitringa has largely shown on this passage.

(2) So, when St. Paul is arguing against the Jews from the types of Sarah, Hagar, Melchisedec, &c. he supposes that in these memorable Old Testament personages there were some things in which Christ and his mystical body the church were delineated, and that these things were admitted by his opponents: otherwise his argument would be inconclusive. Hence it follows, that Isaac, and other persons mentioned in the Old Testament, of whom there is no typical or spiritual signification given in the Scriptures, in express terms, were types of Christ in many things that happened to them, or were performed by them. In like manner, St. Paul shows (1 Cor. ix. 9, 10) that the precept in Deut. xxv. 4. relative to the muzzling of oxen, has a higher spiritual meaning than is suggested by the mere letter of the command.

² Bishop Horne's Commentary on the Psalms, vol. i. Preface. (Works, ii. p. x.) "The importance, then, of figurative and mystical interpretation can hardly be called in question. The entire neglect of it must, in many cases, greatly vitiate expositions, however otherwise valuable for their erudition and judgment. In explaining the prophetic writings and the Mosaic ordinances, this defect will be most striking; since, in consequence of it, not only the spirit and force of many passages will almost wholly evaporate, but erroneous conceptions may be formed of their real purport and intention." Bp. Vanuylert's Bampton Lectures, p. 210. Rambach has adduced several instances, which strongly confirm these solid observations, Institut. Herm. Sacr. p. 81.

³ Rambach, Institutiones Hermeneuticæ Sacræ, p. 72.

Such are the most important criteria, by which to ascertain whether a passage may require a spiritual interpretation, or not. But although these rules will afford essential assistance in enabling us to determine this point, it is another and equally important question, in what manner that interpretation is to be regulated.

In the consideration of this topic, it will be sufficient to remark, that the general principles already laid down,¹ with respect to the figurative and allegorical interpretation of the Scriptures, are applicable to the spiritual exposition of the Sacred Writings. It only remains to add, that all mystical or spiritual interpretations must be such as really illustrate, not obscure or perplex the subject. Agreeably to the sound maxim adopted by divines, they must not be made the foundation of articles of faith, but must be offered only to explain or confirm what is elsewhere more clearly revealed;² and above all, they must on no account or pretext whatever be sought after in matters of little moment.

In the spiritual interpretation of Scripture, there are two extremes to be avoided, viz. on the one hand, that we do not restrict such interpretation within too narrow limits; and, on the other hand, that we do not seek for mystical meanings in every passage, to the exclusion of its literal and common sense, when that sense is sufficiently clear and intelligible. The latter of these two extremes is that to which men have in every age been most liable. Hence it is that we find instances of it in the more ancient Jewish doctors, especially in Philo, and among many of the fathers, as Cyprian, Jerome, Augustine, and others, and particularly in Origen, who appears to have derived his system of allegorizing the Sacred Writings from the school of Plato. Nor are modern expositors altogether free from these extravagancies.³

² "Est regula theologorum, sensum mysticum non esse argumentativum, hoc est, non suppeditare firma ac solida argumenta, quibus dogmata fidei insinuantur." Rambach, Inst. Herm. Sac. pp. 72, 73.

³ Thus, Cocceius represented the entire history of the Old Testament as a mirror, which held forth an accurate view of the transactions and events that were to happen in the church under the New Testament dispensation, to the end of the world. He further affirmed, that by far the greatest part of the ancient prophecies foretold Christ's ministry and mediation, together with the rise, progress, and revolutions of the church, not only under the figure of persons and transactions, but in a literal manner, and by the sense of the words used in these predictions. And he laid it down as a fundamental rule of interpretation that the words and phrases of Scripture are to be understood in every sense of which they are susceptible: or, in other words, that they signify in effect every thing which they can signify. (Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History, vol. v. p. 360. et seq. edit. 1808.) These opinions have not been without their advocates in this country; and if our limits permitted, we could adduce numerous instances of evident misinterpretations of the Scriptures which have been occasioned by the adoption of them: one or two, however, must suffice. Thus, the Ten Commandments, or Moral Law, as they are usually termed, which the most pious and learned men in every age of the Christian church have considered to be rules or precepts for regulating the manners or conduct of men, both towards God and towards one another, have been referred to Jesus Christ, under the mistaken idea that they may be read with a new interest by believers! (See an exposition of the Ten Commandments on the above principle, if such a perversion of sense and reason may be so called, in the Bible Magazine, vol. iv. pp. 13, 14.) In like manner the first psalm, which, it is generally admitted, describes the respective happiness and misery of the pious and the wicked, according to the Cocceian hypothesis, has been applied to the Saviour of the world, in whom alone all the characters of goodness are made to centre, without any reference to its moral import! An ordinary reader, who peruses Isa. iv. 1., would naturally suppose that the prophet was predicting the calamities that should befall the impenitently wicked Jews, previously to the Babylonish captivity; which calamities he represents to be so great that seven women shall take hold of one man, that is, use importunity to be married, and that upon the hard and unusual conditions of maintaining themselves. But this simple and literal meaning of the passage, agreeably to the rule that the words of Scripture signify every thing which they can signify, has been distorted by the prophet makes a transition to evangelical times, this first verse has been made to mean the rapid conversion of mankind to the Christian faith; the seven women are the converted persons, and the one man is Jesus Christ! A simple reference to the context and subject-matter of the prophecy would have shown that this verse properly belonged to the third chapter, and had no reference whatever to Gospel times. On the absurdity of the exposition just noticed, it is needless to make any comment. It is surpassed only by the reveries of a modern writer on the Continent, who has pushed the Cocceian hypothesis to the utmost bounds. According to his scheme, the incest of Lot and his daughters was permitted, only to be a sign of the salvation which the world was afterwards to receive from Jesus Christ; and Joshua the son of Nun signifies the same thing as Jesus the son of Man!!! (Mélanges de Religion, de Morale, et de Critique Sacrée, published at Nîmes, tome i. pp. 159, 160.)

In these strictures, the author trusts he shall not be charged with improperly censuring "that fair and sober accommodation of the historical and parabolical parts to present times and circumstances, or to the elucidation of either the doctrines or precepts of Christianity, which is sanctioned by the word of God;" and which he has attempted to illustrate in the preceding criteria for ascertaining the mystical or spiritual meaning of the Scriptures. Such an accommodation, it is justly remarked, is perfectly allowable, and may be highly useful; and in some cases it is absolutely necessary. "Let every truly pious man, however, beware of the danger of extending this principle beyond its natural and obvious application; lest he should wander himself, and lead others also astray from that clearly traced and well beaten path in which we are assured that even 'a wayfaring man though a fool should not err.' Let no temptations, which vanity, a desire of popularity, or the more specious, but equally fallacious, plea of usefulness may present, seduce him from his tried way. On the contrary, let him adhere with jealous care to the plain and unforced dictates of the word of God; lest, by departing from the simplicity of the Gospel, he should inadvertently contribute to the adulteration of Christianity, and to the consequent injury which must thence arise to the spiritual interest of his fellow-creatures."⁴

IV. APPLICATION OF the preceding principles to the spiritual interpretation of the Miracles recorded in the New Testament.

Although (as we have already observed) the design of miracles⁵ is to mark the divine interposition, yet, when perusing the miracles recorded in the Sacred Writings, we are not to lose sight of the moral and religious instruction concealed under them, and especially under the miracles performed by our Saviour. "All his miracles," indeed, "were undoubtedly so many testimonies that he was sent from God: but they were much more than this, for they were all of such a kind, and attended with such circumstances, as give us an insight into the spiritual state of man, and the great work of his salvation." They were significant emblems of his designs, and figures aptly representing the benefits to be conferred by him upon mankind, and had in them a spiritual sense.

Thus, he cast out evil spirits, who, by the Divine Providence, were permitted to exert themselves at that time, and to possess many persons. By this act he showed that he came to destroy the empire of Satan, and seemed to foretell that, whosoever his doctrine should prevail, idolatry and vice should be put to flight.—He gave sight to the blind, a miracle well suiting him who brought immortality to light, and taught truth to an ignorant world. Lucem caliganti reddidit mundo, applied by Quintus Curtius to a Roman emperor, can be strictly applied to Christ, and to him alone. No prophet ever did this miracle before him, as none ever made the religious discoveries which he made. Our Saviour himself leads us to this observation, and sets his miracle in the same view, saying, upon that occasion, I am the light of the world; I am come into this world, that they which see not might see. He cured the deaf, and the dumb, and the lame, and the infirm, and cleansed the lepers, and healed all manner of sicknesses, to show at the same time that he was the physician of souls, which have their diseases corresponding in some manner to those of the body, and are deaf, and dumb, and impotent, and paralytic, and leprous in the spiritual sense.—He fed the hungry multitudes by a miracle, which aptly represented his heavenly doctrine, and the Gospel preached to the poor, and which he himself so explains, saying,—I am the living bread which came down from heaven; if any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever.—He raised the dead, a miracle peculiarly suiting him, who at the last day should call forth all mankind to appear before him; and, therefore, when he raised Lazarus he uttered those majestic words: I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live.—He performed some miracles upon persons who were not of his own nation, and it was ordered by Divine Providence,

The same topic is also further noticed in volume xvi. for 1817, p. 319. et seq. Many important observations on the history and abuses of spiritual interpretation will be found in the late Rev. J. J. Conybeare's Bampton Lectures for 1824. The whole of Bishop Horne's Preface to his Commentary on the Psalms is equally worthy of perusal for its excellent observations on the same question. that these persons, as the centurion, the Syrophenician woman, the Samaritan leper, should show a greater degree of faith and of gratitude than the Jews to whom the same favours were granted. This was an indication that the Gospel would be more readily received by the Gentiles than by the Jews, and this our Saviour intimates, saying when he had commended the centurion's faith, Many shall come from the east and from the west, from the north and from the south, and shall sit down with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven; but the children of the kingdom shall be cast out into utter darkness.

It were easy to adduce other instances, but the preceding will suffice to establish the rule, especially as the spiritual import of the Christian miracles is particularly considered by every writer that has expressly illustrated them, but by no one with more sobriety than by Dr. Jortin, to whom we are indebted for most of the preceding illustrations.¹

SECTION III.

ON THE INTERPRETATION OF TYPES.

I. Nature of a type.—II. Different species of types.—1. Legal types.—2. Prophetical types.—3. Historical types.—III. Rules for the interpretation of types.—IV. Remarks on the interpretation of symbols.

I. A TYPE, in its primary and literal meaning, simply denotes a rough draught, or less accurate model, from which a more perfect image is made; but, in the sacred or theological sense of the term, a type may be defined to be a symbol of something future and distant, or an example prepared and evidently designed by God to prefigure that future thing. What is thus prefigured is called the antitype.²

1. The first characteristic of a type is its ADUMBRATION OF THE THING TYPIFIED.

One thing may adumbrate another,—either in something which it has in common with the other; as the Jewish victims by their leath represented Christ, who in the fulness of time was to die for mankind,—or in a symbol of some property possessed by the other; as the images of the cherubim, placed in the inner sanctuary of the temple, beautifully represented the celerity of the angels of heaven, not indeed by any celerity of their own, but by wings of curious contrivance, which exhibited an appropriate symbol of swiftness,—or in any other way, in which the thing representing can be compared with the thing represented; as Melchisedec the priest of the Most High God represented Jesus Christ our priest. For though Melchisedec was not an eternal priest, yet the sacred writers have attributed to him a slender and shadowy appearance of eternity, by not mentioning the genealogy of the parents, the birth or death of so illustrious a man, as they commonly do in the case of other eminent persons, but under the divine direction concealing all these particulars.

2. The next requisite to constitute a type is, THAT IT BE PREPARED AND DESIGNED BY GOD TO REPRESENT ITS ANTITYPE.³

This forms the distinction between a type and a simile; for many things are compared to others, which they were not made to resemble, for the purpose of representing them. For, though it is said that "all flesh is grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of grass" (1 Pet. i. 24.), no one can consider the tenuity of grass as a type of human weakness, or the flower of grass as a type of human glory. The same remark must be applied also to a metaphor, or that species of simile in which one thing is called by the name of another; for, though Herod from his cunning is called a fox (Luke xiii. 32.), and Judah for his courage a lion's whelp (Gen. xlix. 9.), yet no one supposes foxes to be types of Herod, or young lions types of Judah.

3. Our definition of a type includes also, that the OBJECT REPRESENTED BY IT IS SOMETHING FUTURE.

Those institutions of Moses, which partook of the nature of types, are called "a shadow of things to come" (Col. ii. 17.); and those things which happened unto the fathers for types are said to have been written for our admonition, "upon whom the ends of the world are come." (1 Cor. x. 1. 11.) In the same sense the Mosaic law, which abounded with numerous types, is declared to have had "a shadow of good things to come." (Heb. x. 1.) And those things which by the command of God were formerly transacted in the tabernacle, are described as prefiguring what was afterwards to be done in the heavenly sanctuary. (Heb. ix. 11, 12, 23, 24.) Hence it appears, that a type and a symbol differ from each other as a genus and species. The term symbol is equally applicable to that which represents a thing, past, present, or future; whereas the object represented by a type is invariably future. So that all the rites which signified to the Jews any virtues that they were to practise, ought to be called symbols rather than types; and those rites, if there were any, which were divinely appointed to represent things both present and future, may be regarded as both symbols and types;—symbols, as denoting things present; and types, as indicating things future.

4. We may further remark, that a type differs from a parable, in being grounded on a matter of fact, not on a fictitious narrative, but is much of the same nature in actions, or things and persons, as an allegory is in words; though allegories are frequently so plain, that it is scarcely possible for any man to mistake them; and thus it is, in many cases, with respect to types.

Where, indeed, there is only one type or resemblance, it is in some instances not so easily discernible; but where several circumstances concur, it is scarcely possible not to perceive the agreement subsisting between the type and the antitype. Thus, the ark was a type of baptism; the land of Canaan, of heaven; the elevation of the brazen serpent, and the prophet Jonah, of our Saviour's crucifixion and resurrection.

II. In the examination of the Sacred Writings, three SPECIES of types present themselves to our consideration; viz. Legal Types, or those contained in the Mosaic law; Prophetical Types, and Historical Types.

1. LEGAL TYPES.—It evidently appears, from comparing the history and economy of Moses with the whole of the New Testament, that the ritual law was typical of the Messiah and of Gospel blessings; and this point has been so clearly established by the great apostle of the Gentiles in his Epistle to the Hebrews, that it will suffice to adduce a very few examples, to show the nature of Legal Types.

Thus, the entire constitution, and offerings of the Levitical priesthood, typically prefigured Christ the great high-priest (Heb. v. vii. viii.); and especially the ceremonies observed on the great day of atonement (Lev. xvi. with Heb. ix. throughout, and x. 1–22.) So, the passover and the paschal lamb typified the sacrifice of Jesus Christ (Exod. xii. 3. et seq. with John xix. 36, and 1 Cor. v. 7.); so, the feast of Pentecost, which commemorated the giving of the law on Mount Sinai (Exod. xix. xx.), prefigured the effusion of the Holy Spirit on the apostles, who were thus enabled to promulgate the Gospel throughout the then known world. (Acts ii. 1–11.) And it has been conjectured, that the feast of tabernacles typifies the final restoration of the Jews. In like manner, the privileges of the Jews were types of those enjoyed by all true Christians; "for their relation to God as his people, signified by the name Israelite (Rom. ix. 4.), prefigured the more honourable relation, in which believers, the true Israel, stand to God.—Their adoption as the sons of God, and the privileges they were entitled to by that adoption, were types of believers being made partakers of the divine nature by the renewing of the Holy Ghost, and of their title to the inheritance of heaven.—The residence of the glory, first in the tabernacle and then in the temple, was a figure of the residence of God by his Spirit in the Christian church, His temple on earth, and of His eternal residence in that church brought to perfection in heaven.—The covenant with Abraham was the new or Gospel covenant, the blessings of which were typified by the temporal blessings promised to him and to his natural seed; and the covenant at Sinai, whereby the Israelites, as the worshippers of the true God, were separated from the idolatrous nations, was an emblem of the final separation of the righteous from the wicked.—In the giving of the law, and the formation of the Israelites into a nation or community, was represented the formation of a city of the living God, and of the general assembly of the church of the first-born.—Lastly, the heavenly country, the habitation of the righteous, was typified by Canaan, a country given to the Israelites by God's promise."⁴

2. PROPHETICAL TYPES are those, by which the divinely inspired prophets prefigured or signified things either present or future, by means of external symbols.

Of this description is the prophet Isaiah's going naked (that is, without his prophetic garment) and barefoot (Isa. xx. 2.), to prefigure the fatal destruction of the Egyptians and Ethiopians.—The hiding of a girdle in a rock on the banks of the Euphrates, which, on being subsequently taken thence, proved to be rotten, to denote the destruction which would speedily befall the abandoned and ingrateful Jewish people (Jer. xiii. 1-7, compared with the following verses)—the abstaining from marriage (Jer. xvi. 2), mourning (Jer. 5), and fasting (Jer. 8), to indicate the woful calamities denounced by Jehovah against his people for their sins. Similar calamities are prefigured by breaking a potter's vessel. (Jer. xviii. 2-10.) By making bonds and yokes (Jer. xxvii. 1-8) is prefigured the subjugation of the kings of Edom, Moab, the Ammonites, Tyre, and Sidon, by Nebuchadnezzar; and in like manner, Agarab's binding his own hands with Paul's girdle intimated the apostle's captivity at Jerusalem. (Acts xxi. 10, 11.)

To this class of types may be referred prophetic and typical visions of future events: some of these have their interpretation annexed; as Jeremiah's vision of the almond tree and a seething pot (Jer. i. 11-16), Ezekiel's vision of the resurrection of dry bones (Ezek. xxxvii.), with many similar instances recorded in the Sacred Writings. Other typical visions, however, will in all probability be explained only by their actual accomplishment; as Ezekiel's vision of the temple and holy city (ch. xl. to the end), and especially the Revelation of Saint John: which will then be most clear and intelligible when the whole is fulfilled; as we can now plainly read the calling of the Gentiles in many parts of the Old Testament, which seemed so strange a thing, before it was accomplished, even to those who were well acquainted with the writings of the prophets. See an instance of this in Acts xi. 1-18.

3. HISTORICAL TYPES are the characters, actions, and fortunes of some eminent persons recorded in the Old Testament, so ordered by Divine Providence as to be exact prefigurations of the characters, actions, and fortunes, of future persons who should arise under the Gospel dispensation.

In some instances, the persons whose characters and actions prefigured future events, were declared by Jehovah himself to be typical, long before the events which they prefigured came to pass: these have been termed innate, or natural historical types; and these may be safely admitted. But inferred types, or those in which typical persons were not known to be such, until after the things which they typified had actually happened (and which can only be consequentially ascertained to be such by probabilities supposed to be agreeable to the analogy of faith), cannot be too carefully avoided, notwithstanding they have the sanction of some eminent expositors, because they are not supported by the authority of the inspired writers of the New Testament.¹

III. From the preceding remarks and statements it will be obvious, that great caution is necessary in the INTERPRETATION OF TYPES; for unless we have the authority of the sacred writers themselves for it, we cannot conclude with certainty that this or that person or thing, which is mentioned in the Old Testament, is a type of Christ on account of the resemblance which we may perceive between them: but we may admit it as probable. "Whatever persons or things recorded in the Old Testament were expressly declared by Christ, or by his apostles, to have been designed as prefigurations of persons or things relating to the New Testament, such persons or things so recorded in the former are types of the persons or things with which they are compared in the latter. But if we assert, that a person or thing was designed to prefigure another person or thing, where no such prefiguration has been declared by divine authority, we make an assertion for which we neither have, nor can have, the slightest foundation. And even when comparisons are instituted in the New Testament between antecedent and subsequent persons or things, we must be careful to distinguish the examples, where a comparison is instituted merely for the sake of illustration, from the examples where such a connection is declared, as exists in the relation of a type to its antitype."² In the interpretation of types, therefore,

2. There must be a fit application of the Type to the Antitype.

"To constitute one thing the type of another, as the term is generally understood in reference to Scripture, something more is wanted than mere resemblance. The former must not only resemble the latter, but must have been designed to resemble the latter. It must have been so designed in its original institution. It must have been designed as something preparatory to the latter. The type, as well as the antitype, must have been preordained; and they must have been preordained as constituent parts of the same general scheme of Divine Providence. It is this previous design and this preordained connection, which constitute the relation of type and antitype. Where these qualities fail, where the previous design and the preordained connection are wanting, the relation between any two things, however similar in themselves, is not the relation of type to antitype."³ In further explanation of this canon, it may be remarked, that in a type every circumstance is far from being typical, as in a parable there are several incidents, which are not to be considered as parts of the parable, nor to be insisted upon as such. From not considering the evident relation which ought to subsist between the type and the antitype, some fanciful expositors, under pretence that the tabernacle of Moses was a figure of the church or of heaven, have converted even the very boards and nails of it into types. Thus Cardinal Bellarmine⁴ found the mass to be typified by Melchisedec's bringing forth bread and wine, he being a priest of the Most High God. The same great adversary of the Protestants (in his Traité de Laities) in like manner discovered that their secession under Luther "was typified by the secession of the ten tribes under Jeroboam; while the Lutherans, with equal reason, retorted that Jeroboam was a type of the Pope, and that the secession of Israel from Judah typified, not the secession of the Protestants under Luther, but the secession of the church of Rome from primitive Christianity. But, to whichever of the two events the secession under Jeroboam may be supposed the most similar (if similarity exist there at all beyond the mere act of secession), we have no authority for pronouncing it a type of either. We have no proof of previous design and of preordained connection between the subjects of comparison; we have no proof that the secession of the Israelites under Jeroboam was designed to prefigure any other secession whatever."⁵ From the same inattention to considering the necessarily evident relation between the type and the antitype, the Hebrew monarch Saul, whose name is by interpretation Death, has been made a type of the moral law, which Saint Paul terms the "ministration of death." (2 Cor. iii. 7.) In like manner, the period, which elapsed between the anointing of David and the death of Saul, has been made to typify the time of Christ's ministry upon earth!! And the long war between the house of Saul and the house of David (2 Sam. iii. 1.), in which David vexed stronger and stronger, and the house of Saul weaker and weaker, has been represented as strikingly portrayed in the lengthened contests between the righteousness of faith and that of works so often alluded to in the epistles, especially in those addressed to the Romans and Galatians!!⁶

It were no difficult task to adduce numerous similar examples of abuse in the interpretation of types; but the preceding will suffice to show the danger of falling into it, and the necessity of confining our attention to the strict relation between the type and the antitype. In further illustration of this canon it may be remarked, that in expounding typical passages two points should be always kept in mind, viz.

(1.) The TYPE must in the first instance be explained according to its literal sense; and if any part of it appear to be obscure, such obscurity must be removed: as in the history of Jonah, who was swallowed by a great fish, and cast ashore on the third day.

(2.) The ANALOGY between the thing prefiguring and the thing prefigured must be soberly shown in all its parts.

The criteria for ascertaining this analogy are to be found solely in the Sacred Writings themselves; for whenever the Holy Spirit refers any thing to analogy, either expressly or by implication, there we may rest assured that such analogy was designed by God. But further than this we cannot safely go.

2. There is often more in the Type than in the Antitype.

God designed one person or thing in the Old Testament to be a type or shadow of things to come, not in all things, but only in respect to some particular thing or things: hence we find many things in the type that are inapplicable to the antitype. The use of this canon is shown in the Epistle to the Hebrews, in which the ritual and sacrifices of the Old Testament are fairly accommodated to Jesus Christ the antitype, although there are many things in that priesthood which do not accord. Thus the priest was to offer sacrifice for his own sins (Heb. v. 3.), which is in no respect applicable to Christ. (Heb. vii. 27.) Again, the Mosaic priesthood is (vii. 13.) weak and unprofitable, neither of which characters can be applied to the Redeemer, who continueth ever, and hath an unchangeable priesthood. (vii. 24, 25.)

3. Frequently there is more in the Antitype than in the Type.

The reason of this canon is the same as that of the preceding rule: for, as no single type can express the life and particular actions of Christ, there is necessarily more in the antitype than can be found in the type itself; so that one type must signify one thing, and another type another thing. Thus, one goat could not typify Christ both in his death and resurrection: therefore two were appointed (Lev. xvi. 7.), one of which was offered, and prefigured his "full, perfect, and sufficient atonement;" while the other, which was dismissed, typified his triumph over death and the grave. In like manner, Moses was a type of Christ as a Deliverer, or Saviour, in bringing the children of Israel out of Egypt, and Joshua, in bringing them into Canaan, which was a type of heaven,—the true country of all sincere Christians.

4. The wicked, as such, are not to be made Types of Christ.

For how can a thing, which is bad in itself, prefigure or typify a thing that is good? Yet, for want of attending to this obvious and almost self-evident proposition, some expositors have interpreted the adultery of David, and the incest of Amnon, as typical of the Messiah! and the oak on which Absalom was suspended, by the hair of the head has been made a type of the cross of Christ!⁷ It is not, however, to be denied, that the punishments of some malefactors are accommodated to Christ as an antitype. Thus, Deut. xxi. 23. is by Saint Paul accommodated typically to him, Gal. iii. 13. Jonah, we have already observed, was a type of Christ, by his continuance three days and three nights in the belly of a great fish: but the point of resemblance is to be sought, not in his being there as the punishment of his disobedience to the divine command, but in his coming forth, at the expiration of that time, alive, and in perfect vigour; which coming forth prefigured the resurrection of Christ.

5. In Types and Antitypes, an enallage or change sometimes takes place; as when the thing prefigured assumes the name of the Type or figure; and, on the contrary, when the Type of the thing represented assumes the name of the Antitype.

(4to. or 8vo.) of his translation of the Apostolical Epistles, Essay viii. sect. 1-5. ³ Bishop Marsh's Lectures, part iii. p. 115.

⁴ Ibid. part iii. p. 113.

⁵ De Missa, lib. i. c. 9.

Of the first kind of enallage we have examples in Ezek. xxxiv. 23. xxxvii. 24. 25. and Hos. iii. 5.; in which descriptions of Messiah's kingdom he is styled David: because as he was prefigured by David in many respects, so he was to descend from him. In like manner Christ is called a lamb (John i. 29. 36. and Rev. xix. 7. 9.), because the paschal lamb was an eminent type of him. So, the Christian church is sometimes called Mount Zion and Jerusalem (Gal. iv. 26. Heb. xii. 22. Rev. xxi. 2.), because these places were types of her.

Of the second kind of enallage we have instances:—1. In prophetical types, in which the name of a person or thing, properly agreeing with the antitype, and for which the type was proposed, is given to any one: as in Isa. vii. 3. and viii. 1—3. So, the wife of the prophet Hosea, and his legitimate children, are by the command of Jehovah termed a wife of whoredoms, and children of whoredoms (Hos. i. 2.), on account of the Israelites, who were the antitype, and were guilty of spiritual whoredom or adultery. See Hos. i. 3. 6. 9.—2. In historical types, as when hanging was called in the Old Testament the curse of the Lord, because it was made a type of Christ, who was made a curse for our sins, as the apostle Paul argues in Gal. iii. 13.

6. That we may not fall into extremes, in the interpretation of Types, we must, in every instance, proceed cautiously, "with fear and trembling," lest we imagine mysteries to exist where none were ever intended.

No mystical or typical sense, therefore, ought to be put upon a plain passage of Scripture, the meaning of which is obvious and natural; unless it be evident from some other part of Scripture that the place is to be understood in a double sense. When Paul says (Gal. iii. 24. Col. ii. 17.) that the law was a schoolmaster to bring men to Christ, and a shadow of things to come, we must instantly acknowledge that the ceremonial law in general was a type of the mysteries of the Gospel. Nothing can be more contrary to that sober judgment which is so strenuously urged by the apostle (Rom. xii. 3.), than to seek for types where there are not the smallest marks or traces of any; and that, too, by contradicting the plain and literal meaning of Scripture, and not unfrequently in direct opposition to common sense. "Should not the prudence and moderation of Christ and his apostles in this respect be imitated? Is it not pretending to be wiser than they were, to look for mysteries where they designed none? How unreasonable is it to lay an useless weight on the consciences of Christians, and to bear down the true and revealed, under the unwieldy burden of traditional mysteries?"¹

IV. Closely connected with the interpretation of types is the expounding of SYMBOLS; which, though often confounded with them, are nevertheless widely different in their nature. By *symbols*² we mean "certain representative marks, rather than express pictures; or, if pictures, such as were at the time characters, and, besides presenting to the eye the resemblance of a particular object, suggested a general idea to the mind. As when a horn was made to denote strength, an eye and sceptre, majesty, and in numberless such instances; where the picture was not drawn to express merely the thing itself, but something else, which was, or was conceived to be, analogous to it. This more complex and ingenious form of picture-writing was much practised by the Egyptians, and is that which we know by the name of Hieroglyphics."³

It has been doubted whether symbolical language should be referred to figurative or spiritual interpretation: in the former case, it would have occupied a place in the discussion respecting the figurative language of Scripture; but, on consideration, it will appear that it is most nearly allied to spiritual interpretation. For a symbol differs from a type in this respect, that the former represents something past or present, while a type represents something future. The images of the cherubim over the propitiatory were symbols; the bread and wine in the last supper also were symbols. The commanded sacrifice of Isaac was given for a type; the sacrifices of the law were types. So far, Bishop Warburton has remarked, symbols and types agree in their genus, that they are equally representations, but in their species they differ widely. It is not required, he further observes, that the symbol should partake of the nature of the thing represented: the cherubim shadowed out the celerity of angels, but not by any physical celerity of their own; the bread and wine shadowed out the body and blood of Christ, but not by any change in the elements. But types being, on the contrary, representations of things future, and so partaking of the nature of prophecy, were to convey information concerning the nature of the antitypes, or of the things represented; which they could not do but by the exhibition of their own nature. And hence we recollect, that the command to offer Isaac, being the command to offer a real sacrifice, the death and sufferings of Christ, thereby represented, were a real sacrifice.⁴

As the same rules, which regulate the general interpretation of the tropes and figures occurring in the Scriptures, are equally applicable to the interpretation of symbols, it will be sufficient to refer to a former part of this volume,⁵ in which that topic is particularly discussed. Much light will also be thrown upon the symbolical language of Scripture, by a careful collation of the writings of the prophets with each other; for "the symbolical language of the prophets is almost a science in itself. None can fully comprehend the depth, sublimity, and force of their writings, who are not thoroughly acquainted with the peculiar and appropriate imagery they were accustomed to use. This is the main key to many of the prophecies; and, without knowing how to apply it, the interpreter will often in vain essay to discover their hidden treasures."⁶ Lastly, the diligent comparison of the New Testament with the Old will essentially contribute to illustrate the symbolical phraseology of the prophets. For instance, we learn what is intended by the water promised to the Israelites in Isa. xlv. 3., and to which the thirsty are invited in ch. lv. 1., from John iv. 10. and vii. 37—39.; where it is explained of the Holy Spirit and his gifts which were afterwards to be dispensed.⁷

In the preceding observations on the interpretation of types, the author has chiefly been indebted to Glassii Philologia Sacra, lib. ii. part i. tract ii. sect. iv. col. 442—472, which has been unaccountably omitted by Prof. Dabie in his otherwise truly valuable edition of that work; Langii Hermeneutica Sacra, pp. 97—119.; J. E. Pfeiffer, Inst. Herm. Sacra, pp. 775—795.; Viscer, Hermeneutica Sacra Novi Testamenti, part ii. pp. 184—188. The subject of types is particularly considered and ably illustrated in Dr. Outram de Sacrificiis, particularly lib. i. cap. 18. and lib. ii. c. 7. (pp. 217—228. 361—384.) of Mr. Allen's translation already noticed; Mr. Faber's Horae Mosaeicae, vol. ii. pp. 40—173.; Bishop Chandler's Defence of Christianity from the Prophecies of the Old Testament, &c. chap. iii.; and Mr. Wilson's popular Inquiry into the Doctrine of Scripture Types. Edinburgh, 1823. 8vo. But the fullest view of this subject is stated by Dr. Graves to be found in the Rev. Samuel Mather's work on the Figures and Types of the Old Testament. Dublin, 1683. 4to.

² Before an alphabet was invented, and what we call literary writing was formed into an art, men had no way to record their conceptions, or to convey them to others at a distance, but by setting down the figures and tropes of such things as were the objects of their contemplation. Hence, the way of writing in picture was as universal, and almost as early, as the way of speaking in metaphor; and from the same reason, the necessity of the thing. In process of time, and through many successive improvements this rude and simple mode of picture-writing was succeeded by that of symbols, or was enlarged at least and enriched by it. CHAPTER IV.

ON THE INTERPRETATION OF THE SCRIPTURE PROPHECIES.

SECTION I.

GENERAL RULES FOR ASCERTAINING THE SENSE OF THE PROPHETIC WRITINGS.

PROPHECY, or the prediction of future events, is justly considered as the highest evidence that can be given, of supernatural communion with the Deity. The force of the argument from prophecy, for proving the divine inspiration of the sacred records, has already been exhibited; and the cavils of objectors, from its alleged obscurity, has been obviated.¹ Difficulties, it is readily admitted, do exist in understanding the prophetic writings: but these are either owing to our ignorance of history and of the Scriptures, or because the prophecies themselves are yet unfulfilled. The latter can only be understood when the events foretold have actually been accomplished: but the former class of difficulties may be removed in many, if not in all cases; and the knowledge, sense, and meaning of the prophets may, in a considerable degree, be attained by prayer, reading, and meditation, and by comparing Scripture with Scripture, especially with the writings of the New Testament, and particularly with the book of the Revelation.² With this view, the following general rules will be found useful in investigating the sense and meaning of the prophecies, as well as their accomplishment.

1. *As not any prophecy of Scripture is of self-interpretation, (2 Pet. i. 20.), or is its own interpreter, "the sense of the prophecy is to be sought in the events of the world, and in the harmony of the prophetic writings, rather than in the bare terms of any single prediction."*³

In the consideration of this canon, the following circumstances should be carefully attended to:—

(1.) Consider well the times when the several prophets flourished, in what place and under what kings they uttered their predictions, the duration of their prophetic ministry, and their personal rank and condition, and, lastly, whatever can be known respecting their life and transactions.

These particulars, indeed, not in every instance be ascertained, the circumstances relating to many of the prophets being very obscure: but, where they can be known, it is necessary to attend to them, as this will materially contribute to the right understanding of the prophetic writings.⁴ Thus, in order to understand correctly the prophecy of Isaiah, we should make ourselves acquainted with the state and condition of the people of Israel under the kings Amaziah, Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah. With this view, the books of Kings (2. xiv.—xxi.) and 2 Chron. (xvi.—xxii.) ought to be repeatedly perused and studied; because they contain an accurate view of the state of those times.

(2.) The situation of the particular places, of which the prophets speak, must also be kept in mind, as well as that of the neighbouring places: there being in the prophetic writings frequent allusions to the situation and ancient names of places.

¹ See Vol. I. pp. 119—142. For an account of the Prophets, see Vol. II. pp. 253—259. and for an analysis of their writings, with critical remarks thereon, see also Vol. II. pp. 259—269.

² There is scarcely an expression in this book which is not taken out of Daniel or some other prophet. Sir Isaac Newton has observed, that it is written in the same style and language with the prophecies of Daniel, and has the same relation to them which they have to one another, so that all of them together make but one complete prophecy; and in like manner it consists of two parts, an introductory prophecy, and an interpretation thereof. (Observations on the Apocalypse, chap. ii. p. 254.) The style of the Revelations, says the profoundly learned Dr. Lightfoot, "is very prophetic as to the things spoken, and very hebraizing as to the speaking of them. Exceeding much of the old prophet's language and manner [is] adduced to intimate New Stories; and exceeding much of the Jews' language and allusion to their customs and opinions, thereby to speak the things more familiarly to be understood." Harmony of the New Testament, p. 154. (Lond. 1655.) See also Langii Hermeneutica Sacra, pp. 148—150.

³ Bishop Horsley. This learned prelate has shown in his sermon on 2 Pet. i. 20. that the clause—No prophecy of the Scripture is of any private interpretation—may be more precisely thus expressed:—"Not any prophecy of Scripture is of self-interpretation, or is its own interpreter: because the Scripture prophecies are not detached predictions of separate independent events, but are united in a regular and entire system, all terminating in one great object,—the promulgation of the Gospel, and the complete establishment of the Messiah's kingdom." Sermons, vol. ii. pp. 13—16.

⁴ On the chronological order, &c. of the prophets, see Vol. II. pp. 269—299.

When places are mentioned as lying north, south, east, or west, it is generally to be understood of their situation with respect to Judaea or Jerusalem; when the context does not plainly restrict the scene to some other place. For instance, Egypt and Arabia are every where called the land of the south, because they are situated to the south of Jerusalem: thus in Daniel (ch. xi.) the king of the south signifies the king of Egypt, and the king of the north, the monarch of Syria. The sea is often put for the west, the Mediterranean Sea being to the west of Judaea: by the earth, the prophets often mean the land of Judaea, and sometimes the great continent of all Asia and Africa, to which they had access by land; and by the isles of the sea, they understood the places to which they sailed, particularly all Europe, and probably the islands and sea-coasts of the Mediterranean. The appellation of sea is also given to the great rivers Nile and Euphrates, which, overflowing their banks, appear like small seas or great lakes. The Egyptian Sea, with its seven streams, is mentioned in Isa. xxi. 15. is the Nile with its seven mouths: the sea, mentioned in Isa. xxvii. 1. and Jer. li. 36. is the Euphrates; and the desert of the sea, in Isa. xxi. 1. is the country of Babylon, watered by that river. In like manner, the Jewish people are described by several particular appellations, after the division of the kingdom in the reign of Jeroboam: thus, the ten tribes, being distinct from the other two, and subject to a different king, until the time of the Assyrian captivity, are respectively called Samaria, Ephraim, and Joseph; because the city of Samaria, which was situated in the allotment of the tribe of Ephraim, who was the son of Joseph, was the metropolis of the kings of Israel. Compare Isa. vii. 2. 5. 8. 9. Psal. lxxxi. 5. Hos. vii. 11. Amos v. 15. and vi. 6. They were also called Israel and Jacob, because they formed the greater part of Israel's or Jacob's posterity. The other two tribes of Judah and Benjamin are called the kingdom of Judah, the house of David, Jerusalem, or Sion (Isa. vii. 13. and xl. 2. Psal. cxxvi. 1. and Isa. lii. 8.), because those two tribes adhered to the family of David, from whose posterity their kings sprang, and the capital of their dominions was Jerusalem, within whose precincts was Mount Sion. After their return, however, from the Babylonish captivity, the names of Israel and Judah are promiscuously applied to all the descendants of the twelve tribes who were thus restored to their native country. This is the case in the writings of the prophets Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, who all flourished after that event. In addition to the situations and names of places, whatever relates to the history of those times must be ascertained, as far as is practicable, by consulting not only the historical books of Scripture, and the writings of Josephus (whose statements must sometimes be taken with great caution, as he has not always related the sacred history with fidelity), but also by comparing the narratives of Herodotus, Diodorus Siculus, and other profane historians, who have written on the affairs of the Chaldeans, Babylonians, Egyptians, Tyrians, Medes and Persians, and other Oriental nations, with whom the posterity of Jacob had any intercourse. Quotations from these writers may be seen in all the larger commentaries on the Bible. Dr. Prideaux's Connection of Sacred and Profane History, and Bishop Newton's Dissertations on the Prophecies, are both particularly valuable for the illustrations of the sacred predictions which they have respectively drawn from profane authors. In the Historical and Geographical Index, at the end of the second volume of this work, under the articles Assyria, Babylon, Egypt, Media, and Persia, we have given an Abstract of the Profane History of the East, from the time of Solomon until the Babylonish Captivity, to facilitate the better understanding of the history of the Hebrews, described in the writings of the prophets.

(3.) As the prophets treat not only of past transactions and present occurrences, but also foretell future events, in order to understand them, we must diligently consult the histories of the following ages, both sacred and profane, and carefully see whether we can trace in them the fulfilment of any prophecy.

The event is the best interpreter of a prediction: this inquiry into history, however, demands not only great labour, but also great industry and equal judgment, in order that the events may be referred to those prophecies with which they harmonize. These events must not be far-fetched; nor can they always be ascertained, because the circumstances alluded to by the prophets are often unknown to us, being yet future. Hence a considerable portion of the prophets, especially of the book of Revelation, is not only not understood, but cannot at present be comprehended. Some conjectures, perhaps, may be offered: but these should be advanced with caution as far as they throw light upon prophecy; and where this is wanting, we must withhold our assent from such conjectures.

(4.) The words and phrases of a prophecy must be explained, where they are obscure: if they be very intricate, every single word should be expounded; and, if the sense be involved in metaphorical and emblematical expressions (as very frequently is the case), these must be explained according to the principles already laid down.

No strained or far-fetched interpretation, therefore, should be admitted; and that sense of any word or phrase is always to be preferred, which is the clearest and most precise.

(5.) Similar prophecies of the same event must be carefully compared, in order to elucidate more clearly the sense of the sacred predictions.

For instance, after having ascertained the subject of the prophet's discourse and the use of the words, Isa. liii. 5. (He was wounded, literally pierced through, for our transgressions), may be compared with Psal. xxii. 16. (They pierced my hands and my feet), and with Zech. xii. 10. (They shall look on me whom they have pierced). In thus paralleling the prophecies, regard must be had to the predictions of former prophets, which are sometimes repeated with abridgment, or more distinctly explained by others; and also to the predictions of subsequent prophets, who sometimes repeat, with greater clearness and precision, former prophecies, which had been more obscurely announced.

II. In order to understand the prophets, great attention should be paid to the prophetic style, which is highly figurative, and particularly abounds in metaphorical and hyperbolic expressions.

By images borrowed from the natural world, the prophets often understand something in the world politic. Thus, as the sun, moon, stars, and heavenly bodies, denote kings, queens, rulers, and persons in great power; and the increase of splendour in those luminaries denotes increase of prosperity, as in Isa. xxx. 26. and lx. 19. On the other hand, their darkening, setting, or falling, signifies a reverse of fortune, or the entire destruction of the potentate or kingdom to which they refer. In this manner the prophet Isaiah denounced the divine judgments on Babylon (Isa. xli. 10, 13, and on Idumea (xxiv. 4-6); and Jeroniah, on the Jews and Jerusalem (Jer. iv. 23, 24). The destruction of Egypt is predicted in similar terms by Ezekiel (xxii. 7, 8); and also the terrible judgments that would befall the unbelieving Jews, by Joel (ii. 28-31). And Jesus Christ himself employed the same phraseology in foretelling the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans (Matt. xxiv. 29).

In further illustration of this rule it may be observed, that the prophetic writings contain numerous figures and similitudes that appear strange to our habits and modes of thinking; but which in their times were perfectly familiar. These figures and similitudes, therefore, must not be interpreted according to our notions of things, but agreeably to the genius of Oriental writing; for instance, very numerous metaphors are taken from agriculture and the pastoral life, which were common pursuits among the Jews, some of the prophets themselves having been herdsmen or shepherds. However humble such employments may appear to us, they were not accounted servile at the time the prophets flourished. Other representations of events, which were to come to pass under the New Testament dispensation, are drawn from the sacred rites of the Jews. Thus, the conversion of Egypt to the Gospel is foretold (Isa. xix. 19, 21) by setting up an altar, and offering sacrifice to the Lord; and the conversion of the Gentiles in general (Mal. i. 11) by the offering up of incense. The service of God under the Gospel is set forth (Zech. xiv. 16) by going up to Jerusalem, and keeping the feast of tabernacles there; and the abundant effusion of the Holy Spirit, in the miraculous gifts which attended the preaching of the Gospel, is represented (Joel ii. 23) by prophesying, and dreaming dreams, and seeing visions. In this passage the prophet did not intend to say, that these things should literally and actually take place under the Christian dispensation; but, in order that his meaning might be the better understood by those whom he addressed, he expressed the abundant measure of gifts and Gospel light by images drawn from those privileges which were at that time most highly valued by the Jews.

Although the prophets thus frequently employ words in a figurative or metaphorical meaning, yet we ought not, without necessity, to depart from the primitive sense of their expressions; and that necessity exists, only when the plain and original sense is less proper, as well as less suitable to the subject and context, or contrary to other passages of Scripture. But, even in this case, we must carefully assign to each prophetic symbol its proper and definite meaning, and never vary from that meaning.

III. As the greater part of the prophetic writings was first composed in verse, and still retains much of the air and cast of the original, an attention to the division of the lines, and to that peculiarity of Hebrew poetry by which the sense of one line or couplet so frequently corresponds with another, will frequently lead to the meaning of many passages; one line of a couplet, or member of a sentence, being generally a commentary on the other.

Of this rule we have an example in Isa. xxv. 6.

The Lord hath a sacrifice in Bozrah,
And a great slaughter in the land of Idumea.

Here the metaphor in the first verse is expressed in the same terms in the next: the sacrifice in Bozrah means the great slaughter in the land of Idumea, of which Bozrah was the capital. Similar instances occur in Isa. xlv. 3. and lxi. 10. and in Micah vi. 6. in which the parallelism is more extended. Concerning the nature of Prophetic Poesy, see P. 380. of the present volume.

IV. Particular names are often put by the prophets for more general ones, in order that they may place the thing represented, as it were, before the eyes of their hearers: but in such passages they are not to be understood literally.

Thus, in Joel iii. 4. Tyre and Sidon, and all the coast of Palestine, are put, by way of poetical description, for all the enemies of the Jews; and the Greeks and Sabeans for distant nations. In like manner the prophet Amos (ch. ix. 12), when speaking of the enemies of the Jews, mentions the remnant of Edom, or the Idumeans.

V. It is usual with the prophets to express the same thing in a great variety of expressions; whence they abound in amplifications, each rising above the other in strength and beauty.

For instance, when describing drought or famine, they accumulate together numerous epithets, to represent the sorrow that would accompany those calamities: on the other hand when delineating plenty, they portray, in a great variety of expressions, the joy of the people possessed of abundance of grain; and in like manner the horrors of war and the blessings of peace, the misery of the wicked and the blessedness of the righteous, are contrasted with numerous illustrations. It were unnecessary to cite examples, as we can scarcely open a single page of the prophetic writings without seeing instances; but in reading such passages it is not to be supposed that each individual phrase possesses a distinct and peculiar sense.

VI. The order of time is not always to be looked for in the prophetic writings; for they frequently resume topics of which they have formerly treated, after other subjects have intervened, and again discuss them.

Jeremiah and Ezekiel may, in particular, be cited as instances of this abruptness of style, who spoke of various things as they were moved by the Holy Spirit, and as occasion required; and whose discourses, being first dispersed, were afterwards collected together without regard to the order of time. In the midst of the mention of particular mercies promised to, or judgments denounced against, the people of God, the prophets sometimes break forth into sublime predictions concerning the Messiah: these digressions appear extremely abrupt and incoherent to those who do not consider how reasonable the mention of Christ may be, in conjunction with that of the mercies of God of which he is the foundation and pinnacle, the ground and consummation, and with the threats of the judgments of God, in which he was his people's grand consolation. A careful examination, however, of the plan and distribution of the different prophetic books will always enable the diligent reader to trace the arrangement and scope of the respective prophecies. Where, indeed, a new prediction or discourse is distinguished from a former one by a new title, as in Haggai i. 1. and ii. 10, 20, it is an easy task to trace such an arrangement and scope: but where the prophets do not introduce any new titles (Hosea for instance) it becomes very difficult. Vitrunga has laid it down as a canon, that in continued predictions, which are not distinguished one from another by titles or inscriptions, we should carefully attend both to the beginning and end of the prophetic sermon, as well as to the period of time in which the scene of the prophetic vision is fixed, and to the period in which it ends. This will tend to illustrate the sermons or discourses of Isaiah, in the forty-first and following chapters of his prophecy.

It is, however, probable that those prophecies—whose terminus à quo demonstrates the beginning of the time of Christ's kingdom, and the terminus ad quem the end of that time—give a narration of the principal events that shall befall the church in a continued series, unless any thing intervene which may require us to go back to former times. Upon this foundation depends the interpretation of Isa. liv. 1. to lx. 22. The commencement of this prophecy unquestionably belongs to the beginning of Messiah's kingdom: the term or end falls upon the most flourishing state of that kingdom, which is to follow the conversion of the Jewish nation, and the vindication of the afflicted church; which deliverance, as well as the flourishing state of Christ's kingdom, are described in Isa. lix. 19-21. and lx. throughout.

VII. The prophets often change both persons and tenses, sometimes speaking in their own persons, at other times representing God, his people, or their enemies, as respectively speaking, and without noticing the change of person; sometimes taking things past or present for things future, to denote the certainty of the events.

Of this observation we have a signal instance in that very obscure prediction contained in Isa. xxi. 11, 12, which, according to Bishop Lowth's translation, is as follows:—

THE ORACLE CONCERNING DUMAH.

A voice crieth unto me from Seir:
Watchman, what from the night?
Watchman, what from the night?
The watchman replieth:
The morning cometh, and also the night.
If ye will inquire, inquire ye: come again.

This prophecy, from the uncertainty of the occasion on which it was uttered, as well as from the brevity of the expression, is very obscure: but if we observe the transitions, and carefully distinguish between the person speaking and the person spoken to, we shall be able to apprehend its general import. It expresses the inquiries, made of a prophet of Jehovah by a people who were in a very distressed and hazardous condition, concerning the fates which awaited them. The Edomites as well as the Jews were subdued by the Babylonians. They anxiously inquire of the prophet, how long their subjection is to last. He intimates that the Jews should be delivered from captivity, but not the Edomites. The transition being thus observed, the obscurity disappears.

Isa. ix. 6, liii. throughout, liiii. throughout, Zech. ix. 9. and Rev. xviii. 2. (to mention no other instances), may be adduced as examples of the substitution of the past or present, in order to denote the certainty of things yet future: attention to the scope and context of the prophetic discourse will here also, as in the preceding rule, enable the reader to distinguish the various transitions with sufficient accuracy.

It may here be further observed, that, in the computation of time, a day is used by the prophet to denote a year: a week, seven years; and that when they speak of the latter, or last days, they invariably mean the days of the Messiah, or the time of the Gospel dispensation. The expression, that day, often means the same time, and always some period at a distance.

VIII. When the prophets received a commission to declare any thing, the message is sometimes expressed as if they had been appointed to do it themselves.

This remark has, in substance, been already made. It is introduced again, in order to illustrate the phraseology of the prophetic writings. One or two additional examples will show the necessity of attending to it in interpreting the predictions of the Sacred Writings.

³ This change of tense, however, is not exclusively confined to predictions of future events: it is sometimes used by the prophets to represent actions as performed which ought to be done: Thus, in Mal. i. 6. A son honours (ought to honour) his father. But it is more frequently employed by the writers of the New Testament to express both our Christian privileges, and the duties to which they oblige us. Thus, Matt. v. 13. — Ye are (ought to be) the salt of the earth. Rom. ii. 4. The goodness of God leadeth (ought to lead) thee to repentance. 2 Cor. iii. 18. We all with open face be holding (enjoying the means of beholding) as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are (ought to be) changed into the same image from glory to glory. Similar instances may be seen in 1 Cor. v. 7. Col. iii. 3. Heb. xiii. 24. 1 Pet. i. 6. 1 John ii. 15. iii. 9. and v. 4. 13. Dr. Taylor's Key to the Apostolic Writings, § 274. (Bishop Watson's Tracts, vol. iii. p. 241.)

Thus, when Isaiah was sent to tell the Jews, that their heart would become fat, and their ears heavy, and that they would be guilty of shutting their eyes, so as not to understand and believe the truth, the message is thus expressed:—Go and tell this people, hear ye indeed, but understand not, and see ye indeed, but perceive not. This implies, that they would not employ the faculties which they possessed, so as to understand and believe the Gospel. The reason of this is assigned:—Make the heart of this people fat, and make their ears heavy, and shut their eyes, lest they see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and convert, and be healed. (Isa. vi. 9, 10.) This is merely a prediction of what they would do; for when this prophetic declaration was accomplished, the Saviour quoted the passage, and expressed its genuine sense:—In them is fulfilled the prophecy of Esaias, which saith: For this people's heart is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes they have closed; lest at any time they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and should understand with their heart, and should be converted, and I should heal them. (Matt. xiii. 15.) This condition is still more explicitly stated in John iii. 19:—This is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil. For every one that doeth evil, hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved. The Lord said to Jeremiah, I have put my words in thy mouth, and to destroy, and to throw down, and to build, and to plant. (Jer. i. 10.) The meaning of this message is, that the prophet was appointed to declare to the nations, that they should be rooted out, pulled down, and destroyed, and that others would be planted in their place, and built up. When Ezekiel beheld the glory of the God of Israel, he observes, that it was according to the appearance of the vision which I saw when I came to DESTROY THE CITY. (Ezek. xliii. 3.) That is, when he came to prophesy that the city should be destroyed.

IX. *As symbolic actions and prophetic visions greatly resemble parables, and were employed for the same purpose, viz. more powerfully to instruct and engage the attention of the people, they must be interpreted in the same manner as parables.*¹

We must therefore chiefly consider the scope and design of such symbolic actions and prophetic visions, without attempting too minute an explanation of all the poetical images and figures with which the sacred writers adorned their style. For instance, in Zech. i. 7–11, it is not necessary to inquire what is meant by the man riding upon a red horse, and standing among the myrtle trees: this vision represents so many angels returning probably from the kingdoms over which they presided, to give to Jehovah an account of their expedition and ministry. The horse, it has been conjectured, denote their power and celerity; and the different colours the difference of their ministries. The scope of the vision, however, is sufficiently plain: the angels tell that all the earth was sitting still and at rest; the Persian empire and other nations connected with Judaea enjoying peace at that time, though the Jews continued in an unsettled state.²

SECTION II.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE ACCOMPLISHMENT OF PROPHECY IN GENERAL.

A PROPHECY is demonstrated to be fulfilled when we can prove that the event has actually taken place, precisely according to the manner in which it was foretold, either from sacred history, where that is practicable, or from profane authors of unimpeachable veracity; whose characters stand so high, that they cannot possibly be suspected of having forged any thing to favour the idea of its accomplishment. In order to ascertain whether a prediction has been fulfilled, we must first endeavour to find out the general scheme of the prophecy in question, by a careful comparison of the parts with the whole, and with corresponding prophecies, both earlier and later; and to classify the various things spoken of, lest the judgment be perplexed with a multitude of references. And, secondly, in our deductions from the prophecies thus arranged, those predictions, and their respective accomplishments, are principally to be selected and urged, which chiefly tend to remove all suspicion of their taking place by accident, or being foretold by some happy conjecture. Now this may be done, by showing the vast distance of time between the prophecy and the event foretold; the agreement of very many, even of the minutest circumstances, so that, when completed, the description determinately applies to the subject; and, lastly, the dependence of actions upon the uncertain will of man, or upon opportunity presenting itself: for all these things are of such a nature, that no unassisted human intellect either can or could possibly foresee them. These two general observations being premised, we now proceed to offer a few canons by which to ascertain the accomplishment of prophecy.

I. The same prophecies frequently have a double meaning, and refer to different events, the one near, the other remote; the one temporal, the other spiritual or perhaps eternal. The prophets thus having several events in view, their expressions may be partly applicable to one, and partly to another, and it is not always easy to mark the transitions. What has not been fulfilled in the first, we must apply to the second; and what has already been fulfilled, may often be considered as typical of what remains to be accomplished.

The double sense of prophecy has been opposed with much ingenuity by Mr. Whiston, Dr. Sykes, and Dr. Benson, in this country, and by father Balhous in France, as well as by most of the German theologians, who severally contend that the ancient prophecies contain only one sense: but, that the rule above stated is correct, we apprehend will appear from the following remarks and illustrations:—

1. "Throughout the whole of prophetic Scripture, a time of retribution and of vengeance on God's enemies is announced. It is called 'the day of the Lord,' 'the day of wrath and slaughter'; of the Lord's anger, visitation, and judgment;' 'the great day,' and 'the last day.' At the same time it is to be observed, that this kind of description, and the same expressions, which are used to represent this great day are also employed by the prophets to describe the fall and punishment of particular states and empires; of Babylon, by Isaiah (ch. xlii.); of Egypt, by Ezekiel (ch. xxx. 2–1. and xxxii. 7, 8); of Jerusalem, by Jeremiah, Joel, and by our Lord (Matt. xxiv.); and in many of these prophecies, the description of the calamity, which is to fall on any particular state or nation, is so blended and intermixed with that general destruction, which, in the final days of vengeance, will invade all the inhabitants of the earth, that the industry and skill of our ablest interpreters have been scarcely equal to separate and assort them. Hence it has been concluded, by judicious divines, that these partial prophecies and particular instances of the divine vengeance, whose accomplishment we know to have taken place, are presented to us as types, certain tokens, and forerunners of some greater events which are also disclosed in them. To the dreadful time of universal vengeance, they all appear to look forward, beyond their first and more immediate object. Little, indeed, can we doubt that such is to be considered the use and application of these prophecies, since we see them thus applied by our Lord and his apostles."³

2. The second psalm is primarily an inauguration hymn, composed by David, the anointed of Jehovah, when crowned with victory, and placed triumphant on the sacred hill of Zion. But in Acts iv. 25. the inspired apostles with one voice declare it to be descriptive of the exaltation of the Messiah, and of the opposition raised against the Gospel, both by Jews and Gentiles.—The latter part of the sixteenth psalm is spoken of David's person, and is, unquestionably, in its first and immediate sense, to be understood of him, and of his hope of rising after death to an endless life: but it is equally clear from Acts ii. 25–31. that it was spoken of Christ, the son of David, who was typified by that king and prophet. The twenty-second psalm, though primarily intended of David when he was in great distress and forsaken by God, is yet, secondarily and mystically, to be understood of our blessed Saviour during his passion upon the cross; and so it is applied by himself. (Matt. xxvii. 46.) And it is further observable, that other passages of this psalm (v. 8. 16. 18.), are noticed by the evangelist, as being fulfilled at that time (Matt. xxvii. 35. 43.); now it is certain that they could not be fulfilled unless they had been intended in this mysterious sense of Jesus Christ. The forty-fifth psalm is, in the original, a song of loves, an epithalamium on the nuptials of king Solomon and the king of Egypt's daughter: but from Heb. i. 8. we are assured that it is addressed to Christ; and, therefore, in a remote and spiritual sense, it celebrates the majesty and glory of his kingdom, his mystical union with his church, and the admirable benefits that would be conferred upon her in the times of the Gospel.

It would be no difficult task to adduce many other psalms in which the double sense is most clearly to be discerned:⁴ but we shall proceed to cite a few instances from the writings of the prophets.

(1.) Isa. vii. 14.—In the primary but lower sense of this prophecy, the sign given was to assure Ahaz that the land of Judaea would speedily be delivered from the kings of Samaria and Damascus, by whom it was invaded. But the introduction of the prophecy, the singular stress laid upon it, and the exact sense of the terms in which it was expressed, make it in a high degree probable that it had another and more important purpose; and the event has clearly proved that the sign given had, second-

¹ Dr. Woodhouse on the Apocalypse, pp. 172, 173. One of the most remarkable of these prophecies, he observes, is that splendid one of Isaiah, ch. xxiv.; the importance and universality of which is to be collected from the manner in which it is introduced: "All nations and people, the world and all things in it," are summoned to the audience. It represents "the day of the Lord's vengeance," and the year of the recompenses for the controversy of Zion (ver. 8.); it descends on all nations and their armies. (ver. 2.) The images of wrathful vengeance and utter dissolution are the same which are presented under the sixth seal in the Revelation of St. John. (vi. 12–17.) The hosts of heaven are dissolved; the heavens are rolled together as a scroll of parchment; the stars fall like a leaf from a vine, or a fig from its tree. And yet Idumea is mentioned by the prophet as the particular object of vengeance: such seems to be the typical completion and primary application of this prophecy; but it has evidently a more sublime and future prospect, and in this sense the whole world is its object; and using the same symbols and figurative expressions with the prophecy of the sixth seal, with those of the fourteenth, fifteenth, and, above all, the sixteenth chapters of the Apocalypse, and with others of the Old and New Testaments, it must, with them, be finally referred to the great day of the Lord's vengeance for its perfect completion." Ibid. p. 174.

² Dr. Randolph has a beautiful exposition of this psalm at the end of vol. i. of his View of Christ's Ministry, pp. 503–515.

³ Bishop Horne, in the preface to his admirable commentary on the Psalms, has noticed a considerable number of those divine odds, which bear a double meaning, the propriety of which he has fully vindicated. Works, vol. ii. pp. x–xx. See also Dr. Anthon's Warburtonian "Discourses on Prophecy," vol. i. pp. 77–89.; and Dr. Nares's Warburtonian Lectures, entitled "A Connected and Chronological View of the Prophecies relating to the Christian Church," p. 175–162. 176, 177. Almost the whole of the Psalms are applied by Bishop Horsley to the Messiah, in his "Book of Psalms translated from the Hebrew," 2 vols. 8vo. But Bishop Marsh has endeavoured to show that there are no double meanings, or, as he terms them, secondary senses, in prophecy. Lectures on Divinity part iv. lect. 22.

² Archbishop Newcome on Zech. i. 7–11.

arily and mystically, a respect to the miraculous birth of Christ, and to a deliverance much more momentous than that of Abaz from his then present distressful situation.¹

(2.) Isa. xi. 6.—What is here said of the wolf dwelling with the lamb, &c. is understood as having its first completion in the reign of Hezekiah, when profound peace was enjoyed after the troubles caused by Sennacherib; but its second and full completion is under the Gospel, whose power is changing our hearts, tempers, and lives of the worst of men, is here foretold and described by a singularly beautiful assemblage of images. Of this blessed power there has, in every age of Christianity, been a cloud of witnesses; although its most glorious era, predicted in this passage, may not yet be arrived. The latter part of the same chapter, in which there are many beautiful allusions to the Exodus from Egypt, seems to refer principally to the future restoration of the Jews from their several dispersions, and to that happy period when they and the Gentiles shall stand together under the banner of Jesus, and unite their zeal in extending the limits of his kingdom. This is a favourite theme with Isaiah, who is usually and justly designated the Evangelical Prophet, and who (ch. xl.) predicted the deliverance of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity, and their restoration to the land of Canaan;—events which were primarily and literally accomplished, but which by the evangelist Matthew (ii. 3.) and by our Lord himself (Matt. xi. 10.) are said to have been fulfilled by John the Baptist's preaching in the wilderness of Judaea; and which, secondarily and spiritually, foretold the deliverance of mankind from the infinitely greater bondage of sin.

(3.) Once more—Hos. xi. 1. Out of Egypt have I called my son. This passage, in its literal sense, was meant of God's delivering the children of Israel out of Egypt; but in its secondary and mystical sense, there can be no doubt that an allusion was intended by the Holy Spirit to the call of the infant Christ out of the same country. (Matt. ii. 15.)

Thus it is evident that many prophecies must be taken in a double sense, in order to understand their full import; and this two-fold application of them, by our Lord and his apostles, is a full authority for us to consider and apply them in a similar way. In order to ascertain whether a prophecy is to be taken in a double sense, the following rules have been laid down by the celebrated Vitringa:²—

(1.) That we may attain an accurate and distinct knowledge of the subject of a prediction, we must carefully attend to all the attributes and characters which are applied to the subject of the prophecy: if the subject be not specifically mentioned by name, it must be discovered by its characteristics; of this description are many of the prophecies concerning Christ, particularly Psalms ii. xxii. xlv. ix. Isa. liii. Zech. iii. 8. If the subject be named, we must inquire whether it is to be taken properly or mystically or partly properly and partly mystically; as in Psalm lxxii.

(2.) We must not, however, depart from the literal sense of the subject, when called by its own proper name, if all the attributes, or the principal and more remarkable ones, agree to the subject of the prophecy. This rule will be found of considerable use in interpreting the prophecies concerning Israel, Judah, Tyre, Babylon, Egypt, and other countries and places.

(3.) If the attributes by no means agree with the subject expressed in a prophecy by its own name, we must direct our thoughts to another subject which corresponds to it, and which assumes a mystic name, on account of the agreement between the type and antitype. Examples of this occur in the prophecies concerning Edom (Isa. lxiii. 1—6.), David (Ezek. xxxiv. 24—31.), and Elijah. (Mal. iv. 5.)

(4.) If, in prophecies, the subject be expressed by name, which may bear both a proper and a mystical interpretation, and the attributes of the prophetic discourse be of a mixed kind, so that some of them agree more strictly with the subject mystically taken, while others are more correctly predicated of it in a literal and grammatical sense;—in such cases, we must take the subject of the prophecy to be, not simple, but complex; and the prophet, actuated by divine illumination, expresses himself in such a manner as designedly to be understood of both senses, and to intimate to the reader that the mystical or allegorical sense is enveloped in the literal sense.

Thus, many of the prophecies concerning Babylon, Edom, Egypt, and Tyre, contain such august and magnificent expressions, as, if taken properly, will admit of a very poor and barren exposition; and, therefore, it must be presumed that the Holy Spirit designed something more, and to lead our minds to the mystical Babylon, &c. In like manner, such grand things are sometimes spoken concerning the return of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity, and mention is made of such distinguished blessings being bestowed upon them, as necessarily lead us to look for a further and more complete fulfilment in the redemption by Jesus Christ, and the spiritual blessings of grace bestowed upon the people of God, under the Gospel dispensation. Isa. lii. 1—3. and Jer. lvi. 14—18., to cite no other examples, present very striking illustrations of this remark. Hence it follows, that,

(5.) Prophecies of a general nature are applicable by accommodation to individuals; most of the things, which are spoken of the church, being equally applicable to her individual members.

(6.) Prophecies of a particular nature, on the other hand, admit, and often require, an extended sense: for instance, Edom, Moab, or any of the enemies of God's people, are often put for the whole; what is said of one being generally applicable to the rest. And, in like manner, what is said either to or concerning God's people, on any particular occasion, is of general application; as all, who stand in the same relation to God, have an interest in the same prophecies.

(7.) In continued prophecies, which are not distinguished one from another, we should carefully attend, first, to the beginning and end of each discourse, and, secondly, to the epoch of time which commences the scene of the prophetic vision, and the term in which it ends.

The first observation is of principal use in the discourses of Isaiah, from the fourth chapter to the end of the book. This distinction, often difficult and somewhat obscure, is of great moment in the interpretation of the prophecies, that we may not consider as a continued discourse what ought to be divided into several distinct topics. The last part of this canon is indispensable in explaining the Psalms and Prophetic Visions. See Psal. xiv. i. Isa. vi. 1.

II. Predictions, announcing judgments to come, do not in themselves speak the absolute futurity of the event, but only declare what is to be expected by the persons to whom they are made, and what will certainly come to pass, unless God in his mercy interpose between the threatening and the event.

“So that comminations do speak only the debitum pœnæ, and the necessary obligation to punishment: but therein God doth not bind up himself as he doth in absolute promises; the reason is, because comminations confer no right to any, which absolute promises do, and therefore God is not bound to necessary performance of what he threatens. Indeed the guilt or obligation to punishment is necessary, where the offence hath been committed, to which the threatening was annexed: but the execution of that punishment doth still depend upon God's arbitrary will, and therefore he may suspend or remove it upon serious addresses made to himself in order to it. For, since God was pleased not to take the present forfeiture of the first grand transgression, but made such a relaxation of that penal law, that conditions of pardon were admissible, notwithstanding sentence passed upon the malefactors, there is strong ground of presumption in human nature, that God's forbearance of mankind, notwithstanding sin, doth suppose his readiness to pardon offenders upon their repentance, and, therefore, that all particular threatenings of judgment to come do suppose incorrigibility in those against whom they are pronounced; upon which the foundation of hope is built, that if timely repentance do intervene, God will remove those judgments which are threatened against them.”³ Of these conditional comminatory predictions we have examples in Jonah's preaching to the Ninevites (Jonah iii. 4—10.), and in Isaiah's denunciation of death to Hezekiah. (Isa. xxxviii. 1.) See also a similar instance in Jer. xxxviii. 11—23.

III. Predictions then express divine purposes, when many prophets in several ages concur in the same prediction.

“Because it is hardly seen but all those tacit conditions, which are supposed in general promises or comminations, may be altered in different ages: but, when the conditions alter, and the predictions continue the same, it is a stronger evidence that it is some immutable counsel of God, which is expressed in those predictions. And in this case one prediction confirms the foregoing, as the Jews say of prophets, ‘one prophet hath the testimony of another prophet is supposed to be true.’⁴ but it must be with this supposition, that the other prophet was before approved to be a true prophet. Now, both these meet in the prophecies concerning our Saviour; for to him bear all the prophets witness, and in their several ages they had several things revealed to them concerning him: and the uniformity and perfect harmony of all these several prophecies by persons at so great distance from each other, and being of several interests and employments, and in several places, yet all giving light to each other, and exactly meeting at last in the accomplishment, do give us yet a further and clearer evidence, that all those several beams came from the same sun, when all those scattered rays were at last gathered into one body again at the appearance of the Sun of Righteousness in the world.”⁵

SECTION III.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE ACCOMPLISHMENT OF PROPHECIES CONCERNING THE MESSIAH IN PARTICULAR.⁶

I. JESUS CHRIST being the great subject and end of Scripture revelation, we ought every where to search for Prophecies concerning him.

We are assured by Christ himself that the Scriptures testify of him (John v. 39.), and that in Moses, the Psalms, and Prophets, there are things concerning him (Luke xxiv. 25—27. 44.); further, we have the declaration of an inspired apostle, that to him give all the prophets witness (Acts x. 43.), and ² Stillington's Orig. Sac. p. 130.

⁴ There is a good philological illustration of this prediction in Dr. Randolph's Praelectiones Theologicae, vol. ii. (pp. 446. et seq.) of his View of Christ's Ministry: and an elaborate vindication and explanation of it in the Abbé Hook's Religiois Naturalis et Revelatæ Principia, tom. ii. pp. 494—498.

of an angel of God, that "the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy." (Rev. xix. 10.) It may therefore be remarked generally, that whatsoever is emphatically and characteristically spoken of some certain person, not called by his own name, in the psalms or prophetic books, so that each predicate can be fully demonstrated in no single subject of that or any other time, must be taken as said and predicted of the Messiah. The twenty-second psalm, and the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah's prophecy, may be adduced as illustrations of this rule, which will not mislead any student or reader of the sacred volume. The first four remarks in p. 391. may be advantageously employed in the application of this rule.

II. The interpretation of the word of prophecy, made by Jesus Christ himself, and by his inspired apostles, is a rule and key by which to interpret correctly the prophecies cited or alluded to by them.

The propriety of this canon must be obvious: for as every one is the best interpreter of his own words, so the Holy Spirit (under whose influence the ancient prophets wrote and spoke), in more recent prophecies, refers to former predictions, and often uses the same words, phrases, and instances, thus leading us to understand the true sense of those oracles.¹ For instance, the prophecy (in Isa. viii. 14.) that the Messiah would prove a stone of stumbling and a rock of offence, is more plainly repeated by Simon (Luke ii. 34.), and is shown to have been fulfilled by Paul (Rom. ix. 32, 33.), and by Peter (1 Pet. ii. 8.); and the sixteenth psalm is expressly applied to Jesus Christ by the latter of these apostles. (Acts ii. 25—31.)²

III. Where the prophets describe a golden age of felicity, they clearly foretell Gospel times: and particularly in the Prophecies and Psalms, whatever is predicated of a person not named, in terms expressive of such excellence, glory, and other characteristics, as are suitable in their just emphases to no other subject, must be interpreted as spoken and predicted of the Messiah.

1. It is thus that the writers of the New Testament interpret and allege the ancient prophecies; instances may be given in Deut. xviii. 18. Psalms viii. xvi. xxii. xl. lxix. lxxviii. cxviii. 22, 23. Isa. iv. 2. vii. 14, 15. xlii. 1. liii. Zech. iii. 8. and xii. 10. It is worthy of remark that the writers of the New Testament directly apply to the Son of God the most magnificent descriptions and attributes of the FATHER in the Old Testament; as in Psal. lxxviii. 13. cii. 26, 27. Isa. xlv. 22—24.; which teach us to acknowledge the mystery of God, even of the Father, and of Christ, in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. (Col. ii. 2, 3.)

2. At the time the prophets respectively flourished the Israelites and Jews were, in general, notoriously wicked, although, even in the worst of times, there was a considerable number who feared Jehovah. Hence, while the prophets denounce national judgments upon the wicked (in which temporal afflictions the righteous would necessarily be involved), they at the same time hold out to the latter, to strengthen their trust in God, predictions of future and better times; and, with promises of some great and temporal deliverance, they invariably connect a display of the yet greater though future deliverance of the Messiah: the peace and happiness which are to prevail in consequence of that deliverance are portrayed in such a beautiful assemblage of images, and delineate so high a state of felicity, that, as there is no period in the history of the world, prior to the Christian dispensation, to which they can in any way be applied, these predictions of future happiness and peace must necessarily be understood exclusively to refer to Gospel times. Many passages might be adduced from the prophetic writings in confirmation of this rule. It will, however, suffice to adduce two instances from Isaiah, ch. ix. 2—7. and xi. 1—9. In the former of these passages, the peaceful kingdom of the Messiah is set forth, its extent and duration; and in the latter, the singular peace and happiness which should then prevail are delineated in imagery of unequalled beauty and energy.³

IV. Things foretold as universally or indefinitely to come to pass under the Gospel, are to be understood,—as they respect the duty,—of all persons; but,—as they respect the event,—only of God's people.

Thus, when the peace, that is foretold to prevail in Gospel times, is stated to be so great that men should then beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks; that nation should not lift up sword against nation, neither learn war any more (Isa. ii. 4.); and that the wolf should lie down with the lamb, and the leopard with the kid (Isa. xi. 6. and lxx. 25. with other passages that might be adduced);—all these highly figurative expressions are to be understood of the nature, design, and tendency of the Gospel, and what is the duty of all its professors, and what would actually take place in the Christian world, if all who profess the Christian doctrine did sincerely and cordially obey its dictates. And, so far as the Gospel does prevail upon any, it reclaims their wild and unruly natures; from being furious as wolves, they become meek as lambs, and from raging like lions, they become gentle and tender as kids: so far as they are from hurting or injuring others, that they dare not entertain any the slightest thoughts of malevolence or revenge, towards their most inveterate enemies.

² The petty cavils and evasions of Rupert and other modern commentators, who deny (without being able to disprove) the above canon, are well exposed by Dr. J. P. Smith, on the Person of Christ, vol. i. p. 222, 223.

³ Rambach, Inst. Herm. pp. 175—177. J. P. Carpov, Primæ Linææ Hermeneuticæ p. 25, 26.

V. As the ancient prophecies concerning the Messiah are of two kinds, some of them relating to his first coming to suffer, while the rest of them concern his second coming to advance his kingdom, and restore the Jews;—in all these prophecies, we must carefully distinguish between his first coming in humiliation to accomplish his mediatorial work on the cross, and his second coming in glory to judgment.

This distinction is sufficiently obvious in those passages which treat of either coming separately, as in Isa. vii. 14. ix. 6. liii. &c. which treat of his first coming in the flesh; and in Isa. ii. 10—21., which refers to his second coming to judgment. To the former must be referred all those passages which relate to his humiliation. But it is more difficult to distinguish each advent in those passages, in which the prophet makes an immediate transition from the one to the other. For instance, in Isa. xl. 1—9., the prediction relates to the first advent of Christ, but in v. 10. his second coming to judgment is noticed, express mention being made of the solemn work of retribution, which is peculiar to judgment. Again, in Jer. xxiii. 5—7., the promise of sending the Son of God into the world is in v. 8. joined with a prophecy concerning the conversion of the Jews, which is yet future. A similar instance of uniting the two advents of Christ occurs in Mal. iii. 1—5. By distinguishing, however, between them, we shall be better able to combat the objections of the Jews, who apply to the Messiah all those predictions which refer to a state of exaltation, while they overlook all those plain, though less numerous prophecies, in which is described Messiah's first coming in a state of humiliation.

Before we dismiss the important subject of prophecy, there are two cautions, which must uniformly be kept in view in studying the prophetic writings.

1. The first is, that we do not apply passing events as actually fulfilling particular prophecies.

It has justly been remarked, that "a commentator upon the predictions of Daniel and John can never be too much upon his guard against the fascinating idea, that he may expect to find every passing event of his own day there predicted. Before he ventures to introduce any exposition founded upon present circumstances, he ought to make it clearly appear that it both accords with the chronological order so carefully preserved in those prophecies, that it strictly harmonizes with the language of symbols, and that it demonstrates every part of the prediction to tally exactly with its supposed accomplishments."⁴

2. The other caution is, that we do not curiously pry beyond what is expressly written, or describe as fulfilled prophecies which are yet future.

Such secret things, as unaccomplished prophecies, belong unto the Lord our God; and it is a vain waste of time to weary ourselves with conjectures respecting the precise mode of their accomplishment. Upon these points, when we go beyond what is written, we exceed our commission; and it has almost invariably been found, that a commentator, who attempted to show how a prophecy was about to be fulfilled, was by the event convicted of error. We may safely and positively declare what will come to pass, and we may even say how it will come to pass, so long as we resolutely confine ourselves to the explicit declarations of Scripture; but to point out the manner in which an event will be accomplished, any further than the word of God has revealed the manner of it, is to pry too curiously into what he has purposely concealed, and to aim at becoming prophets, instead of contenting ourselves with being humble and fallible expositors of prophecy. What the Bible has declared, that we may without hesitation declare: beyond this, all is mere vague conjecture.⁵

CHAPTER V.

ON THE DOCTRINAL INTERPRETATION OF THE SCRIPTURES.

As the Holy Scriptures contain the revealed will of God to man, they not only offer to our attention the most interesting histories and characters for our instruction by example, and the most sublime prophecies for the confirmation of our faith, but they likewise present to our serious study, doctrinal truths of the utmost importance. Some of these occur in the historical, poetical, and prophetic parts of the Bible: but they are chiefly to be found in the apostolic epistles which, though originally designed for the edification of particular Christian churches or individuals, are nevertheless of general application, and designed for the guidance of the universal church in every age. For many of the fundamental doctrines of Christianity are more copiously treated in the epistles, which are not so particularly explained in the Gospels; and as the authors of the several epistles wrote under the same divine inspiration as the evangelists, the epistles and gospels must be taken together, to complete the rule of Christian faith. The doctrinal interpretation, therefore, of the Sacred Writings is of paramount consequence; as by this means we are enabled to acquire a correct and saving knowledge of the will of God concerning us. In the prosecution of this important branch of sacred literature, the following observations are offered to the attention of the student:—

I. The meaning of the Sacred Writings is not to be determined according to modern notions and systems: but we must endeavour to carry ourselves back to the very times and places in which they were written, and realize the ideas and modes of thinking of the sacred writers.

This rule is of the utmost importance for understanding the Scriptures; but is too commonly neglected by commentators and expositors, who, when applying themselves to the explanation of the Sacred Writings, have a preconceived system of doctrine which they seek in the Bible, and to which they refer every passage of Scripture. Thus they rather draw the Scriptures to their system of doctrine, than bring their doctrines to the standard of Scripture; a mode of interpretation which is altogether unjust, and utterly useless in the attainment of truth. The only way by which to understand the meaning of the sacred writers, and to distinguish between true and false doctrines, is, to lay aside all preconceived modern notions and systems, and to carry ourselves back to the very times and places in which the prophets and apostles wrote. In perusing the Bible, therefore, this rule must be most carefully attended to:—it is only an unbiassed mind that can attain the true and genuine sense of Scripture.¹

II. Regard must also be had to the peculiar state of the churches, cities, or persons, to whom particular epistles, especially those of Saint Paul, were addressed; as the knowledge of such state frequently leads to the particular occasion for which such epistle was written.

“Although the general design of the whole of Scripture was the instruction of the world, and the edification of the church in every age, still there was an immediate and specific design with regard to every book. This appears particularly obvious in reference to the epistles. With the exception of those properly called catholic or general epistles, and of a few written to individuals, they were addressed to particular societies of Christians, and they were adapted to the exact state of those societies, whether consisting chiefly of Jewish or of Heathen converts; whether recently organized as churches, or in a state of flourishing maturity; whether closely cemented together by the strength of brotherly love, or distracted by the spirit of faction; whether steadfast in adherence to the truth, or inclining to the admission of error. Now, if these considerations were present to the mind of the inspired writer of an epistle, and served to regulate the strain and the topics of his address, it is evident that they must by no means be disregarded by us in our attempts to ascertain the genuine and intended sense.”² A knowledge, therefore, of the state of the particular churches, to which they addressed their epistles, is of the greatest importance, not only to enable us to ascertain the scope of any particular epistle, but also for the purpose of reconciling doctrinal passages, which, to a cursory reader, may at first sight appear contradictory.

For instance, the Galatian churches, not long after their members had been converted to the faith of the Gospel, were persuaded by some Judaizing teachers that it was absolutely necessary they should be circumcised, and observe the entire law of Moses; hence great dissensions arose among the Galatian Christians. These circumstances led Saint Paul to write his Epistle to them; the design of which was, to prove the Jewish ceremonial law to be no longer obligatory, to convince them of the moral and spiritual nature of the Gospel, and thus to restore mutual good-will among them.

Again, Rom. xiv. 5. and Gal. iv. 10, 11. are apparently contradictory to each other. In the former passage we read—“One man esteemeth one day above another; another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind.” The latter passage runs thus,—“Ye observe days, and months, and times, and years; I am afraid lest I have bestowed upon you labour in vain.” Now, if we attend to the situation and character of the persons addressed, we shall easily be enabled to solve this seeming difficulty.

The Roman and Galatian churches were composed of both Jews and Gentiles; but they are not addressed promiscuously; neither are they the same description of people who are addressed in both passages. Those who “regarded days,” among the Romans, were the converted Jews, who, having from their youth observed them as divine appointments, were with difficulty brought to lay them aside. And as their attachment had its origin in a tender regard to divine authority, they were considered as “keeping the day unto the Lord;” and great forbearance was enjoined upon the Gentile converts towards them in that matter. Those, on the other hand, who, among the Galatians, “observed days, and months, and times,” were converted Gentiles, as is manifest from the context, which describes them as having, in their unconverted state, “done service to them which by nature were no gods.” (ch. iv. 8.) These being perverted by certain Judaizing teachers, were, contrary to the apostolic decision (Acts xv.), circumcised, and subjected themselves to the yoke of Jewish ceremonies. Nor was this all; they were led to consider these things as necessary to justification and salvation, which were subversive of the doctrine of justification by faith in Jesus Christ (Acts xv. 1. Gal. v. 4.) These circumstances being considered, the different language of the apostle is perfectly in character. Circumcision, and conformity to the law of Moses, in Jewish converts, was held to be lawful. Even the apostle of the Gentiles himself “to the Jews became a Jew;” frequently, if not constantly, conforming to the Jewish laws. And when writing to others, he expresses himself on this wise:—“Is any man called, being circumcised? let him not become uncircumcised. Is any called, in uncircumcision? let him not become circumcised. Circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing; but the keeping of the commandments of God.” (1 Cor. vii. 18, 19.) But for Gentiles, who had no such things to allege in their favour, to go off from the liberty granted to them (Acts xv.), and entangle themselves under a yoke of bondage, and not only so, but to make it a term of justification, was sufficient to excite a fear lest the labour which he had bestowed upon them was in vain.³

Braunius,⁴ Viringa,⁵ and Buddens⁶ have happily illustrated numerous passages in St. Paul’s Epistles by attending to the circumstances mentioned in the above canon. The state of the Apocalyptic churches has also been well described by our learned countryman Smith,⁷ by Witsius,⁸ and especially by Ferdinand Stosch.⁹ Rambach, in his Introduction to the Epistle to the Romans, has elaborately investigated the state of the church at Rome, and applied it to the justification and scope of this epistle.¹⁰

III. In order to understand any doctrinal book or passage of Scripture, we must attend to the controversies which were agitated at that time, and to which the sacred writers allude: for a key to the apostolic epistles is not to be sought in the modern controversies that divide Christians, and which were not only unknown, but also were not in existence at that time.

The controversies which were discussed in the age of the apostles are to be ascertained, partly from their writings, partly from the existing monuments of the primitive Christians, and likewise from some passages in the writings of the Rabbins.

From these it appears that the following were the principal questions then agitated, viz. What is the true way by which to please God, and thus to obtain eternal life—the observance of the Mosaic law, or faith and obedience as held forth in the Gospel? To this question the following was closely allied—Whether the observance of the Mosaic ceremonies was so absolutely necessary, that they were to be imposed on the converted Gentiles? The former question is particularly discussed in St. Paul’s Epistle to the Romans; the latter in the council held at Jerusalem (Acts xv. 1–31.), and especially in the Epistle to the Galatians.

Another question which was most warmly agitated, related to the calling of the Gentiles, which the Jews could by no means bear, as appears from numerous passages in the Gospels, Acts of the Apostles, and the Epistles. The apostles, therefore, found it necessary to assert that point, to confirm it by citing numerous prophecies from the Old Testament relative to the conversion of the Gentiles, and to vindicate it from the objections of the Jews; this has been done by Saint Paul in several chapters of his Epistle to the Romans, as well as in his Epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians, in which he proves that the Jewish ceremonies were superseded.

There were also some Jewish notions, which were refuted both by our Lord and by his apostles; for instance, that all Jews would certainly be saved. Turretin, to whom we are indebted for this observation, has adduced a passage from the Codex Sanhedrin, which affirmed that every Jew had a portion in the future world, and another from the Talmud, in which it is said that Abraham is sitting near the gates of hell, and does not permit any Israelite, however wicked he may be, to descend into hell.¹ In opposition to such traditions as these, Jesus Christ thus solemnly warned them:—Not every man that saith unto me, "Lord, Lord," shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven. (Matt. vii. 21.) This notion was also opposed at length by St. Paul. (Rom. ii. 16. et seq.) Once more: it appears from very many passages of the Jewish writers, that the Jews divided the precepts of the law into great and little, and taught that if a man observed one such grand precept, that would suffice to conciliate the favour of God, and would outweigh all his other actions. In opposition to this our Lord solemnly declares, that "whosoever shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called (shall be) least in the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. v. 19.); and Saint James also, "whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all." (James i. 10.)

Further, many erroneous tenets were held and promulgated in the time of the apostles, by persons calling themselves Christians. To these "oppositions of science falsely so called" (1 Tim. vi. 20.) there are numerous allusions in the Epistles, where such errors are refuted: for instance, Col. ii. 18. the worshipping of angels; Col. ii. 20, 21. against the pretensions of extraordinary mortifications and abstinence; 1 Cor. viii. and 2 Cor. vi. 16, &c. against idols and eating things offered to them, &c. The beginning of Saint John's Gospel, it is well known, was written to refute the false notions of Cerinthus.

IV. The doctrinal books of Scripture, for instance, the Epistles, are not to be perused in detached portions or sections; but they should be read through at once, with a close attention to the scope and tenor of the discourse, regardless of the divisions into chapters and verses, precisely in the same manner in which we would peruse the letters of Cicero, Pliny, or other ancient writers.

This reading should not be cursory or casual, but frequent and diligent; and the Epistles should be repeatedly perused, until we become intimately acquainted with their contents.² Want of attention to the general scope and design of the doctrinal parts of Scripture, particularly of the Epistles, has been the source of many and great errors: "for, to pick out a verse or two, and criticise on a word or expression, and ground a doctrine thereon, without considering the main scope of the epistle and the occasion of writing it, is just as if a man should interpret ancient statutes or records by two or three words or expressions in them, without regard to the true occasion upon which they were made, and without any manner of knowledge and insight into the history of the age in which they were written." The absurdity of such a conduct is too obvious to need further exposure.

Having already offered some hints for investigating the scope of a particular book or passage,³ it only remains to notice that there is this general difference observable between the scope of the Gospels and that of the Epistles; viz. the former represent the principles of Christianity absolutely, or as they are in themselves; while the latter represent them relatively, that is, as they respect the state of the world at that particular time.

Mr. Locke has forcibly illustrated this remark by relating his own practice in studying the Epistles of Saint Paul. After he had found by long experience that the ordinary way of reading a chapter, and then consulting commentators upon difficult passages, failed in leading him to the true sense of the Epistle, he says, "I saw plainly, after I began once to reflect on it, that if any one should now write me a letter as long as Saint Paul's to the Romans, concerning such a matter as that is, in a style as foreign, and expressions as dubious, as his seem to be, if I should divide it into fifteen or sixteen chapters, and read one of them to-day and another to-morrow, &c. it was ten to one that I should never come to a full and clear comprehension of it. The way to understand the mind of him that wrote it, every one would agree, was to read the whole letter through from one end to the other, all at once, to see what was the main subject and tendency of it; or, if it had several parts and purposes in it, not to depend one of another, nor in a subordination to one chief aim and end, to discover what those different matters were, and where the author concluded one and began another; and if there were any necessity of dividing the Epistles into parts, mark the boundaries of them." In the prosecution of this thought, Mr. Locke concluded it necessary for the understanding of any one of Saint Paul's Epistles to read it all through at one sitting, and to observe as well as he could the drift and design of the writer. Successive perusals in a similar way at length gave him a good general view of the apostle's main purpose in writing the Epistle, the chief branches of his discourse, the arguments he used, and the disposition of the whole. This, however, is not to be attained by one or two hasty readings. "It must be repeated again and again, with a close attention to the tenor of the discourse, and a perfect neglect of the divisions into chapters and verses. On the contrary, the safest way is, to suppose that the Epistle has but one business and but one aim; until, by a frequent perusal of it, you are forced to see there are distinct independent matters in it, which will forwardly enough show themselves." Locke on the Epistles of Saint Paul, Preface. (Works, vol. ii. pp. 281, 282. 4to.)

See pp. 339, 340, supra.

V. Where any doctrine is to be deduced from the Scriptures, it will be collected better, and with more precision, from those places in which it is professedly discussed, than from those in which it is noticed only incidentally or by way of inference.

For instance, in the Epistles to the Romans and Galatians, the doctrine of justification by faith is fully treated; and in those to the Ephesians and Colossians, the calling of the Gentiles and the abrogation of the ceremonial law are particularly illustrated. These must, therefore, be diligently compared together, in order to deduce those doctrines correctly.

VI. Doctrines peculiar to a certain age are better ascertained from writings belonging to that age, or the times immediately following, than from memorials or writings of a later date.

Thus, the ideas entertained by the patriarchs are better collected from the writings immediately concerning them—the book of Genesis, for instance—than from books written long afterwards, as the Apostolic Epistles.—Not that these are unworthy of credit (of such an insinuation the author trusts he shall be fully acquitted), but because the apostles deduce inferences from passages of Scripture, according to the manner practised in their own time; which inferences, though truly correct, and every way worthy the assent of Christians, were not known at the time when such passages were first committed to writing.⁴

VII. Although the Scriptures sometimes speak of God after the manner of men, they are not to be understood literally, but must be taken in a sense worthy of God.

This rule was not unknown to the Jews, with whom it was usual to say that the Scriptures speak of God with the tongue of the sons of men. When, therefore, human members, faculties, senses, and affections, are attributed to the Deity, they are to be understood in a sense worthy of Him; and the manner in which that sense is to be ascertained is twofold:—1. From the light of nature, which teaches us that all ideas of imperfection are to be removed from God, and, consequently, corporeity; and, 2. From the comparison of other passages of Scripture, in which it is written, that God is a spirit, that he cannot be represented by any figure, and that he is not a man that he should repent, &c. Numerous illustrations of this remark might be offered, were it necessary; but as this subject has already been discussed in a former chapter, it will be sufficient to give a reference to it.⁵

VIII. No doctrine is admissible, or can be established from the Scriptures, that is either repugnant to them, or contrary to reason or to the analogy of faith.

For instance, if the doctrine of transubstantiation were to be admitted, the evidence of our reason, as well as of our senses, could no longer be believed, and the consequence would be, that the arguments for the truth of the Christian religion, arising from the miracles and resurrection of Jesus Christ, would fall to the ground, and become of no effect whatever. Articles of revelation, indeed, may be above our reason; but no doctrine, which comes from God, can be irrational, or contrary to those moral truths, which are clearly perceived by the mind of man. We are sure, therefore, that any interpretation of revealed doctrines that is inconsistent with common sense, or with the established laws of morality, must be erroneous. The several parts of those doctrines, which are dispersed through the Scriptures, ought to be collected and explained so as to agree with one another, and form an intelligible and consistent scheme. The different parts of a revelation, which comes from God, must all be reconcilable with one another, and with sound reason. The prejudices of different denominations unfit them for understanding the passages, which are connected with the subjects of their disputations; but there are general principles that all parties adopt: and no text can be interpreted in a sense inconsistent with those articles which are universally received. This conformity, of every part to first principles, is commonly called the analogy of faith; the nature of which, and the manner in which it is to be applied to the interpretation of Scripture, are stated and explained in pp. 342—344.

IX. It is of great importance to the understanding of the doctrinal books of the New Testament, to attend to and distinctly to note the transitions of person which frequently occur, especially in Saint Paul's Epistles.

The pronouns I, We, and You, are used by the apostles in such a variety of applications, that the understanding of their true meaning is often a key to many difficult passages.

Thus, by the pronoun I, Saint Paul sometimes means himself; sometimes any Christian; sometimes a Jew; and sometimes any man, &c.

If the speaking of himself in the first person singular have these various meanings, his use of the plural We is with far greater latitude; for sometimes we means himself alone, sometimes those who were with him whom he makes partners to the Epistles (as in the two Epistles to the Corinthians, and in those to the Philippians and Colossians); sometimes with himself comprehending the other apostles, or preachers of the Gospel, or Christians. Nay, he sometimes speaks in this way of the converted Jews, at others, of the converted Gentiles; sometimes he introduces the unregenerate as speaking in his own person; at other times he personifies false teachers or false Christians, whose names, however, he forbears to mention, lest he should give them offence. In all these instances, his application of the above-mentioned pronouns varies the meaning of the text, and causes it to be differently understood. Examples illustrative of this remark may be found in every page of Saint Paul's Epistles. Further, in the current of his discourse, he sometimes drops in the objections of others, and his answers to them, without any change in the scheme of his language, that might give notice of any other person speaking besides himself. To discover this, requires great attention to the apostle's scope and argument; and yet, if it be neglected or overlooked, it will cause the reader greatly to mistake and misunderstand his meaning, and will also render the sense very perplexed. Mr. Locke, and Dr. Macknight, in their elaborate works on the Epistles, are particularly useful in pointing out these various transpositions of persons and subjects.

X. In applying the Scriptures as a proof of any doctrine, it is necessary to ascertain, if all that is meant be expressed; or, if it be not expressed, what is necessarily implied, in order to complete the passage.

Thus it is common (as we have already shown)² for the sacred writers to mention only the principal part of any subject, for the whole.

In Rom. x. 9. Paul says; If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved. The resurrection of Christ is the only article which is mentioned here, because, by that miracle, God established the Saviour's authority, as a lawgiver, and confirmed all the doctrines which he taught. But there are other essential articles, which are necessary to be believed, in order to be saved, though they are not stated in the text. It is added (ver. 13.), for whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved. No real Christian can be so ignorant of the Gospel, as to suppose, that no more is necessary, in order to be saved, than to call upon the name of the Lord. In this text, it is evident that the apostle mentions only a principal part of what is meant. Now, from the context may be gathered the following particulars, as implied, though not expressed. First, in the ninth verse it is affirmed, that in order to be saved, a man must believe in his heart. Secondly, he must confess with his mouth; If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved. Confession implies more than profession. A true believer in Jesus Christ openly, and of his own accord, professes the articles of his belief; and when he is persecuted, and examined concerning his religion, he readily confesses the truth, as an evidence of his sincerity and faithfulness. Even this is not all that is necessary, in order to be saved; for it is added in the tenth verse, with the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation. Faith, acting on the heart, is productive of a righteous life, and thus the believer becomes a sincere worshipper of the Lord; for whosoever will call on the name of the Lord shall be saved. (ver. 13.) In these different passages, it is evident that a part is mentioned for the whole; and in order to understand all that is implied, the several parts must be collected and put together.

XI. No article of faith can be established from metaphors, parables, or single obscure and figurative texts.

The metaphorical language of the prophets, and figurative expressions which abound in the Scriptures, are calculated to promote the purposes of godliness by acting on the imagination, and by influencing a believer's conduct; but they never were intended to be a revelation of Gospel principles. Instead of deriving our knowledge of Christianity from parables and figurative passages, an intimate acquaintance with the doctrines of the Gospel is necessary, in order to be capable of interpreting them.

The beautiful parable of the man who fell among thieves (Luke x. 30—37.) is evidently intended to influence the Jews to be benevolent and kind, like the good Samaritan. Some writers have considered that parable to be a representation of Adam's fall, and of man's recovery, through the interposition and love of Jesus Christ. But those, who embrace this opinion, did not learn these doctrines from the passage itself. No person, who is wholly ignorant of Adam, and of Jesus Christ, could ever learn any thing concerning them, from what is related in this parable. The same observation is equally applicable to every other parable, and typical subject; in which the doctrines of the Gospel cannot be discovered by any person, who has not first learned them from other texts.

CHAPTER VI.

ON THE MORAL INTERPRETATION OF SCRIPTURE.

SECTION I.

ON THE INTERPRETATION OF THE MORAL PARTS OF SCRIPTURE.

HAVING already discussed the interpretation of the figurative, spiritual, typical, prophetic, and doctrinal parts of the Sacred Writings, it now remains that we consider the Moral Parts of Scripture. These, indeed, are to be interpreted precisely in the same manner as all other moral writings; regard being had to the peculiar circumstances of the sacred writers, viz. the age in which they wrote, the nation to which they belonged, their style, genius, &c. For, being natives of the East, they treat moral topics, after the oriental manner, in a highly figurative style, and with similitudes, and figures considerably more far-fetched than is usual among Greek and Latin authors, or even among the moderns. Again, being for the most part persons in the common walks of life, they generally deliver their precepts in a popular manner, adapted to the capacities of those to whom they were addressed. In the examination of the moral parts of Scripture, the following more particular rules will be found useful:—

I. Moral propositions or discourses are not to be urged too far, but must be understood with a certain degree of latitude, and with various LIMITATIONS.

For want of attending to this canon, how many moral truths have been pushed to an extent, which causes them altogether to fail of the effect they were designed to produce! It is not to be denied that universal propositions may be offered: such are frequent in the Scriptures as well as in profane writers, and also in common life; but it is in explaining the expressions by which they are conveyed, that just limits ought to be applied, to prevent them from being urged too far. The nature of the thing, and various other circumstances, will always afford a criterion by which to understand moral propositions with the requisite limitations. In order, however, that this subject may be better understood, and applied to the Scriptures, we will state a few of these limitations, and illustrate them by examples.

1. Universal or indefinite moral propositions often denote nothing more than the natural aptitude or tendency of a thing to produce a certain effect, even although that effect should not actually take place.

Thus, when Solomon says that a soft answer turneth away wrath (Prov. xv. 1.), the best method of mitigating anger is pointed out, although the obstinacy or wickedness of man may produce a different result. In like manner, when St. Peter says, Who is he that will harm you, if ye be followers of that which is good? (1 Pet. iii. 13.) this expression is not to be understood as implying that good men shall never be ill-treated; but it simply denotes the natural effect which a virtuous life will probably produce, viz. many occasions of irritating men will be avoided, and, on the other hand, their friendship and favour will be conciliated.

2. Universal or indefinite propositions denote only what generally or often takes place.

As in Prov. xxii. 6. Train up a child in the way he should go; and when he is old he will not depart from it. Here the wise monarch intimates not what always takes place, but what is the frequent consequence of judicious education. To this rule are to be referred all those propositions which treat of the manners, virtues, or vices of particular nations, conditions, or ages. Thus Saint Paul says, that the Cretans are always liars (Tit. i. 12.) Again, when the same apostle, portraying the struggles of an enlightened but unregenerate person, says—I know that in me (that is, in my flesh) dwelleth no good thing (Rom. vii. 18.), he does not mean to say that there is nothing morally good in man; but that no man is by nature spiritually good, or good in the sight of God.³

³ Similar to this is the language of the Liturgy of the Anglican church:—"O God, . . . because through the weakness of our mortal nature, we can do no good thing, without thou grant us the help of thy grace." (Collect for the first Sunday after Trinity.) On which Bishop Tomline remarks—"I have only to observe, that the good thing here mentioned, must mean good in the sight of God: such an action our weak and unassisted nature will, unquestionably, not allow us to perform." (Refutation of Calvinism, pp. 67, 68. 1st edit.) To the same purpose, in another place he observes:—

3. Unversa, or indefinite propositions frequently denote duty, or what ought to be done, not what always does actually take place.

"It is the way of the Scriptures," says a late writer, "to speak to and of the visible members of the church of Christ, under such appellations and expressions as may seem, at first hearing, to imply that they are all of them truly righteous and holy persons. Thus the apostles style those to whom they write, in general, saints; they speak of them as 'sanctified in Christ Jesus, chosen of God, buried with Christ in baptism, risen again with him from the dead, sitting with him in heavenly places;' and particularly Saint Paul (Tit. iii. 5.) says, that they were 'saved by the washing of regeneration,' &c. The reason of which is, that they were visibly, by obligation, and by profession, all this; which was thus represented to them, the more effectually to stir them up, and engage them to live according to their profession and obligation."¹

By this rule also we may explain Mal. ii. 7. "The priest's lips should keep knowledge;" which passage the advocates of the church of Rome urge, as asserting the infallibility of the priesthood. A simple inspection, however, of the following verse is sufficient to refute this assertion, and to show that the prophet's words denote only the duty of the Jewish priesthood, not what the priests really did perform. The application of this rule will likewise explain Prov. xvi. 10, 12, 13.

4. Many precepts are delivered generally and absolutely, concerning moral duties, which are only to be taken with certain limitations.

For instance, when we are commanded not to be angry, we must understand, without a cause, and not beyond measure: when we are forbidden to avenge ourselves, it is to be understood of privately taking revenge; for the inmagistrate beareth not the sword in vain, but is the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil. (Rom. xiii. 4.) Public vengeance, or punishment, therefore, is clearly not prohibited. Once more, though we are commanded in the Scriptures to swear not at all (as in Matt. v. 34.), and not to forswear ourselves (Levit. xix. 12.), yet they do not forbid the use of oaths in cases where they can be made subservient to the support of truth and the interests of justice. Moses says, Thou shalt fear the Lord thy God, and serve him, and shall swear by his name. (Deut. vi. 13.) Thou shalt swear, says the prophet Jeremiah, the Lord liveth, in truth, in judgment, and in righteousness. (Jer. iv. 2.) Our Saviour himself, when adjured by the high-priest, in the name of the living God, to declare whether he was the Christ the Son of God (Matt. xxvi. 63, 64. Mark xiv. 61, 62.), did not refuse to answer the question, thus judicially proposed to him; but he certainly would have remained silent if he had disapproved of all asseverations upon oath, or all such solemn invocations of, and appeals to, the name of God, in cases where the truth is doubtful or the testimony is suspected. The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews says, that an oath for confirmation is an end of all strife. (Heb. vi. 16.)²

II. Many things in morals, which are not spoken COMPARATIVELY, are nevertheless to be thus understood.

1. In Matt. ix. 13. and xii. 7. Jesus Christ, citing Hos. vi. 6., says, that God desired mercy and not sacrifice. Yet he had prescribed that victims should be offered. This, therefore, must be understood comparatively, sacrifice being compared with mercy, or with acts of humanity and benevolence; which, the context shows, are here intended. The sense of the passage in question is this:—I require mercy and not sacrifice; in other words, I prefer acts of charity to matters of positive institution, when, in any instance, they interfere with each other.

2. In 1 Tim. vi. 8. we read—Having food and raiment let us be therewith content. Is no one then to desire a house, or a competence of wealth? These things, therefore, are compared with what are called the luxuries of life.³

III. Principals include their accessories, that is, whatever approaches or comes near to them, or has any tendency to them.

Thus, where any sin is forbidden, we must be careful not only to avoid it, but also every thing of a similar nature, and whatever may prove an occasion of it, or imply our consent to it in others; and we must endeavour to dissuade or restrain others from it.

Compare Matt. v. 21—31. 1 Thess. v. 22. Jude 23. Ephes. v. 11. 1 Cor. viii. 13. Lev. xix. 17. James v. 19, 20. So, where any duty is enjoined, all means and facilities, enabling either ourselves or others to discharge it, according to our respective places, capacities, or opportunities, are likewise enjoined. See Gen. xviii. 19. Deut. vi. 7. Heb. x. 23—25. Upon this ground our Lord makes the law and the prophets to depend upon a sincere affectionate love to God and man (Mark xli. 30. Luke x. 27.); because, where this prevails, we shall not knowingly be deficient in any duty or office which lies within our power; neither shall we willingly do any thing that may either directly or indirectly offend, or tend to the prejudice of mankind. See Rom. xii. 17, 18. This observation will leave little room for "The human mind is so weakened and vitiated by the sin of our first parents, that we cannot by our own natural strength prepare it, or put it into a proper state, for the reception of a saving faith, or for the performance of the spiritual worship required in the Gospel: this mental purification cannot be effected without divine assistance." (Ibid. p. 54.) Again: "The grace of God prevents us Christians, that is, it goes before, it gives the first spring and rise to our endeavours, that we may have a good will; and when this good will is thus excited, the grace of God does not desert us, but it works with us when we have that good will." . . . "It is acknowledged that man has not the disposition, and, consequently, not the ability, to do what in the sight of God is good, till he is influenced by the Spirit of God." (Ibid. pp. 60, 61.)

the "evangelical counsels," or "counsels of perfection," as they are called by the Papists, who ground upon them their erroneous doctrine of supererogation.⁴ Again, in whatever commandment we are forbidden to do any thing in our persons, as sinful, it equally restrains us from being partakers of other men's guilt, who do commit what we know is thereby forbidden. We must not, therefore, be either advising, assisting, encouraging, or in any shape a party with them in it: nay, we must not so much as give any countenance to the evil which they do, by excusing or making light of the crime, or by hiding their wickedness, lest by so doing we incur part of the blame and punishment, and thus deserve the character given by the psalmist—When thou savest a thief, then thou consentest unto him, and hast been partaker with the adulterers. (Psalm i. 18.)

IV. Negatives include affirmatives, and affirmatives include negatives:—in other words, where any duty is enjoined, the contrary sin is forbidden; and where any sin is forbidden, the contrary duty is enjoined.

Thus, in Deut. vi. 13. where we are commanded to serve God, we are forbidden to serve any other. Therefore, in Matt. iv. 10. it is said, Him only shalt thou serve; and as honouring parents is required in the fifth commandment (Exod. xx. 12.), so cursing them is forbidden. (Matt. xv. 4.) Stealing being prohibited in the eighth commandment (Exod. xx. 15.), diligence in our calling is enjoined in Eph. iv. 28.

V. Negatives are binding at all times, but not affirmatives; that is, we must never do that which is forbidden, though good may ultimately come from it. (Rom. iii. 8.) We must not speak wickedly for God. (Job xiii. 7.)

Such things, however, as are required of us, though they never cease to be our duty, are yet not to be done at all times: for instance, prayer, public worship, reproving others, visiting the sick, and other works of charity and mercy, will be our duty as long as we live; but, as we cannot perform these at all times, we must do sometimes one thing, sometimes another, as opportunity offers. Hence in the observance of negative precepts, Christian courage and Christian prudence are equally necessary; the former, that we may never, upon any occasion or pretence, do that which in positive precepts is pronounced to be evil; the latter, that we may discern the fittest times and seasons for doing every thing.

VI. When an action is either required or commended, or any promise is annexed to its performance; such action is supposed to be done from proper motives and in a proper manner.

The giving of alms may be mentioned as an instance; which, if done from ostentatious motives, we are assured, is displeasing in the sight of God. Compare Matt. vi. 1—4.

VII. When the favour of God or salvation is promised to any deed or duty, all the other duties of religion are supposed to be rightly performed.

The giving of alms, as well as visiting the fatherless and widows in their affliction (James i. 27.), may be noticed as examples: such promise, therefore, is not to be so understood, as if one single Christian virtue were necessary to salvation: but that the particular virtue in question is one of several necessary and momentous virtues. The application of this rule will illustrate our Lord's declaration concerning a future judgment (Matt. xxv. 34—36.); where, though charitable actions only are mentioned, yet we know, from other passages of Scripture, that every idle word, as well as the secret thoughts of men, besides their actions, will be brought into judgment.

VIII. When a certain state or condition is pronounced blessed, or any promise is annexed to it, a suitable disposition of mind is supposed to prevail.

Thus, when the poor or afflicted are pronounced to be blessed, it is because such persons, being poor and afflicted, are free from the sins usually attendant on unsanctified prosperity, and because they are, on the contrary, more humble and more obedient to

⁴ "These 'counsels of perfection' are rules which do not bind under the penalty of sin, but are only useful in carrying men to a greater degree of perfection than is necessary to salvation. There is not the slightest authority in Scripture for these counsels of perfection: all the rules there prescribed for our conduct are given in the form of positive commands, as absolutely necessary, wherever they are applicable, to the attainment of eternal life; and the violation of every one of these commands is declared to be sin. We are commanded to be 'perfect even as our Father which is in heaven is perfect' (Matt. v. 48.); and so far from being able to exceed what is required for our salvation, the Gospel assures us, that after our utmost care and endeavours we shall still fall short of our whole duty: and that our deficiencies must be supplied by the abundant merits of our blessed Redeemer. We are directed to trust to the mercy of God, and to the mediation of Christ; and to 'work out our salvation with fear and trembling' (Phil. ii. 12.), that is, with anxiety, lest we should not fulfil the conditions upon which it is offered. Upon these grounds we may pronounce that works of supererogation are inconsistent with the nature of man, irreconcilable with the whole tenor and general principles of our religion, and contrary to the express declarations of Scripture." Bishop Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. ii. pp. 281, 282. (8th edit.)

God. If, however, they be not the characters described (as unquestionably there are many to whom the characters do not apply), the promise in that case does not belong to them. Vice versa, when any state is pronounced to be wretched, it is on account of the sins or vices which generally attend it.

IX. Some precepts of moral prudence are given in the Scriptures, which nevertheless admit of exceptions, on account of some duties of benevolence or piety that ought to predominate.

We may illustrate this rule by the often-repeated counsels of Solomon respecting becoming surety for another. (See Prov. vi. 1, 2. xi. 15. xvii. 18. and xx. 16.) In these passages he does not condemn suretiship, which, in many cases, is not only lawful, out, in some instances, even an act of justice, prudence, and charity; but Solomon forbids his disciples to become surety rashly without considering for whom, or how far he binds himself, or how he could discharge the debt, if occasion should require it.

X. A change of circumstances changes moral things; therefore contrary things may be spoken together in moral things, on account of the difference of circumstances.

Thus, in Prov. xxvi. 4, 5. we meet with two precepts that seem to be diametrically opposite to each other: Answer not a fool according to his folly, lest thou be like unto him; and Answer a fool according to his folly, lest he be wise in his own conceit. But if we attend carefully to the reason which the sacred writer subjoins to each precept, we shall be enabled satisfactorily to account for the apparent repugnancy in the counsels of the Israelitish monarch; and it will be evident that they form, not inconsistent, but distinct, rules of conduct, which are respectively to be observed according to the difference of circumstances. The following observations on the two verses just cited will materially illustrate their meaning.

A fool, in the sense of Scripture, means a wicked man, or one who acts contrary to the wisdom that is from above, and who is supposed to utter his foolishness in speech or writing. Doubtless there are different descriptions of these characters; and some may require to be answered, while others are best treated with silence. But the cases here seem to be one; both have respect to the same character, and both require to be answered. The whole difference lies in the manner in which the answer should be given.

"In the first instance, the term, 'according to his folly,' means in a foolish manner, as is manifest from the reason given; 'lest thou also be like unto him.' But in the second instance they mean, in the manner in which his foolishness requires. This also is plain from the reason given, 'lest he be wise in his own conceit.' A foolish speech is not a rule for our imitation; nevertheless our answer must be so framed by it, as to meet and repel it. Both these proverbs caution us against evils to which we are not a little addicted; the first, that of saying and doing to others as they say and do to us, rather than as we would they should say and do; the last, that of suffering the cause of truth or justice to be run down, while we, from a love of ease, stand by as unconcerned spectators. The first of these proverbs is exemplified in the answer of Moses to the rebellious Israelites; the last in that of Job to his wife.—It was a foolish speech which was addressed to the former;—'Would to God, that we had died when our brethren died before the Lord! And why have ye brought up the congregation of the Lord into this wilderness, that we and our cattle should die there?' Unhappily, this provoked Moses to speak unadvisedly with his lips; saying, 'Hear now, ye rebels, must we fetch you water out of this rock?' This was answering folly in a foolish manner, which he should not have done; and by which the servant of God became too much like them whom he opposed.—It was also a foolish saying of Job's wife, in the day of his distress, 'Curse God, and die!' Job answered this speech, not in the manner of it, but in the manner which it required. 'What, shall we receive good at the hand of God; and shall we not receive evil?' In all the answers of our Saviour to the Scribes and Pharisees, we may perceive that he never lost the possession of his soul for a single moment; and never answered in the manner of his opponents, so as to be like unto them. Yet neither did he decline to repel their folly, and so to abase their self-conceit."

XI. Different ideas must be annexed to the names of virtues or vices, according to different ages and places.

* Thus Judah became surety to his father, for his brother Benjamin (Gen. xliii. 9. xliv. 32.); and Paul to Philemon for Onesimus. (Philem. 18, 19.)

† Fuller's Harmony of Scripture, pp. 17, 18. Bishop Warburton has given an excellent illustration of the passage above explained, in one of his Sermons. See his Works, vol. x. Sermon 21. pp. 61—73.

Thus, holiness and purity denote widely different things, in many parts of the Old Testament, from what they intend in the New; in the former, they are applied to persons and things dedicated to Jehovah; while in the latter, they are applied to all true Christians, who are called saints or holy, being made so through the illumination and renovation of the Holy Spirit, and because, being called with a high and holy calling, they are bound to evince the sincerity of their profession by a pure and holy life.

XII. In investigating and interpreting those passages of Scripture, the argument of which is moral,—that is, passages in which holy and virtuous actions are commended,—but wicked and unholy ones are forbidden, the nature of the virtue enjoined, or of the sin prohibited, should be explained. We should also consider whether such passages are positive commands, or merely counsels or opinions, and by what motives or arguments the inspired writer supports his persuasions to virtue, and his dissuaves from sin or vice.

In conducting this investigation, the parallel passages will be found of the greatest service; and in applying the writings of the New Testament as authority for practical institutions, it is necessary to distinguish those precepts or articles, which are circumstantial and temporary, from such as are essential to true religion, and therefore obligatory, in all ages. Not only are all the important laws of morality permanent, but all those general rules of conduct, and institutions which are evidently calculated in religion to promote the good of mankind and the glory of God. The situation of the first Christians, during the infancy of Christianity, required temporary regulations, which are not now binding on the church. The controversy concerning holy days, and particular kinds of food, occasioned Paul to enjoin such temporary precepts as suited the situation of the church when he wrote. Abstinence from the use of unclean beasts, in compliance with the opinions of the Jews, is not now necessary; but a condescension to the very prejudices of weak brethren, in things indifferent, is at all times the duty of Christians. Those doctrines which were evidently adapted to the situation of Christ's disciples, when under persecution, do not apply to their conduct, when enjoying full liberty of conscience. Exhortations, which are restricted to particular cases, must not be applied as rules for general conduct.

Those directions, to be kind and hospitable to one another, in which the customs of eastern countries are mentioned, are not literally to be observed, by those among whom different manners prevail. Paul enjoins the saints to salute one another with a holy kiss. (Rom. xvi. 16.) The Jews saluted one another, as an expression of sincere friendship. When Jesus Christ observed to Simon that he was deficient in kindness and affection, he said, Thou gavest me no kiss, but this woman, since the time I came in, hath not ceased to kiss my feet. (Luke vii. 45.) The disposition is incumbent on saints, in all ages of the world: but not this mode of expressing it. In order to teach the disciples, how they ought to manifest their affection, for one another, by performing every office of friendship in their power, their Lord and Master took a towel and girded himself, and began to wash the disciples' feet, and to wipe them with the towel wherewith he was girded; and said, If I then, your Lord and Master, have washed your feet, ye also ought to wash one another's feet. (John xiii. 5, 14.) In those hot countries, after travelling in sandals, the washing of the feet was very refreshing, and an expression of the most tender care and regard: hence it is mentioned as an amiable part of the widow's character, that she had washed the saints' feet and relieved the afflicted. (1 Tim. v. 10.) It is evident, that this mode of expressing our love to one another was not intended as a permanent law, but a direction adapted to the prevailing custom of the people to whom it was originally given.

In concluding our remarks on the moral interpretation of the Sacred Writings, it is worthy of observation, that they contain two kinds of moral books and discourses, viz. 1. Detached sentences, such as occur in the book of Proverbs, in many of our Lord's sermons, and in several of the moral exhortations at the close of the apostolic Epistles; and, 2. Continuous and connected discourses, such as are to be found in the book of Job. In the former, we are not to look for any order or arrangement, because they have been put together just as they presented themselves to the minds of their inspired authors; but, in the latter, we must carefully attend to the scope. Thus, the scope of the book of Job is specified in the second and third verses of the thirty-second chapter; to this, therefore, the whole book must be referred, without seeking for any mysteries.

The style also of the moral parts of Scripture is highly figurative, abounding not only with bold hyperboles and propopœias, but also with antitheses and seeming paradoxes: the former must be explained agreeably to those general rules, for expounding the figurative language of Scripture, which have already been stated and illustrated;¹ and the latter must be interpreted and limited according to the nature of the thing; for instance, the beatitudes as related by St. Matthew (ch. v.) must be compared with those delivered at a different time, as related by Saint Luke (ch. vi. 20. et seq.); and from this collation we shall be enabled to reconcile the seeming differences, and fully to understand the antithetic sayings of our Lord.

Lastly, as the moral sentences in the Scriptures are written in the very concise style peculiar to the Orientals, many passages, are, in consequence, necessarily obscure, and therefore admit of various expositions. In such cases, that interpretation which is most obvious to the reader will in general be sufficiently intelligible for all purposes of practical edification, and beyond this we need not be anxiously solicitous, if we should fail in ascertaining the precise meaning of every word in a proverb or moral sentence.

SECTION II.

ON THE INTERPRETATION OF THE PROMISES AND THREATENINGS OF SCRIPTURE.

A PROMISE, in the scriptural sense of the term, is a declaration or assurance of the divine will, in which God signifies what particular blessings or good things he will freely bestow, as well as the evils which he will remove. The promises, therefore, differ from the threatenings of God, inasmuch as the former are declarations concerning good, while the latter are denunciations of evil only: at the same time it is to be observed, that promises seem to include threats, because, being in their very nature conditional, they imply the bestowment of the blessing promised, only on the condition being performed, which blessing is tacitly threatened to be withheld on noncompliance with such condition. Further, promises differ from the commands of God, because the latter are significations of the divine will concerning a duty enjoined to be performed, while promises relate to mercy to be received. As a considerable portion of the promises relates to the performance of moral and of pious duties, they might have been discussed under the preceding chapter; but, from the variety of topics which they embrace, it has been deemed preferable to give them a separate consideration.

There are four classes of promises mentioned in the Scriptures, particularly in the New Testament; viz. 1. Promises relating to the Messiah: 2. Promises relating to the church: 3. Promises of blessings, both temporal and spiritual, to the pious; and, 4. Promises encouraging to the exercise of the several graces and duties that compose the Christian character.² The two first of these classes, indeed, are many of them predictions as well as promises; consequently the same observations will apply to them, as are stated for the interpretation of Scripture prophecies;³ but in regard to those promises which are directed to particular persons, or to the performance of particular duties, the following remarks are offered to the attention of the reader.

1. "We must receive God's promises in such wise as they be generally set forth in the Holy Scriptures."⁴

³ See pp. 388–390. supra.

⁴ Art. XVII. of the Confession of the Anglican Church. Similar to this is the declaration of the Helvetic Confession, which in general symbolizes with that of the British Church. "In the temptation concerning predestination, and which, perhaps, is more dangerous than any other, we should derive comfort from the consideration, that God's promises are general to all that believe—that he himself says, Ask and ye shall receive.—Every one that asks receives. Chap. x. towards the end, or in the valuable work entitled, "Primitive Truth, in a History of the Reformation, expressed by the Early Reformers in their Writings," p. 57.

To us "the promises of God are general and conditional. The Gospel dispensation is described as a covenant between God and man; and the salvation of every individual is made to depend upon his observance of the proposed conditions. Men, as free agents, have it in their power to perform or not to perform these conditions: and God foresaw from eternity, who would and who would not perform them, that is, who will and who will not be saved at the day of judgment."⁵ If, therefore, the promises of God be not fulfilled towards us, we may rest assured that the fault does not rest with Him "who cannot lie," but with ourselves, who have failed in complying with the conditions either tacitly or expressly annexed to them. We may, then, apply general promises to ourselves, not doubting that if we perform the condition expressed or implied, we shall enjoy the mercy promised: for, as all particulars are included in universals, it follows that a general promise is made a particular one to him, whose character corresponds with those to whom such general promise is made.

Matt. xi. 28. may be cited as an example: the promise here made is the giving of rest: the characters of the persons to whom it is made are distinctly specified; they are the weary and heavy laden, whether with the distresses of life, or with the sense of guilt (see Psal. xxxii. 4. xxxviii. 4.), and with the load of ceremonial observances; the condition required is to come unto Christ by faith; in other words to believe in him and become his disciples; and the menace implied is, that if they do not thus come, they will not find rest. Similar promises occur in John iii. 16. and 1 Tim. ii. 4.

II. Such promises as were made in one case may be applied in other cases of the same nature, consistently with the analogy of faith.

It is in promises as in commands: they do not exclusively concern those to whom they were first made; but, being inserted in the Scriptures, they are made of public benefit: for whatsoever things were written aforetime, were written for our use; that we, through patience and comfort of the Scriptures, might have hope. (Rom. xv. 4.)

Thus, what was spoken to Joshua, on his going up against the Canaanites, lest he should be discouraged in that enterprise, is applied by Saint Paul as a remedy against covetousness or inordinate care concerning the things of this life; it being a very comprehensive promise that God will never fail us nor forsake us. But if we were to apply the promises contained in Psal. xciv. 14. and Jer. xxxii. 40. and John x. 28. as promises of absolute and indefectible grace to believers, we should violate every rule of sober interpretation, as well as the analogy of faith. A distinction, however, must be taken between such of the promises in the Old Testament, particularly in the book of Psalms, as are of universal application, and such as were made to those Israelites and Jews who obeyed the law of God, which were strictly temporal. Of this description are all those promises of peace and prosperity in this world, which were literally suitable to the Jewish dispensation, God having encouraged them to obey his laws, by promise of peculiar peace and prosperity in the land of Canaan. Whereas now, under the Gospel dispensation, "godliness hath" indeed the "promise of the life that now is, as well as of that which is to come" (1 Tim. iv. 8.), but with an exception of the cross, when that may be best for us, in order to our future happiness in heaven. So that the promises in the Old Testament, of a general blessing in this life, are not so literally to be applied to Christians as they were to the Jews.¹

⁵ Bp. Tindale's Elements of Theology, vol. ii. p. 213. Similar to the above sentiments are those contained in the "Necessary Erudition of a Christian Man" (at the close of the introductory observations on "Faith"), a Manual of Christian Doctrine published in the year 1534: the value of which ought not to be lessened in our judgment by the circumstance of its not being purged of popish errors—"Although God's promises made in Christ be immutable, yet He maketh them not to us, but with condition; so that His promise standing, we may yet fail of the promise because we keep not our promise. And therefore, if we assuredly reckon upon the state of our felicity, as grounded upon God's promise, and do not therewith remember, that no man shall be crowned unless he lawfully fight, we shall triumph before the victory, and so shall look in vain for that, which is not otherwise promised but under a condition." On the subject of conditional promises, see also Tillotson's Works, vol. v. pp. 185–193. 205, 206. vol. vi. p. 513. vol. ix. pp. 53, 54. and vol. x. p. 119.; and on the subject of conditional threatenings, see vol. vi. pp. 510, 511. (London, 1820.)

III. God has suited his promises to his precepts.

By his precepts we see what is our duty, and what should be the scope of our endeavours; and by his promises we see what is our inability, what should be the matter or object of our prayers, and where we may be supplied with that grace which will enable us to discharge our duty. Compare Deut. x. 16. with Deut. xxx. 6. Eccles. xii. 13. with Jer. xxxii. 40. Ezek. xviii. 31. with Ezek. xxxvi. 37. and Rom. vi. 12. with v. 14.

IV. *Where any thing is promised in case of obedience, the threatening of the contrary is implied in case of disobedience: and where there is a threatening of any thing in case of disobedience, a promise of the contrary is implied upon condition of obedience.*²

In illustration of this remark, it will be sufficient to refer to, and compare, Exod. xx. 7. with Psal. xv. 1—4. and xxiv. 3, 4. and Exod. xx. 12. with Prov. xxx. 17.

There are, however, two important cautions to be attended to in the application of Scripture promises; viz. that we do not violate that connection or dependency which subsists between one promise and another; and that we do not invert that fixed order which is observable between them.

1. The mutual connection or dependency subsisting between promises, must not be broken.

As the duties enjoined by the moral law are copulative, and may not be disjoined in the obedience yielded to them (James ii. 10.); so are the blessings of the promises; which may not be made use of as severed from each other, like unstrung pearls, but as collected into one entire chain. For instance, throughout the sacred volume, the promises of pardon and repentance are invariably connected together; so that it would be presumptuous in any man to suppose that God will ever hearken to him who implores the one and neglects to seek the other. "He pardoneth and absolveth all them that truly repent and unfeignedly believe his holy word." In like manner, in Psal. lxxxix. 11. the promise of grace and glory is so inseparably united, that no person can lay a just claim to the one, who is not previously made a partaker of the other. Bishop Horne's commentary on this verse is not more beautiful than just.³

2. In applying the promises, their order and method should not be inverted, but be carefully observed.

The promises made by God in his word have not inaptly been termed an ample storehouse of every kind of blessings, including both the mercies of the life that now is, and of that which is to come. There is, indeed, no good that can present itself as an object to our desires or thoughts, but the promises are a ground for faith to believe, and hope to expect the enjoyment of it; but then our use and application of them must be regular, and suitable both to the pattern and precept which Christ has given us.

The Pattern or example referred to, we have in that most comprehensive prayer, emphatically termed the Lord's Prayer (Matt. vi. 9—13.); in which he shows what is chiefly to be desired by us, viz. the sanctification of his name in our hearts, the coming of his kingdom into our souls, and the doing of his will in our lives; all which are to be implored, before and above our daily bread. We are not to be more anxious for food than for divine grace.

The Precept alluded to, we have in his sermon on the mount (Matt. v. 33): Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you. The soul is of more worth than the body; as the body is more valuable than raiment; and therefore the principal care of every one should be, to secure his spiritual welfare, by interesting himself in the promises of life and eternal happiness. Here, however, a method must be observed, and the law of the Scripture must be exactly followed, which tells us (Psal. lxxxiv. 11.) that God first gives grace and then glory. "As it is a sin to divide grace from glory, and to seek the one without the other: so it is also a sin to be preposterous in our seeking, to look first after happiness and then after holiness: no man can be rightly solicitous about the crown, but he must first be careful about the race; nor can any be truly thoughtful about his interest in the promises of glory that doth not first make good his title to the promises of grace."⁴

CHAPTER VII.

ON THE INTERPRETATION, AND MEANS OF HARMONIZING PASSAGES OF SCRIPTURE, WHICH ARE ALLEGED TO BE CONTRADICTORY.

ALTHOUGH the sacred writers, being divinely inspired, were necessarily exempted from error in the important truths which they were commissioned to reveal to mankind, yet it is not to be concealed, that, on comparing Scripture with itself, some detached passages are to be found, which appear to be contradictory; and these have been a favourite topic of cavil with the enemies of Christianity from Spinos down to Voltaire, and the opposers of Divine Revelation in our days, who have copied their objections. Unable to disprove or subvert the indisputable facts on which Christianity is founded, and detesting the exemplary holiness of heart and life which it enjoins, its modern antagonists insidiously attempt to impugn the credibility of the sacred writers, by producing what they call contradictions. It is readily admitted that real contradictions are a just and sufficient proof that a book is not divinely inspired, whatever pretences it may make to such inspiration. In this way we prove, that the Koran of Mohammed could not be inspired, much as it is extolled by his admiring followers. The whole of that rhapsody was framed by the wily Arab to answer some particular exigencies.⁵ If any new measure was to be proposed,—any objection against him or the religion which he wished to propagate, was to be answered,—any difficulty to be solved,—any discontent or offence among his people to be removed,—or any other thing done that could promote his designs,—his constant recourse was to the angel Gabriel, for a new revelation: and instantly he produced some addition to the Koran, which was to further the objects he had in view, so that by far the greater part of that book was composed on these or similar occasions to influence his followers to adopt the measures which he intended. Hence not a few real contradictions crept into the Koran; the existence of which is not denied by the Mussulman commentators, who are not only very particular in stating the several occasions on which particular chapters were produced, but also, where any contradiction occurs which they cannot solve, affirm that one of the contradictory passages is revoked. And they reckon in the Koran upwards of one hundred and fifty passages thus revoked. Now this fact is a full evidence that the compiler of that volume could not be inspired; but no such thing can be alleged against the Scriptures. They were indeed given at sundry times and in divers manners, and the authors of them were inspired on particular occasions; but nothing was ever published as a part of it, which was afterwards revoked; nor is there any thing in them which we need to have annulled. Errors in the transcription of copies, as well as in printed editions and translations, do unquestionably exist: but the contradictions objected are only seeming, not real, nor do we know a single instance of such alleged contradictions, that is not capable of a rational solution. A little skill in criticism in the original languages of the Scriptures, their idioms and properties (of which the modern opposers of revelation, it is well known, have for the most part been and are notoriously ignorant), and in the times, occasions, and scopes of the several books, as well as in the antiquities and customs of those countries, which were the scenes of the transactions recorded, will clear the principal difficulties.

To the person who honestly and impartially examines the various evidences for the divinity and inspiration of the Bible (and it not only invites but commands investigation), most of the alleged contradictions, which are discussed in the following pages, will appear frivolous: for they have been made and refuted nearly one hundred and fifty years since. But as

³ "Jesus Christ is our 'Lord' and our 'God': he is a 'sun' to enlighten and direct us in the way, and a 'shield' to protect us against the enemies of our salvation. He will give 'grace' to carry us on 'from strength to strength,' and 'glory' to crown us when we 'appear before him in Zion;' he will 'withhold' nothing that is 'good' and profitable for us in the course of our journey, and will himself be our reward, when we come to the end of it." they are now reasserted, regardless of the satisfactory answers which have been given to them in various forms, both in this country and on the Continent, the author would deem his work imperfect if he were to suffer such objections to pass unnoticed, particularly as he has been called upon, through the public press, to consider, and to obviate them. Should the reader be led to think, that an undue portion of the present volume is appropriated to the interpretation of passages alleged to be contradictory, he is requested to bear in mind that, although the pretended contradictions, here considered, have for the most part been clothed in a few plausible sentences,¹ yet their sophistry cannot be exposed without a laborious and minute examination.

Wherever, then, one text of Scripture seems to contradict another, we should, by a serious consideration of them, endeavour to discover their harmony; for the only way, by which to judge rightly of particular passages in any book, is, first, to ascertain whether the text be correct, and in the next place to consider its whole design, method, and style, and not to criticise some particular parts of it, without bestowing any attention upon the rest. Such is the method adopted by all who would investigate, with judgment, any difficult passages occurring in a profane author: and if a judicious and accurate writer is not to be lightly accused of contradicting himself for any seeming inconsistencies, but is to be reconciled with himself if possible,—unquestionably the same equitable principle of interpretation ought to be applied in the investigation of Scripture difficulties.

Some passages, indeed, are explained by the Scriptures themselves, which serve as a key to assist us in the elucidation of others.

Thus, in one place it is said that Jesus baptized, and in another it is stated that he baptized not: the former passage is explained to be intended not of baptism performed by himself, but by his disciples who baptized in his name. Compare John iii. 22. with iv. 1, 2.

Frequently, also, a distinction of the different senses of words, as well as of the different subjects and times, will enable us to obviate the seeming discrepancy.

Thus, when it is said, It is appointed unto all men once to die (Heb. ix. 27); and elsewhere, If a man keep Christ's saying, he shall never see death, there is no contradiction; for, in the former place, natural death, the death of the body, is intended, and in the latter passage, spiritual or eternal death. Again, when Moses says, God rested on the seventh day from all his works (Gen. ii. 2), and Jesus says, My Father worketh hitherto (John v. 17), there is no opposition or contradiction; for Moses is speaking of the works of creation, and Jesus of the works of providence. So Samuel tells us God will not repent (1 Sam. xv. 29); and yet we read in other parts of the Old Testament that it repented the Lord that he had made man on the earth (Gen. vi. 6); and that he had set up Saul to be king. (1 Sam. xv. 11.) But in these passages there is no real contradiction; repentance in the one place signifies a change of mind and counsel, from want of foresight of what come to pass, and thus God cannot repent; but then he changes his course as men do when they change their minds, and so he may be said to repent. In these, as well as in other instances, where personal qualities or feelings are ascribed to God, the Scriptures speak in condescension to our capacities, after the manner of men; nor can we speak of the Deity in any other manner, if we would speak intelligibly to the generality of mankind.

The contradictions which are alleged to exist in the Scriptures, may be referred to the following classes, viz.—seeming contradictions in historical passages—in chronology—between prophecies and their fulfilment—in points of doctrine and morality—in the quotations from the Old Testament in the New—between the sacred writers themselves—between the sacred writers and profane authors—and, lastly, seeming contradictions to philosophy and the nature of things.

SECTION I.

SEEMING CONTRADICTIONS IN HISTORICAL PASSAGES.

MOST of the seeming contradictions in Scripture are found in the historical parts, where their connection with the great subject or scope is less considerable; and they may not unfrequently be traced to the errors of transcribers or of the press. The apparent contradictions, in the historical passages of Scripture, arise from the different circumstances related,—from things being related in a different order by the sacred writers,—from differences in numbers,—and from differences in the relation of events in one place, and references to those events in another.

¹ Bishop Horne, when speaking of the disingenuity of infidels in bringing forward objections against the Scriptures, has the following remarks: "Many and painful are the researches, usually necessary to be made for settling points of this kind. Pertness and ignorance may ask a question in three lines, which it will cost learning and ingenuity thirty pages to answer. When this is done, the same question shall be triumphantly asked again the next year, as if nothing had ever been written upon the subject. And as people in general, for one reason or other, like short objections better than long answers, in this mode of disputation (if it can be styled such) the odds must ever be against us; and we must be content with those of our friends, who have honesty and erudition, candour and patience, to study both sides of the question." Letters on Infidelity, p. 82. (Works, vol. vi. pp. 447, 448. 8vo. London, 1809.)

§ 1. Seeming Contradictions in the different Circumstances related.

These arise from various causes, as the sources whence the inspired writers drew their relations, the different designs of the sacred writers, erroneous readings, obscure or ambiguous expressions, transpositions in the order of narrating, and sometimes from several of these causes combined.

1. Apparent contradictions, in the different circumstances related, arise from the different sources whence the inspired writers drew their narratives.

For instance, in the brief accounts recorded by Matthew and Mark respecting the birth and childhood of Jesus Christ, from whom could they have derived their information? They could not have become acquainted with those circumstances, unless from the particulars communicated by his relatives according to the flesh; and, as it has been frequently remarked, it is highly probable that they received their information from Mary and Joseph, or others of the family of Jesus. How easy, then, is it for some trifling variations to creep into such accounts of infancy as are preserved by oral relation; all of which, though differing, are nevertheless perfectly consistent with the truth! Again, during our Lord's three years' circuit in Palestine, Matthew and John were constantly his disciples and companions: the source of their narratives, therefore, was ocular testimony; while Luke and Mark, not having been Christ's disciples, related things as they were communicated to them by the apostles and others, who from the beginning were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word, as Saint Luke expressly states at the commencement of his Gospel. Under such circumstances, how is it possible that some discrepancies should not appear in the writings of such persons? Yet these discrepancies, as we shall presently see, are so far from affecting their credibility as historians, that, on the contrary, they confirm their veracity and correctness. The same remark will apply to the history of our Lord's death and resurrection, as well as to the account of the sermon delivered on the mount and on the plain.

2. Seeming contradictions, in the different circumstances related, may also arise, from the different designs which the sacred writers had in the composition of their narratives; for the difference of design will necessarily lead to a corresponding selection of circumstances.

The consideration of this circumstance will remove the contradiction which modern opposers of the Scriptures have asserted to exist between the first and second chapters of the book of Genesis. The design of Moses, in the first chapter, was to give a short account of the orderly creation of all things, from the meanest to the noblest, in opposition to the absurd and contradictory notions which at that time prevailed among the Egyptians and other nations. In the second chapter, the sacred writer explains some things more at length, which in the preceding were narrated more briefly, because he would not interrupt the connection of his discourse concerning the six days' work of creation. He therefore more particularly relates the manner in which Eve was formed, and also further illustrates the creation of Adam. In thus recapitulating the history of creation, Moses describes the creation through its several stages, as the phenomena would have successively presented themselves to a spectator, had a spectator been in existence. Again, the design of the two books of Samuel, especially the second book, is, to relate the various steps which conducted to the wonderful elevation of David from a low condition to the throne of Judah first, and after seven years and six months to that of Israel, together with the battles and occurrences which led to that great event, and secured to him the possession of his kingdom: and then at the close (2 Sam. xxiii. 8—39) we have a catalogue to perpetuate the memory of those warriors who had been particularly instrumental in promoting the success and establishing the glory of their royal master. But in the first book of Chronicles the history of David begins with him as king, and immediately mentions the heroes of his armies, and then proceeds to an abridgment of the events of his reign. This difference of design will account for the variations occurring in the two principal chapters containing the history of those heroes; for in 1 Chron. xi. they are recorded in the beginning of David's reign, with Joab introduced at their head, and the reason assigned for his being so particularly distinguished; but in the concluding chapter of Samuel, when the history of David's reign had already been given, there the name of Joab is omitted, since no one could forget that he was David's chief mighty man, when he had been mentioned, in almost every page, as captain general of the armies of Israel.²

The difference of design also will satisfactorily explain the seeming difference between the genealogies of our Saviour given by the evangelist Matthew and Luke from the public registers, and which comprise a period of four thousand years, from Adam to Joseph his reputed father, or to Mary his mother. The genealogy given by Saint Matthew was principally designed for the Jews; and, therefore, it traces the pedigree of Jesus Christ, as the promised seed, down from Abraham to David, and from him through Solomon's line to Jacob the father of Joseph, who was the reputed or legal father of Christ. (Matt. i. 1—16.) That given by Saint Luke was intended for the Gentiles, and ² Dr. Kennicott's First Dissertation, pp. 13—15. The subsequent part of this very learned volume is appropriated to an elaborate comparison of the discrepancies between 1 Chron. xi. and 2 Sam. v. and xxiii., to which the reader is referred.

traces the pedigree upwards from Heli, the father of Mary, to David, through the line of his son Nathan, and from Nathan to Abraham, concurring with the former, and from Abraham up to Adam, who was the immediate "Son of God," born without father or mother. (Luke iii. 23—38.)¹

To this satisfactory answer to the cavils of modern infidels, the Jews object—Why is Mary not mentioned in this genealogy, and Joseph said to be the son of Heli?

ANSWER. This is a mode of speaking quite warranted by the Old Testament, the authority of which is acknowledged by the Jews themselves. For example, Neh. vii. 63. And of the priests: the children of Habasiah, the children of Kor, the children of Barzillai, which took one of the daughters of Barzillai the Gileadite to wife, and was called after their name. Here it appears that a person of the priestly tribe, or tribe of Levi, took to wife a daughter of Barzillai, and that he and the issue of this marriage were regarded as children of Barzillai, though properly the sons of Levi, and though the mother's name is not mentioned. So Joseph, taking the daughter of Heli to wife, is called the son of Heli.²

That Saint Luke gives the pedigree of Mary, the real mother of Christ, may be collected from the following reasons:—

"1. The angel Gabriel, at the annunciation, told the virgin, that 'God would give her divine Son the throne of his father David' (Luke i. 32); and this was necessary to be proved, by her genealogy, afterwards. 2. Mary is called by the Jews, מרים, 'the daughter of Ehi,'³ and by the early Christian writers, 'the daughter of Joakim and Anna.' But Joakim and Eliakim (as being derived from the names of God, יהוה, Iahohi, and אֵל, Ehi) are sometimes interchanged. (2 Chron. xxxvi. 4.) Ehi, therefore, or Heli, is the abridgment of Eliakim. Nor is it of any consequence that the Rabbins called him עלי, instead of אֵל, the aspirates Aleph and Ain being frequently interchanged. 3. A similar case in point occurs elsewhere in the genealogy. After the Babylonian captivity, the two lines of Solomon and Nathan, the sons of David, unite in the generations of Salathiel and Zerobabel, and thence diverge again in the sons of the latter, Abiud and Resa. Hence, as Salathiel in Matthew, was the son of Jeconiah, or Jehoiachin, who was carried away into captivity by Nebuchadnezzar, so in Luke, Salathiel must have been the grandson of Neri, by his mother's side. 4. The evangelist himself has critically distinguished the real from the legal genealogy, by a parenthetical remark:—ἐν τούτοις—συν ὡς ἐνομίσθητε, υἱὸς Ἰωσήφ [καὶ οὐτως υἱὸς Δαυὶδ]. τὸν ἡαίον—Jesus—being (as was reputed) the son of Joseph, (but in reality) the son of Heli, or his grandson by the mother's side: for so should the ellipsis involved in the parenthesis be supplied.⁴ This interpretation of the genealogy in Saint Luke's Gospel, if it be admitted, removes at once every difficulty; and (as Bishop Gleig has truly remarked) it is so natural and consistent with itself, that we think, it can hardly be rejected, except by those who are determined, that "seeing they will not see, and hearing they will not understand."

But the difference in the circumstances related, arising from the difference in design of the sacred writers, is to be found chiefly in those cases, where the same event is narrated very briefly by one evangelist, and is described more copiously by another.

An example of this kind we have in the account of our Lord's threefold temptation in the wilderness, which is related more at length by Matthew and Luke, while Mark has given a very brief epitome of that occurrence. But these variations, which arise from differences of design, do not present a shadow of contradiction or discrepancy: for it is well known that Saint Matthew wrote his Gospel a few years after our Lord's ascension, while the church wholly consisted of converts from Judaism. Saint Mark's Gospel, probably written at Rome, was adapted to the state of the church there, which consisted of a mixture of converts who had been Pagans and Jews. He inserts many direct or oblique explanations of passages in Saint Matthew's Gospel, in order to render them more intelligible to the converts from Paganism. The Gospel of Saint Luke was written for the immediate use of the converts from Heathenism; several parts of it appear to be particularly adapted to display the divine goodness to the Gentiles. Hence, he traces up Christ's lineage to Adam, to signify that he was THE SEED of the woman promised to our first parents, and the Saviour of all their posterity. He marks the era of Christ's birth, and the time when John the Baptist began to announce the Gospel, by the reigns of the Roman emperors. Saint John, who wrote long after the other evangelists, appears to have designed his Gospel to be partly as a supplement to the others, in order to preserve several discourses of our Lord, or facts relating to him which had been omitted by the other evangelists; but chiefly to check the heresies which were beginning to appear in the church, and (as he himself declares, xx. 31) to establish the true doctrine concerning the divinity and mediatorial character of Christ.⁵

The differences, however, which thus subsist in the respective narratives of the evangelists, do not in any degree whatever affect their credibility. The transactions related are still true and actual transactions, and capable of being readily comprehended, although there may be a trifling discrepancy in some particulars. We know, for instance, that a discourse was delivered by our Lord, so sublime, so replete with momentous instruction, that the people were astonished at his doctrine. But whether this discourse was delivered on a mountain or on a plain, is a matter of no moment whatever. In like manner, although there are circumstantial differences in the accounts of our Lord's resurrection from the dead, the thing itself may be known, and its truth ascertained. A narrative is not to be rejected by reason of some diversity of circumstances with which it is related: for the character of human testimony is, substantial truth under circumstantial variety; but a close agreement induces suspicion of confederacy and fraud. Important variations, and even contradictions, are not always deemed sufficient to shake the credibility of a fact; and if this circumstance be allowed to operate in favour of profane historians, it ought at least to be admitted with equal weight in reference to the sacred writers. It were no difficult task to give numerous instances of differences between profane historians. Two or three may suffice. It is well known that Julius Caesar wrote histories both of the civil war and of the war in Gaul: the same events are related by Dion Cassius, as well as by Plutarch in his lives of Pompey and Caesar. The transactions recorded by Suetonius are also related by Dion, and many of them by Livy and Polybius. What discrepancies are discoverable between these writers! Yet Livy and Polybius are not considered as liars on this account, but we endeavour by various ways to harmonize their discordant narratives, conscious that, even when we fail, these discordancies do not affect the general credibility of their histories. Again, the embassy of the Jews to the emperor Claudian is placed by Philo in harvest, and by Josephus in seed-time; yet the existence of this embassy was never called in question. To come nearer to our own times: Lord Clarendon states that the Marquis of Argyll was condemned to be hanged, which sentence was executed on the same day: four other historians affirm that he was beheaded upon the Monday, having been condemned on the preceding Saturday; yet this contradiction never led any person to doubt, whether the Marquis was executed or not.

Much of the discrepancy in the Gospels arises from omission, which is always an uncertain ground of objection. Suetonius, Tacitus, and Dion Cassius have all written an account of the reign of Tiberius; and each has omitted many things mentioned by the rest, yet their credit is not impeached. And these differences will be more numerous, when men do not write histories, but memoirs (which perhaps is the true name of the Gospels), that is, when they do not undertake to deliver, in the order of time, a regular account of all things of importance which the subject of the history said and did, but only such passages as were suggested by their particular design at the time of writing.⁶ Further, as these seeming discordancies in the evangelical historians prove that they did not write in concert; so from their agreeing in the principal and most material facts, we may infer that they wrote after the truth.

In Xiphilin and Theodosius, the two abbreviators of the historian Dion Cassius, may be observed the like agreement and disagreement; the one taking notice of many particulars which the other passes in silence, and both of them relating the chief and most remarkable events. And since, from their both frequently making use of the very same words and expressions, when they speak of the same thing, it is apparent that they both copied from the same original; so, no person was ever absurd enough to imagine that the particulars mentioned by the one were not taken out of Dion Cassius, merely because they were omitted by the other. And still more absurd would it be to say (as some modern opposers of revelation have said of the Evangelists), that the facts related by Theodosius are contradicted by Xiphilin, because the latter says nothing of them. But against the Evangelists, it seems, all kinds of arguments may not only be employed but applauded. The case, however, of the sacred historians is

But the fullest discussion of the subject is to be found in Dr. Barrett's Preliminary Dissertation prefixed to his edition of the Fragments of Saint Matthew's Gospel, from a Codex Rescriptus in Trinity College Library at Dublin. (*Evangelium secundum mattheum ex Codice Rescripto in Bibliotheca Collegii Sanctae Trinitatis Justitiae Dublin, &c. 4to. Eccl. lib. i. c. 7.), and translated by Dr. Lardner (Works, vol. ii. pp. 436—438, 8vo. or vol. i. pp. 416, 417, 4to.), and which Africanus professed to have received from some of our Lord's relatives. As Dr. Barrett's book is scarce, and comparatively little known, it may gratify the reader to learn that a copious and faithful abstract of it is given in the Eclectic Review for 1807, vol. iii. part 2. pp. 586—594, 678—693; and also with some additional observations by Dr. A. exactly parallel to that of these two abbreviators. The latter extracted the particulars, related in their several abridgments, from the history of Dion Cassius, as the former drew the materials of their Gospels from the life of Jesus Christ. Xiphilin and Theodosius transcribed their relations from a certain collection of facts contained in one and the same history; the four evangelists, from a certain collection of facts contained in the life of one and the same person, laid before them by that same Scriptur, which was to lead them into all truth. And why the fidelity of the four transcribers should be called in question for reasons which hold equally strong against the two abbreviators, we leave those to determine who lay such a weight upon the objection.¹

3. A third source of apparent contradictions, in the different circumstances related, arises from *false readings, or from obscure and ambiguous expressions, or from transpositions in the order of relating, and sometimes from several of these causes combined.*² The only way by which these seeming repugnancies may be reconciled, is to call in the aid of sacred criticism; which, when judiciously applied, will, in most instances, if not in every case, remove them.

Thus, in Gen. xxix. 1-8 we have a dialogue in which no man is mentioned but Jacob, the only living creatures present being three flocks of sheep; yet these are represented as conversing, rolling away the stone, and watering the sheep. This appearance of contradiction probably originated, first, in some transcriber writing הַקָּרִים (HADARIM), flocks, for קָרִים (HARIM), shepherds, in three places; and, secondly, from verse 3. expressing what customarily happened, not what then had actually taken place;³ and this mistake, having obtained in some copy of high repute, has been transcribed into all the later manuscripts. That the above mistake has actually been made appears from the Samaritan text of the Pentateuch, from the Arabic version in Bishop Walton's Polyglott (which has preserved the true reading in verses 3 and 8), and from the Greek version. The true reading, therefore, as Houbigant and Dr. Kennicott contend, is shepherds, not flocks, and the third verse should be read parenthetically.⁴

Having thus stated the various causes of apparent contradictions in the different circumstances related by the inspired writers, we shall proceed to illustrate the preceding remarks.

I. The names of persons and places are respectively liable to change.

Thus, the name of one person is sometimes given to another, either as they are types of them.—So Christ is called David (Ezek. xxiv. 23, 24.) and Zerubbabel (Hag. ii. 23.)—or, on account of some resemblance between them, as in Isa. i. 10. Ezek. xvi. 3. 46. Matt. iv. 5. compared with Matt. xi. 14. and John i. 21. Rev. ii. 20. and xviii. 2. So Heil derives its name, in many languages, from the valley of the children of Hinnom, on account of the wickedness there committed, and the dreadful cries formerly heard in that place. In like manner, the place of the great slaughter (Rev. xvi. 16.) has its name from the place of the memorable battle where Josiah was slain, 2 Kings xxiii. 29.

II. The name of the head of a tribe or nation is sometimes given to their posterity.

Thus, Edom or Esau is put for the Edomites, who were the descendants of Esau, in Num. xx. 18. Gen. xxxvi. 1. and Obadiah i. 6. Very numerous similar examples are to be found in the Sacred Writings, which it is unnecessary to specify.

III. Sometimes names remain after the reason for which they were given, or the thing whence they were taken, has ceased to exist.

Aaron's rod, for instance, retained its name when changed into a serpent, Exod. vii. 12. So Matthew is called a publican, because he had formerly followed that calling. Simon the leper is so termed because he had formerly been afflicted with the leprosy, Matt. xxvi. 6. So it is said in Matt. x. 5. that the blind see, and the deaf hear, that is, those who had been blind and deaf. A similar instance occurs in Matt. xxi. 31. The publicans and harlots enter into the kingdom of heaven, that is, those who had been such, not those who continue so. (Compare 1 Cor. vi. 9.)

IV. The same persons or places sometimes have several names.

Thus, Esau's wife is called Basemath in Gen. xxvi. 34. and Adah in Gen. xxxvi. 2. Gideon is called Jerubbab in Judges vi. 32. and vii. 1. Zerubbabel and Sabbazbazar are the same person, Ezra i. 8. and v. 14. compared with Hag. i. 14. and ii. 2. 21. Almost numberless similar instances might be adduced from the Old Testament; nor are examples wanting in the New. Thus, he who was nominated for the apostleship, is called Joseph, Barsabas, and Justus. (Acts i. 25.) Josee and Barnabas are the names of the same apostle. Simon, it is well known, was called Peter and all the other apostles, except Saint John, had more names than one in like manner, the same places are distinguished by several names: as Emishplat and Kadesi, Gen. xiv. 7. Heronon, Siron, Suenir, Deut. iii. 9. Magdala in Matt. xv. 39. is termed Dalmanutha in Mark viii. 10. and the country of the Gergesenes, in Matt. viii. 28, in Mark v. 1. called that of the Galadrenes.

V. Many persons and places also have the same name.

There was one Bethlehem in the tribe of Zebulun, Josh. xix. 15 and another in the tribe of Judah, Matt. ii. 6. Luke ii. 4. There were two towns called Cana, Josh. xix. 28. John ii. 1. Several Casarars, Matt. xvi. 13. Acts ix. 30. and xviii. 22. Several Zechariahs, as in 1 Chron. v. 7. xv. 20. xxiv. 25. &c. 2 Chron. xvii. 7. xx. 14. Zech. i. 1. Luke i. 5. Matt. xxiii. 35. The Zechariah in this last cited passage was probably the person mentioned in 2 Chron. xx. 14. and the name of the father has been added since, by some transcriber, who took it from the title of the prophecy. Several Herods, as, 1. Herod the Great, in whose reign our Redeemer was incarnate, Matt. ii. 1. and by whom the infants at Bethlehem were massacred, Matt. ii. 16. 2. Herod Antipas, surnamed the Tetrarch, Matt. xiv. 1. by whom John the Baptist was murdered (verse 10.), and our Saviour was mocked and set at nought, Luke xxiii. 11. 3. Herod Agrippa, who slew the apostle James, Acts xii. 2. and miserably perished, verse 23. So, there are some names which appear to have been common to several, if not to all, the successive kings of a country. Thus, Pharaoh was the general name of the kings of Egypt, Gen. xii. 15. xxxix. 1. Exodus i.—xv. passim. 1 Kings iii. 1. 2 Kings xxiii. 29. Isa. xli. 11. Jer. xxv. 19. xlv. 30. and xlv. 17. and very frequently in the prophecy of Ezekiel; and that this was the constant title of the Egyptian kings, is further attested by Josephus and Suidas.⁵ Artaxerxes was the common name of the whole race of Persian kings; as Abimelech was of the Philistines, Gen. xx. 2. xxvi. 8. compared with the title to Psal. xxiv. 1. and Agag of the Amalekites, as may be inferred from Num. xxiv. 7. compared with 1 Sam. xv. 8.

VI. The differences in names occurring in the Scriptures are sometimes occasioned by false readings, and can only be reconciled by correcting these; but the true name may in such cases be distinguished from the erroneous one, by the usage of Scripture in other places, as well as from the Samaritan Pentateuch, the ancient versions, and Josephus.⁷

The following instances will illustrate this remark. Hadadezer, 1 Chron. xviii. 3. ought to be Hadadezer, as in 2 Sam. viii. 3. A Resh being mistaken for a Daleth 7. Joshabab, 2 Sam. xxii. 8. (marg. rend.) should be Jashobeam, as in 1 Chron. xi. 11. and xxvii. 2. Bathshua, the daughter of Amiel, in 1 Chron. iii. 5. should be Bathsheba the daughter of Eliam, as in 2 Sam. xi. 3. the two last letters of the father's name being transposed, and the two first put last. Azariah, in 2 Kings xiv. 21. should be Uzziah, as in 2 Chron. xxvi. 1. and elsewhere; which reading is adopted, or nearly so, by the Arabic and Syriac versions. Jehozab, in 2 Chron. xii. 17. should be Ahaziah, or Ahaziah, as in 2 Kings viii. 24. and elsewhere.⁸ The name of the great king Nebuchadnezzar is spelled seven different ways.⁹

§ 2. Apparent Contradictions, from Things being related in a different Order by the sacred Writers.

I. The Scriptures being as it were a compendious record of important events, we are not to infer that these took place exactly in the order narrated; for frequently things are related together, between which many things intervened while they were transacting. Neither are we to conclude that a thing is not done, because it is not related in the history of other things happening in the same age.

1. Thus, in Num. xxxiii. we have a particular account of the journeyings of the Israelites, which are not noticed in their proper place in the book of Exodus. In the four Gospels especially, we find that each of the evangelists did not relate every word and thing; but one frequently omits what has been related by the rest, while that which has been briefly noticed by one is recorded at length by the others; and two evangelists, when relating the same fact, do not always observe the order of time.

2. So, in John xii. 1-3. Jesus Christ is said to have been anointed at Bethany six days before the passover; yet Saint Matthew (xxvi. 2. 6, 7.) takes no notice of this remarkable circumstance till within two days of the feast. "The reason is manifest. It was at this time that Judas offered to the chief priests and elders to betray him; and the evangelist, intending to relate his treachery, returns to give an account of the event which prompted him to it. The rebuke which he received in the house of Simon, when he complained of the waste of ointment, had irritated his proud disaffected heart, and inspired him with sentiments of revenge. The mention of the union of our Saviour, which was preparatory to his burial, reminds us of another observation, which is of use in removing difficulties, namely, that two facts may much resemble each other and yet not be the same. Although they differ, therefore, in some circumstances, while they agree in others, it is through haste and inattention that, on this account, we charge the Scriptures with contradiction. The anointing of Christ, six days before the passover, is evidently different from the anointing recorded in the seventh chapter of Luke. The two incidents agree, as both happened at table, and in the house of a person named Simon; but on considering the passages, they appear to have taken place at different times."¹⁰ Apparent contradictions of this kind are so numerous in the Gospels, that it would almost require a harmony of them to be constructed, were we here to specify them; and from these discrepancies have originated harmonies, or connected histories, compiled from the writings of the evangelists, in the structure of which different theories of arrangement have been adopted in order to reconcile their seeming discrepancies.

The proper version of the passage above referred to will be thus:—"Then Jacob went on his journey, and came into the land of the people of the east. 2. And he looked, and behold a well in a field; and, lo, three shepherds were lying by it, for out of that well they watered their flocks; and a great stone was upon the well's mouth. (And there all the shepherds usually met together, and rolled the stone from the well's mouth, and watered the sheep; and put the stone again upon the well's mouth, in its place.) 4-7. And Jacob said, &c. &c. 8. And they said, We cannot until all the shepherds shall be gathered together, and roll the stone from the well's mouth; then we water the sheep."

3. Other additional instances of things that are mentioned as having happened, but of which no notice is taken in the sacred histories, occur in Gen. xxii. 7, 8, the changing of Jacob's wages trinitas, that is, frequently; in Psalm cv. 18, Joseph's feet being hurt with fetters; in Hosea xi. 4, Jacob's weeping; in Acts xv. 23–30, several things concerning Moses; in Acts xx. 35, a saying of our Lord; in 1 Cor. xv. 7, an appearance of Christ to St. James; in 2 Tim. iii. 8, James and Jambros withstanding Moses; in Heb. ix. 19, Moses sprinkling the book as well as the people with blood; in 1st Heb. xii. 21, a saying of Moses. Jude 9, Michael's contending for the body of Moses; and verse 14, Enoch's prophesy; and in Rev. ii. 14, Halaam teaching Blak to put a stumbling-block before the children of Israel: all which things might be known by revelation, or by personal communication, as in the case of Christ's appearance to James, who was evidently living when Paul mentioned it, or by tradition, or by the history of those times, as some of the circumstances above adverted to are mentioned by Josephus.

II. Things are not always recorded in the Scriptures exactly in the same method and order in which they were done; whence apparent contradictions arise, events being sometimes introduced by anticipation and sometimes by επαγγελία, in which the natural order is inverted, and things are related first which ought to appear last.

1. Events introduced by anticipation.

The creation of man in Gen. i. 27; which, after several other things inserted, is related more at large, particularly the creation of Adam, in Gen. ii. 7, and of Eve, in verses 21–23. The death of Isaac (Gen. xxxv. 29) is anticipated, as several transactions, especially those in chapters xxxvii. and xxxviii. must have happened during his life: it was probably thus anticipated, that the history of Joseph might not be disturbed. Isaac is supposed to have lived at least twelve years after Joseph was sold into Egypt. In Exod. xvi. 23, we read of the keeping of the pot of manna, which was not done till many years after. David's adventure with Goliath, related in 1 Sam. xvii, was prior to his sojourn Saul with him; and the latter story is recorded in 1 Sam. xvi, the historian bringing together the effect of Saul's rejection, and the endowment of David with various graces, among which was, his pre-eminent skill on the harp. "It appears, indeed, from many circumstances of the story, that David's combat with Goliath was many years prior in time to Saul's madness, and to David's introduction to him as a musician. In the first place, David was quite a youth when he engaged Goliath (1 Sam. xvii. 32, 33): when he was introduced to Saul, as a musician, he was of full age. (xvi. 18). Secondly, his combat with Goliath was his first appearance in public life (xvii. 56); when he was introduced as a musician he was a man of established character. (xvi. 18). Thirdly, his combat with Goliath was his first military exploit. (xvii. 38, 39). He was a man of war when he was introduced as a musician. (xvi. 18). He was unknown both to Saul and Abner when he fought Goliath. He had not, therefore, yet been in the office of Saul's armour-bearer, or resident in any capacity at the court. Now, this conclusion is, not that those twenty verses are an interpolation, (as some critics have imagined), but that the last ten verses of 1 Sam. xvi, which relate Saul's madness and David's introduction to the court upon that occasion, are misplaced. The true place for these ten verses seems to be between the ninth and tenth of the eighteenth chapter. Let these ten verses be removed to that place, and this seventeenth chapter be connected immediately with the thirteenth verse of chapter xvi, and the whole disorder and inconsistency that appears in the present narrative will be removed." In Matt. xxi. 21, and Mark xiv. 18, our Saviour is recorded to have intimated by whom he was to be betrayed, while eating the passover; which Saint Luke (xxii. 21) shows to have been after the institution of the Lord's Supper: the order of Luke therefore is the true one. The imprisonment of John is set down in Luke iii. 19, before the baptism of Christ, whereas it happened after he had entered on his public ministry. The same occurrence is related by Saint Matthew and the other evangelists, per. c. c. c. c. c. on occasion of Herod's consternation.

2. Events related first which ought to have been placed last.

The calling of Abraham to depart from Ur in Chaldea, in Gen. xii. 1, for it preceded that departure which is related in ch. xi. 31. Compare Gen. xv. 7, with Acts vii. 3. The history of Judah, in Gen. xxxviii, for most of the particulars related happened before the sale of Joseph. In Luke iv. 9, the carrying and placing of Christ on one of the battlements of the temple is related after his being transported to an exceeding high mountain; whereas it certainly preceded it, as appears from Matt. iv. 5, 8, who has distinctly noted the order of the temptations.

III. A thing is sometimes attributed to one who was formerly an example of any action. See an instance of this in Jude, verse 11.

IV. Actions or things are sometimes said to be done, when they are not already done, but upon the point of being accomplished, or (as we usually say) "as good as done."

And in this language Christ ordinarily spoke a little before his death, as in Matt. xxvi. 24, the son of man orthos, &c. verse 45, the son of man is betrayed. So Mark xiv. 41, Luke xxi. 19, 20, which is given, which is shed, and verse 37, the things concerning me have an end. A similar expression occurs in Isa. iv. 6, to us a child is born; to us a son is given, &c. and in Rev. xviii. 2, Babylon is fallen, is fallen.

V. So actions or things are said to be done, which are only declared to be done.

4 Classii Philologia Sacra, tom. i. pp. 668–671. edit Dathii.

Thus, in Gen. xxvii. 37, we read, I have made him thy Lord, that is, I have foretold that he shall be so. Gen. xxxv. 12, The land which I gave Abraham and Isaac, that is, promised or foretold should be theirs. See also instances in Num. xvi. 7, Job v. 3, Jer. i. 10, xv. 1, and xxv. 15.

VI. So, actions or things are said to be done, which only seem or are reputed to be done.

Thus, in Josh. ii. 7, it is said, the men pursued after the spies; that is, they believed they were doing so, at the very time when the spies were concealed.

VII. So, a thing is said to be done by him who only desires or endeavours to accomplish it, or uses proper means for that purpose.

See examples of this in Gen. xxvii. 21, Esther viii. 5, Ezek. xxiv. 13, 1 Cor. x. 33, &c.

§ 3. Apparent Contradictions, arising from Differences in Numbers.

Apparent contradictions in the Sacred Writings, arising from the difference of numbers, proceed from the Scriptures speaking in whole or round numbers,—from numbers being taken sometimes exclusively and sometimes inclusively,—from various readings,—and from the writers of the New Testament sometimes quoting numbers from the Alexandrian version, not from the Hebrew text.

I. The Scriptures sometimes speak in whole, or, as we usually term them, round numbers; though an odd or imperfect number would be more exact.

Thus, in Gen. xv. 13, it is foretold that his posterity should be enslaved in Egypt four hundred years. Moses (Exod. xii. 40,) states their sojourning to be four hundred and thirty years, as also does Paul, Gal. iii. 17, and Josephus. In Acts vii. 6, Stephen says that the children of Israel sojourned in Egypt four hundred years, leaving out the odd tens. Though the Israelites themselves resided in Egypt only two hundred and some odd years, yet the full time of their peregrination was four hundred and thirty years, if we reckon from the calling of Abraham and his departure from Ur, until the Israelites quitted Egypt; and that this is the proper reckoning appears from the Samaritan copy of the Pentateuch; which in all its printed editions and manuscripts, as well as the Septuagint version of the Pentateuch, reads the passage in Exod. xii. 40, thus: Note the sojourning of the children of Israel, and of their fathers, which they sojourned in the land of Canaan, and in the land of Egypt, was four hundred and thirty years. In Num. xiv. 33, it is denounced to the murmuring Israelites that they should wander forty years in the wilderness; but if we compare Num. xxiii. with Josh. iv. 19, we shall find that some days, if not weeks, were wanting to complete the number: but, forty years being a round and entire number, and because in so many years a few days were inconsiderable, therefore Moses delivers it in this manner. The same remark applies to Judges xi. 26, relative to the sojourning of the Israelites in the Land of the Amorites. The twelve apostles are also mentioned in 1 Cor. xv. 5, though Judas was no more; and Abimelech is said to have slain seventy persons, though Jotham escaped. Compare Judges ix. 18, 56, with verse 5.

II. Sometimes numbers are to be taken exclusively, and sometimes inclusively.

Matt. xvii. 1, Mark ix. 2, Luke ix. 28, and John xx. 26, may be mentioned as examples of this remark. See them further explained in p. 405. Obs. V. infra.

III. Differences in numbers not unfrequently arise from false readings.

As the Hebrews anciently used the letters of their alphabet to denote numbers, many of those numbers which to us appear almost incredible in some places, and contradictory in others, are owing to mistakes in some of the similar letters. Thus, in 2 Kings vii. 26, we read that Hazaiab was twenty-two years old when he began to reign; but in 2 Chron. xxii. 2, he is said to have been forty-two years old, which is impossible, as he could not be born two years before Jehoram his father, who was only forty years old. Twenty-two years, therefore, is the proper reading, a Kaph 2, whose numeral power is twenty, being put for a Mem 2, whose numeral power is forty. In like manner, in 2 Sam. viii. 4, and x. 18, we read seven hundred, which in 1 Chron. xviii. 4, and xix. 18, is seven thousand, the proper number. As the Jews anciently appear to have expressed numbers by marks analogous to our common figures, the corruption and consequently the seeming contradiction may be accounted for, from the transcribers having carelessly added or omitted a single cipher. In 1 Kings iv. 26, we are told that Solomon had forty thousand stalls for horses, which number, in 2 Chron. ix. 25, is only four thousand, and is most probably correct, a cipher having been added. In 2 Chron. xiii. 3, 17, we meet with the following numbers, four hundred thousand, eight hundred thousand, and five hundred thousand, which in several of the old editions of the Vulgate Latin Bible are forty thousand, eighty thousand, and fifty thousand; the latter are probably the true numbers.

By the application of this rule, some critics have endeavoured to reconcile the difference relative to the hour of Christ's crucifixion, which Mark (xv. 25,) is stated to be the third, and by St. John (xix. 14,) the sixth hour; for, as in ancient times all numbers were written in manuscripts not at length, but with numeral letters, it was easy for Γ, three, to be taken for Ϟ, six. Of this opinion are Griesbach, in his elaborate edition of the New Testament, Semler, Rosenmüller, Doddridge, Whitby, Bengel, Cocceius, Beza, Erasmus, and by the greater part of the most eminent critics. What further renders this correction probable is, that besides the Codex Bezae, and the Codex Stephani (of the eighth century), there are four other manuscripts which read τρεῖς, the third, in John xix. 14. as well as the Alexandrian Chronicle, which professes to cite accurate manuscripts—even the autograph copy of St. John himself. Such also is the opinion of Severus Antiochenus, Ammonius, and some others cited by Theophylact on the passage; to whom must be added Nonnus, a Greek poet of Panopolis in Egypt, who flourished in the fifth century, and wrote a poetical paraphrase of the Gospel of St. John, and who also found τρεῖς in the manuscript used by him.¹

IV. Apparent contradictions in the numbers of the New Testament arise from the sacred writers sometimes quoting the numbers of the Septuagint or Alexandrian version, not those of the Hebrew text.

This is evidently the case in Acts vii. 14. where Jacob's family is stated, at the time of his going into Egypt, to have consisted of threescore and fifteen souls; whereas Moses, in Gen. xli. 27. fixes it at threescore and ten souls. What further confirms this remark is, that the Septuagint version of Gen. xli. 20. enumerates five persons more than the Hebrew, which, being added to the threescore and ten mentioned by Moses, exhibits the exact number, seventy-five.² To this we may add (although it does not strictly belong to numbers) the well-known passage, Luke iii. 36. where, in giving the genealogy of Jesus Christ, the evangelist notices a Cainan, whose name does not occur in the pedigree recorded by Moses, but which appears in the Septuagint version of Gen. x. 24.³ On the subject of quotations from the Old Testament in the New, see pp. 293–319. supra.

SECTION II.

APPARENT CONTRADICTIONS IN CHRONOLOGY.

CHRONOLOGY is a branch of learning which is most difficult to be exactly adjusted; because it depends upon so many circumstances, and comprehends so great a variety of events in all ages and nations, that with whatever punctuality the accounts of time might have been set down in the original manuscripts, yet the slightest change in one word or letter may cause a material variation in copies. Besides, the difference of the æras adopted in the computations of different countries, especially at great distances of time and place, is such, that the most exact chronology may easily be mistaken, and may be perplexed by those who endeavour to rectify what they conceive to be erroneous; for that which was exact at first is often made incorrect by him who thought it false before.⁴ Chronological differences do undoubtedly exist in the Scriptures, as well as in profane historians; but these differences infer no uncertainty in the mutters of fact themselves. It is a question yet undetermined, whether Rome was founded by Romulus or not, and it is a point equally litigated, in what year the building of that city commenced; yet, if the uncertainty of the time when any fact was done imply the uncertainty of the fact itself, the necessary inference must be, that it is uncertain whether Rome was built at all, or whether such a person as Romulus was ever in existence. Further, differences in chronology do not imply that the sacred historians were mistaken, but they arise from the mistakes of transcribers or expositors, which may be obviated by applying the various existing aids to the examination and reconciliation of the apparent contradictions in scriptural chronology.

I. Seeming contradictions in Chronology arise from not observing, that what had before been said in the general, is afterwards resumed in the particulars comprised under it.

For the total sum of any term of years being set down first, before the particulars have been insisted on and explained, has led some into mistake, by supposing that the particulars subsequently mentioned were not to be comprehended in it, but were to be reckoned distinctly as if they had happened afterwards in order of time, because they are last related in the course of the history. Thus, in Gen. xi. 26. it is said, that Terah lived seventy years and begat Abram; and in verse 32. that the days of Terah were two hundred and five years; and Terah died in Haran. But in Gen. xii. 4. it is related that Abram was seventy and five years old when he departed out of Haran; which is inconsistent, if we suppose Abram to have resided in Haran till the death of his father Terah. But, if we consider that the whole number of years, during which Terah lived, is set down in Gen. xi. 32. and that Abram's departure from Haran, which is related in Gen. xii. 4. happened before his father's death, there will be no inconsistency; on the contrary, if Terah were only seventy years old when Abram was begotten, and if Abram were only seventy-five years old when he departed for Haran, it will be evident that Abram left his father Terah in Haran, where the latter lived after his son's departure, to the age of two hundred and five years; although during Terah's life Abram occasionally returned to Haran, for his final removal did not take place until the death of his father, as we learn from Acts vii. 4. Now, if this way of relating the general first, which is afterwards particularly set forth, be attended to in the interpretation of the Scriptures, it will afford a natural and easy solution of many otherwise inexplicable difficulties. Another explanation has been offered for the above apparent chronological difference, viz. that Abram was Terah's youngest son though first mentioned. What renders this solution probable is, that it is no unfrequent thing in Scripture, when any case of dignity or pre-eminence is to be distinguished, to place the youngest son before the eldest, though contrary to the usage of the Scriptures in other cases. Thus, Shem, the second son of Noah, is always placed first; Abram is placed before his two elder brothers Haran and Nahor; Isaac is placed before Ishmael; Jacob the youngest son of Isaac has the pre-eminence over Esau; and Moses is mentioned before his elder brother Aaron. Whatever chronological difficulties, therefore, arise upon § 4. Apparent Contradictions in the Relation of Events in one Passage, and References to them in another.

These contradictions are of two kinds.

1. Sometimes events are referred to as having taken place, which are not noticed by the inspired historians; these apparent contradictions have already been considered in § 2. Obs. I. pp. 402, 403.

2. Sometimes the reference appears contradictory to circumstances actually noticed in the history.

Thus, in Num. xiv. 30. it is said that none of the Israelites should come into the land of Canaan, save Caleb and Joshua; and yet, in Josh. xiv. 1. and xvii. 13. we read, that Eleazar and others entered into that land. But this seeming repugnance will disappear when it is recollected that nothing is more common in the most serious and considerate writers, than to speak of things by way of restriction and limitation, and yet to leave them

² Various other solutions have been given, in order to reconcile this seeming difference between the numbers of Jacob's family, as related in the Old and New Testaments: the most satisfactory of all is the following one of Dr. Hales; which by a critical comparison of Gen. xli. 27. with Acts vii. 14. completely reconciles the apparent discrepancy.

³ "Moses," he remarks, "states that 'all the souls that came with Jacob into Egypt, which issued from his loins (except his sons' wives), were sixty-six souls.'" Gen. xli. 26., and this number is thus collected:—

Jacob's children, eleven sons and one daughter	12
Reuben's sons	4
Simeon's sons	6
Levi's sons	3
Judah's three sons and two grandsons	5
Issachar's sons	4
Zebulun's sons	3
Gad's sons	7
Asher's four sons and one daughter and two grandsons	7
Dan's son	1
Naphthali's sons	4
Benjamin's sons	10
	66

"If to these sixty-six children, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren, we add Jacob himself, Joseph and his two sons born in Egypt, or four more, the amount is seventy, the whole number of Jacob's family which settled in Egypt. In this statement the wives of Jacob's sons, who formed part of the household, are omitted, but they amounted to nine: for of the twelve wives of the twelve sons, Judah's wife was dead (Gen. xxxviii. 12.), and Simeon's also, as we may collect from his youngest son, Shaul, by a Cananite (xvi. 19.), and Joseph's wife was already in Egypt. These nine wives, therefore, added to the sixty-six, gave seventy-five souls, the whole amount of Jacob's household, that went down with him to Egypt; critically corresponding with the statement in the New Testament, that 'Joseph sent for his father Jacob, and all his kindred, amounting to seventy-five souls'—the expression, all his kindred, including the wives who were Joseph's kindred not only by affinity, but also by consanguinity; being probably of the families of Esau, Ishmael, or Keturah. Thus does the New Testament furnish an admirable commentary on the Old."

From the preceding list, compared with that of the births of Jacob's sons, it appears that some of them married remarkably early. Thus Judah, Er, and Pharez respectively married at the age of about fourteen years; Ashur and his fourth or youngest son (Beriah), under twenty; Benjamin about fifteen; and Joseph's sons and grandsons could not have been much above twenty years old when they married, in order that he should have great-grandchildren in the course of seventy-three years. What further confirms this statement is, that they must have necessarily married at a very early age (as we know is practised to this day in the East), to have produced, in the course of two hundred and fifteen years, at the time of their departure, no less than six hundred thousand men, above twenty years of age, exclusive of women and children; so that the whole population of the Israelites, who went out of Egypt, must have exceeded two millions. Dr. Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. part i. pp. 159–162.

⁴ Dr. Hales has proved this second Cainan to be an interpolation in the Septuagint, New Analysis, vol. i. pp. 90–94.

this supposition, that the son first named must necessarily be the first-born, must consequently proceed from mistake.¹

II. Sometimes the principal number is set down, and the odd or smaller number is omitted; which being added to the principal number in some other place, causes a difference not to be reconciled but by considering that it is customary in the best authors not always to mention the smaller numbers, where the matter does not require it.

Of this we have evident proof in the Scriptures. Thus the Benjamites that were slain, are said in Judges x. 35 to be 25,000, but in verse 46, they are reckoned only at 25,000. So the evangelist Mark says, xvi. 11, that Jesus Christ appeared to the eleven as they were sitting at meat, though Thomas was absent. The observation already made, on the use of round numbers in computations,² will apply in the present instance; to which we might add numerous similar examples from profane writers. Two or three, however, will suffice. One hundred acres of land were by the Romans called centuria; but in progress of time the same term was given to double that number of acres.³ The tribes, into which the population of Rome was divided, were so denominated, because they were originally three in number; but the same appellation was retained though they were afterwards augmented to thirty-five; and in like manner the judges, styled centumviri, were at first five more than one hundred, and afterwards were nearly double that number.⁴ Yet still they retained the same name. Since, then, it is evident that smaller numbers are sometimes omitted both in the Old and in the New Testament, as well as in profane writings, and the principal or great numbers only, whether more or less than the precise calculation, are set down, and at other times the smaller numbers are specified;—nay, that sometimes the original number multiplied retains the same denomination; therefore it is reasonable to make abatements, and not always to insist rigorously on precise numbers, in adjusting the accounts of scriptural chronology.⁵

III. As sons frequently reigned with their fathers, during the Hebrew monarchy, the reigns of the former are not unfrequently made, in some instances, to commence from their partnership with their fathers in the throne, and in others from the commencement of their sole government after their father's decease; consequently the time of the reign is sometimes noticed as it respects the father, sometimes as it respects the son, and sometimes as it includes both.

Thus, Jotham is said (2 Kings xv. 33.) to have reigned sixteen years, yet in the preceding verse 30, mention is made of his twentieth year. This repugnance is reconcilable in the following manner; Jotham reigned alone sixteen years only, but with his father Uzziah (who, being a leper, was, therefore, unfit for the sole government) four years before, which makes twenty in the whole. In like manner we read (2 Kings xiii. 1.) that “in the three-and-twentieth year of Joash the son of Ahaziah king of Judah, Jehoahaz the son of Jehu began to reign over Israel in Samaria, and reigned seventeen years;” but in verse 10 of the same chapter it is related that “in the thirty-seventh year of the same Joash began Jehoahaz the son of Jehoahaz to reign over Israel in Samaria.” Now, if to the three-and-twenty years of Joash, mentioned in the first passage, we add the seventeen years of Jehoahaz, we come down to the thirty-ninth or fortieth year of Joash; when on the death of Jehoahaz, the reign of Jehoash may be supposed to have begun. Yet it is easy to assign the reason why the commencement of this reign is fixed two or three years earlier, in the thirty-seventh year of Joash, when his father must have been alive, by supposing that his father had admitted him as an associate in the government, two or three years before his death. This solution is the more probable, as we find from the case of Jehoshaphat and his son (2 Kings viii. 16.) that in those days such a practice was not uncommon.⁶ The application of the rule above stated will also remove the apparent contradiction between 2 Kings xxiv. 8. and 2 Chron. xxxvi. 9. Jehoiaquim being eight years old when he was associated in the government with his father, and eighteen years old when he began to reign alone. The application of this rule will reconcile many other seeming contradictions in the books of Kings and Chronicles; and will also clear up the difficulty respecting the fifteenth year of the emperor Tiberius mentioned in Luke iii. 1. which has exercised the ingenuity of many eminent philologists who have endeavoured to settle the chronology of the New Testament. Now, we learn from the Roman historians that the reign of Tiberius had two commencements: in the first, when he was admitted to a share in the empire (but without the title of emperor), in August of the year 764 from the foundation of the city of Rome, three years before the death of Augustus; and the second when he began to reign alone, after that emperor's decease. It is from the first of these commencements that the fifteenth year mentioned by Saint Luke is to be computed; who, as Tiberius did not assume the imperial title during the life of Augustus, makes use of a word, which precisely marks the nature of the power exercised by Tiberius, viz. in the fifteenth year 765 of the administration of Tiberius Caesar. Consequently, this fifteenth year began in August 778. And if John the Baptist entered on his ministry in the spring following, in the year of Rome 779, in the same year of Tiberius, and after he had preached about twelve months, baptized Jesus in the spring of 780, then Jesus (who was most probably born in September or October 749) would at his baptism be thirty-three years of age and some odd months, which perfectly agrees with what St. Luke says of his being at that time about thirty years old.⁷

IV. Seeming chronological contradictions arise from the sacred historians adopting different methods of computation, and assigning differing dates to the same period.

Thus, in Gen. xv. 13. it is announced to Abraham that his “seed should be a stranger in a land that was not theirs, and should serve them; and that they should afflict them four hundred years.” But in Exod. xii. 40, 41. the sacred historian relates that “the sojourning of the children of Israel who dwelt in Egypt was four hundred and thirty years. And it came to pass at the end of the four hundred and thirty years, even the self-same day it came to pass, that all the hosts of the Lord went out from the land of Egypt.” Between these two passages there is an apparent contradiction: the truth is, that both are perfectly consistent, the computation being made from two different dates. In Gen. xv. 13. the time is calculated from the promise made to Abraham of a son, or from the birth of Isaac; and in Exod. xii. 40, 41. it is reckoned from his departure from “Ur of the Chaldees,” his native country, in obedience to the command of Jehovah.⁸

By the application of this rule many commentators reconcile the difference between Mark xv. 25, who says the hour of Christ's crucifixion was the third, and John xix. 14, who says it was about the sixth hour, that he was brought forth. Notwithstanding the authorities above adduced, they observe that none of the ancient translators read the third hour in John; they therefore solve the difficulty imperfectly (it must be confessed), by considering the day as divided into four parts answering to the four watches of the night. These coincided with the hours of three, six, nine, and twelve, or, in our way of reckoning, nine, twelve, three, and six, which also suited the solemn times of sacrifice and prayer in the temple; in cases, they argue, in which the Jews did not think it of consequence to ascertain the time with great accuracy, they did not regard the intermediate hours, but only those more noted divisions which happened to come nearest the time of the event spoken of. Adopting this method of reconciliation, Dr. Campbell remarks, that Mark says it was the third hour, from which we have reason to conclude that the third hour was just. John says it was about the sixth hour, from which he thinks it probable that the sixth hour was not yet come. “On this supposition, though the evangelists may by a fastidious reader be accused of want of precision in regard to dates, they will not by any judicious and candid critic be charged with falsehood or misrepresentation. Who would accuse two modern historians with contradicting each other, because in relating an event which had happened between ten and eleven in the forenoon, one had said it was just nine o'clock; the other that it was drawing towards noon?”⁹ From the evidence before him, we leave the reader to draw his own conclusions as to the reading which is preferably to be adopted. We apprehend that the weight of evidence will be found to preponderate in favour of the solution given in pp. 403, 404. supra.

V. The terms of time in computation are sometimes taken inclusively, and at other times exclusively.

Thus in Matt. xvii. 1. and Mark ix. 2. we read that after six days Jesus (taking Peter, James, and John his brother, and bringeth them up into an high mountain apart. But in Luke ix. 28. this is said to come to pass about an eight days after; which is perfectly consistent with what the other evangelists write. For Matthew and Mark speak exclusively, reckoning the six days between the time of our Saviour's discourse (which they are relating) and his transfiguration; but Luke includes the day on which he had that discourse, and the day of his transfiguration, and reckons them with the six intermediate days. So in John xxi. 26. eight days after are probably to be understood inclusively; it being most likely on that day se'night on which Jesus Christ had before appeared to his disciples. It were unnecessary to subjoin additional examples of a mode of reckoning except those who professedly treat on chronology.

This mode of computation is not confined to the evangelical historians. The rabbins also observe, that the very first day of a year may stand in computation for that year;¹⁰ and this way of reckoning mistakes of years current for years complete, or vice versa, in the successions of so many kings, and in the transactions of affairs for so long a time, as is narrated in the Scriptures, may amount to a considerable number of years. For this reason Thucydides says,¹¹ that he computes the years of the Peloponnesian war, not by the magistrates who were annually chosen during that time, but by so many summers and winters; whereas Polybius, Josephus, and Plutarch, have been supposed to contradict themselves because they reckon sometimes by current and sometimes by complete years.

The preceding, and various other ways by which disputes in chronology may be occasioned, are a sufficient argument to us, that they do not imply that there were, originally, chronological mistakes in the books themselves. And if mistakes might arise in so many and such various ways, without any error in the original writings;—if the same difficulties occur upon so very nice and intricate a subject in any or all the books which are extant in the world;—and if it could by no means be necessary, that books of divine authority should be either at first so penned as to be liable to no wrong interpretations, or be ever after preserved by miracle from all corruption, it is great rashness to deny the divine authority of the Scriptures, on account of any difficulties that may occur in chronology.

SECTION III.

APPARENT CONTRADICTIONS BETWEEN PROPHECIES AND THEIR FULFILMENT.

I. "When both a prediction and the event foretold in it are recorded in Scripture, there is sometimes an appearance of disagreement and inconsistency between them."

"This appearance generally arises from some difficulty in understanding the true meaning of the prediction: it may be occasioned by any of those causes which produce the peculiar difficulties of the prophetic writings; and it is to be removed by the same means which serve for clearing these difficulties. It may proceed from any sort of obscurity or ambiguity in the expression, or from any uncertainty in the structure of a sentence."¹

Thus, there is a seeming difference in Matt. xii. 40.² between our Lord's prediction of the time he was to be in the grave, and the time during which his body was actually interred. Now this difference is naturally and easily obviated by considering, that it was the custom of the Orientals to reckon any part of a day of twenty-four hours for a whole day, and to say it was done after three or seven days, &c. if it were done on the third or seventh day from that last mentioned. Compare 1 Kings xx. 29. and Luke ii. 21. And, as the Hebrews had no word exactly answering to the Greek ἡμέρας—to signify a natural day of twenty-four hours, they used night and day, or day and night, for it; so that to say a thing happened after three days and three nights, was the same as to say that it happened after three days, or on the third day. Compare Esther iv. 16. with v. 1. Gen. vii. 4. 12. 17. Exod. xxiv. 28. and Dan. viii. 14.

II. *Apparent contradictions between prophecies and their accomplishment sometimes proceed from the figurative language of the prophets; which is taken, partly from the analogy between the world natural and an empire or kingdom considered as a world politic, and partly from sacred topics.*³

Hence it is that the prophets so frequently express what relates to the Christian dispensation and worship in terms borrowed from the Mosaic religion; of which instances may be seen in Isa. i. 2, 3. xix. 19. and Jer. iii. 17. Zech. vii. 22. and Mal. i. 11. For the religion of Moses being introductory to that of Jesus, and there being, consequently, a mutual dependency between the two religions, "it is reasonable to suppose that, previous to such an important change of the economy, some intimations would be given of its approach. And yet, to have done this in a way, that would have led the Jews to look with irreverence on a system under which not only themselves but their posterity were to live, would not have harmonized with our notions of the divine wisdom. A method was therefore to be invented; which, while it kept the people sincerely attached to the law, would dispose them, when the time was come, for the reception of a better covenant that was to be established on better promises. Now the spirit of prophecy, together with the language in which that prophecy was conveyed, fully accomplished both these purposes. By a contrivance only to be suggested by divine rescience, the same expressions, which in their primary and literal meaning were used to denote the fortunes and deliverances of the Jews, for the present consolation of that people, were so ordered, as in a secondary and figurative sense to adumbrate the sufferings and victories of the Messiah, for the future instruction of the church of Christ. Had no expedient of this sort been employed, we should have wanted one proof of the connection between the Mosaic and Christian religions; and, on the other hand, had the nature of the Messiah's kingdom been plainly described, the design of the national separation would have been defeated. But, when spiritual blessings were promised under the veil of temporal blessings, and in terms familiar to the carnal expectations of the Jews, a proper degree of respect for the old system was preserved, at the same time that matters were gradually ripening for the introduction of the new; and the shadow of good things held forth obscurely in the law prepared them to look forward to that happier day, when the very image itself should be presented in full splendour, and distinctly defined by the Gospel."⁴

III. *Apparent contradictions between the prophecies and their accomplishment "may be occasioned by a prediction relating only to one part of a complex character or event, and on that account seeming to be inconsistent with other parts of it; and the appearance will be removed by taking in such predictions as relate to these other parts, and considering them all in connection."*⁵

Such seeming differences occur in the predictions relative to the exaltation and glory of the Messiah, compared with the prophecies concerning his previous sufferings. On this subject the reader may compare pp. 390—392. of the present volume. In pp. 451—456. infra, we have given a table of the chief predictions relative to the Messiah.

IV. Seeming differences in the interpretation of prophecies also proceed partly from the difficulty of fixing the precise time of their fulfilment, and partly from the variety of opinions adopted by expositors; who, being dissatisfied with the views taken by their predecessors, are each solicitous to bring forward some new interpretation of his own.

These differences, however, are no more an objection against prophecy, than they are against the truth of all history; and we may with equal propriety conclude that things never came to pass, because historians differ about the time when they were done, as that they were never predicted, because learned men vary in their modes of explaining the accomplishment of such predictions. Expositors may differ in the niceties of the chronological part, but in general circumstances they are agreed; hence, whoever will consult them may be greatly confirmed in the truth of the prophecies, upon this very consideration—that there is less difference in the explanation of the principal prophecies than there is in the comments upon most ancient profane histories: and that those who differ in other matters must have the greater evidence for that in which they agree. Although there may be a difficulty in calculating the precise time when some predictions were fulfilled, because it is disputed when the computation is to begin, or how some other circumstance is to be understood, yet all interpreters and expositors are agreed, concerning these very prophecies, that they are fulfilled. For instance, in Gen. xlix. 10. it is certain that the sceptre has departed from Judah, whether that prophecy is to be understood of the tribe of Judah, or of the Jewish nation who were denominated from that tribe. Although the later Jewish writers deny its application to the times of the Messiah, yet the elder writers invariably refer it to him; and it is certain that the city and sanctuary are destroyed, and that the sacrifice and oblation are entirely done away, though interpreters do not agree about the precise time and manner of the accomplishment of every particular. In a similar manner the prophecy of Daniel respecting the seventy weeks is equally plain, and its accomplishment in the destruction of Jerusalem is certain; notwithstanding the differences of opinion in assigning the precise epochs of time. Plain matter of fact shows that these memorable predictions are fulfilled; and the only difference is concerning a single circumstance. To doubt, therefore (as some of our modern self-styled philosophers do), of the fulfilment of prophecies, merely because we do not certainly know the exact time when each particular was accomplished, though we certainly know that they must have long since been fulfilled, is as unreasonable, as if a man should question the truth of history on account of the uncertainties which are to be found in chronology. The existence of Homer is not denied because it is uncertain when he lived; nor is the reality of the Trojan war the less certain because the time of the capture of Troy has been variously determined. History, it has been well remarked, relates what has happened, and prophecy foretells what shall come to pass; and an uncertainty in point of time no more affects the one than the other. We may be uncertain of the time foretold by the prophet, and as uncertain of the time mentioned by the historian; but when all other circumstances agree, there is no reason why our uncertainty, as to the single circumstance of time, should be alleged against the credibility of either of them.⁶

V. Some of the prophetic declarations are not predictions concerning things future, but simply commands relative to things which were to be performed, or they are conditional promises and threatenings, not absolute predictions; so that, if it subsequently appear that these were not executed, such non-performance cannot create any difficulty or repugnancy between the supposed prophecy and its fulfilment.

We may illustrate this remark by reference to the fast observed by the Jews on the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar; these fasts the prophet Zechariah (viii. 19.) in the name of Jehovah declares, are to be abolished, and converted into a joyous festival; but notwithstanding this declaration, we know that they continued afterwards to be observed. Another instance may be seen in 2 Kings viii. 10. Elisha's answer to Hazael; to which we may add the seeming assertion, that the last day was near, in Rom. xiii. 11, 12. 1 Cor. x. 11. 1 Thess. iv. 15. Heb. ix. 26. James v. 7, 8. 2 Pet. iii. 12, 13. and 1 John ii. 18.

VI. Some of the prophetic promises appear to have been made to individuals, which, however, were not fulfilled in them.

But between such prophecies and their fulfilment there is no real discordance; because they were accomplished in the posterity of the person to whom the promise was made. Thus, in Isaac's prophetic blessing of Jacob, it was announced (Gen. xxvii. 29.) that he should be lord over his brethren. Now we know from the Sacred Writings that this never took effect in the person of Jacob; but it was fully verified in his posterity.

SECTION IV.

APPARENT CONTRADICTIONS IN DOCTRINE

THESE arise from various causes; as contradictions from a mode of speaking which, to our apprehensions, is not sufficiently clear,—from the same term being used in different senses in different texts,—from the same word being used in apparently contradictory senses,—from the different designs of the sacred writers,—from the different ages in which the various sacred writers lived, and from the different degrees of their knowledge respecting the coming of the Messiah, and the religion to be instituted by him.

§ 1. Seeming Contradictions from a Mode of Speaking, when, to our Apprehensions, is not sufficiently clear.

It has been the practice of some writers to assert that the apostles, Saint Paul in particular, have argued both illogically and inconclusively; this assertion, however, falls to the ground of itself, when we consider the violent dislocations to which writers of the school alluded to have resorted, in order to disprove what is self-evident from the Bible—the divinity and atonement of the Messiah. At the same time it is not to be concealed, that apparent contradictions do sometimes arise from a mode of speaking which, to our apprehensions, does not seem sufficiently clear. For instance, salvation is in one passage ascribed to grace through faith, which we are assured is not of ourselves, but is the gift of God;—not of works lest any man should boast (Eph. ii. 8—10.); and in another Abraham is said to be justified by faith without works (Rom. iv. 2—6.); while in a third passage he is said to have been justified by works. (James ii. 21.) The apparent difference in these points of doctrine is occasioned by the fruits and effects being put for the cause. A little attention to the argument of the apostle removes all difficulty. Saint Paul's object in the Epistle to the Romans was, to show, in opposition to the objections of the Jews, that how much soever Abraham excelled other men in righteousness during the course of his life, he had no cause for glorying before God; who justified, accepted, and covenanted with him, not for obedience, but for faith in the divine promise. Abraham believed God's word, and God accepted his faith, dealt with him as righteous, and became his God; in like manner as he now conducts himself towards all who truly repent, and unfeignedly believe his Gospel. Saint James, on the contrary, having encouraged the Christian converts to bear with patience the trials they should meet with, and improve them to the purposes of religion, presses upon them meekness and gentleness towards each other, as the test of their sincerity; and shows that faith without love is of no avail. Thus the doctrine asserted by each apostle is proved to be consistent, and the seeming repugnance disappears. For the removal of difficulties arising from expressions not appearing sufficiently clear, the following observations will be found useful.

I. A passage which is ambiguous, or which contains any unusual expression, must be interpreted agreeably to what is revealed more clearly and accurately in other parts of the Scriptures.

Numerous instances might be adduced in illustration of this remark, in which bodily parts and passions are ascribed to God; which unusual modes of expression are to be explained in conformity with such other passages as remove the appearance of contradiction. Another example we have in Luke xiv. 13, 14. When thou makest a feast, call the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind, and thou shalt be blessed; for they cannot recompense thee; for thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just. From this passage, some have inferred that the resurrection of the just only is intended, and, consequently, that the wicked shall certainly perish. There is, it is true, something unusual in this expression: but the doctrine of the resurrection of all mankind from the dead, which is so explicitly revealed in other parts of Scripture, being laid down and acknowledged, we readily perceive that our Saviour was speaking, in the passage under consideration, of acts of kindness done purely for the love of God, and on the recompense which He would bestow on them. But of the universal resurrection no notice is taken, nor is it denied that the wicked will receive their reward.

II. A passage, in which a doctrine is slightly treated, must be explained by one where the subject is more largely discussed: and one single passage is not to be explained in contradiction to many others, but consistently with them.

For instance, Jesus Christ in one place says, that he judges no man; in another, that he will judge all men: in one passage that he is not come to judge the world; in another, that he is come for judgment. These seeming inconsistencies occur in the Gospel of Saint John; it becomes necessary, therefore, to find out some other passage that will reconcile them. Thus, in John xii. 47, he says, I came not to judge the world; and in ch. ix. 39, he says, For judgment I am come into this world. In the latter passage he adds the cause of his thus coming,—namely, that they whose blindness proceeded from mere ignorance should be taught to see: while they who saw only through pride and prejudice should be left in their wilful blindness. Hence it appears, that our Lord was not speaking of the last judgment, from which we call God the judge of the living and of the dead; but that the tenor of his discourse was, to enable his hearers themselves to determine whether they were ignorant or not; for in the same chapter (verse 16.) it is said that Jesus spoke these words to the Pharisees, who would not perceive their own ignorance, nor judge themselves. In the other passages (John xii. 47.) we read, I came not to judge (rather to condemn) the world, but to save the world—not to make its inhabitants wretched, but to make them happy for time and eternity. If they will be so wise as to listen to the proposals which I offer. Here the word save is plainly opposed to condemn: and that this is the proper meaning of the passage is evident from comparing chapter iii. verses 15—19.

The latter part of this rule the following passage will exemplify. In Gen. xvi. 10—14. the observance of circumcision is commanded; in Acts xv. the observance of that rite is affirmed not to be necessary. These propositions are apparently contradictory; Jesus Christ himself has determined them, Matt. xi. 13. All the prophets, and the law, until John, prophesied; intimating, as the context implies, that the observance of the law would thereafter cease.

III. Between a general assertion in one text, and a restriction of it, or an exception to it, in another text, there is an appearance of contradiction which is sometimes removed by explaining the former with the proper limitations.¹

Several general expressions, in all languages, not only admit of, but also require a limitation; without which the true sense and meaning of many passages will not be understood. And, as the eastern nations indulged themselves most freely in the use of strong and figurative expressions, the Scriptures require more limitations, perhaps, than any other book; as it respects the New Testament, Saint Paul mentions principles on which we may build our limitations: I speak after the manner of men. (Rom. vi. 19.) It is manifest that he is excepted. (1 Cor. xv. 27.)

Thus in Mark x. 11, 12, and in Luke xvi. 18, divorce is absolutely forbidden: but in Matt. v. 32. and xix. 9. it is allowed for adultery only. Yet in 1 Cor. vii. 15. it seems to be allowed, though the apostle does not authorize a second marriage.

The precept, Except ye become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven (Matt. xviii. 3.) cannot mean that we are not to speak distinctly, or to walk steadily; but obviously refers to the docility, and freedom from ambition and worldly thoughts, which characterize children.

The observations offered in pp. 371, 372. supra, on the figures of speech, termed synecdoche, and hyperbole, may be applied in illustration of the preceding remark.

§ 2. Apparent Contradictions from the same Terms being used in different and even contradictory Senses.

I. Sometimes an apparent contradiction, in point of doctrine, arises from the same words being used in different senses in different texts.

In this case the seeming repugnance is to be removed by restricting the term properly in each text.

Thus, in some passages of the New Testament, we read that the kingdom of Christ is eternal: but in 1 Cor. xv. 24. it is said to have an end: in the latter passage, the kingdom of Christ means his mediatorial kingdom, which includes all the displays of his grace in saving sinners, and all his spiritual influence in governing the church visible on earth. By the eternal kingdom of Christ is intended the future state of eternal blessedness, which is so beautifully described as an inheritance, incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven, &c. (1 Pet. i. 4, 5.)

In like manner, It is appointed unto men once to die (Heb. ix. 27.), that is, a temporal death: yet if any man keep Christ's sayings he shall never see death (John viii. 51.), that is, eternal death. Hatred of others is very sinful and odious (Tit. iii. 3.), and yet to hate our nearest relations, that is, to love them less than we love Christ, is a duty. (Luke xiv. 26. compared with Matt. x. 37.) John the Baptist was not Elias (John i. 21.), that is, no the prophet who lived under Ahab; but he was the Elias predicted by Malachi (Mal. iv. 5, 6.), that is, one in the spirit and power of the ancient Elijah. (Matt. xi. 11, 12, 14. Mark ix. 11—13. Luke i. 17.)

So we cannot stand before God in the righteousness of our own persons (Psalm. cxliii. 2.), but we may appeal to him for the righteousness of our cause, in matters of difference between ourselves and others. (Psalm. cxviii. 20. xxv. 27.)

II. Apparent contradictions, in points of doctrine, sometimes arise from the same word being used not only in different but also in contradictory senses.

Thus in Joshua, xxiii. 5. the same Hebrew verb יָרַשׁ (yarussh), which usually signifies to inherit or possess, also means to dispossess or disinherit. He shall expel them (from their inheritance) from before you, and ye shall possess their land, succeed to their inheritance. In like manner, the word sin also denotes a sin-offering in Gen. iv. 7. 2 Cor. v. 21. and in many other passages of Scripture. The Hebrew verb בָּרַךְ (barak), to bless, has been supposed also to mean curse; and, contrary to the authority of ancient versions, the lexicons (as the late eminently learned Mr. Parkhurst has proved) have given it the sense of cursing in the six following passages; 1 Kings xxii. 10. Job i. 5. 11. and especially Job ii. 5. 9. The rendering of which last passage, he observes, should be thus:—

Then said his wife unto him,
Dost thou yet retain thine integrity,
Blessing the Aicin (God) and dying, or even unto death?²

The Greek language presents numerous similar examples of the same words having different senses. Thus Εἰκοναίς, its primitive acceptation, bears a good sense, and simply means any representation or likeness of a thing; but it also most frequently denotes, in the New Testament, an image to which religious worship is given, whether it be intended of the true God, as in Acts vii. 41., or of a false deity, as in Acts xv. 20. 1 Cor. xii. 2. and Rev. ix. 20. So ἰδιωτικός, which simply means curious, and its derivative ἰδιωτικῶς, are used in a worse sense, and denote impertinent curiosity in other persons' affairs, as in 1 Tim. v. 13. and 2 Thess. iii. 11. So ἀποκρίτης, which primarily signifies to have more than another, also means to have more than one ought to possess, to defraud and circumvent. See 2 Cor. vii. 2. xii. 17, 18. and 1 Thess. iv. 6. (which last text denotes to defraud and injure by adultery, as numerous commentators, ancient and modern, have already observed). And ἀναιδέως, which (like the Hebrew verb שָׂכַר, Gen. xliii. 34.) in its good sense denotes merely to drink freely and to cheerfulness, but not to intoxication (as in John ii. 10.), is often taken in an ill sense, and means to be drunken. Compare Matt. xxiv. 49. Acts ii. 15. and 1 Thess. v. 7. with Rev. xvii. 2. 6, 4.

² They drank and were merry (literally drank largely) with him.
³ The Latin language presents us with many examples of the same words which have different meanings. It will suffice to specify two or three. Sacer, it is well known, signifies not only that which is holy, but also that which is most cursed and detestable. Thus, we have in Virgil (Æn. iii. 57.) the well known words auri sacra fames. In our old English common law writers, villanus (villain) denotes a rustic of servile condition, but the English word is now exclusively a term of infamy. So, mœus, the mass, was at first an innocent word, signifying merely the service of the church; but it has long since degenerated into a widely different meaning, and is given exclusively to the worship of the church of Rome.

§ 3. Apparent contradictions, in points of doctrine, arising from the different designs of the sacred writers.

A kind of repugnancy sometimes arises from the different designs which the sacred writers had in view; and this can only be removed by interpreting each passage agreeably to the writer's design.

It is obvious that the same person may express himself in various ways concerning one and the same thing, and in this case regard must be had to his intention. In Saint Paul's Epistles, for instance, we find the apostle frequently arguing, but more or less severely, with those who rigorously urged a compliance with the Mosaic rites and ceremonies; in some passages he expresses himself more gently towards his opponents; in others, with greater severity, calling the opinions thus asserted doctrines of devils, and profane and old wives' fables. (1 Tim. iv. 1. 7.) To understand these passages aright, then, it is necessary that we distinguish the threefold design of the apostle, according to the three different classes of advocates for the observance of the Mosaic ritual. 1. Against those who maintained the rites prescribed by Moses from weakness of mind, and could not persuade themselves that these ought to be abandoned, the apostle argues with great lenity; compare Rom. xiv. throughout. 2. There were others, however, who, while they contended for and urged the external observance of the Mosaic law, expressed the utmost contempt for the Christian religion, which they either affirmed not to be true, or to be insufficient unless the observance of the law of Moses were superadded. Against this class of opponents, Saint Paul argues with much more severity, denying altogether the necessity of such observance; compare the Epistle to the Galatians. 3. There was another class of persons, who, to the external observance of the Mosaic ritual, joined certain philosophical notions borrowed from the Alexandrian school of philosophers, and which were received among the Therapeutæ. According to these, the highest wisdom consisted in a state of celibacy, mortification, and abstinence from animal food; against these crude opinions the apostle argues vehemently, terming them profane and old wives' fables, and diabolical, that is, the most pestilential doctrines. The perusal of Philo's treatise on the Therapeutæ will show what pretensions that sect made to wisdom and piety, which consisted in mortification and abstinence, and with what sovereign contempt they regarded all other persons. To this class of Saint Paul's antagonists are to be referred 1 Tim. iv. throughout, and also Col. ii. verse 8. to the end.

On the best mode of ascertaining the design of any book or passage in the Sacred Writings, see pp. 339, 340. supra.

§ 4. Apparent contradictions, arising from the different ages in which the Sacred Writers lived, and the different degrees of knowledge which they possessed.

I. There is another class of doctrinal points, in which a species of repugnancy is produced by the different ages in which the sacred writers lived.

All expositors of the Scriptures are agreed in the summary of religious truths revealed in them, and that, from the book of Genesis to the Revelation of Saint John, this doctrine is constantly and unanimously delivered, viz. that there is one infinitely wise, gracious, just, and eternal God; and that our salvation is of God through the atonement of the Messiah, &c. &c. But this doctrine is variously expressed, according as the ages, in which the writers lived, were more or less remote from the time when the Son of God was manifested in the flesh. Further, in the Old Testament, there are many very severe precepts relative to revenging of injuries on enemies, as well as many imprecations against the foes of David; no such precepts are to be found in the New Testament. Again, the law of revenge and retaliation, in the Mosaic system, is extremely severe, requiring eye for eye, hand for hand, tooth for tooth, &c. Widely different from this is the spirit of the Christian doctrine.

II. An apparent contradiction likewise is caused by the different degrees of knowledge possessed by the sacred writers relative to the happiness to be procured for man by Jesus Christ.

In the Old Testament this happiness is almost constantly described as being external; but in the New Testament all external considerations are dismissed, and it is affirmed to be spiritual or internal. Hence also it happens, that although the same worship of the same Jehovah is treated of in the books of the Old and New Testament, external worship is chiefly, though not exclusively, insisted upon in the former, but internal in the latter; in the Old Testament it is the spirit of bondage, but in the New it is the spirit of adoption. In this gradual revelation of the divine will we see the wisdom and goodness of God; who graciously proportioned it to the capacities of men, and the disposition of their minds, to receive those intimations which he was pleased to communicate. And, as the sacred writers accommodated themselves to the imperfect or more improved degrees of knowledge which existed at the times they wrote, so it appears that they adapted their precepts to the religious, civil, and domestic or private customs of their countrymen. Hence it happens, that though religion in itself was always one and the same thing, yet the manner in which it was made known acquired some time, &c.—

1. From religious customs: for as all the more ancient people were accustomed to worship their own gods, agreeably to their own peculiar rites, so the Jews after their manner worshipped the only true God.

2. Civil customs also imparted some degree of peculiarity to religion. For while one nation was separated from intercourse with others by its own customs, many things were spoken of God, as a national deity, more peculiarly appropriated to that nation: but if that separation be removed, Jehovah is described as the common parent of all mankind.

3. Lastly, in the domestic or private institutes contained in the Mosaic law, there are many things derived from the manners and customs of their forefathers; this fact has been shown by Professor Michaelis, in his elaborate "Commentaries on the Law of Moses." In like manner the apostles adapted their instructions to the peculiar customs that obtained in different countries in their own age. How differently do they express themselves towards Jews and Heathens! Not only do they allude to religion, as civil, and domestic or private manners and customs, but, in proportion as these underwent gradual changes, they explain many things more copiously, as well as more clearly, rejecting the veil of types, and despising those ceremonies in which the Jewish nation formerly delighted. An attentive consideration of these circumstances will contribute to clear up many apparent contradictions, as well as to solve very many of the objections brought by infidels against the Sacred Writings. Let times and seasons be accurately distinguished, and perfect harmony will be found to subsist in the different books of Scripture.

SECTION V.

SEEMING CONTRADICTIONS TO MORALITY.

NOTWITHSTANDING it is generally admitted that the Holy Scriptures breathe a spirit of the purest and most diffusively benevolent morality; yet there are some passages which have been represented as giving countenance to immorality and cruelty. But these, when duly examined, will be found perfectly in unison with the purest principles of morality. The wide difference which subsists between ancient and modern manners, if fairly considered, would alone be a sufficient reply to the indecencies which are asserted to exist in the Bible.

Further, the characters and conduct of men, whom we find in all other respects commended in the Scriptures, are in some respects faulty; but these are, in such instances, by no means proposed for our imitation, and, consequently, give no sanction whatever to immorality: for several of these faults are either expressly condemned, or are briefly related or mentioned as matter of fact, without any intimation that they are either to be commended or imitated. The sacred writers, however, are only answerable for facts, not for the morality of actions. It is true that the Jewish history is stained with blood and cruelty; but so is the history of all other nations (whose chroniclers, annalists, or other historians are not censured for their bare narration of the crimes of the individuals or nations), and without the additional circumstance of being relieved by such histories of true piety and virtue as abound in the Scriptures. But it is worthy of remark, that the moral character of the Jewish nation was by no means so uniformly bad as the modern antagonists of divine revelation pretended. In some ages, their morals were much purer, and their piety more fervent, than at others. Such was the generation which first entered Canaan with Joshua, and such also the generations that lived during the reigns of their most pious monarchs. It is, moreover, to be considered, that the mere narration of any action, such as we find in the Old and New Testaments, implies neither the approbation nor the censure of it, but only declares that such a thing was done, and in such a manner; and the not concealing of these shows the simplicity and impartiality of the sacred writers, who spare no person whomsoever, not even when they themselves are concerned,—though the thing related should redound to their disgrace;—as in the case of Noah's drunkenness (Gen. ix. 21.), Jacob's deceiving of Isaac (Gen. xxvii.), Peter's denial of Christ (Matt. xxvi. 69—75. and the parallel passages of the other evangelists): Paul's dispute with Peter (Gal. ii. 11—14.); and Paul's excuse of himself. (Acts xxiii. 5.)

1. From this circumstance God has been represented by infidels, as distinguishing his favorite Jacob, by a system of fraud and lies: but the following considerations, by the late Bishop Horne, may assist us to form a right judgment of this matter.

1st. The proposition of deceiving Isaac originated not with Jacob, but with Rebecca. Jacob remonstrated against it, as likely to bring a curse upon him, rather than a blessing; nor would consent to perform his part, till she engaged to take all the blame on herself—"On me be thy curse, my son; only obey my voice."

2dly. From this speech, and from the earnestness and solicitude discovered by Rebecca, it may not unfairly be presumed, that she had some special reason for what she did: that Isaac was about to take a wrong step in a concern of great moment, which ought to be prevented, and could be prevented by no other means.

3dly. The rectitude of Rebecca's judgment seems evidently to have been recognised and allowed by Isaac, at the conclusion of the matter. For though he had blessed Jacob, intending to bless Esau, yet, as if recollecting himself, he confirmed and ratified that blessing in the strongest terms: "Yea, and he shall be blessed." Still farther—at sending him away, he again repeated the benediction, in the most solemn and affecting manner; "God give thee the blessing of Abraham!" It is hard to assign any other reason why, if so disposed, upon discovering the fraud, he might not have reversed the proceeding. Nay, by the kind meeting of the brothers afterwards, one should be inclined to suppose, that Esau himself acquiesced at length in the propriety of what had been done.

4thly. If such were the case, Isaac was only deceived into what was right, and what himself acknowledged to be so in the conclusion. The deception was like those often practised by physicians for the benefit of their patients; and casuists must decide upon it in the same manner. The offence of Jacob is certainly alleviated, if not entirely taken off, by the circumstance of Rebecca pleading herself to bear the blame; as the conduct of Rebecca seems justified by that of Isaac ratifying and confirming to Jacob the blessing originally intended for Esau. Upon the whole, if there were any offence, it was one that might be forgiven; and if God, notwithstanding, continued to bless Jacob, he did forgive it, and had reasons for so doing." Bp. Horne's Works, vol. vi. pp. 477, 478.

The following are the principal passages which the recent advocates of infidelity have charged with being contradictions to morality; with how little pretext, the reader will be enabled to judge, by the candid examination and consideration of the remainder of this section.

1. God's command to Abraham, to sacrifice Isaac (Gen. xxii.), has been represented as a command to commit murder in its most horrid form, and consequently, as inconsistent with the holiness of God to give.

But this command may be satisfactorily vindicated, either by regarding it as a symbolical action,¹ or (without this consideration) by resolving it into the divine sovereignty over the lives of his creatures. For, the Supreme Lord and Giver of life has a right to take it away, and to command it to be taken away, whenever and in whatsoever manner he pleases. To offer a human victim to him, without his express warrant, would be to commit murder; but to do so by his command would be an act of obedience. As the Almighty has a right to command, so his perfections lead us to infer that he will command nothing but what is worthy of himself. The design of God, however, was to prove Abraham, in order that his faith, love, and obedience might be manifest, and not, in fact, that he should offer up Isaac.

2. Jacob's vow (Gen. xxviii. 20—22,) is asserted to be quite conditional, and as implying that if his God would clothe and feed him, he would serve him.

This representation is not more unjust, than the manner in which it is stated is indecent. In order that this matter may be regarded in its proper light, it must be considered, that, immediately before the account which is given us of Jacob's vow, we are informed of a vision which he had when setting out on his journey to Padan-Aram, when God renewed to him the promises made to Abraham concerning the giving of the land of Canaan to his posterity, and that in his seed all nations of the earth should be blessed: at the same time assuring him, that he would be with him in all places whither he should go, and would bring him again into that land. (12—15.) In consequence of this vision, Jacob made his vow the next morning; the design of which was, to express the sense he had of the divine goodness, and his confidence in God's gracious protection, and to declare his solemn resolution, that if God would be with him and keep him in his way, and would give him bread to eat and raiment to put on (which shows the moderation of his desires), so that he should come again to his father's house in peace, he would after his return make an open and public acknowledgment of his gratitude and devotion to the Lord as his God; would set apart that place, where God had appeared to him, to his worship; and would devote to His service the tenth of all the substance which God should give him. Now such a conduct as this, instead of being impiously interested and craving (as some opposers of revelation have asserted), will appear to every one, who judges candidly and impartially, a great argument of the simplicity and goodness of Jacob's heart, and of a pious and well-disposed mind: though undoubtedly it appears absurd to those who affirm—what however they cannot prove—that the Almighty does not concern himself with individuals of the human race.

3. The objection, that God's commanding of the Israelites (Exod. iii. 22. xii. 35.) to borrow from the Egyptians what they never intended to restore, is not only an act of injustice, but favours theft, is obviated by rendering the Hebrew verb שָׁאָה (SHA'AH), asked or demanded, agreeably to its proper and literal meaning,² which is given to it in all the ancient versions, as well as in every modern translation, our own excepted.

4. The hardening of Pharaoh's heart (Exod. iv. 21. ix. 16,) has been a fruitful source of malignant cavil with the adversaries of the Bible; some of whom have not hesitated to affirm that this single chapter is sufficient to destroy the authenticity of the entire Scriptures, while others, more decently and speciously, assert that a just God could not punish the Egyptian monarch for a hardness of heart of which he himself was evidently the cause. This is the objection in all its force. Let us now see how little foundation there is for it.

"When we meet with an assertion apparently contrary to all the truth and equity in the world, it is but common justice to any writer, human or divine, to suppose, that we mistake his meaning, and that the expression employed to convey it is capable of an interpretation different from that which may at first present itself. We cannot, for a moment, imagine that God secretly influences a man's will, or suggests any wicked stubborn resolution to his mind, and then punishes him for it. We are, therefore, to consider, by what other means, not incompatible with his nature and attributes, he may be said, in a certain sense, and without impropriety, to harden a man's heart. There are many ways by which we may conceive this effect to be wrought, without running into the absurdity and impiety above mentioned. The heart may be hardened by those very respects, miracles, and mercies, intended to soften it; for if they do not soften it they will harden it.—God is sometimes said to do that which he permits to be done by others, in the way of judgment and punishment: as when his people rejected his own righteous laws, he is said to have 'given them' the idolatrous ones of their heathen neighbours, 'statutes that were not good'—The heart may be hardened by his withdrawing that grace it has long resisted: men may be given up to a reprobate mind; as they would not see when they possessed the faculty of sight, the use of that faculty may be taken from them, and they may be abandoned to blindness. But all this is judicial, and supposes previous voluntary wickedness, which it is designed to punish."³

Further, no person who candidly peruses the history of the transactions with Pharaoh, can deny that what the Almighty did to Pharaoh and the Egyptians had a tendency to soften rather than to harden his heart: especially as it was not until after he had seen the miracles, and after the plagues had ceased, that he hardened himself, and would not suffer the Israelites to depart. The threatened plagues were suspended on a condition with which he refused to comply, and then only were they inflicted. It is, moreover, well known that Hebrew verbs in the Hiphil conjugation signify to permit or to suffer to be done, as well as to cause to be done, hence nothing more is meant, than to leave a man to the bent and tendency of his own disposition. Thus Pharaoh was left, and he is said to have made his own heart stubborn against God. He sinned yet more and hardened his heart. The proper rendering, therefore, of Exod. ix. 21, is—I will permit his heart to be so hardened that he will not let the people go. So in Exod. ix. 12 it ought to be translated, Yet the Lord suffered the heart of Pharaoh to be so hardened, that he hearkened not to them. And a more literal rendering of Exod. ix. 15, 16, would remove the discrepancy which seems at present to exist in our common version, which runs thus:—For now I will stretch out my hand and smite thee with pestilence; and thou shalt be cut off from the earth. And in very deed for this cause have I raised thee up, for to show in thee my power: and that my name may be declared throughout all the earth. In the original Hebrew, the verbs are in the past tense, and not in the future, as our authorized version improperly expresses them, by which means an apparent contradiction is produced: for neither Pharaoh nor his people were smitten with pestilence, nor was he by any kind of mortality cut off from the earth. The first born, it is true, were slain by a destroying angel, and Pharaoh himself was drowned in the Red Sea: but there is no reference whatever to these judgments in the two verses in question. If the words be translated as they ought in the subjunctive mood, or in the past instead of the future, this seeming contradiction to facts, as well as all ambiguity, will be avoided: For if now I HAD STRETCHED OUT יָדִי (SHA'LOCHTI had sent forth) my hand, and had smitten thee and thy people with the pestilence, thou SHOULDEST HAVE BEEN cut off from the earth. But truly on this very account HAVE I RAISED thee to TESTIFY, that I might cause thee to see my power: and that my NAME might be declared throughout all the earth, or in all this land."⁴

Thus God gave this impious king to know that it was in consequence of his especial providence, that both he and his people had not been already destroyed by means of the past plagues: but that God had preserved him for this very purpose, that he might have a further opportunity of showing Pharaoh His power in the remaining plagues, and of manifesting that He, Jehovah, was the only true God, for the full conviction of the Hebrews and Egyptians.⁵

Lastly, our authorized translation of Exod. vii. 13. (and he [that is, God] hardened Pharaoh's heart) is incorrect. It ought to have been, and THE HEART OF PHARAOH WAS HARDENED, as the original is rendered by all the ancient versions, without exception, and by the most judicious modern translations. The same phrase is correctly translated in our authorized version, in Exod. vii. 22. viii. 19. and ix. 7.

The objections, therefore, which the opponents of the Bible have raised against it from the passages we have been considering, are thus proved to be utterly destitute of foundation.

5. Again, visiting the sins of the fathers upon their children (Exod. xx. 5.) has been charged as injustice.

But this objection disappears, the moment we are convinced that the reward and punishment here intended, are confined to the outward circumstances of prosperity and distress in the present life: because if (as was the case) such a sanction were necessary in the particular system by which God thought fit to govern the Jewish people, it is evident, that any inequality as to individuals, would be certainly and easily remedied in a future life (as in the particular instances recorded in Num. xvi. 27—33. and Josh. vii. 24, 25); so that each should receive his final reward exactly according to his true appearance in the sight of God, and "thus the Judge of all the earth do right." It is only when children copy and improve on the crimes of their wicked parents, that they draw down upon their heads redoubled vengeance: so that the innocent never suffer for the guilty, except in such temporal calamities as necessarily result from their parents' crimes. As, when the profligacy of one generation involves the next in poverty, or the like. On the contrary, so benevolent is the God of Israel, that the eminent piety of one man is sometimes rewarded with blessings on thousands of his descendants. This was the case with Abraham and his descendants. Yet this is the God whom deists represent as cruel and vindictive.⁶

6. The extirpation of the Canaanites by the Jews, according to the divine command, is urged as an act of the greatest cruelty and injustice; but this objection falls to the ground when it is considered—

FIRST, That the Canaanites were unquestionably a most depraved and idolatrous race; and to have suffered them to remain and coalesce with the Israelites, would have been to sanction idolatry by encouraging their union with idolatrous nations. It must be admitted that God has a right to punish wicked nations by the infliction of judgments, such as pestilence or famine, or by employing the sword of enemies; because we see that he actually does so in the course of his Providence; and we cannot see what essential difference there is between this and his giving a command to the Israelites to destroy the wicked Canaanites; for it is a notorious fact, that these latter were an abominably wicked people. "It is needless to enter into any proof of the depraved state of their morals; they were a wicked people in the time of Abraham; and even then were devoted to

* Ainsworth, Boothroyd, Dathe, Schott and Winzer on Exod. ix. 15, 16. It is worthy of remark that the Septuagint Greek version of the Pentateuch (which confessedly is the best executed part of all that version), renders these two verses subjectively, and is followed in this respect by Dr. Boothroyd, who thus translates them:—Yea now could I stretch out my hand and smite thee and thy people with pestilence: so that thou SHOULDEST BE cut off from the earth. And in very deed for this purpose have I preserved thee, (Sept. ὥστε τοὺς θυγατέρας, On this account thou hast been preserved), that I may show to thee my power, and that my name MAY BE declared throughout all the earth. The case of Pharaoh is fully considered by Mr. Twopenny in his "Dissertations on some parts of the Old and New Testaments." &c. Diss. iv. pp. 32—54; and in Dr. Graves's Discourses on Calvinistic Predestination, pp. 225—204.

destruction by God; but their iniquity was not then full, that is, they were not yet arrived to such a height of profligacy and impiety as required their destruction. In the time of Moses, they were idolaters; sacrificers of their own crying and smiling infants; devourers of human flesh; addicted to unnatural lusts; immersed in the filthiness of all manner of vice. Now, it will be impossible to prove, that it was a proceeding contrary to God's moral justice to exterminate so wicked a people. He made the Israelites the executors of his vengeance; and, in doing this, he gave such an evident and terrible proof of his abomination of vice, as could not fail to strike the surrounding nations with astonishment and terror, and to impress on the minds of the Israelites what they were to expect, if they followed the example of the nations whom he commanded them to cut off. 'Ye shall not commit any of these abominations, that the land spue not you out also, as it spued out the nations which were before you.' (Lev. xviii. 28.) How strong and descriptive this language! the vices of the inhabitants were so abominable, that the very land was sick of them, and forced to vomit them forth, as the stomach disgorges a deadly poison.⁷¹

Secondly, After the time of God's forbearance was expired, they had still the alternative either to flee elsewhere, as, in fact, many of them did, or to surrender themselves, renounce their idolatries, and serve the God of Israel: in which case it appears that there was mercy for them. Compare Deut. xx. 10–17. That the utter destruction here mentioned was to take place only in cases of obstinacy and resistance, may be inferred both from the reason of the denunciation, and also from the several facts attending its execution.

(1.) The reason why they were to be cut off, is stated (Deut. xx. 18.) to be that they teach you not to do after all their abominations; which reason would not hold good in case of their repentance, and turning from their idols to worship the God of Israel.

(2.) The facts, from which we argue, are the following. After the conquest of the country, we are told (Josh. xi. 19, 20.) that *There was not a city that made peace with the children of Israel, save the Hivites the inhabitants of Gibeon; all other they took in battle. For it was of the Lord to harden their hearts, that they should meet Israel in battle, that he (i. e. Israel) might destroy them utterly, and that they might have no favour, but that he (Israel or the Israelites) might destroy them.*⁷² Now this passage certainly implies that the Canaanites might have had peace, if they had thought proper to accept the proposed terms. They rejected the first offers of peace, and were punished by Jehovah refusing them any further opportunities. The case of the Gibeonites seems to confirm this,⁷³ in as much as it is difficult to conceive that the oath and covenant, made to them under the circumstances of deception, should have been so valid and sacred, if the order for their extinction admitted of no limitation. The preservation of Rahab also (Josh. ii. 12–14. vi. 22, 23.) and a family of Bethel (Judg. i. 25.), with some other instances (1 Kings ix. 20, 21, &c.), incline strongly to this exposition; nor does it want the sanction of very respectable names among the critics and commentators, Jewish and Christian.⁷⁴

In the third place, The destruction is not to be attributed to Israel wholly, even as instruments. The Lord himself, partly by storms and tempests, partly by noxious insects, and partly by injecting terror into the minds of the inhabitants, perhaps expelled and destroyed more than the Israelites themselves; the wonderful, and we may add the miraculous power of God, co-operating with them. (Compare Exod. xliii. 27, 28. Josh. x. 11, &c.) Doubtless God might have destroyed these nations by earthquake, fire, storm, or plague, and no man surely would have disputed his justice or authority. Then why should men dispute his equity in destroying them by the sword of war? Or, if we admit for a moment the existence of invisible spirits, he might have sent an angel to destroy them; and would it be unworthy of an angel to be the minister of his displeasure? Why, then, are Joshua and the Israelites to be abused on the same ground?

LASTLY, The Almighty has, in fact, executed judgments on mankind far more severe than this. Though the inhabitants of Canaan are reckoned seven or eight nations, their whole country was much less than England, and what is this to the drowning of the world? a fact, attested by all ancient histories, divine and human, and confirmed by innumerable monuments.

These considerations will sufficiently justify Joshua and the other Hebrew worthies, who engaged in this war in obedience to the divine command: and unless we admit them in a great degree, we know not how any war at all can be justified, however necessary. If many of the people engaged in it from baser motives, we are not required to answer for their conduct. There will always be bad characters in an army, and we do not reckon the Jews to be a nation of pure saints.⁷⁵ But the fact is, that it nowhere appears (nor can it be proved) that the Israelites in general contracted ferocious habits by this exterminating war. Few nations, if any, ever engaged less frequently, or in fewer offensive wars than Israel; and their agricultural habits, together with other circumstances, operated against such wars of ambition and conquest. If any individuals, or even the nation in some instances, did gratify a ferocious spirit, they proportionately violated their own laws, which enjoined love to neighbours, strangers, and enemies. The most remote shadow of proof cannot be adduced that Moses carried on war, under the pretext of religion. He made no proselytes by the sword; and neither he nor any other person mentioned with approbation in Scripture, made war on any nation beyond the borders of the promised land because they were idolaters.

The late Dr. Paley has some admirable observations on the same topic, in his Sermons on several subjects. Sermon xxix. pp. 429–443. And Dr. Graves has treated it at great length, and with his wonted accuracy. Lect. on Pentateuch, vol. ii. pp. 4–64.

⁷² The twentieth verse may, more literally, be rendered:—For it was of Jehovah (or the will of Jehovah) that they should be so courageous as to meet Israel in battle: that they might utterly destroy them; that they might show to them no favour, but destroy them as Jehovah commanded Moses.

⁷⁵ Age of Infidelity, pp. 28–31.

23–35. has met with peculiar treatment from the critics of the new school in Germany.

One class have suggested that Moses probably caused the tents of the rebels to be undermined; and as he knew at what hour of the day the mine would be sprung, so he could predict when the rebels would be swallowed up in the earth! Eichhorn is somewhat more exact in his explanation. He attempts to show, that Moses ordered the rebels to be buried alive, with all that appeared to them. As to the two hundred and fifty men consumed by fire, he thinks that they were first slain, and then their bodies consumed by fire; and this by the orders of Moses!!!

To argue against conjectures of such a nature would, indeed, be labour in vain. It is not possible for any one, who reads the narration of Moses, really to suppose that the writer did not regard the event in question as miraculous. Now the object of an interpreter is, to explain the meaning of the author whom he interprets. The question—whether such an event as is related in Num. xvi. 23–35, is possible or credible?—may be raised by critics or sceptics, and may be answered by them in the negative; but those who believe that the Creator of the world has it at all times under his control, and that the authors of the sacred volume are worthy of full credit, will not be anxious to explain away the obvious meaning of the Scriptures, nor to free themselves from the obligation to believe in occurrences of a supernatural kind. To wonder or to scoff at this (so named) credibility, is not difficult; but to argue it down, with grounds of reasoning that will abide the test of careful, extensive, and sober investigation, is quite a different task.⁷⁶

8. The severity of Moses in ordering the extermination of the Midianites (Num. xxxi.) can only be justified by the command. This the history asserts: but that assertion (it has been insisted) is contradicted by the nature of the case, because it is abhorrent from the Deity to require the destruction of his creatures, and more especially to require them to destroy one another.

This is the objection in all its strength; only in this instance there is supposed to be equal cruelty in sparing as in destroying, because, while all the males were destroyed (children as well as adults), the female children and virgins were all to be spared, as it has been said, for prostitution. For the latter assertion, however, there is no foundation, either in fact or in probability. It only proves that the objectors find it necessary to exaggerate, in order to produce the desired effect upon their readers; for the books of Moses nowhere allow the Israelites to debauch their female slaves. His law prohibited an Israelite even from marrying a captive, without delays and previous formalities; and if he afterwards divorced her, he was bound to set her at liberty "because he had humbled her." (Deut. xxi. 10–14.) They were, then, simply allowed to retain these captives as slaves, educating them in their families, and employing them as domestics. The destruction of the other Midianish women, who were either married or debauched, is accounted for, by recollecting that they had enticed the Israelites to sin. It is a fact too well known to require additional proof in this place, that in the early heathen nations, numbers of lewd women were consecrated to fornication and idolatry, vestiges of which are still to be found among the dancing girls of Egypt and of India. Such, probably, were many of these women, and such, therefore, was their punishment. As to the males, they were appointed to destruction, that the nation might be extirpated, which was impossible while any of the male issue were preserved.

9. It is asserted that some of the Levitical laws have a manifest tendency to corrupt and defile the imagination; and the regulations in Deut. xxii. 13–21. have been particularly urged as an instance of this sort.

With regard to these regulations, and others of a similar kind, we may remark that what they require might be needful in the then situation of the Israelites, and yet it is not necessary that we should now curiously or impertinently scrutinize them. The people of Israel were naturally disposed to be jealous of their wives, and to defame them without any just cause, that they might have an excuse for putting them away, which would tend to produce many public mischiefs and disorders. In this case, therefore, it was a wise and merciful institution, to provide a remedy by such sort of injunctions by which the innocent might be vindicated. Such signs of trial might never fail in that climate, though they might in some others. So far indeed was it from being unworthy of God to leave such things upon record, that it may heighten our admiration both of his great wisdom and benignity in his management of that people, who were so extremely perverse, and so addicted to the extremes of lust and jealousy. If, therefore, the perusal of the passage in question excite improper thoughts in any one, the fault is in them, and not in the Scripture. Scarcely any thing can be mentioned, of which a bad use may not be made: things the most sacred and divine may in this respect be strangely abused. Nor is it a better argument that the Scriptures were not written by inspiration of God, that there are some parts and passages of it, which may be abused by persons who are lasciviously disposed, than it is that the sun was not created by the Almighty, because its light may be used by wicked men as an auxiliary in perpetrating the crimes which they have meditated.

10. The Mosaic law (Deut. xiii.) which punished idolatry with death, has been represented as cruel and unjust, and giving countenance to persecution for religious opinions.

But it is manifest to any one, who will peruse the chapter in question with attention, that this law commanded only such Israelites to be put to death, as apostatized to idolatry and still continued members of their own community. And as their government was a theocracy (in other words, God was the temporal king of Israel, and their kings were only his viceroy), idolatry was, strictly, the political crime of high-treason, which in every state is justly punishable with death. It is further to be observed, that the Israelites were never commissioned to make war upon their neighbours, or exercise any violence towards any of them, in order to compel them to worship the God of Israel, nor to force them to it even after they were conquered (Deut. x. 10); nor were they empowered thus forcibly to attempt to recover any native Israelites, who should revolt to idolatry, and go to settle in a heathen country.

11. The law in Deut. xxi. 18—21. has been stigmatized as being both inhuman and brutal, but with as little justice as any other part of the Mosaic institutes.

The passage in question is as follows:—"If a man have a stubborn and rebellious son, which will not obey the voice of his father, nor the voice of his mother, and that when they have chastened him, will not bearken unto them; then shall his father and his mother lay hold on him, and bring him out unto the elders of his city and unto the gate of his place; and they shall say unto the elders of his city, This our son is stubborn and rebellious; he will not obey our voice; he is a glutton and a drunkard. And all the men of the city shall stone him with stones, that he die. On this clause, we are to take notice, in the first place, of the character of the culprit, it is a son,—not a daughter;—a stubborn and rebellious son, a glutton and a drunkard;—in a word, a most profligate and abandoned character. Secondly, his parents must reprove and correct him, repeatedly, and until there is no hope of amendment. Thirdly, the parents were the only allowed prosecutors; and it was required that they should both concur in bringing him to the magistrate, the power of life and death not being intrusted to the parents, as it afterwards was among the Greeks and Romans. Lastly, the magistrates were to investigate the case, which must be fully proved, so as to induce them to condemn the criminal, and order him to be put to death. Natural affection would almost always prevent the prosecution; the required proof would secure all, but the most atrociously criminal, from the hasty rage, or the deliberate malice of those few parents, who were capable of such desperate wickedness, as combining to murder their own children. We do not read of any instance, in the whole Jewish history, of this law having been carried into execution. If, however, such an extraordinary event at any time occurred, it could not fail to excite general notice, and to produce a deep and lasting impression on the minds of both parents and children. So that the solemn execution of one incorrigible criminal would be a most salutary warning to tens of thousands. The very existence of such a law would confirm greatly the authority of parents, and give energy to their admonitions; as well as fortify the minds of young persons against various temptations, and so prevent crimes. And it would constantly excite all parents, who attended to the law of Moses, to restrain, correct, and watch over their children, when young; to give them good instruction, set them a good example, and pray for them without ceasing; and to keep them as much as possible out of bad company, and from contracting bad habits.

This law, therefore, so harmless and beneficial in its operations, yet so contrary to human policy, proves, instead of invalidating, the divine original of that code, in which alone it is found.

12. From the conduct of Ehud (Judges iii. 15—26.), of Jael (iv. 17—20.), and from David's advice to Solomon concerning Joab and Shimei (1 Kings ii. 5, 6, 8.), it has been asserted that the Scriptures inculcate assassination.

Nothing can be more false than this assertion. For, in the first place, the cases of Ehud and Jael are simply recorded as matters of fact, without any comment or observation whatever; and, therefore, they neither can nor ought to be represented as encouraging assassination. With regard to the conduct of Jael in particular, we must judge of it by the feelings of those, among whom the right of avenging the blood of a relative was so strongly rooted, that even Moses could not take it away. Jael was an ally, by blood, of the Israelitish nation; their chief oppressor, who had mightily oppressed them for the space of twenty years, now lay defenceless before her; and he was moreover one of those whom Israel was bound by divine command to exterminate. Perhaps, too, she felt herself called to be the instrument of God in working out for that nation a great deliverance, by thus exterminating their heathen oppressor. At least, Israel viewed it in this light; and in this view we cannot reproach the heroine with that as a crime, which both she and Israel felt to be a deed performed in accordance with the mandate of heaven.*

The advice of David to Solomon when on his death-bed, demands a more listnet consideration. And, in the first place, with regard to Joab, we remark that no attentive reader of the history of David, after his accession to the throne of Israel, can help observing how often it is noticed that the sons of Zeruiah were too strong for David; in other words, that they had too much power with the army for him to venture to punish their atrocious deeds; reasons of state deferred the punishment, and when those reasons were removed, it was proper to punish a deliberate murderer according to an express law. David also knew that a man like Joab, who could brook no superior, might endanger the peace of the kingdom. He was now engaged to support Adonijah, and so far in actual rebellion. But it is to be observed that the Hebrew monarch does not advise Solomon to put Joab absolutely and unconditionally to death; he charges him to do according to his wisdom, and the sum of his advice is in effect this:—"Though you have now pardoned Joab through policy, as I was myself compelled to do by the exigency of the times, and the predominant influence of the sons of Zeruiah; yet, should he offend again, act according to discretion, and then punish him, as a hoary-headed and confirmed traitor, with death." Secondly, with respect to Shimei, David had fulfilled his promise. He had only engaged that he would not put him to death on the day when Abishai had requested permission to do it (compare 2 Sam. xix. 23. with 1 Kings ii. 8.); and he left it to Solomon to treat him as he thought just, in reference to his future conduct. David knew that he was Shimei still, and would so act as to bring on himself due punishment. Solomon accordingly sent for Shimei, and commanded him to reside in Jerusalem, and not to depart thence, under pain of death on the day when he should pass over the brook Kidson, a condition to which Shimei thankfully acceded. (1 Kings ii. 37, 38) Three years afterwards, the latter transgressed this convention and went to Gath (verse 40.), a suspicious quarter, in consequence of which Solomon, after charging him with the violation of his oath, commanded him to be put to death. (41—46.)†

13. Again, it has been asserted by some, that the law of Moses (Lev. xxvii. 28.), concerning devoted things to be put to death, authorized human sacrifices: and Jephthah's sacrificing his daughter (Judg. xi. 34, &c.), Samuel's hewing Agag in pieces before the Lord (1 Sam. xv. 33.), and David's delivering seven of Saul's posterity to the Gibeonites to be put to death by them (2 Sam. xxi. 2, &c.), have been represented as instances of human sacrifices according to that law.

But as there are express prohibitions of sacrificing their children in Deut. xii. 30, 31. Psal. cvi. 37, 38. Jer. vii. 31. and Ezek. xvi. 20, 21; so there is no doctrine to sacrifice any other human creature, nor are there any rites appointed for such sacrifice, but also it would have rendered the priest unclean, by touching a dead body; and the sacrifice of a man is expressly declared to be abominable in Isa. lxvi. 3. As no devoted thing could be sacrificed at all, the law in question cannot possibly relate to sacrifice, and is capable of a very different meaning. For, although Josephus, and many commentators after him, are of opinion that Jephthah did really immolate his daughter, the probability is that she was not sacrificed. And this will appear from the rendering of the converse article (וְעָרָא), which the preceding considerations require to be taken disjunctively, and translated on instead of AND, both in Lev. xxvii. 28. and also in Judges xi. 30, 31. What further confirms this rendering, and consequently reconciles these two passages, is, that Jephthah's rashness had time to cool, as his daughter went two months to bewail her virginity, that is her consecration to God, which obliged her to remain single without posterity. It is further said that she went to bewail her virginity, not her sacrifice. Besides the Israelitish women went four times in every year to mourn or talk with (not for) the daughter of Jephthah, to lament her seclusion from the world, and the hardship of her situation as cut off from every domestic enjoyment. Now, if in the course of two months no person could have suggested to Jephthah a ransom for his daughter, yet surely she must have been alive, though dead to him and his family (as his only child), and to the world by her seclusion, if the Israelitish women went to condole with her. It is further worthy of remark, that it is not afterwards said, that he actually sacrificed her, but that "he did with her according to his vow." The sacred historian subjoins, she knew no man: if she were sacrificed this remark is frivolous; but if she were devoted to perpetual virginity, this idea coincides with the visits of the Israelitish women. On the whole, we may safely conclude, that Jephthah's daughter was not sacrificed, but consecrated to a state of celibacy.‡

With respect to the two other cases above mentioned, viz. the hewing of Agag in pieces before the Lord, and the delivery of seven of Saul's posterity to the Gibeonites, they have no reference whatever to sacrifices. Agag, in particular, was put to death as a criminal, and not as a sacrifice. The seven descendants of Saul, who were partly the children of a concubine and partly of a daughter of Saul, were not pretenders to the crown: and David cannot be suspected of having embraced such an opportunity to put them out of the way. Neither is to be supposed that David delivered up the innocent to death contrary to the law (Deut. xxiv. 16.) They were therefore delivered up to the avengers of blood, and punished with death not on account of the crimes of Saul, but for the murders which they themselves, with the connivance of Saul, had committed on the Gibeonites, and for which they had hitherto remained unpunished. They themselves constituted the bloody house, which was generally notorious as such. Saul is mentioned with them, merely because he took under his protection the murderers, who were so nearly related to him, and delivered them from the hand of the avengers of blood.¶

14. In 1 Sam. xiii. 14. David is called the man after God's own heart. And this phrase, as applied to him, has been a fertile source of sarcasm and reproach to many infidel writers, as if the Scriptures sanctioned adultery and murder.

But do they authorize those crimes? By no means. They are there reprehended, and the severest denunciations are pronounced against those who perpetrate them. In what sense then was he a man after God's own heart? ANSWER.—In his strict attention to the law and worship of God; in his recognising, throughout his whole conduct, that Jehovah was king in Israel, and that he himself was only his vicergerent; in never attempting to alter any of those laws, or in the least degree to change the Israelitish constitution. In all his public official conduct he acted according to the Divine Mind, and fulfilled the will of his Maker. But the phrase itself, will, perhaps, be the best explained by the case of Samuel. Eli was rejected, and Samuel chosen in his place, just as David superseded Saul. On this occasion God said, I will raise me up a faithful priest, that shall do according to that which is in mine heart. (1 Sam. ii. 35.) And is not he, who acts agreeably to the Divine Will, a man after God's heart? Further, it is worthy of remark, that this expression is never used in reference to his private or personal moral conduct. It is used wholly in reference to his uniform regard to the promotion of the interests of pure religion, notwithstanding all temptations to idolatry and persecution. The numbering of the people (2 Sam. xxiv.), in order, as it would seem, to push conquests into foreign countries, and the flagitious adultery with Bathsheba, together with the consequent murder of Uriah (2 Sam. xi.) are the only instances in which

* That this passage should be so rendered, has been proved by Dr. Hales. It will then run thus:—Notwithstanding, no devoted thing, which a man shall devote unto his Lord, of all that he hath, (either) of man or of beast, or of land or of his own property, shall be sold or redeemed. Every thing devoted is most holy unto the Lord. New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. p. 320. § See Dr. Chandler's Life of David, vol. ii. pp. 444—481, where that monarch's conduct to Joab and Shimei is fully vindicated.

David seems to have forgotten himself and his God. With regard to the two last shocking crimes, more particularly, so far was David from excusing them, that he confesses and laments them with the greatest horror. "But how earnest was his repentance! And with what submission to the will of God did he bear those calamities which were sent for his punishment; and which, as they were caused by his own children, must have been so much the more distressing to his paternal feelings!" (2 Sam. xi. Psal. li. 2 Sam. xii. 1—23. xiii. 1—20. xv.—xviii.) Do we not here again see the soul entirely and steadily devoted to God? David, indeed, was no ideal model of human perfection; he was not without the blemishes incident to human nature; but, on the whole, he was an example worthy of the imitation of his successors; and, according as they appear on comparison with him, the sacred writers estimate their characters."

15. The conduct of David towards the Ammonites, in putting them under saws and harrows of iron, &c. on the capture of Rabbah, has been represented as an instance of diabolical and unparalleled cruelty. (2 Sam. xii. 31.)

The cavils of the objectors, in this as in every other instance, are utterly unfounded: for, instead of deducing their objections from translations, they had consulted the original passage; they would have seen that there was no ground whatever for their charges. The Hebrew prefix ב (beth), which is used throughout the verse in question, it is well known, signifies to as well as under; and to put the people to saws, harrows, axes, and the brick-kilns, means no more than to employ them as slaves in the most menial and laborious offices, such as sawing, making iron harrows, hewing wood and making bricks. This form of expression is an Anglicism as well as a Hebraism; and we still say, to put a person to the plough, to the anvil, &c. The passage objected to may be thus rendered. He (David) brought forth the people that were therein, and put them to saws, and to harrows of iron (or to iron-mines, for the original word means both), and to axes of iron, and made them pass through the brick-kilns. The erroneous interpretation of this verse appears to have been taken from 1 Chron. xx. 3, where David is said to have cut them with saws and with harrows of iron, and with axes: on which place it is to be observed that, instead of וישר (vayaser) he saved or cut with saws, seven of the manuscripts collated by Dr. Kennicott have וישר (vayaser) he put them. 1 Chron. xx. 3, therefore, must be rendered in the same manner as 2 Sam. xii. 31.

16. It has been asserted from 1 Kings xxii. that Jehovah kept false prophets, as well as true ones.

The most common attention to the context will show that this assertion is as false as it is malignant. For, in the first place, the four hundred prophets mentioned in that chapter (verse 6.) were pretended prophets whom the wicked king of Israel had in his pay, and who knew how to suit his humour and to flatter his vanity, all agreeing in the same fawning compliances and in the same treacherous counsels which pleased for the present, but ultimately proved fatal. They are emphatically termed by Micah (verse 23.) Ahab's prophets, notwithstanding they professed to be the Lord's prophets, prophesying in his name. And, secondly, the address of Micah to the two confederated kings in verses 19—23, is not a real representation of any thing done in the heavenly world, as if the Almighty were at a loss for expedients, or had any hand in the sins of his creatures; but it is a mere parable, and only tells in figurative language what was in the womb of providence, the events which were shortly to take place, and the permission on the part of God, for these agents to act. Micah did not choose to tell the angry and impious Ahab, that all his prophets were liars; but he represents the whole by this parable, and says the same truths in language equally forcible but less offensive.

17. The Scriptures represent the Almighty as a God of truth and faithfulness: but he is charged by the opposers of divine revelation with being guilty of falsehood, by inspiring prophets with false messages, and by violating his promises. The grossness of such assertions is sufficiently disgusting, but it is the duty of a Christian advocate fully to meet them, and to expose all their falsehood.

In the first place, With regard to the charge of inspiring prophets with false messages (which is founded on 1 Kings xxii. 22, 23. Jer. iv. 10. and Ezek. xiv. 9.), we remark, that it is a known idiom of the Hebrew language, to express things in an imperative and active form, which are to be understood only permissively. So where the devils besought Christ that he would suffer them to enter into the herd of swine, he said unto them, Go (Matt. viii. 31.); he did not command, but permitted them. And so in John xii. 27, where our Saviour says to Judas, What thou dost, do quickly, we are not to understand that he commanded him to betray him, though that seemed to be expressed in the form. So, likewise, here, where an evil spirit offered himself to be a lying spirit in the mouth of the prophet, and God says, Go forth and do as thou sayest, this only signifies a permission, not a command. And so (Jer. iv. 10.) where the prophet complains that God had greatly deceived the people, saying, they should have peace when the sword reacheth to the soul; we are to understand this no otherwise, but that God permitted the false prophets to deceive them, prophesying peace to them, as appears by the history. (Ezek. xiv. 19.) I the Lord have deceived that prophet, that is, permitted him to be deceived, and to deceive the people, as a just judgment upon them for their infidelity with respect to his true prophets. This he threatens at the 5th verse, I will take the house of Israel in their own heart, because they are all estranged from me through their idols; because they have chosen to themselves false gods, I will suffer them to be deceived with false prophets; and that this is the meaning, appears by the threatening added, and I will stretch out my hand upon him, and I will destroy him from the midst of my people: now God will not punish that of which he is the author.

That text (Jer. xx. 7.) Thou hast deceived me, and I was deceived, signifies no more, but that he had mistaken the promise of God to him, who when he gave him his commission, told him he would be with him, by which he understood that no evil should come to him, and now he was become a derision and the people mocked him; and in his passion and weakness, he breaks forth into this expression, Thou hast deceived me, and I was deceived; whereas it was his own mistake of the meaning of God's promise, which was not, that he should not meet with scorn, and opposition, and persecution, but that they should not prevail against him, as we may see at the latter end of the first chapter.²

Secondly, With respect to the assertion that the Almighty violates his promises, it has been objected that God did not give the children of Israel all the land which he promised to Abraham, as will appear by comparing Gen. xviii. 19, 20. with Josh. xiii. 1. &c. and Judg. ii. 20, 21. In Gen. xv. 18 God promised to give Abraham and his seed such a land, the bounds of which he describes in Josh. xiii. 1. It is there said that there remained very much land yet unconquered, of which they had not got possession. And in Judg. ii. 20 it is said, that the people having not performed their part of the covenant, God would suspend the further performance of his promise, and would not drive out any more of the nations before them; and it is probable, that the Israelites never were possessed of the promised land in the full latitude and extent of the promise.

Answer.—The covenant of God with Abraham was upon consideration of his past faith and obedience, though it seems that the full performance of it did likewise depend upon the future obedience of his posterity. In pursuance of his covenant, notwithstanding all the murmurs and rebellions of that people, God did bring them into the promised land, though they provoked him to destroy them many a time; because he remembered his covenant with Abraham. When they were possessed of it, God gave them a title to the rest, and would have assisted them in the conquest of it, if they had performed the condition required on their part, that is, continued faithful and obedient to him; but they did not, and thereby discharged God from any further performance of his promise; and God, when he had done this, had fully performed the covenant he made with Abraham, so far as concerned his part, as appears by the acknowledgment of Joshua, even in a time when a great part of the land was unconquered (Josh. xxi. 44), and of Solomon (1 Kings viii. 56.); yea, and had it not been that God had made this covenant, as well upon consideration of Abraham's faith and obedience, as upon condition of the future obedience of his posterity, the rebellious and disobedience of the people in the wilderness had released God wholly from the promise, and he would not have been unfaithful if he had utterly destroyed that people, and made a full end of them, and they had never entered into that land; because a failure of the condition makes the obligation to cease; and that this condition was implied in the covenant with Abraham appears from Deut. vii. 12, 13. xi. 22, 23. and Judg. ii. 20. God gives this reason why he suspended the complete performance of his promise: *The anger of the Lord was hot against Israel, and he said, Because that this people hath transgressed my covenant which I commanded their fathers, and have not hearkened to my voice. I also will not henceforth drive out any of the nations which Joshua left when he died.*³

18. The destruction of forty-two little children, by Elisha, whom they had in sportive playfulness called a bald head (it is said), was an act of cruelty and revenge.

It was no such thing. The original word in 2 Kings ii. 23, 24. נָקִיִּים (NEARIM), which in our version is rendered little children, also means young persons who are grown up. Thus Isaac was called נָקִיר (NAQIR) a lad, when he was twenty-eight years old; Joseph when he was thirty; and Rehoboam when he was forty years of age. The town of Beth-el was one of the principal seats of Ahab's idolatry; and it is probable that these men came out of that city and insulted the prophet, at the instigation of the priests of Baal, exclaiming—Ascend, too, thou bald head; ascend, too, thou bald head, in allusion to Elijah's ascension to heaven; of which they had heard, but which they did not believe. Elisha, it is said, cursed them; but he did not this from any petulant temper of his own. He cursed them in the name of the Lord, that is, he declared in his name and authority the punishment which he would inflict upon them. Thus Elisha acted as a minister of the Supreme Governor of the world; and by his order and in his name he foretold the punishment which was about to be inflicted upon these profligate idolaters. Had this denunciation proceeded from the angry resentment of the prophet only, and not from a divine impulse, such a signal event as the destruction of these profane young men of Beth-el would not have been the immediate consequence of it.

19. It is objected that many passages of the Old Testament ascribe to the Almighty human affections, passions, and actions, even those of the worst kind.

But these objections cease, when such passages are interpreted figuratively, as they ought to be, and when all those other passages of the Bible are duly considered, which most evidently convey the sublimest ideas of the Divine Majesty. The Holy Scriptures, it is true, in condescension to our limited capacities, and to the imperfections of human creatures and of human language, represent God as having the body, the passions, and the infirmities of a man. Thus, they make mention of his eyes and ears, his hands and feet, his sleeping and waking; they ascribe to him fierce anger and jealousy, grief and repentance, joy and desire. The simple language of the Hebrews might also be another reason for its abounding with such expressions. But that no man might be so weak or so perverse as to take those expressions according to the letter, and entertain mean and unworthy thoughts of his Maker, the same Scriptures often add to those very descriptions something which manifestly shows us how they are to be understood, and reminds us that if God has a body, the heaven is his throne, and the earth his footstool; if he has eyes, the darkness to them is no darkness; and from them nothing is hid; and in other places we are told that he is perfect; that he is blessed or happy; that he is unchangeable; that he is every where present; that he is a spirit; that no man hath seen him or can see him; that he is incomprehensible; and that the most exalted notion which we can possibly frame of him, falls infinitely short of the truth.⁴ One or two examples will illustrate the preceding remarks.

Thus, when God is said to repent, the expression simply means, that he does not execute that which seemed to us to have been his purpose; that he is pleased to do otherwise than his threatenings seemed openly to express, on account of some tacit condition implied in them. And this does not derogate either from the truth, or sincerity, or constancy, of God in his word. It does not derogate from his truth, because he speaks what he really intends unless something intervened to prevent the judgment threatened, upon which he resolved when he threatened to take off and stop his judgments. Nor does it derogate from his sincerity, for he has told us that his threatenings have such conditions implied in them:—nor from his constancy and immutability, because God does not change his counsel and purpose, but takes off the sentence, which he had passed with reserved conditions.

20. It has also been objected, that the book of Ecclesiastes contains some passages which savour of irreligion, and others which savour of immorality.

That the passages, thus excepted against, are either innocent when rightly interpreted; or else they express, not the sentiments of Solomon, but the false opinions of others, whom he personates in order to confute them;—or, however, not his deliberate sentiments, but such hasty and wrong notions, as during the course of his inquiry after happiness arose successively in his mind, and were on mature consideration rejected by him, that he might fix at last on the true basis,—the conclusion of the whole matter; which is, to fear God and keep his commandments: for God will bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil. (Ecc. xii. 13, 14.)

21. It has likewise been objected that the Song of Solomon, and the sixteenth and twenty-third chapters of Ezekiel's prophecy, contain passages offensive to common decency.

But this objection will fall to the ground by interpreting those parts allegorically, as almost all the commentators, from the earliest times, have unanimously done: and, likewise, by considering that the simplicity of the eastern nations made these phrases less offensive to them than they appeared to us; as, on the other hand, many things which are perfectly correct in our view, would appear far different in eastern climates. With respect to the Song of Solomon, in particular, it is to be remarked, 1. That most of the forms of speech, against which exceptions have been made, are mistranslations, and do not exist in the original:—and, 2. Admitting the correctness of these remarks, it may also be shown, that this book abounds with beautiful poetic images. There is, therefore, no just exception to supposing it allegorical, provided the allegory be not extravagant and inconsistent.

22. It is asserted, that the imprecations contained in some of the prophetic parts of Scripture, and in the book of Psalms (especially in the fifty-fifth, sixty-ninth, hundred and ninth, hundred and thirty-seventh, and some other Psalms), breathe a spirit of malice, are highly inconsistent with humanity, and highly vicious.

It must be confessed that, at first sight, they appear cruel and vindictive, irreconcilable with the gentle spirit of piety and religion; and some, unhesitatingly acknowledging them to be indefensible on Christian principles, rest the defence solely on their accordance with the character of the Jewish dispensation; which, they say, did not inculcate that cordial forgiveness of injuries, and even love of our enemies, which form an essential and peculiar doctrine of the Gospel. In this representation the inquirer will not be disposed to acquiesce, when he reflects that the Hebrew Scriptures do forcibly enjoin the duties of forgiving injuries, Exod. xii. 49. xxiii. 4. 5. Lev. xix. 17, 18. Deut. xxii. 35. Prov. ix. 17. xix. 11. xx. 22. xxiv. 29. Zech. vii. 10.; of doing good to enemies, Exod. xxiii. 4. 5. Prov. xxv. 21. Jer. xix. 7.; and of cultivating mutual kindness and good will, Exod. xii. 21—23. Lev. xix. 17, 18, 34. xxv. 35. Deut. x. 19. Prov. xv. 17. xvii. 17. xviii. 21. xxvii. 10. David, the sweet Psalmist of Israel, extols and recommends benevolence and mercy, forgiveness and kindness to enemies, Psal. xv. 25. xxvii. 2. et seq. xxviii. 11. 8. 21. 26. xxxviii. 12, 13, 14. xxxix. 1. xl. 1. 3. xciv. 1. ci. 5. cix. 4. 5. cxii. 5. 9. cxx. 6, 7. cxxxiii. 4, 2, 3.; and his own conduct afforded a noble exemplification of these virtues, as will be apparent by consulting the following passages; Psal. xxxv. 12—15. I Sam. xxiv. 1. et seq. xxv. 1. et seq. 2 Sam. i. 4. et seq. iv. 8—12. xv. 7—11. xix. 21—23. It cannot then be credited that one so distinguished for tenderness and benevolence of heart, as well as for pre eminent piety, could utter any thing in direct opposition to those feelings of mercy and forgiveness, which he both highly recommended, and exhibited in his own practice. Independently of this we may rest assured that no unmerciful and revengeful sentiment was ever suggested by the Holy Spirit, or ever found entrance into a work of inspiration.

From these observations we may with certainty infer that the passages in question, however they may appear, were undoubtedly not intended to convey any bitter and unrelenting malediction. Nor will they be deemed to do so, provided due allowance be made for the bold phraseology of Oriental poetry, which must generally be received with considerable abatement; and provided also they be understood with the reservation, which ought to accompany all our wishes and addresses to the Deity, namely, that he would grant them only so far as may be consistent with His will and providence. If the imprecative parts of the book of Psalms be taken with these limitations, as in reason they ought, they will be found in substance merely to express a wish that the wicked men spoken of might receive the just recompense of their deeds, and that the punishment they deserved might speedily overtake them, if such were the will of God. The unpius and transgressors are those alone upon whom the Psalmist imprecates the Divine vengeance; and there is nothing of vindictive feeling in praying for that which he believed the Divine justice as well as the Divine promise were engaged to inflict; while at the same time his entire confidence in the absolute perfections of the Supreme Being affords ample evidence that he calls for this vengeance only so far as might be accordant with the Divine attributes of wisdom, goodness, and equity. A strong confirmation of this reasoning is supplied by Psal. xxvii. 4, 5, where he prays the Almighty to 'give them according to their deeds, according to the wickedness of their endeavours; to give them after the work of their hands: to render them their desert'; and he immediately subjoins as a reason for the petition, and a vindication of it, 'because they regard not the works of the Lord, nor the operation of his hands, he shall utterly destroy them, and not build them up.' Such imprecative addresses are in reality the expression of an earnest desire that the will of God may be done in earth as it is in heaven, and that, if it seemed good unto Him, He would assert his own law as well by the punishment of the iniquitous as by the preservation of the righteous.

The persons, to whom the imprecations refer, were inveterate adversaries, plotting against the life of the Psalmist, and maliciously intent upon effecting his ruin. To pray to be rescued from their wicked devices was clearly lawful; and, considering their numbers and persevering malignity, his escape might seem utterly impracticable without their entire overthrow or extirpation; a prayer for their destruction, therefore, was equivalent to a prayer for his own preservation and deliverance. Besides, they were for the most part not only personal enemies, but hostile to the people of Israel, rebels to their heavenly King, and violators of His commands. To desire the punishment of such characters arose, it may fairly be presumed, not from personal vindictive feelings, but from a regard to religion, and hatred of iniquity; and was in fact tantamount to desiring the Almighty to vindicate His glory by inflicting the chastisements, which they deserved, and which he has denounced against the proud contemners of His laws.

By many writers the passages objected to are explained as predictions; and this is not at variance with the Hebrew idiom; which admits, under some circumstances, the use of the imperative for the future, as Psal. xxxvii. 27. Gen. xx. 7. xlii. 19. xlv. 8. Prov. iii. 4. iv. 4.; and the employment of the imperative mood, when declaring future events, is not unusual with the sacred writers, as in Isa. vi. 10. viii. 9, 10. ix. 3. xvi. 1. xxix. 9. Jer. i. 10. Ezek. xlii. 3. In some instances, a prayer or wish for the punishment of sinners may be nearly equivalent to a prediction, inasmuch as it is founded on the belief, and meant to imply, that, according to God's moral government of the world, punishment most certainly awaits them. Some of the imprecations in the Psalms may, then, be understood as declarative of the just judgments of God, which would inevitably fall upon the impious; but in others, and perhaps most of them, both the natural construction of the sentences, and the full force and propriety of the expressions, require them to be taken in an imprecative sense. To explain them in any other sense is doing violence to the laws of grammatical interpretation; yet even in this light, considered as imprecations, they amount to no more than a wish that the impious may be dealt with according to the eternal and unalterable laws of Divine justice, that they may openly and before the world receive the penalties of crime, provided it be the will of God; which surely is neither an unnatural nor unreasonable wish in those, who anxiously seek the punishment of vice, and the maintenance of true religion and virtue. In the Psalmist, moreover, it is a wish not proceeding from a desire to gratify a personal vindictive feeling, but partly from a desire of self-preservation, and partly from anxiety to see the worship and glory of God triumphant over all enemies. Imprecations, therefore, made with the limitations, and originating in the motives just mentioned, so far from being liable to the charge of maliciousness and revenge, are in accordance with the purest spirit of religion, and with the exercise of the most extensive charity.¹

Of all those tremendous imprecations which appear in our common English version of Deut. xxvii. 15—26, there is not one authorized by the original. The Hebrew texts express no kind of imprecation, but are only so many denunciations of the displeasure of God against those who either were or should be guilty of the sins therein mentioned, and of the judgments which they must expect to be inflicted upon them, unless prevented by a timely and sincere repentance. And agreeably to this view, the sacred text should have been rendered 'cursed they,' or, 'cursed are they,' and not 'cursed be they,' in the sense of Let them be cursed; the word be, though inserted in our translation, having nothing answerable to it in the Hebrew.

The same idiom, which appears in the prophetic writings and Psalms, is also to be found in 1 Cor. xvi. 22. and 2 Tim. iv. 14.

The former passage runs thus:—If any man love not the Lord Jesus, let him be anathema maranatha. From 1 Cor. xii. 3. we find that the Jews, who pretended to be under the Spirit and teaching of God, called Jesus Christ anathema, or accursed; that is, a person devoted to destruction. In 1 Cor. xvi. 22 Saint Paul retorts the whole upon themselves, and says, If any man love not the Lord Jesus, let him be (that is, he will be) accursed; the Lord will come. This is not said in the way of imprecation, but as a prediction of what would certainly come upon the Jews if they did not repent; and of what actually came upon them, because they did not repent, but continued to hate and execrate the Saviour of the world, as well as a prediction of what still lies upon them because they continue to hate and execrate the Redeemer.

In 2 Tim. iv. 14. we read Alexander the coppersmith did me much evil; the Lord reward him according to his works; which has the appearance of an imprecation. But instead of αποδοτω may the Lord reward, αποδοτω will reward is the reading of the Codices Alexandrinus and Ephremi (which are of the best authority), the Codices Claromontanus, San Germanensis, Augiensis, also of those numbered by Griesbach, 6. 17. 31. 37. 67*. 71. 73. 80. and of the MS. by Matthæi noted with the letter f;—of the Coptic, Armenian, and Vulgate versions;—and of Chrysostom, Theodoret, Eulogius as cited by Photius, Johannes Damascenus, Occumenius, Augustine, and others among the fathers of the Christian church. The reading of αποδοτω makes the sentence declaratory.—The Lord will reward him according to his works; and as it is supported by such satisfactory evidence, Griesbach has inserted it in his inner margin, as being nearly equal, if not preferable, to the common reading. An additional proof that this is the preferable lection is furnished by the fact, that it is in unison with the spirit and temper of the intrepid apostle, Saint Paul; who, in the sixteenth verse, when speaking of his being deserted by every one, when (during his second imprisonment at Rome) he was first summoned to vindicate himself before the sanguinary emperor Nero, says, Let it not be placed to their charge, that is, Let them not have to reckon for it with the Supreme Judge, at the great day. This passage furnishes an additional example of canon 9., concerning various readings, which is given in p. 231. supra.

23. The preceding examples, with two exceptions, have been taken from the Old Testament. So pure, indeed, is the morality of the New Testament, that the advocates of infidelity can find no other fault with it, than this,—that it carries the principle of forbearance too far, because, among other things, it inculcates the love of our enemies. Notwithstanding this involuntary testimony to its inimitable excellence, two passages have been singled out, as inculcating immorality, viz. Luke xvi. 8. and 1 Cor. ix. 5.

(1.) In Luke xvi. 8. we read, that The Lord commended the unjust steward (who in the parable had been represented as having defrauded his master), because he had done wisely; and hence Jesus Christ has been unjustly charged with countenancing dishonesty. The whole of the context, however, shows, that it was the master or lord of the steward, and not Christ, who is represented as commending his conduct, and it is in consequence of his master's so commending him, that Jesus made the reflection that the children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light. The parable in question is to be interpreted solely in reference to the principal idea contained in it; and that idea is, from the conduct of a worldly minded man, to enforce upon the followers of Jesus Christ the necessity of their being at least as assiduous in pursuing the business of the next world,—the salvation of their souls,—as worldly minded men are in their management of the affairs of this world.

(2.) The interrogatory (1 Cor. ix. 5) has been distorted into a charge of adultery against the apostle Paul. It would be a sufficient reply to this falsehood to state that the whole of his conduct and sentiments completely disprove it. The purest benevolence, the severest reproofs of all sin, and the most exemplary discharge of all the civil, social, and relative duties pervade all his justly admired epistles. Let us, however, briefly consider this passage. It is sufficiently evident from the context, that at Corinth there were false teachers of Christianity, who questioned Paul's apostleship; and that he was obliged to conduct himself in the most circumspcious manner, in order that they might not find any occasion against him. Having vindicated his apostolic character and mission, and proved his right to have the necessities of life supplied to him, if he had demanded them of those among whom he had laboured gratuitously, he says,—Have we not power (authority or right) to lead about a sister, a wife, as well as other apostles, and as the brethren of the Lord and Cephas? What is there in this passage, which can be construed into a sufficient proof of adultery in an English court of law?—When the apostle speaks of his right to take with him a sister, a wife, he means, first, that he and all other apostles, and, consequently, all ministers of the Gospel, had a right to marry; for it appears that James and Jude, who were the brethren or kinsmen of the Lord, were married; and we have infallible evidence that Peter (surnamed Cephas) was a married man, not only from this verse, but also from Matt. viii. 14, where his mother-in-law is mentioned as being cured by Jesus Christ of a fever. And, secondly, we find that their wives were persons of the same faith; for less can never be implied in the word sister. It is further worthy of notice that Clement of Alexandria has particularly remarked that the apostles carried their wives about with them, "not as wives but as sisters, that they might minister to those who were mistresses of families; that so the doctrine of the Lord might, without reprehension or evil suspicion, enter the apartments of the women." And in giving his finished picture of a perfect Christian, he says,—Ἐρῶντες καὶ πίπτες, καὶ γαμέτες, ἔχοντες τοὺς ἀδελφοὺς τοῦ αἵματος—He eats and drinks and marries... having the apostles for his example!*

SECTION VI.

APPARENT CONTRADICTIONS BETWEEN THE SACRED WRITERS.

THERE are some facts recorded in one part of the Sacred Writings which seem to be repugnant to the statements contained in other parts of the Scriptures; and these apparent contradictions are to be found between different writers of the Old Testament, and also between the Old and the New Testament.

1. In the Old Testament the following passages are objected to as contradictory.

1. Gen. i. and Gen. ii. have been affirmed to contradict each other.

They are perfectly consistent. In the first chapter, Moses gives a general account of the whole creation in six days; and then, carrying on his history, he proceeds to describe particularly the formation of Adam and Eve. In Gen. ii. 3. it is said, that God had rested from all his works which he had created and made; that is, he ceased to make any more creatures; consequently, Adam was not made after this.

2. Gen. vii. 12. And the rain was upon the earth forty days and forty nights. } is said to be } Gen. vii. 17. The flood was } contradicted by } forty days upon the earth.

The words "and forty nights," in Gen. vii. 17. are lost from the Hebrew copies, but they are found in the Septuagint Greek version, and also in many MSS. of the Latin Vulgate version. They ought to be restored to the text, which will read as follows, in perfect unison with Gen. vii. 12.—The flood was forty days and forty nights upon the earth.

3. Gen. vii. 24. And the waters prevailed upon the earth an hundred and fifty days. } is said to be } Gen. viii. 3. The waters } contradicted by } returned from off the earth } continually; and after the } end of the hundred and fifty } days, the waters were abated.

Gen. viii. 3. ought to be rendered:—The waters continually subsided from off the earth; and at the end of the hundred and fifty days, the waters were much abated. This rendering (which Dr. Boothroyd has adopted in his new version of the Bible) completely removes the alleged contradiction.

4. Gen. viii. 4, 5. are affirmed to be repugnant.

Dr. Boothroyd renders them thus, which obviates that repugnancy:—The waters were much abated, so that in the seventh month, on the seventeenth day of the month, the ark rested upon one of the mountains of Ararat. And the waters were continually decreasing until the tenth month; and on the first day of the tenth month the tops of the mountains were visible.

5. Gen. vi. 19. vii. 2, 3, 8, 9. and viii. 20. are charged with being direct contradictions. A little attention to the context and connection of the passages in question will show their perfect consistency.

In Gen. vi. 19–21. general orders are given to Noah to take into the ark with him animals of every kind, pairs of each. In Gen. vii. 2. the number of pairs is stated, viz. seven pairs of clean beasts, and two pairs of beasts that are not clean; and (verse 3.) of the fowls of the air that are clean, seven pairs, the male and the female, and of fowls that are not clean, two pairs, the male and his female.* In vii. 8, 9. and 15. the historian, relating what was done in obedience to the divine command, says generally, that pairs went with Noah into the ark; and in viii. 20. it is stated, also, in general terms, that he offered sacrifices of every clean beast, and of every clean fowl. There is, therefore, no real contradiction between these several numbers. As animals were not used for food before the Deluge, it is probable that the distinction of beasts and fowls into clean and unclean was made with respect to sacrifices; the former being offered while the latter were not.

6. On the alleged contradiction between Gen. xv. 13. Exod. xii. 40, 41. and Acts vii. 6. see p. 405. supra.

7. Gen. xxii. 1. It came to pass went with him, that is, he tries and proves them, and thus he tempted Abraham. Sometimes temptation means dangerous trials and enticements to sin, under which we are more likely to sink, than to overcome them. In this sense God tempteth not any man; nor, if we resist them, will He suffer us to be tempted above what we are able. (1 Cor. x. 13.)

8. From Gen. xxxi. 38. and 41. compared with Gen. xxxiv. it has been asserted that Dinah was only six years of age (instead of sixteen), when she was forcibly defiled by Shechem, and hence it is insinuated that the narrative is so contradictory, as to be unworthy of credit.

This pretended difficulty, concerning the age of Dinah, originated in the supposition that that disastrous circumstance took place in the very same year when Jacob returned into Palestine. So far, however, is the book of Genesis from dating it in that year, that, on the contrary, we learn from it, that Jacob resided in that country a long time. (Compare Gen. xxxiii. 11. 18. xxxiv. 1. 30. and xxxv. 1. 28. 29.) The best chronologists compute that the patriarch's residence, both at Succoth and at Shechem, was about ten years; and there is not a single word in the book of Genesis that affords any ground of contradiction or difficulty against this computation. Dinah, therefore, was about sixteen, or between sixteen and seventeen, years of age; and her brothers Simeon and Levi, about twenty-two or twenty-three (instead of twelve, as the opposers of the Bible falsely assert), when the disastrous occurrence at Shechem obliged Jacob to quit that district or canton, and go to Bethel, whence he repaired to Mamre to his father Isaac. It is true, that Isaac's death, which is recorded at the close of Gen. xxxv. was subsequent to Joseph's departure into Egypt, though the latter is not related until the thirty-seventh chapter; but that patriarch's decease was noticed in this place by anticipation, in order that the history of Joseph might not be interrupted. This mode of narrating &c., it is well known, is pursued by all historians who do not wish to be mere annalists, and by no means affects the date of the account of Dinah, which took place previously to Isaac's death, as well as the sale of Joseph. The days of Isaac were a hundred and fourscore years; he was one hundred and seventy three years old when Dinah was violated, and one hundred and seventy four when Joseph was sold into Egypt.

9. The land of Rameses, in Gen. xlvii. 11. means, the land of Goshen, and not the capital of that district; it was probably so called in the time of Moses, from the city of Rameses, which the Israelites had built for Pharaoh. The Hebrew historian used an appellation well known to them. There is no improbability or contradiction whatever between Gen. xlvii. 11. and Exod. i. 11.

10. Gen. xlviii. 8. and 10. In the first of these verses it is said, that Israel beheld Joseph's sons; and in the other, that his eyes were dim, so that he could not see.

The meaning is, not that he could not see at all, but only that he could not plainly and distinctly see the objects which were before him. Therefore, though he beheld Ephraim and Manasseh, yet he could not distinguish them, until they were brought nigh to him. The declaration of Jacob to Joseph, in xlviii. 22. is not prophetic of the future, as a scoffing writer of the present day has asserted. From Gen. xxxiii. 19. we learn, that Jacob bought a piece of land from Hamor at Shechem; to which he doubtless alludes in Gen. xlviii. 22. I have given thee one portion above thy brethren, which I took out of the hand of the Amorite with my sword and with my bow. It should seem that this spot had afterwards fallen into the hands of an Amorite family or tribe, after the destruction of the Shechemites, and that Jacob had retaken it from them by force of arms, though this transaction is nowhere else mentioned.

11. Reuel in Exod. ii. 18. is the same as Raguel in Num. x. 29.

The Hebrew is the same in both places; consequently there is no contradiction. The reason of the seeming difference is, that the ר (or Ain) in רַגֵּל is sometimes used merely as a vowel, and sometimes as g, or ġn; and this is occasioned by the difficulty of the sound, which scarcely any European organs can enunciate. As pronounced by the Arabs, it strongly resembles the first effort made in the throat by gargling. Raguel is the worst method of pronouncing this word; Re-u-el, the first syllable being strongly accented, is nearer to the true sound. On a comparison of all the places where these relations of Moses are mentioned, it is evident that Re-u-el or Raguel was the father of Jethro, whose daughter Zipporah Moses married; and it is most probable that Hobab was the son of Jethro who accompanied the Israelites through the wilderness. (Compare Exod. iii. 1. iv. 18. and Num. x. 29.) No solid objection can be made against this explanation from Reuel being called "their father" (Exod. ii. 18.), as this appellation frequently denotes any remote ancestor. Aged men, uncles, and grandfathers are in the Scriptures sometimes called fathers. Thus in Gen. xxxi. 43. Laban calls his grand-children his children, and considers himself as their father, and in 2 Kings xiv. 3. David is called the father of Amaziah, though he was his remote ancestor.

12. Exod. iii. 2. And the angel of the Lord appeared unto him (Moses) in a flame of fire out of the midst of a bush.

is said to contradict

Exod. iii. 4. And when the Lord saw that he turned aside to see, God called unto him out of the midst of the bush.

In these two verses there is no contradiction whatever. On the subject of this and other divine appearances related in the Old Testament which both Jews and Christians believe, on the solid evidence of facts, though infidels, unable to refute them, disguise them with scoffing, the solid and incontestable solution is laid by Jesus Christ himself, who perfectly understood the whole affair of divine appearances, in John v. 37. And the Father himself which hath sent me hath borne witness of me. Ye have neither heard his voice at any time, nor seen his shape. (John i. 18.) No man hath seen God at any time. He is the invisible God, whom no man hath seen, nor can see. It is often said, that the Lord, the Most High God, appeared to the patriarchs, to Moses and to the prophets, the ancestors of the Jews; but, according to Jesus Christ's rule, the appearance, form, or shape which they saw, was not the appearance of the Lord God himself; for never, at any time, did they see his shape. Again, it is often said, that the Most High God spake to the patriarchs, to Moses, and to the prophets; but our Lord affirms, that they never heard his voice at any time. How shall we reconcile this seeming inconsistency? The true solution, according to the Scriptures, is this:—That the Lord God never spake or appeared in person, but always by a proxy, nuncios, or messenger, who represented him and spake in his name and authority. It was this messenger of Jehovah (or angel of Jehovah), who appeared unto Moses (Exod. iii. 2.), and who is called, in verse 4. Jehovah or Lord (whence it is evident that he was no created human being); and who spake to Moses, in verse 5. saying, Draw not nigh hither, &c. I am the God of Abraham (ver. 6.), and I AM THAT I AM. (ver. 14.) All which words were pronounced by an angel, but are true, not of the angel, but of God, whom he represented. So a herald reads a proclamation in the king's name and words, as if the king himself were speaking. The word ANGEL, both in the Greek language and in the Hebrew, signifies a messenger or nuncius, an ambassador; one who acts and speaks, not in his own name or behalf, but in the name, person, and behalf of him who sends him. Thus the word is frequently rendered in our authorized translation; and if it had always been rendered the messenger of the Lord, instead of the angel of the Lord, the case would have been very plain. But angel, being a Greek word, which the English reader does not understand, throws some obscurity upon such passages.

13. Exod. vii. 19—21. is apparently contradicted by Exod. vii. 22.

Both are reconciled by comparing verse 21. The Egyptians digged round about the river for water to drink; and it seems that the water thus obtained was not bloody like that in the river; on this water, therefore, the magicians might operate. Again, though Moses was commissioned to turn into blood, not only the waters of the river Nile, but also those of their streams, rivers, ponds, and pools; yet it seems evident from verse 20. that he did not proceed thus far, at least in the first instance, for it is there stated, that only the waters of the river were turned into blood. Afterwards, doubtless, the plague became general. At the commencement, therefore, of this plague, the magicians might obtain other water, to imitate the miracle; and it would not be difficult for them, by juggling tricks, to impart to it a bloody appearance, a fetid smell, and a bad taste. On either of these grounds there is no contradiction in the Mosaic account.

14. Exod. ix. 6. ALL THE CATTLE OF EGYPT DIED; but of the cattle of the children of Israel died not one.

is said to contradict

Exod. ix. 20. He that feareth the word of the Lord among the servants of Pharaoh made . . . HIS CATTLE flee into the houses.

Nothing can be more evident than that universal terms are used in all languages in a limited sense; so that the word ALL, in verse 6. means, that all the cattle that did die belonged to the Egyptians, and died in the field, while those in the houses escaped; or else that a great many of all sorts of cattle died; or, if we understand that all the cattle of the Egyptians perished, as asserted in ix. 6., what was there to hinder them from obtaining others from the Israelites, not one of whose cattle died in the land of Goshen? This justifies the supposition that there was some respite or interval between the several plagues.

15. It has been asserted, that Exod. xx. 11. and Deut. v. 15. (both which passages enjoin the observance of the Sabbath) are at variance; and hence it has been inferred that Moses could not be the author of the Pentateuch.

But the enforcement of the same precept by two different motives does not constitute two discordant precepts; and this is the case with the passage in question. In Exod. xx. 11. Moses urges the observance of the Sabbath, by a motive taken from the creation; and in the latter, by another derived from their exodus or departure from bondage in Egypt.

16. Exod. xxxiii. 11. The Lord spake unto Moses face to face.

John i. 18. I John, i. 12. No man hath seen God at any time.

The Almighty is said to have conversed with Moses, and Jacob to have seen him. (Gen. xxxii. 30.) But this only signifies that God revealed himself to them in a more particular manner than to others; for God is a Spirit whom no one hath seen or can see (1 Tim. vi. 16.), that is, as he is in heaven. And when Moses besought this favour of God, he refused him, saying, Thou canst not see my face, for there shall no man see me and live. (Exod. xxxiii. 20.) The apostle John, might, therefore, say, that no man hath seen God at any time. The ancient Christian writers (who certainly were more likely to understand the subject than we are) were generally agreed, that the person who appeared to Adam, Abraham, Moses, and the Prophets, was the Word of God, the Son of God, Jesus Christ.

17. In Lev. xvii. 1—7. the Israelites were prohibited from slaughtering any clean animal, which they were permitted to eat, in any other place except upon the altar at the door of the tabernacle, whither they were to bring it, and to immolate it. The reason assigned for this prohibition in verse 7. is, that they should no longer offer sacrifice unto idols. But in Deut. xii. 15. 20—

22. the Israelites, just before they entered Palestine, were permitted to slaughter oxen, sheep, or other clean animals at pleasure, in any part of the country, provided they did not regard them as sacrifices, and abstained from their blood, which the heathens, in their sacrifices, were accustomed to drink.

Between these two passages there is an apparent contradiction; but it may be readily accounted for, when we consider that the laws of Moses were necessarily regulated by the circumstances of the Israelites, and that they were not intended to be absolutely unalterable. The law in question might be observed in the wilderness, where the Israelites kept near together, and, from their poverty, ate but little animal food; but in Palestine, and when their circumstances were improved, it would have been an intolerable grievance, for many of them lived at the distance of several days' journey from the sanctuary, at which alone offerings could be made; and they must, consequently, either have altogether denied themselves the use of the flesh of oxen, sheep, and goats, or else have travelled long journeys to present them at the altar before they could taste it. But, in fact, Moses himself shows that Lev. xvii. 1—7. was a temporary law intended only for their situation in the wilderness, by the phrase "without or within the camp." And in the law last promulgated (Deut. xii. 15. 20—22.), in the fortieth year of their pilgrimage, just before their entrance into Palestine, he explicitly declares it repealed, as soon as they should abide there, permitting them to kill and eat the flesh of oxen, sheep, &c. any where, as already noticed. He tells them, that they might then eat them even as the hart and the roe, that is, with as full liberty, and likewise without the smallest idea of offering them; for the hart and the roe were not allowed to be brought to the altar.

18. The promulgation of the Levitical law is said (Lev. i. 1.) to have been made from the tabernacle, and in Lev. xxvii. 34. we read, These are the commandments which the Lord commanded Moses in Mount Sinai.

But there is no real contradiction here. The Hebrew preposition 2 (beth) signifies near as well as in; the meaning, therefore, is, that these were added to the foregoing commandments, before the Israelites removed from the wilderness of Mount Sinai, or while they were near Mount Sinai. And if the objector had distinguished the time and place when the Levitical law was given, from the time when the moral law was promulgated, he would not have asserted the existence of a contradiction. The latter was given on Mount Sinai, in the third month of the first year after the departure of the Israelites from Egypt. (Exod. xix. xx.) The tabernacle was raised on the first day of the first month of the second year after their departure; on which occasion Aaron and his sons were set apart to the sacerdotal office. (Exod. xl. 2. 17—32.) To the ceremonies attendant on this consecration, the chief part of Leviticus belongs; and from the manner in which this book begins, it is plainly a continuation of the preceding. Indeed, the whole is but one law, though divided from a very ancient period into five portions.

19. Num. iv. 3. From THIRTY years old and upwards even until fifty years old.

19. Num. viii. 24. From TWENTY and FIVE years old and upwards, they shall go, &c.

These texts may be reconciled in two ways, either by recollecting that the Levites were obliged to spend five years in learning the duties of their ministry, before they were admitted to officiate; or that in the time of Moses their consecration began at the twenty-fifth year of their age, but afterwards, during the time of David, at their twentieth year.

20. Num. xiv. 25. (Now the Amalekites dwelt in the VAL-LEY.)

is said to contradict

Num. xiv. 45. Then the Amalekites CAME DOWN, and the Canaanites which dwelt in that hill.

The twenty-fifth verse should be read without a parenthesis, and in the present tense dwelt. The meaning simply is, that they at present lie in wait for you, at the bottom on the other side of the mountain. God, having consented not to destroy the people, suddenly gave them notice of their danger from the neighbouring people, who were lying in wait to give them battle. The Israelites presumed (verse 44.) to go up into the hill-top; whence they were driven and discomfited by the Amalekites and Canaanites, who had posted themselves there. A detachment of the Amalekites, who were encamped on the opposite foot of the hill, might easily ascend to succour their Canaanitish allies.

21. Num. xxi. 2, 3. is said to be contradicted by the subsequent history of the conquest of Canaan.

But there is no reason why we should not understand the destruction of the Canaanites, and their cities as limited to those which they then took; for Joshua afterwards took the king of Arad. (Josh. xii. 14.) See also Judg. i. 16, 17.

22. In 1 Cor. x. 8. St. Paul tells us, that the number of persons who were cut off in the plague was twenty-three thousand; but in Num. xxv. 9. Moses makes them not less than twenty-four thousand, because in this number he includes the thousand who were found guilty of idolatry, and were in consequence slain with the sword; whereas the apostle speaks only of those who died of the pestilence.

23. From the law being mentioned in the book of Exodus as delivered on Mount Sinai, and from Mount Horeb being mentioned as the place where it was delivered, in the book of Deuteronomy, without any notice being taken of Mount Sinai, it has been insinuated, that neither of these books is worthy of credit, especially because some injudicious persons have represented them in maps as two distinct mountains.

It is, however, well known that Sinai and Horeb are two different peaks of one and the same range of mountains; and hence it is, that what is in one passage of Scripture related as having been done at Horeb, is in another place said to have been done at Sinai, or in the wilderness of Sinai.

24. Deut. i. 9—18, is said to contradict Exod. xviii. 13—23, and Moses is asserted to have conceived the idea of setting judges and rulers over the people.

A little attention to the two passages would have satisfied the objector that Moses did not conceive any such idea. In Exod. xviii. 13—23, Jethro, his father-in-law, having observed the great personal fatigue to which the Jewish legislator daily exposed himself, suggested to him the appointment of magistrates over thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens, men of integrity and piety, to hear and determine minor questions between the people, subject, however, to the approbation of God. In verses 24—27, we read generally that Moses hearkened to the voice of his father-in-law, followed his counsel, with the approbation of God, and appointed the necessary officers. In the first chapter of Deuteronomy, Moses is represented as alluding to this fact, but with this remarkable difference, that he not only says nothing of Jethro, but instead of representing himself as the person who selected those magistrates, he states that he had appealed to the people, and desired that they would elect them. "There is a great and striking difference between these statements, but there is no contradiction. Jethro suggested to Moses the appointment; he, probably after consulting God, as Jethro intimates, if God shall thus command thee, referred the matter to the people, and assigned the choice of the individuals to them; the persons thus selected he admitted to share his authority as subordinate judges. Thus the two statements are perfectly consistent. But this is not all: their difference is most natural. In first recording the event, it was natural Moses should dwell on the first cause which led to it, and pass by the appeal to the people as a subordinate and less material part of the transaction; but in addressing the people, it was natural to notice the part they themselves had in the selection of those judges, in order to conciliate their regard and obedience. How naturally also does the pious legislator, in his public address, dwell on every circumstance which could improve his hearers in piety and virtue. The multitude of the people was the cause of the appointment of these judges. How beautifully is this increase of the nation turned to an argument of gratitude to God! How affectionate are the blessings with which the pious speaker interrupts the narrative, imploring God, that the multitude of his people may increase a thousand fold! How admirably does he take occasion, from mentioning the judges, to inculcate the eternal principles of justice and piety, which should control their decisions! How remote is all this from art, forgery, and imposture! Surely here, if any where, we can trace the dictates of nature, truth, and piety."

25. Deut. x. 6, 7, is affirmed to contradict Num. xx. 23—29, and xxxiii. 30, 37, 38.

But Dr. Kennicott has shown that verses 6—9, of Deut. x. are an interpolation, and ought to be inserted after Deut. ii. 11. For reconciling this passage, where Aaron is said to have died at Moserah, with Num. xxxiii. 31, 32, where his death is said to have taken place on Mount Hor, it is sufficient to remark that the same place frequently had different names; just as (we have seen) Horeb and Sinai were two peaks of the same ridge, so Moserah might have been a peak of Mount Hor, and interchanged with it. In Deut. x., as it stands in our printed copies, there are several things omitted, which are preserved in the Samaritan copy, and remove the difficulty we otherwise find respecting the time and place of Aaron's death. The Samaritan copy may be thus translated: "Thence they journeyed, and pitched their camp in Gudgodah; thence they journeyed, and pitched in Jabbath, a land of springs and water. Thence they journeyed, and pitched in Abarnaah. Thence they journeyed, and pitched in Ezion-geber. Thence they journeyed, and pitched in the desert of Sin, which is Kadesh. Thence they journeyed, and pitched in Mount Hor, and there Aaron died," &c.

26. Deut. x. 22, is apparently contradicted by Acts vii. 14.

The family of Jacob are differently reckoned at their going into Egypt. In Deut. x. 22, Moses says, that they were threescore and ten, that is to say, all who came out of Jacob's loins (Gen. xvi. 26.) were threescore and six, besides himself, Joseph, and his two sons who were in Egypt before; which make threescore and ten. But in Acts vii. 14, Stephen adds to these one of his son's wives, and thus makes the number threescore and fifteen. The latter, though not of Jacob's blood, were of his kindred, as Stephen justly expresses it, being allied to him by marriage.

27. There is no "strange inconsistency" between Deut. xxxii. and Deut. xxxiii.

The former is a sublime ode, which contains a defence of God against the Israelites, and unfolds the method of the divine judgments. In the latter chapter Moses takes his leave of the people, by pronouncing a blessing upon them generally, and upon each tribe in particular.

28. In Joshua x. 23, and 37, the Israelitish general is charged with killing the same king of Hebron twice.

The historian relates no such thing. Hebron was a place of considerable note; and its inhabitants, finding that their king had fallen in battle, elected another in his place. The second king was he whom Joshua slew, after he had taken the city and its dependencies, as related in verse 37.

29. Josh. x. 15, is apparently contradicted by verse 43, of the same chapter.

In the former place he is said to have returned and all Israel with him to Gilgal; which he certainly did not do until the end of the expedition (verse 43.), where it is properly introduced. It is therefore either an interpolation, or must signify that Joshua intended to have returned, but changed his resolution, when he heard that the five kings had fled and hidden themselves in a cave at Makkedah. So Balak, king of Moab, is said (Josh. xxiv. 1.) to have warred against Israel, that is, he intended to war against them.

30. Josh. xi. 19. There was not a city that made peace with the children of Israel, save the Hivites, the inhabitants of Gibeon; all other they took in battle.

There is no contradiction here. Although Jerusalem was taken and its king vanquished by Joshua, together with the land surrounding it (Josh. x. 5, 23, 42), the fortress or stronghold of Zion continued in the hands of the Jebusites. And the Israelites not being able immediately to people all the cities they had taken, the Jebusites recovered possession of the city, whence the children of Judah expelled them after the death of Joshua. (Judg. i. 8.) But the fortress of Mount Zion remained in their hands until the reign of David.

31. Josh. xxi. 43, 44, we read, The Lord gave unto Israel all the land which he swore to give unto their fathers; and they possessed and dwelt therein. And the Lord gave them rest round about, according to all that he swore unto their fathers: and there stood not a man of all their enemies before them; the Lord delivered all their enemies into their hand. This is asserted to be a direct contradiction to the preceding parts of this book; but it is assertion without proof.

The whole country was now divided by lot unto them; and their enemies were so completely discomfited, that there was not a single army of the Canaanites remaining to make head against them; and those who were left in the land served under tribute; and the tribute so paid by them was the amplest proof of their complete subjugation. Add to this, that the Israelites had as much of the land in actual possession as they could occupy; and as they increased, God enabled them to drive out the ancient inhabitants, but in consequence of the infidelity of the Israelites, their enemies were often permitted to straiten them, and sometimes to prevail against them. It is also to be recollected, that God never promised to give them the land, or to maintain them, but upon condition of obedience; and so punctually did he fulfil this intention, that there is not a single instance upon record in which they were either straitened or subjugated, while they were obedient and faithful to their God. In this sense, therefore, it might most correctly and literally be said that there failed not ought of any good thing which the Lord had spoken unto the house of Israel: all came to pass.—Nor will one word of his ever fail, while sun and moon endure.

32. In Judg. i. 19, we read, The Lord was with Judah, and he drove out the inhabitants of the mountain; but could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley, because they had chariots of iron.

From this passage M. Voltaire and his copyists in this country have taken occasion to remark that it is difficult to conceive how the Lord of heaven and earth, who had so often changed the order and suspended the established laws of nature, in favour of his people, could not succeed against the inhabitants of a valley, because they had chariots of iron.

A little consideration, however, of the context of the passage will show that this mightily difficulty has as little foundation as all the rest which the ingenuity of the enemies of the Bible have imagined to exist. In the first place, then, it is to be observed, that when it is said he drove out the inhabitants of the mountain, but could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley; the antecedent is Judah, not Jehovah; because Jehovah had often displayed much more eminent instances of his power; and he that effected the greater, could certainly have effected the less. In the second place, though it pleased God to give success to Judah in one instance, it does not necessarily follow, that therefore he should give it in all. So that there is no more absurdity in the passage, than there would be in the following speech, if such had been addressed to the sovereign by one of his commanders returned from America:—"By the blessing of God upon your majesty's arms, we overcame General Greene in the field; but we could not attack General Washington, because he was too strongly entrenched in his camp." There is no reason, therefore, for supposing, that "the Jews considered the God of Israel their protector as a local divinity; who was, in some instances, more, and in others less powerful, than the gods of their enemies."

33. Judg. vi. 1, is said to contradict Num. xxxi. 10.

In the latter place, however, it is not said that all the Midianites were extirpated. Those who engaged the Israelites were discomfited, and their country was laid waste, that those who fled might have no encouragement to return thither. In the course of two hundred years, however, they might increase and become sufficiently formidable (as we read that they did in Judg. vi. 1.) to oppress the northern and eastern Israelites, especially when joined by the Amalekites and Ishmaelites, or children of the east, as their allies are termed in the third verse. This remark will serve also to remove the contradiction alleged to exist between 1 Sam. xv. 7, 8, where the Amalekites are said to have been discomfited by the Israelites under Saul, and 1 Sam. xxx. 1, 2, where they are said, twenty-three years afterwards, to have made a predatory incursion against Ziklag. The latter were, doubtless, a travelling predatory horde, similar to those who to this day live in the country where the Amalekites formerly dwelt, viz. Arabia.

34. The account of Saul's death, related in 1 Sam. xxxi. 1—6, (whence it is copied, with some trifling difference, in 1 Chron. x.) is said to be contradicted by the account of the Amalekite, narrated in 2 Sam. i. 10.

The historian relates the fact as stated by the Amalekite himself, whose story bears every mark of being a fiction, formed in order to ingratiate himself with David as the next probable successor to the crown. (Compare 2 Sam. iv. 10.) There are always men of this description about camps, whose object is plunder, and for which they will strip the dead.

35. 2 Kings xxiv. 13, and xxv. 8—12, are stated to be contradictory.

If the objector had attended to the difference of times, he would have found the Scriptures perfectly consistent. Nebuchadnezzar carried away the riches and furniture of the temple at three different times: first, in the third year of Jehoiachin (Dan. i. 2.); these were the vessels which his son Belshazzar profaned (Dan. v. 2.), and which Cyrus restored to the Jews (Ezra i. 7.), to be set up in the temple, when rebuilt: secondly, in

Dr. Graves's Lectures on the Four last Books of the Pentateuch, vol. i. p. 87.

Mr. Townsend has accordingly placed them so in his excellent Harmony of the Old Testament. See vol. i. p. 379.

Bishop Horne's Works, vol. vi. p. 493.

the reign of Jehoiachin he again took the city, and cut to pieces a great part of the vessels of gold which Solomon had made (2 Kings xxiv. 13.); and, thirdly, in the eleventh year of Zedekiah, as related in 2 Kings xxv. 13—17, he once more pillaged the temple.

36. Ezra ii. is apparently at variance with Nehemiah vii.

On the discrepancies occurring throughout these two chapters, the commentators must be consulted: it may suffice here to remark that the account contained in Ezra was taken in Chaldea before the Jews commenced their return; and that which is related in Nehemiah vii. after their arrival in Jerusalem. Some of them altering their minds and staying behind after they had given in their names to go, and others dying on the way, lessened part of the numbers in Nehemiah; as on the contrary, some of them coming to them afterwards, made the numbers mentioned in the latter appear the greater.

But the principal and most numerous contradictions are to be found in the Old Testament between some parts of the second book of Samuel and the books of Kings and Chronicles; and chiefly relate to numbers, dates, names, and genealogies. The means by which some of these repugnancies may be reconciled have already been indicated; in addition to which we may remark, that although the commentators generally present satisfactory solutions, yet many of the seeming differences may be easily reconciled on the principle that the books of Chronicles are supplementary to those of Kings; and hence they are termed in the Septuagint Παραπληρωματικά, or things omitted. Besides, the language was slightly changed, after the captivity, from what it had previously been. The various places had received new names, or undergone sundry vicissitudes; certain things were now better known to the returned Jews, under other appellations than those by which they had formerly been distinguished; and from the materials before him, which often were not the same as those used by the abridgers of the histories of the kings, the author of the books of Chronicles takes those passages which seemed best adapted to his purpose, and most suitable to the time in which he wrote. It must also be considered, that he often elucidates obsolete and ambiguous words, in former books, by a different mode of spelling them, or by a different order of the words employed even when he does not use a distinct phraseology of narration, which he sometimes adopts. The following are the most material passages of these books, which have been the subject of cavil to the modern advocates of infidelity.

37. In 1 Chron. xix. 7. the children of Ammon are said to have hired thirty-two thousand chariots, and the king of Maachah and his people; which appears an incredible number.

But the original word here rendered chariots does not always bear that meaning: it is a collective noun signifying cavalry or riders. The meaning, therefore, is, that they hired thirty-two thousand Syrian auxiliaries, who were usually mounted on chariots or horses, but who occasionally also served as foot soldiers, which is perfectly in unison with 2 Sam. x. 6., where the Syrian auxiliaries engaged by the Ammonites amount exactly to thirty-two thousand, besides a thousand men, whom they hired of the king of Maachah; and whom we may presume to be infantry.

38. 2 Sam. xxiv. 1. Again the anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel; and he moved David against them, to say, Go number Israel and Judah.

is said to } 1 Chron. xxi. 4. Satan stood up and provoked David to number Israel.
contradict }

It is not usual to mention the anger of God, without stating its cause: but as the first of these texts now stands, God is stated to be angry, and his anger leads him to move David to number the people. This numbering of the people, however, was not the cause, but the effect of his anger; the cause is stated in the second passage, which may be rendered—an adversary (perhaps one of David's wicked counsellors, for the Hebrew word שָׂטָן (satan) signifies an adversary) stood up against Israel, and moved David to number Israel. At the time referred to, David probably coveted an extension of empire; and having through the suggestions of an adversary given way to this evil disposition, he could not well look to God for help, and, therefore, wished to know whether the thousands of Israel and Judah might be deemed equal to the conquest which he meditated. His design was, to force all the Israelites to perform military service, and engage in the contest which his ambition had in view; and, as the people might resist this census, soldiers were employed to make it, who might not only put down resistance, but also suppress any disturbances that might arise. Concerning the difference of numbers in this census, see Sect. VII. Obs. 6. p. 421. infra.

39. In 2 Kings xvi. 9. it is said, that the king of Assyria hearkened unto Ahaz, but in 2 Chron. xxviii. 20. we read that he distressed him, but strengthened him not.

Both statements are true. He did help him against the king of Syria, took Damascus, and delivered Ahaz from the power of the Syrians. But this service was of little value; for the Assyrian monarch did not assist Ahaz against the Edomites or Philistines; and he distressed him by taking the royal treasures and the treasures of the temple, and rendered him but little service for so great a sacrifice.²

The preceding are the chief passages in the Old Testament, in which differences have been imagined to exist; but with how little propriety the reader will be enabled to judge from a careful examination of the various passages themselves. It remains only that we notice a few passages in the New Testament which have also been the subject of cavil.

40. Matthew xxvii. 9, 10. disagrees with Zechariah xi. 13.

Both may be reconciled by supposing the name of the prophet to have been originally omitted by the evangelist, and that the name of Jeremiah was inserted by some subsequent copyist. Jeremiah is omitted in two manuscripts of the twelfth century, in the Syriac, the later Persian, and modern Greek versions, and in some later copies. What renders it likely that the original reading was δὲ τοῦ προφήτου by the prophet, is, that Saint Matthew frequently omits the name of the prophet in his quotations. On this passage, see further p. 226. note 5. in this Volume.

41. Mark ii. 26. is at variance with 1 Sam. xxi. 1.

Abiathar was not high-priest at that time; but the expression may easily signify, in the days of Abiathar, who was afterwards high priest. Or, probably, both Ahimelech and Abiathar might officiate in the high-priesthood, and the name of the office be indifferently applied to either.

42. The different manner in which the four evangelists have mentioned the superscription which was written over Jesus Christ when on the cross was objected as a want of accuracy and truth by Dr. Middleton; and his objection has been copied by later writers.

But it is not improbable that it varied in each of the languages in which that accusation or superscription was written: for both Luke (xxiii. 39.) and John (xix. 20.) say that it was written in Greek, Latin, and Hebrew. We may then reasonably suppose Matthew to have recited the Hebrew:

THIS IS JESUS THE KING OF THE JEWS.

And John the Greek:

JESUS THE NAZARENE THE KING OF THE JEWS.

If it should be asked, Why the Nazarene was omitted in the Hebrew, and we must assign a reason for Pilate's humour; perhaps we may thus account for it. He might be informed, that Jesus in Hebrew denoted a Saviour,³ and as it carried more appearance of such an appellation or general term by standing alone, he might choose, by dropping the epithet the Nazarene, to leave the sense so ambiguous, that it might be so thus understood:

THIS IS A SAVIOUR THE KING OF THE JEWS.

Pilate, as little satisfied with the Jews as with himself on that day, meant the inscription, which was his own, as a dishonour to the nation; and thus set a momentous verity before them, with as much design of declaring it as Caiaphas had of prophesying, that Jesus should die for the people.⁴ The ambiguity not holding in Greek, the Nazarene might be there inserted in scorn again of the Jews, by denominating their king from a city which they held in the utmost contempt.⁵

Let us now view the Latin. It is not assuming much to suppose, that Pilate would not concern himself with Hebrew names, nor risk an impropriety in speaking or writing them. It was thought essential to the dignity of a Roman magistrate in the times of the republic not to speak but in Latin on public occasions.⁶ Of which spirit Tiberius the emperor retained so much, that in an oration to the senate he apologizes for using a Greek word; and once, when they were drawing up a decree, advised them to erase another that had been inserted in it.⁷ And though the magistrates in general were then become more condescending to the Greeks, they retained this point of state with regard to other nations, whose languages they esteemed barbarous, and would give themselves no trouble of acquiring. Pilate, indeed, according to Matthew, asked at our Lord's trial, Whom wilt ye that I release unto you, Barabbas, or Jesus which is called Christ? And again, What shall I do then with Jesus which is called Christ? But we judge this to be related, as the interpreter by whom he spake delivered it in Hebrew.⁸ For if the other evangelists have given his exact words, he never pronounced the name of Jesus, but spake of him all along by a periphrasis: Will ye that I release unto you The king of the Jews? What wilt ye then that I shall do unto him whom ye call The king of the Jews? Thus he acted in conference with the rulers, and then ordered a Latin inscription without mixture of foreign words, just as Mark repeats it:

THE KING OF THE JEWS:

Which is followed by Luke; only that he has brought down This is from above, as having a common reference to what stood under it:

THIS IS
THE KING OF THE JEWS.

Thus it is evident that there were variations in the inscription, and that the Latin was the shortest; but it is equally evident that these variations are not discrepancies or contradictions in the narratives of the evangelists.⁹

43. The alleged discrepancies in the genealogies recorded by Matthew (i.) and Luke (iii.) have already been considered in pp. 400, 401. supra. In addition to the observations there adduced, the following solution of the supposed contradiction, by Professor Hug (founded on the law of the levirate),¹⁰ is highly deserving of consideration, both from its novelty and its probability.

By that law one and the same son might have two different fathers, one real and the other legal. Most of the apparent contradictions in the genealogies of Matthew and Luke disappear, since Salathiel might be declared to be the son of Jechonias as well as Neri, and since Zerobabel might appear in one filiation as the father of Abiud and in the other as the father of Rhesa. Thus, since one genealogy makes Jacob to be the father of Joseph, and the other makes Heli to be his father, he might be the son of both, viz. of one by nature, and of the other by law. According to this solution, the design of the two evangelists, in giving the genealogy of Jesus Christ, would have been to prove to the Jews, that the man who called himself the Messiah was by his legal father Joseph inscribed as a descendant of David in the genealogical tables, to which that nation attached so much importance and authority. Indeed, in a country where a legal descent was the same as a real descent, and where an inscription in the genealogical tables was every thing, the Jews, to whom the apostles addressed themselves, were to be the sole judges, from the ancestors of Joseph, of the fulfilment of the prophecies relative to the family of the Messiah; and the descent of Mary was of no importance to them.¹

⁸ By the jus leviratus, or law of the levirate, when a man died without issue, his nearest male relative was obliged to raise up seed to him; accordingly, he married his widow, and the first-born son, of that marriage, was reputed to be the son of the deceased, to whose name and rights he succeeded.

² This seeming contradiction is illustrated by what happened in our own nation. The Britons invited the Saxons to help them against the Scots and Picts. The Saxons accordingly came and assisted them for a time, but at length they made themselves masters of the country.

The following additional remarks of the late Bishop Horne, on the subject of the Jewish Genealogies, are likewise highly deserving of attention.

In the first place, Genealogies in general, and those of the Jews in particular, with their method of deriving them, and the confusion often arising from the circumstance of the same person being called by different names, or different persons by the same name, are in their nature, and must be to us, at this distance of time, matters of very complicated consideration, and it is no wonder they should be attended with difficulties and perplexities. Secondly, The evangelists, in an affair of so much importance, and so open then to detection, had there been any thing wrong to be detected, would most assuredly be careful to give Christ's pedigree as it was found in the authentic tables, which, according to the custom of the nation, were preserved in the family, as is evident from Josephus, who says, "I give you this succession of our family, as I find it written in the public tables." Thirdly, As it was well known the Messiah must descend from David, the genealogical tables of that family would be kept with more than ordinary diligence and precision. Fourthly, Whatever cavils the modern Jews and others now make against the genealogies recorded by the evangelists, the Jews their contemporaries never offered to find fault with, or to invalidate, the accounts given in the Gospels. As they wanted neither opportunity, materials, skill, nor malice to have done it, and it would have offered them so great an advantage against the Christians, this circumstance alone, as Dr. South well remarks, were we not now able to clear the point, ought with every sober and judicious person to have the force of a moral demonstration.²

44. Matt. xxvii. 5. apparently disagrees with Acts i. 18.

Matthew simply says, that Judas went and hanged himself; and this he thought sufficient to say of the traitor, without adding the other circumstances of his death. Luke parenthetically states those circumstances only which followed after he had hanged himself; viz. that, falling headlong, he burst asunder in the midst, and all his bowels gushed out. He hanged himself; and whether the cord or rope with which he committed suicide broke, or that to which it was fastened gave way, he fell with his face to the ground, and the violence of the fall ruptured the abdomen, so that his intestines were dashed upon the ground.³

45. Heb. ix. 4. is apparently contradictory to 1 Kings viii. 9.

From the text of the former book, it appears that the ark contained several things therein specified; whereas, we learn from the latter, that it contained only the two tables of stone. The word Ev, in which (wherein in the authorized translation), therefore, refer to the tabernacle, and not to the ark; and thus the difference is removed.

Lastly, Some of the differences between the Old and New Testaments arise from numbers and dates, and may be explained on the principles already laid down in pp. 403, 404. supra; and others arise from the variances occurring in the quotations from the Old in the New Testament. But as these require a distinct consideration, the reader will find them fully discussed in pp. 293—318. of this volume.

SECTION VII.

SEEMING INCONSISTENCIES BETWEEN SACRED AND PROFANE WRITERS.

It is not to be denied that the sacred Scriptures contain facts which appear to be contradictory to the relations of the same facts by profane historians. But the objections which some would derive from these seeming inconsistencies lose all their force, when the uncertainty and want of credibility in heathen historians are considered, as well as their want of authentic records of the times.⁴ It may further be added, that the silence of the latter, concerning facts related by the inspired writers, cannot be regarded as contradicting them; because many of these facts are either too ancient to come within the limits of profane histories, or are of such a description that they could not take notice of them.⁵ The silence or omission even of many historians ought not to overturn the testimony of any one author, who positively relates a matter of fact: if, therefore, a fact related in the Scripture be contradicted by an historian who lived many centuries after the time when it took place, such contradiction ought to have no weight.

1. Justin, the abbreviator of Troguus Pompeius, who wrote at least eighteen hundred years after the time of Moses, relates that the Israelites were expelled from Egypt, because they had communicated the itch and leprosy to the Egyptians, who were apprehensive lest the contagion should spread; and that the Israelites, having clandestinely carried away the sacred mysteries of the Egyptians, were pursued by the latter; who were compelled to return home by tempests.⁶

It is scarcely necessary to remark, how contrary this statement of the Roman historian is to that of the Jewish legislator; and when Justin's credulity and want of information are properly weighed, the contradiction falls entirely to the ground. The same remark is applicable to the accounts of the Jewish nation given by the prejudiced historian Tacitus; which evidently betray the injurious representations of their avowed enemies. Bp. Gray, who has given these accounts (for which we have not room), has observed that many of them had been distinctly refuted in the time of Tacitus by Josephus and other historians. They contain in themselves sufficient to show how full of errors they are; and while they exhibit much truth blended with falsehood, they tend to establish the former, without conferring any shadow of probability on the latter.⁷

2. It has been thought impossible to raise so vast an empire as that of Assyria is described to have been by Herodotus and Ctesias (whose accounts contradict the relation of Moses), so early as within one hundred and fifty years after Noah.

But their accounts are, probably, exaggerated, and in many instances fictitious; and, according to the chronology of the LXX. as well as of the Samaritan Pentateuch, the origin of the Assyrian empire is carried to a much greater distance from the flood.⁸

3. Joseph's division of the land of Egypt, which is recorded by Moses (Gen. xlvii.) has been represented as contradictory to the account of that country by Diodorus Siculus.

But on comparing the two narratives together it will be found that the latter fully supports the sacred historian. Diodorus expressly affirms that the lands were divided between the king, the priests, and the soldiery; and Moses expressly says, that they were divided between the king, the priests, and the people. "Moses tells us that before the famine, all the lands of Egypt were in the hands of the king, the priests, and the people; but that this national calamity made a great revolution in property, and brought the whole possessions of the people into the king's hands; which must needs make a prodigious accession of power to the crown. But Joseph, in whom the office of high-priest and patriot supported each other, and jointly concurred to the public service, prevented for some time the ill effects of this accession by his farming out the new domain to the old proprietors on very easy conditions. We may well suppose this wise disposition to have continued, till that new king arose that knew not Joseph (Exod. i. 8.); that is, would obliterate his memory, as averse to his system of policy. Hc, as it appears from Scripture, greatly affected a despotic government; to support which he first established a standing militia, and endowed it with the lands formerly belonging to the people, who now became a kind of villains to this order, and were obliged to personal service; and the priesthood being the orders of nobility in this powerful empire: and so considerable were they, that out of them, indifferently, their kings were taken and elected. Thus the property of Egypt became divided in the manner the Sicilian relates; and it is remarkable that from this time, and not till now, we hear in Scripture of a standing militia, and of the king's six hundred chosen chariots," &c.¹⁰

4. The destruction of Sennacherib's army, which is ascribed to divine agency by the sacred historian (2 Kings xix. 35. 2 Chron. xxxii. 21. and Isaiah xxxvii. 36.) was probably the blast or hot plentiful south wind called the Simoom, so well described by Mr. Bruce.¹¹

The destruction of the same army before Pelusium, in the reign of Sethos king of Egypt, is attributed by Herodotus to an immense number of mice, that infested the Assyrian camp by night, so that their quivers and bows, together with what secured their shields to their arms, were gnawed in pieces. It is particularly to be remarked that Herodotus calls the Assyrian king Sennacherib, as the Scriptures do; and that the time referred to in both is perfectly accordant. Hence it appears that it is the same fact to which Herodotus alludes, although much disguised in the relation; and thus the seeming contradiction between the sacred and profane historians is easily removed. The difference between them may be readily explained, when it is considered that Herodotus derived his information from the Egyptian priests, who cherished the greatest aversion from the nation and religion of the Jews, and, therefore, would relate nothing in such a manner as would give reputation to either.¹²

5. There are many, apparently considerable, contradictions of the Scriptures in the writings of Josephus.

But these, as well as his omissions, may be accounted for by his peculiar situation. His country was now in great distress; its constitution was overturned, and his countrymen in danger of extirpation, from the circumstance of their being confounded with the Christians, who were reputed to be a sect of the Jews, and at that time were suffering persecution. Josephus's deviations from Scripture, therefore, were made in order to accommodate his work to the taste of the Greeks and Romans.³

6. In consequence of this Jewish historian having omitted to notice the massacre of the infants at Bethlehem, which is related in Matt. ii. 16., the evangelical narrative has been pronounced a "fabrication," and "a tale that carries its own refutation with it."

This assertion was first made, we believe, by Voltaire, whose disregard of truth, especially in matters connected with the sacred history, is sufficiently notorious. But the evidence for the reality of the fact, and, consequently, for the veracity of Matthew, is too strong to be subverted by any cold and unsupported assertions. For,

In the first place, The whole character which Josephus ascribes to Herod is the most evident confirmation of the barbarous deed mentioned by the evangelist.

Secondly, The Gospel of Matthew was published about the year of our Lord 38, at which time there doubtless were persons living who could, and (from the hostility then manifested against the Christian faith) who would, have contradicted his assertion if it had been false or erroneous; their silence is a tacit proof that the evangelist has stated the fact correctly.—But,

Thirdly, The reality of the fact itself (though mentioned in his usual scoffing manner) was not denied by the philosopher Celsus, one of the bitterest enemies of Christianity, who lived towards the close of the second century; and who would most unquestionably have denied it if he could.⁴

Fourthly, Matthew's narrative is confirmed by Macrobius, a heathen author, who lived about the end of the fourth century, and who mentions this massacre in the following terms:—"Augustus," says he, "having been informed that Herod had ordered a son of his own to be killed, among the male infants about two years old, whom he had put to death in Syria," said, "it is better to be Herod's son than his son." Now, although Macrobius is far too modern to be produced as a valid evidence in this matter, unsupported by other circumstances, and although his story is magnified by an erroneous circumstance; yet the passage, cited from him, serves to prove how universally notorious was the murder of the children in Bethlehem, which was perpetrated by the orders of Herod.

Fifthly, With regard to the silence of Josephus, we may further remark, that no historian, not even an annalist, can be expected to record every event that occurs within the period of which he writes: besides, his silence may be satisfactorily accounted for. Josephus was a firm Jew, and there was, therefore, a particular reason for his passing over this event; because he could not mention it, without giving the Christian cause a very great advantage. To write, that Herod, at the latter end of his reign, had put to death all the infants at Bethlehem, under two years of age, on occasion of a report that the king of the Jews had been lately born there, would have greatly gratified the Christians, whom Josephus hated; since it was well known that, about thirty years after the slaughter, and the latter end of Herod's reign, Jesus (who was said to be born at Bethlehem), being about thirty years of age, styled himself King of the Jews, and did many things, to say no more in proof of it." It seems utterly impossible that Josephus could have been ignorant of this event: his silence was more likely to have been, in this as in other instances, wilful and interested.⁵

Sixthly, Contemporary historians do not relate the same facts: Suetonius tells us many things which Tacitus has omitted; and Dion Cassius supplies the deficiencies of both.

Seventhly, It is unreasonable to make the silence of the Jewish historian an objection to the credibility of the sacred writer, while there is equal and even superior reason to confide in the fidelity of the latter.

Eighthly, Herod would naturally be disposed to take such precautions as he might think necessary without being scrupulous concerning the means.

Ninthly, Voltaire, either from ignorance or dishonesty, asserts that fourteen thousand children must have lost their lives in this massacre. If this were true, the silence of Josephus would indeed be a very important objection to the veracity of Matthew's narrative; and with this view Voltaire makes the assertion, who every where shows himself an inveterate enemy of revealed and not seldom of natural religion also. But as the children, whom Herod caused to be put to death (probably by assassins whom he kept in his pay), were only males of two years old and under, it is obvious, according to this statement, that more children must have been born annually in the village of Bethlehem, than there are either in Paris or London. Further, as Bethlehem was a very small place, scarcely two thousand persons existed in it and in its dependent district; consequently, in the massacre, not more than fifty at most could be slain. In the description of the life of such a tyrant as Herod was, this was so trifling an act of cruelty, that it was but of small consequence in the history of his sanguinary government.

³ Otthus has compiled a curious treatise, entitled Prætermissa à Josepho: it is a collection of sixty-eight articles, of which, in all probability, the Jewish historian could not be ignorant; but which he chose to omit for the reason above assigned. This treatise is appended to Otthus's very valuable Spicilegium sive Excerpta ex Flavio Josepho, pp. 527–612.

⁵ See the passages in Lardner's Works, vol. viii. p. 21. 8vo. or vol. iv. p. 122. 4to.

⁶ Macrobi. Saturn. lib. ii. c. 4. The emperor, according to this writer, seems to have played upon the Greek words ὁ υἱος a hog, and ὁ υἱος a son: the point of the saying perhaps consists in this, that Herod, professing Judaism, was by his religion prohibited from killing swine, or having any thing to do with their flesh; and, therefore, that his hog would have been safe where his son lost his life. Macrobius, with singular propriety, states this massacre to have been perpetrated in Syria, because Judæa was at that time part of the province of Syria. Gilpin and Dr. A. Clarke on Matt. ii. 16. The massacre of the infants is likewise noticed in a rabbinical work called Toldoth Jeshu, in the following passage: "And the king gave orders for putting to death every infant to be found in Bethlehem; and the king's messengers killed every infant according to the royal order." Dr. D. Sharpe's First Defence of Christianity, &c. p. 40.

⁷ Townsend's Harmony of the New Testament, vol. i. pp. 77, 78.

Lastly, As the male infants that were to be slain could easily be ascertained from the public tables of birth or genealogies, that circumstance will account for the reputed parents of our Saviour fleeing into Egypt rather than into any city of Judæa.⁸

Any of these arguments would be sufficient to vindicate the evangelist's narrative; but, altogether, they form a cloud of witnesses, abundantly sufficient to overbalance the negative evidence attempted to be drawn from the silence of Josephus.

7. Luke ii. 2. is said to be contrary to historical fact, Saturninus and Volumnius being at that time the Roman presidents of Syria, and Cyrenius not being governor of that province until eleven years after the birth of Christ.

A slight attention to the situation of Judæa at that time, and a more correct rendering of the passage than is to be found in our English version, will easily reconcile the seeming difference between the sacred historian and Josephus.

Towards the close of his reign, Herod the Great (who held his kingdom by a grant from Mark Antony with the consent of the senate, which had been confirmed by Augustus), having incurred the emperor's displeasure, to whom his conduct had been misrepresented, Augustus issued a decree reducing Judæa to a Roman province, and commanding an enrolment, or register, to be made of every person's estate, dignity, age, employment, and office. The making of this enrolment was confided to Cyrenius or Quirinius, a Roman senator, who was collector of the imperial revenue; but Herod having sent his trusty minister, Nicholas of Damascus, to Rome, the latter found means to undeceive the emperor, and soften his anger, in consequence of which the actual operation of the decree was suspended. Eleven years afterwards, however, it was carried into effect, on the deposition and banishment of Archelaus (Herod's son and successor), for maladministration, by Augustus, upon the complaint of the Jews; who, weary of the tyranny of the Herodian family, requested that Judæa might be made a Roman province. Cyrenius was now sent as president of Syria, with an armed force, to confiscate the property of Archelaus, and to complete the census, to which the Jewish people submitted. It was this establishment of the assessment or taxing under Cyrenius which was necessary to complete the Roman census, to which the evangelist alludes in the parenthetical remark occurring in Luke ii. 2, which may be more correctly written and translated thus:—"It came to pass in those days," that is, a few days before our Saviour's birth, "that there went out a decree from Cæsar Augustus, that all the land" [of Judæa, Galilee, Idumæa, &c. under Herod's dominion] "should be enrolled" preparatory to a census or taxing ("The taxing itself was first made when Cyrenius was governor of Syria.") And all went to be enrolled, every one to his own city. (Luke ii. 1–3.)

By the preceding construction, supported by the emendation in the note, the evangelist is critically reconciled with the varying accounts of Josephus, Justin Martyr, and Tertullian, and an historical difficulty is solved, which has hitherto been considered as irreconcilable.⁹

Two other solutions have been offered, which deserve to be noticed on account of their ingenuity.

(1.) The first is that of Mr. Charles Thompson, Secretary to the Congress of the United States, the learned translator of the Old and New Testaments from the Greek. He renders Luke ii. 1, 2. in the following manner:—"Now it happened in those days that an edict came forth from Cæsar Augustus that this whole inhabited land should be enrolled. This was the first enrolment; it was made when Cyrenius was governor of Syria." In a note on the passage in question, he observes, "There were two enrolments, ⁹ Απογραφὴ τῆς οἰκουμένης, Luke ii. 1. That ΟΙΚΟΥΜΗΝΗΝ signifies the land of Judæa, and not the whole Roman empire, see Vol. II. p. 13.

¹¹ Dr. Campbell (Translation of the Four Gospels, vol. ii. pp. 140.422–425.) renders Luke ii. 2. in the following manner:—"This first register took effect when Cyrenius was president of Syria." But, as we have seen in the preceding note that αὐτός is here used adverbially, this version will not hold good. In confirmation of his rendering ἐποίησεν 'took effect' (which is adopted by Dr. Hales), Campbell refers to Matt. v. 18. vi. 10. xlvii. 19. xxii. 42. and I Cor. xv. 54. Dr. Lardner has proposed another solution of the above difference (Credibility, part i. book ii. ch. i. Works, vol. i. pp. 248–329. 8vo. or pp. 136–179. 4to.), which deserves to be noticed, because it has been adopted by Archdeacon Paley. (Evidences, vol. ii. pp. 177, 178.) It is as follows:—"This was the first enrolment of Cyrenius governor of Syria, that is, who was afterwards governor of Syria, and best known among the Jews by that title;" which title, belonging to him at the time of writing the account, was naturally subjoined to his name, although acquired after the transaction which the account describes. A similar solution is given by Alber. Hermeneut. Nov. Test. tom. ii. pp. 309, 310., and in Priti Introd. in Nov. Test. p. 437.

the first merely for the purpose of numbering the inhabitants, and the second for assessing them. The first here spoken of was in the reign of Herod the Great, when Cyrenius was deputy-governor of Syria. It was done according to communities and families; and all were obliged to repair to their respective cities or towns to be enrolled in their several families, according to their genealogies. The second, which was after the death of Herod, was for the sake of assessment, and was made indiscriminately. This was the enrolment which offended the Jews, and excited tumults and insurrections, and brought on the war which terminated in the destruction of Jerusalem, and the utter dispersion of the Jews.¹ From the rendering, thus supported, the praise of learning and ingenuity must not be withheld. Mr. Thompson evidently considers the word enrolment, as the third person singular of enroll, the imperfect tense in the indicative mode of the verb enroll, I am. It is well known that profane writers use enroll indifferently as the third person singular; and if we could find a single parallel construction in the New Testament, we should unquestionably give the preference to Mr. T.'s rendering.

(2.) The other solution is that offered by the learned editor of Calmet's Dictionary; who conjectures, that for the purposes of enrolment, Cyrenius, though not probably governor of Syria at the time of Christ's birth, might be associated with Saturninus; or, though now sent into Syria as an extraordinary officer, yet being afterwards governor of Syria, he might be called governor of Syria, as we call an officer during his life by the title he has borne, even after he has given up his commission. On a medal of Antioch appear the names of Saturninus and Volunnius, who were the emperor's chief officers in Syria. It would seem, therefore, that Volunnius was the colleague of Saturninus in the government of Syria, and procurator of the province; and that while Saturninus kept his court at Antioch, where he remained stationary, his associate Volunnius was engaged in other districts of the province as circumstances required. What we suppose of Volunnius we may also suppose of Cyrenius, who, after him, held the same office. Thus, the medal vindicates Josephus, who described Saturninus and Volunnius as governors of Syria; and it may justify both Saint Luke and Tertullian, of whom the former affirmed that Cyrenius, and the latter that Saturninus, executed the enrolment. It may also justify the evangelist, whose words the editor of Calmet thinks may be thus understood:—"This was the first enrolment of Cyrenius, he being then governor of Syria, associated with Saturninus; and it should be distinguished from that which he made eleven years after, when he was the chief, the presidential governor of the same province."²

The reader will adopt which of the preceding solutions he may prefer: either of them affords a sufficient explanation of the seeming contradiction between the evangelist and Josephus, though, upon the whole, we think the rendering of Dr. Hales presents the most satisfactory elucidation.

8. In Luke iii. 19. Herod the tetrarch is said to have been reproved by John the Baptist for Herodias, his brother Philip's wife, whom he had forcibly taken away from her husband, and married.

Now this is irreconcilable with profane history, which asserts his brother's name to have been Herod. Hence it is probable that the name of Philip has crept into the text through the copyist's negligence, and ought to be omitted: Griesbach has omitted it in his text, but has inserted the word φίλιππου in the margin, with the mark of doubtful genuineness.

9. Acts v. 36. For before these days rose up Theudas, &c. Josephus's account of Theudas (Antiq. l. xx. c. 5. § 1.) referred to a transaction that occurred seven years after Gamaliel's speech, of which this text is a part.

The contradiction is removed by the probability that there might be two impostors of the same name; for there were four persons of the name of Simon within forty years, and three of Judas within ten years, all of whom were leaders of insurrections.³

SECTION VIII.

ALLEGED CONTRADICTIONS TO PHILOSOPHY AND THE NATURE OF THINGS.

THE Scriptures often refer to matters of fact, which are asserted (though without any proof whatever) to be contradictory to philosophy and to the nature of things. A little consideration, however, will reconcile these alleged repugnances; for it has been well observed by different writers, who have treated on this subject, that the Scriptures were not written with the design of teaching us natural philosophy, but to make known the revealed will of God to man, and to teach us our duties and obligations to our great Creator and Redeemer. Therefore the sacred penman might make use of popular expressions and forms of speech, neither affirming nor denying their philosophical truth. All proverbial sayings and metaphorical expressions introduced by way of illustration or ornament must be taken from received notions; but they are not, therefore, asserted in the philosophical sense by him who uses them, any more than the historical truth of parables and similitudes is supposed to be asserted. Further, to have employed philosophical terms and notions only, and to have rectified the vulgar conceptions of men concerning all the phenomena incidentally mentioned in the Scriptures, would have required a large system of philosophy, which would have rendered the Scriptures a book unfit for ordinary capacities; and the greater part of those for whom it is designed. If, indeed, revelation had introduced any the best founded system of modern physics, or if the Almighty Creator had been pleased to disclose the councils themselves of his infinite wisdom, what would have been the consequence? Philosophy would immediately have become matter of faith, and disbelief of any part of it a dangerous heresy. How many infidels would this or that man's fanciful hypothesis concerning the appearances of things have called forth! Besides, if the Scriptures had been made the vehicle for a refined system of natural philosophy, such a theory of nature would have seemed as strange and incredible to most men as miracles do; for there is scarcely any thing which more surprises men, unacquainted with philosophy, than philosophical discoveries. How incredible do the motion of the earth and the rest of the sun appear to all but philosophers, who are now fully convinced of the reality of these phenomena, while the rising and setting of the sun are terms as much in use with those who hold the doctrine of the earth's motion as with others! In fact, if we would be understood, we must continue to make use of this expression; but excepting this one instance, which is and ever will be in use, according to the vulgar conceptions of all nations and languages (notwithstanding any philosophical discoveries to the contrary), there is nothing in the Scriptures that is not strictly consistent with the present notions of philosophy. The discoveries both in chemistry and in physics, as well as in natural history, which have been made in later times, concur in many instances to confirm and elucidate the Sacred Writings. A few examples will illustrate the preceding observations.

1. No fact recorded in the Sacred Writings has been a more favourite subject of cavil with modern objectors, than the account of the creation, related in the first two chapters of the book of Genesis. Founding their cavils upon translations, instead of consulting the original Hebrew (which their ignorance completely disqualified them from doing), they have pretended that the Mosaic narrative is alike inconsistent with reason and with true philosophy. If, however, these writers had impartially considered the modern discoveries in philosophy, they would have found nothing to contradict, but on the contrary much—very much—to confirm the relation of Moses.

"The structure of the earth," says one of the most profound geologists and practical philosophers of the present day,⁴ and "the mode of distribution of extraneous fossils or petrifications, are so many direct evidences of the truth of the Scripture account of the formation of the earth; and they might be used as proofs of its author having been inspired; because the mineralogical facts discovered by modern naturalists were unknown to the sacred historian. Even the periods of time, the six days of the Mosaic description, are not inconsistent with our theories of the earth." Nor are the phenomena of the heavenly bodies at all contradictory to the Mosaic history. Modern opposers of revelation have objected that the historian talks of light before there was any such thing as the sun, and calls the moon a great light, when every one knows it to be an opaque body. But Moses seems to have known what philosophy did not till very lately discover, that the sun is not the original source of light, and, therefore, he does not call either the sun or the moon a great light, though he represents them both as great luminaries or light-bearers. Had these objectors looked into a Hebrew, Greek, or Latin Bible, they would have found that the word, which in Gen. i. 3, our translators have properly rendered light, is different from that which in the fourteenth verse they have improperly rendered light also. In the third verse the original word is אור (aur); the Greek, φως; and the Vulgate Latin, lux; in the fourteenth verse the corresponding words are מארה (mar), φωσφορις, and luminaria. Each of the former set of words means that subtle, elastic matter, to which in English we give the name of light; each of the latter, the instruments, or means, by which light is transmitted to men. But surely the moon is as much an instrument of this kind, as the reflector placed behind the lamp of a light-house, for the purpose of transmitting to the mariner at sea the light of that lamp, which would otherwise have passed in an opposite direction to the land. Though the moon is not a light in itself, yet it is that planet a light in its effects, as it reflects the light of the sun to us. And both the sun and moon are with great propriety called great,—not as being absolutely greater than all other stars and planets, but because they appear greater to us, and are of greater use and consequence to this world. And now, after all our improvements in philosophy and astronomy, we still speak of the light of the moon, as well as of the sun's motion, rising and setting. And the man, who in a moral, theological, or historical discourse, should use a different language, would only render himself ridiculous.

In like manner, had these objectors referred to the original Hebrew of Gen. i. 6, 7, 8. (which in our English authorized version, as well as in other modern versions, is erroneously rendered firmament, after the Septuagint and Vulgate Latin version), they would have rendered it expanse; and they might have known, that it meant the air or atmosphere around us, in which birds fly and clouds are formed, and that it had no reference whatever to a solid firmament; though such an idea was entertained by the ancient Greek philosophers, who, with all their boasted wisdom, were nearly as ignorant of the works as they were of the nature of God. And does not this circumstance aid divide the waters from the waters, the waters of the sea from the waters which float above us in clouds and vapours? For there is a multitude of waters in the heavens, and life causeth the vapours to ascend from the ends of the earth. (Jer. x. 13.)

Once more Moses represents the earth at first in a state of fluidity. The spirit of God, says he, moved upon the face (or surface) of the waters. (Gen. i. 2.) The apostle Peter also speaks of the earth as being formed out of a fluid. The earth standing out of the water (more correctly, consisting of water ἡ γῆ ὡς ὕδωρ) and in the mud of the water. The same tradition reached also some of the ancient heathen philosophers; and Thales, in particular, one of the seven wise men and the wisest of them all, as Cicero informs us, said that all things were made out of water. Others after him taught the same doctrine; and is it in the least degree contradicted or disproved by modern discoveries? On the contrary, is it not more and more confirmed and illustrated by them? It is well known that if a soft or elastic globular body be rapidly whirled round on its axis, the parts of the poles will be flattened, and the parts on the equator, midway between the north and south poles, will be raised up. This is precisely the shape of our earth; it has the figure of an oblate spheroid, a figure bearing a close resemblance to that of an orange. Now, if the earth was ever in a state of fluidity, its revolution round its axis must necessarily induce such a figure, because the greatest centrifugal force must necessarily be near the equatorial parts, and consequently, there the fluid must rise and swell most. It has been demonstrated by experiment, that the earth is flattened at the poles and raised at the equator; and thus do the Scriptures and philosophy agree together and confirm each other. The Scriptures assert that the earth was in a state of fluidity; and philosophy evinces that it must have been in such a state by its very figure.

The account of the creation of man (Gen. i. 26, 27.) has been ridiculed by all opposers of revelation; but can they furnish us with one more likely to be the true one? Reason will tell us no better than history or tradition does, how man came into the world. This, therefore, is a subject of divine revelation, and until the objectors to revelation can give us a better account, we may safely affirm that the Mosaic history is perfectly consistent with every idea which right reason teaches us to entertain of the creation of man.

Lastly, objectors to the Scriptures have laid great stress upon the expression in Gen. ii. 3. God rested the seventh day from all his work, as if they were alone sufficient to destroy the authority of the Mosaic writings. But no one, who impartially considers the noble account there given of the creation, that God is represented as having only spoken and it was done, can reasonably imagine, that the Almighty was tired with labour, as if he had moulded every thing with his hands, and that on the seventh day he lay or sat down for rest. Hast thou not known, says the Hebrew prophet Isaiah, hast thou not heard, that the everlasting God, the Creator of the ends of the earth, fainteth not, neither is weary? (Isa. xl. 24.)

The objections drawn by infidel writers from the Mosaic narrative of the deluge have already been noticed in pp. 72, 75, 76, supra.

2. The declaration of Moses in Deut. i. 10. that God had multiplied the Israelites as the stars of heaven for multitude, has been ridiculed because to the apprehension of the objector "the number of the stars is infinite."

Let us, however, consider this subject. How many in number are the stars which appear to the naked eye? For it is that which appears to the naked eye, which is to govern us in replying to this objection; for God brought Abraham forth abroad,—that is, out of doors, and bade him look towards heaven (Gen. xv. 5), not with a telescope, but with his naked eyes. Now, let the objector go forth into the open air, and look up in the brightest and most favourable night, and count the stars. Not more than 3010 stars can be seen by the naked eye in both the northern and southern hemispheres; but at the time alluded to, the Israelites, independently of women and children, were more than six hundred thousand. Suppose, however, we even allow from the late discoveries made by Sir Wm. Herschel and others with telescopes, which have magnified between thirty-five and thirty-six thousand times, that there may be seventy-five millions of stars visible by the aid of such instruments, which is the highest calculation ever made; yet still the divine word stands literally true. Matthew says (i. 17.) that the generations from Abraham to Christ were forty-two. Now we find at the second census, that the fighting men among the Hebrews amounted to 600,000; and the Israelites, who have never ceased to be a distinct people, have so multiplied that, if the aggregate number of them who have ever lived, could be ascertained, it would be found far to exceed the number of all the fixed stars taken together.*

3. The speaking of Balaam's ass (Num. xxii. 28.) has been a standing jest to infidels in almost every age.

If the ass had opened her own mouth, and reproved the rash prophet, we might well be astonished. Maimonides and others have imagined that the matter was transacted in a vision. But it is evident, from the whole tenor of the narration, as well as from the declaration of an inspired writer (2 Pet. ii. 14–16.), that it is to be understood as a literal narrative of a real transaction. The ass, it has been observed, was enabled to utter such and such sounds, probably as parrots do, without understanding them; and, whatever, may be said of the construction of the ass's mouth, and of the tongue and jaws being so formed as to be unfit for speaking, yet an adequate cause is assigned for this wonderful effect; for it is expressly said, that the Lord opened the mouth of the ass. The miracle was by no means needless or superfluous; it was very proper to convince Balaam, that the mouth and tongue were under God's direction, and that the same divine power, which caused the dumb ass to speak contrary to its nature, could make him in like manner utter blessings contrary to his inclination. The fact is as consonant to reason as any other extraordinary operation; for all miracles are alike, and equally demand our assent, if properly attested. The giving of articulation to a brute is no more to the Deity than the making of the blind to see, or the deaf to hear. And the reputed baseness of the instrument, of which God was pleased to make use, amounts merely to this, that (as the apostle observes on another occasion) God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise. (1 Cor. i. 27.) There was, therefore, a fitness in the instrument used; for, the more vile it means were, the fitter they were to confound the unrighteous prophet.

4. It has been affirmed that the circumstance of the sun and moon standing still, which is recorded in Joshua x. 12., is contrary to philosophy.

"It is pitiful to say that the sun could not stand still because it does not move; for the history speaks according to the ideas of the age, and was intended to record simply the appearance to the eye, to which the language of men, whether philosophers or peasants, is still conformed in common conversation. Whether the effect was produced by a supernatural refraction, or whether the motion of the earth around its axis was suspended, we do not possess the means of determining." In either case there was a miracle; and as a miracle the sacred historian expressly relates this event. It is, therefore, impossible to account for it on philosophical principles.†

The object of this miracle was of the most important and impressive nature. The sun and the moon, the two principal gods of the idolatrous heathen nations, were commanded to yield miraculous obedience to the chief servant of the true God; and thereby to contribute to the more effectual conquest of their own worshippers. It was a miracle of the same description as those which had been wrought in Egypt. With respect to the objections to the probability of this miracle, which originate in a consideration of its supposed consequences, it is justly observed by Bishop Watson, that "the machine of the universe is in the hand of God: he can stop the motion of any part or of the whole, with less trouble than either of us can stop a watch!" How absurd, then, are the reasonings of those men who believe in the existence of an omnipotent God, yet deny the possibility of the exertion of his power in other ways, than those which are known to their limited experience!‡

5. The beautiful poetical passage in Judges v. 20. has been stigmatized as a "species of Jewish rant and hyperbole."

A tenpest meeting the enemy in the face discomfited them; and the torrent Kishon was so suddenly swelled by the rain (which common opinion ascribed to the planets), as to sweep away the greater part of Sisera's army in their precipitate flight. Hence the poetess calls it the first or the prince of torrents. The whole is exceedingly poetical, notwithstanding the censure of the opposers of revelation, whose cavils are characterized not more by want of taste, than by wilful ignorance and malignity of disposition.

6. It is said that such a number of inhabitants, as are stated to have dwelt in the land of Canaan, could not possibly have been supported there, viz. a million and a half of fighting men. (2 Sam. xxiv. 9. 1 Chron. xxi. 5.)

To this it is to be answered, that if there be no mistake in the numbers (which probably are incorrect, as the Syriac version reads eight hundred thousand in 2 Sam. xxiv. 9 and 1 Chron. xxi. 5), this vast population is to be ascribed to the extraordinary fertility of the soil. Another solution of this apparent contradiction has been offered by a late writer,* which is both ingenious and probable. "It appears," he observes, "from Chronicles, that there were twelve divisions of generals, who commanded monthly, and whose duty it was to keep guard near the king's person, each having a body of troops consisting of twenty-four thousand men, which jointly formed a grand army of two hundred and eighty thousand; and, as a separate body of twelve thousand men naturally attended on the twelve princes of the twelve tribes, mentioned in the same chapter, the whole will be three hundred thousand; which is the difference between the two last accounts of eight hundred thousand and of one million one hundred thousand. Whence may be deduced this natural solution as to the number of Israel. As to the men of Israel, the author of Samuel does not take notice of the three hundred thousand, because they were in the actual service of the king as a standing army, and, therefore, there was no need to number them: but the author of Chronicles joins them to the rest, saying expressly, כל ישראל, 'all those of Israel were one million one hundred thousand'; whereas the author of Samuel, who reckons only the 'eight hundred thousand, does not say כל ישראל, 'all those of Israel,' but barely ישראל and יהודה were, &c. It must also be observed, that exclusively of the troops before mentioned, there was an army of observation on the frontiers of the Philistines' country, composed of thirty thousand men, as appears by 2 Sam. vi. 1.; which, it seems, were included in the number of five hundred thousand of the people of Judah, by the author of Samuel: but the author of Chronicles, who mentions only four hundred and seventy thousand, gives the number of that tribe exclusively of those thirty thousand men, because they were not all of the tribe of Judah; and therefore he does not say, כל יהודה, 'all those of Judah,' as he had said ישראל 'all those of Israel,' but only יהודה and 'those of Judah.' Thus both accounts may be reconciled, by only having recourse to other parts of Scripture treating on the same subject; which will ever be found the best method of explaining difficult passages.†

‡ This was first conjectured by Sir Isaac Newton, and confirmed by M. Cassini and others, who measured several degrees of latitude at the equator and at the north pole; and found that the difference perfectly justified Sir Isaac Newton's conjecture, and, consequently, confirmed the truth of the Mosaic narrative. The result of the experiments, instituted to determine this point, proved, that the diameter of the earth at the equator is greater by more than twenty-three miles than it is at the poles.

7. The number of cattle sacrificed at the dedication of Solomon's temple, has been objected to as incredible, viz. one hundred and twenty thousand sheep, and two-and-twenty thousand oxen. (1 Kings viii. 63.)

To this it may be replied, first, that all these were not offered in one day, much less on one altar. This solemn meeting continued fourteen days, viz. seven at the feast of tabernacles, and seven at the feast of dedication (1 Kings viii. 65); and because the brazen altar was too little to receive the burnt-offerings, Solomon, by special permission from God, hath laid the middle of the court, that is, ordered other altars to be erected in the court of the priests, and perhaps in other places, which were to serve only during that solemnity, when such a vast number of sacrifices was to be offered. And, secondly, it is by no means improbable that there were some neighbouring princes, who paid Solomon their tribute in cattle, and who might supply victims for the extraordinary sacrifice above referred to. See an instance of this kind in 2 Kings iii. 4.

The great number of beasts daily required in Solomon's kitchen (1 Kings iv. 23.), will by no means be found incredible, when we compare it with the accounts of the daily consumption of oriental courts in modern times, and the prodigious number of servants of an Asiatic prince. Thus, Tavernier, in his description of the seraglio, said, that five hundred sheep and lambs were daily required for the persons belonging to the court of the sultan.

8. It is urged that the treasures, mentioned in 1 Chron. xxix. 4—7, as amassed by David for the purpose of erecting a temple, are incredible; and that it was impossible that he could collect such a sum, which has been computed by M. le Clerc at eight hundred millions sterling, and which is thought to exceed all the gold of all the princes now upon earth put together.

But it is possible that there may be a corruption in the numbers: we are not so well acquainted with the weights mentioned, as to be able to ascertain with precision the then comparative value of the precious metals, nor what resources for obtaining them (now lost) there were at that time. Besides, it is probable that the talent, mentioned in the passage above cited, was the Syriac talent; according to which the amount collected by David would be £7,087,791.² And in an age like that in which David lived, when kings and princes were accustomed to hoard up vast quantities of gold and silver (as the oriental monarchs still do) it is by no means improbable that David and his princes, in their successful wars with the Philistines, Moabites, and Amalekites, and with the kings of Zobah, Syria, and Edom, might collect gold and silver to the above amount.

9. The circumstance of Elijah being fed by ravens (1 Kings xvii. 4.) has excited the profane scoffs of unbelievers, as an incredible thing; and they have attempted to be witty in their inquiries whence these unclean birds could have procured food for the prophet.

It has been attempted to get rid of this miracle, by asserting that the prophet was not fed by ravens, but by the Orhim or inhabitants of Orbo, a small town in the vicinity of Bethshan. But the following arguments will show that the received interpretation is correct.—It is expressly said that Elisha drank of the brook Cherith. (1 Kings xvii. 6.) Had strangers brought him food, they might as well have furnished him with water; and thus it would not have been necessary for him to have removed when the brook was dried up. Again, Ahab (who had sent messengers in pursuit of the prophet among the neighbouring kingdoms and nations) took an oath of them that they were ignorant of the place of his concealment (1 Kings xviii. 10); and some one out of a tribe, we may suppose it probable, would have delivered him up, seeing that they could gain nothing by his concealment, and had every thing to fear from detection. If we come to verbal criticism, we find that the word is precisely the same with that which is most properly rendered 'raven' in Gen. vii. 7. when Noah sends a bird out of the ark.³ The Almighty, doubtless, could have caused food to have been conveyed to Elijah in any other way, but he chose to send it by these rapacious birds for the greater illustration of his absolute command over all creatures, and also to give us full evidence that he is able to succour and preserve, by the most improbable means, all those who put their trust in him. We need go no further to inquire whence the ravens had this food: it is enough if we believe that they brought it to Elijah; for then we must allow, that they acted by divine direction, and that the food was of God's providing.

10. There is no contradiction between Job xxvi. 7. and Psal. xxiv. 2. and civ. 5.

In the first-cited passage, Job says that God hath stretched the earth upon nothing; and in Psal. xxiv. 2. it is said that Jehovah hath founded the earth upon the seas, and established it upon the floods; and in Psal. civ. 5. that he hath laid the foundations of the earth that it should not be removed for ever. All which expressions are philosophically correct: for the foundation of a pendulous globe can be nothing but its centre, upon which all the parts lean and are supported by it; and the waters continually flowing through the bowels and cavities of the earth, from the depths of the sea, by a constant course and circulation, constitute an abyss in the lowermost parts of the earth. All the rivers run into the sea; yet the sea is not full; unto the place from whence the rivers come, thither they return again. (Eccles. i. 7.) So that, with great propriety of speech, the terra-queous globe is said to hang upon nothing, and the earth to be founded upon the seas, and established upon the floods, and (Psal. cxxxvi. 6.) to be stretched out above the waters.

11. The unicorn רִמָּה (reim), described in Job xxxix. 9. and alluded to in several other passages of Scripture, is the common rhinoceros, which is known, in Arabia, by the name of reim unto this day.

12. The circumstance of Jonah being in the belly of a whale (Jonah i. 17. Matt. xii. 40.) has been affirmed to be contrary to matter of fact; as the throat of a whale, it is well known, is capable of admitting little more than the arm of an ordinary man, and these fish are never found in the Mediterranean Sea.

But Bochart has long since proved that a great fish of the shark kind is here intended. It is a well attested fact that many of the shark species are not only of such a size and form as to be able, without any miracle, to swallow a man whole, but also that men have been found entire in their stomachs; and, since it is a fact well known to physiologists, that the stomach has no power over substances endued with vitality, this circumstance will account in part for the miraculous preservation of the prophet Jonah in the belly or stomach of the great fish, in which he was for three days and three nights. Bochart is further of opinion, that the particular species of shark which followed the prophet Jonah was the squalus carcharias or white shark, for its voracity termed lamia by some naturalists, and which is a native of the seas in hot climates, where it is the terror of navigators.⁴ Mr. Rae Wilson, the day after a violent storm exactly in the same portion of the sea where the ship with Jonah on board encountered the tempest, observed several very "great fishes" sporting about the ship, some of which could not be less than sixty feet in length, and appeared as long as the vessel itself on board of which he was embarked.⁵

The preceding are the passages of Scripture, which have been principally excepted against, as being contrary to philosophy and the nature of things; and yet, when all the circumstances of them are properly considered, there is nothing in them which may not be accounted for, and interpreted, on the principles of modern philosophy.

See also Scripture illustrated by Natural History, &c. Expository Index, p. 52. and the Fragments annexed to the quarto edition of Calmet's Dictionary, No. cxlv. p. 103. Bishop Jebb, however, has urged several considerations (which are too long for insertion here, and the force of which it would impair to abridge), showing that it probably was a whale, into the cavity of whose mouth Jonah was taken. (Sacred Literature, pp. 178—180.) The observations which he has adduced from the natural history of the whale are confirmed by the enterprising and experienced whale-fisher, Captain Scoresby; who states, that when the mouth of the Balaena mysticetus, or Great Common Whale, is open, "it presents a cavity as large as a room, and capable of containing a merchant ship's jolly-bout full of men, being six or eight feet wide, ten or twelve feet high (in front), and fifteen or sixteen feet long." (Scoresby's Account of the Arctic Regions, vol. i. p. 455.) The only objection that can be offered to Dr. Jebb's opinion is, that there is no authentic instance on record of whales being found in the Mediterranean Sea.

CHAPTER VIII.

ON THE INFERENTIAL AND PRACTICAL READING OF SCRIPTURE.

SECTION I.

ON THE INFERENTIAL READING OF THE BIBLE.

I. General Rules for the Deduction of Inferences.—II. Observations for ascertaining the Sources of Internal Inferences. III. And also of External Inferences.

1. THE sense of Scripture having been explained and ascertained, it only remains that we apply it to purposes of practical utility; which may be effected either by deducing inferences from texts, or by practically applying the Scriptures to our personal edification and salvation. By INFERENCES, we mean certain corollaries or conclusions legitimately deduced from words rightly explained; so that they who either hear or read them may form correct views of Christian doctrine and Christian duty. And in this deduction of inferences we are warranted both by the genius of language, which, when correctly understood, not only means what the words uttered in themselves obviously imply, but also what may be deduced from them by legitimate consequences; and likewise by the authority of Jesus Christ and his apostles, who have sanctioned this practice by their example. To illustrate this remark by a single instance:—

Our Lord (Matt. xxii. 23—32.) when disputing with the Sadducees, cited the declaration of Jehovah recorded in Exod. iii. 6. I am the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; and from thence he proved the resurrection of the dead inferentially, or by legitimate consequence. It should be observed, that Abraham had been dead upwards of three hundred years before these words were spoken to Moses, yet still Jehovah called himself the God of Abraham, &c. Jesus Christ properly remarked that God is not the God of the dead (that word being equivalent to eternal annihilation, in the sense intended by the Sadducees, who held that the soul vanished with the body),² but of the living: whence it follows, that if he be the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, they have not altogether perished, but their bodies will be raised again from the dead, while their spirits or souls are alive with God, notwithstanding they have ceased for many centuries to exist among mortals. In the same reply our Saviour further confuted, inferentially, another tenet of the Sadducees, viz. that there is neither angel nor spirit, by showing that the soul is not only immortal, but lives with God even while the body is detained in the dust of the earth, which body will afterwards be raised to life, and be united to the soul by the miraculous power of God.

The foundation of inferential reading is the perpetual harmony of sacred things; so that any one who has thoroughly considered and rightly understood a single doctrine, may hence easily deduce many others which depend upon it, as they are linked together in one continued chain. But, in order to conduct this kind of reading with advantage, it is necessary that we bring to it a sober judgment, capable of penetrating deeply into sacred truths, and of eliciting with indefatigable attention and patience, and also of deducing one truth from another by strong reasoning; and further, that the mind possess a sufficient knowledge of the form of sound words in faith and love which is in Christ Jesus. (2 Tim. i. 13.) Without this knowledge, it will be impossible to make any beneficial progress in this branch of sacred literature, or to discover the exhaustless variety of important truths contained in the Sacred Writings. It will likewise be requisite to compare inferences when deduced, in order to ascertain whether they are correct, and are really worthy of that appellation. For this purpose the following rules may be advantageously consulted:—

1. Obvious or too common inferences must not be deduced, nor should they be expressed in the very words of Scripture.

Thus, if from Matt. vi. 33. Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you, the following

² Εὐνοφάνης: τοῖς ζῶνσι. Joseph. Ant. Jud. lib. xviii. c. i. § 4. (al. c. ii.) Vol. I. 3 K inferences be deduced:—1. The kingdom of God is to be sought in the first instance. 2. It is necessary that we seek the righteousness of God; and, 3. To him that thus seeks, all other things shall be added. Although these are in themselves weighty truths, yet they are expressed too plainly in the very words of Scripture to be called inferences. They are, rather, truths seated in the text itself, than truths deduced from those words.

2. Inferences must be deduced from the true and genuine sense of the words, not from a spurious sense, whether literal or mystical.

We have a striking violation of this sober and almost self-evident canon, in the inference deduced by cardinal Bellarmin, from a comparison of Acts x. 13. with John xxi. 16. From the divine command, Rise, Peter! kill and eat, compared with our Lord's direction to the apostle, Feed my sheep, he extorts this consequence, viz. that the functions of the Roman pontiff, as the successor of Peter, are twofold—to feed the church, and to put heretics to death! It is scarcely necessary to add, that this inference is derived from putting a false and spurious sense upon those passages.

3. Inferences are deduced more safely as well as more correctly from the originals, than from any version of the Scriptures.

It is not uncommon, even in the best versions, to find meanings put upon the sacred text, which are totally foreign to the intention of the inspired penman. Thus, from Acts ii. 47. (The Lord added to the church daily such as should be saved), the papists have absurdly pretended to deduce the perpetuity and visibility of the (Roman Catholic) church; and, from the same text compared with Acts xiii. 48. (as many as were ordained to eternal life believed), some have inferred that those whom God adds to the church shall necessarily and absolutely be eternally saved. The question relative to indefectibility from grace is foreign to a practical work like this; but without throwing down the gauntlet of controversy, we may remark, that these passages have no relation whatever to the doctrine of election; that Luke is speaking as an historian of a fact which fell under his own observation, relating to the Jews and not to the hidden counsels of God; and that if the translators of our authorized version had rendered the original of Acts ii. 47. literally, as they have done in other parts of the New Testament, it would have run thus:—The Lord added daily to the church, τοὺς σωζόμενους, the saved; that is, those who were saved from their sins and prejudices; and so the passage is rendered by Drs. Whitby, Doddridge, and other eminent critics and divines. Further, if Acts xlii. 48. had been translated according to the proper meaning of τιταγμένοι, that verse would have run thus:—As many as were disposed for eternal life, believed: which rendering is not only faithful to the original, but also to the context and scope of the sacred historian, who is relating the effects or consequences of the preaching of the Gospel to the Gentiles. For the Jews had contradicted Paul, and blasphemed, while the religious proselytes heard with profound attention, and cordially received the Gospel; he, utterly indisposed to receive that Gospel, while the latter, destitute of prejudice and prepossession, rejoiced to hear that the Gentiles were included in the covenant of salvation through Jesus Christ; and, therefore, in this good state or disposition of mind, they believed. Such is the plain and obvious meaning deducible from the consideration of the context and scope of the passage in question; and that the rendering above given is strictly conformable to the original Greek, is evident from the following considerations. In the first place, the word τιταγμένοι is not the word generally used in the New Testament to denote fore-ordination, or an eternal decree, but the verbs ορίζω and προορίζω, which exactly answer to our English words determine and predetermine. Further, Dr. Hammond remarks, the verb τασσω or ταττω (whence the participle τιταγμένος) and its compounds, are often employed in the sense of our military word tactics, by which is meant whatever relates to the disposal or marshalling of troops (compare Luke vii. 8. and Rom. xiii. 1. Gr.); and hence, by analogy, it is applied to other things.—Thus, in 1 Cor. xvi. 15. we read “They devoted (εταξεν) themselves to the ministry of the saints.” See also 1 Macc. v. 27. and 2 Macc. xv. 20. (Gr.); and particularly Acts xx. 13., where we read that Saint Paul went on foot to Assos, for so he was (διεταγμένος) disposed. Similar expressions are to be found in the Greek classic writers. But what confirms the preceding rendering of this text, is the fact, that it is so translated in the Old Syriac, the most ancient of all the versions of the New Testament. This is of great moment; for that version was made at least four hundred years before the sense of this place was disputed by the different sects and parties of Christians. “Meanwhile,” says Dr. Hammond, with equal truth and piety, “it must be remembered that these qualifications are not pretended to have been originally from themselves, but from the preventing grace of God; to which it is to be acknowledged due that they are ever pliable, or willing to follow Christ.”

¹ "It may not be the most philosophical, but it is probably the wisest opinion which we can adopt, that the truth lies somewhere between the two rival systems of Calvin and Arminius; though I believe it to exceed the wit of man to point out the exact place where it does lie. We distinctly perceive the two extremities of the vast chain, which stretches across the whole expanse of the theological heavens; but its central links are enveloped in impenetrable clouds and thick darkness." (Mr. Faber's Discourses, vol. i. pp. 473, 474.) Archbishop Tillotson has a fine passage on this subject to the same effect. See his Works, vol. v. pp. 395, 396. Compare also vol. vii. pp. 99, 100. (London, 1820.) On this topic the author cannot withhold from his readers the following admirable observations of the late Bishop Horsley. Addressing the clergy of the diocese of Rochester, he says, "I would entreat you of all things to avoid controversial arguments in the pulpit upon what are called the Calvinistic points;—the dark subject of predestination and election I mean, and the subordinate questions. Differences of opinion upon these subjects have subsisted among the best Christians from the beginning, and will subsist, I am persuaded, to the end. They seem to me to arise almost of necessity, from the inability of the human mind to reconcile the doctrine of a providence, irresistibly ruling all events, with the responsibility of man as a moral agent. And persons equally zealous for God's glory have taken different sides of the question, according as their minds have been more forcibly impressed with awful notions of God's right of sovereignty on the one hand, or of his justice on the other. But in certain leading principles, Lutherans, Calvinists, Arminians, and we of the church of England are, I trust, all agreed. We are agreed in the fundamental doctrines of the Trinity; all believing in the united operation of the three persons, in their distinct offices in the accomplishment of man's redemption. We are all agreed that the foreknowledge of God is—like himself—from all eternity, and absolute; that his providence is universal, controlling not only all the motions of matter, but all the thoughts and actions of intelligent beings of all orders; that, nevertheless, man has that degree of free agency which makes him justly responsible; that his sins are his own; and that, without holiness, no man shall see God. While we agree in these principles, I cannot see to what purpose we agitate endless disputes upon the dark—I had almost said—presumptuous questions upon the order of the divine decrees, as if there could be any internal energies of the divine mind, and about the manner of the communion between the Spirit of God and the soul of the believer." (Bishop Horsley's Charge in 1800, pp. 32, 33, 4to.)

4. Those inferences are always to be preferred which approach nearest to the scope of a passage.

Thus, in John vi. 37. Christ says, Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out. From this clause the two following inferences have been deduced. 1. That Jesus Christ is a most certain asylum for all persons whose consciences are burdened. 2. That Christians ought to receive those who are weak in faith, after the example of Christ, and to treat them with tenderness. Now, though both these inferences are good in themselves, the first is most to be preferred, because it harmonizes best with the scope of the passage (compare verses 37–40.), which is to show that Christ will reject none “that truly repent and unfeigningly believe” in him.

5. Inferences ought to embrace useful truths, and such as are necessary to be known, on which the mind may meditate, and be led to a more intimate acquaintance with the doctrines of salvation, and with Christian morality.

It were no difficult task to illustrate this remark by a variety of examples; but this is rendered unnecessary by the admirable models presented in the valuable sermons of our most eminent divines, not to mention the excellent discourses of Massillon, Bossuet, Flechier, Claude, Saurin, Super-ville, Du Bosc, and other eminent foreign divines, both Protestants and Romanists. The reader, who is desirous of illustrations, will find many very apposite ones in Monsieur Claude's celebrated and elaborate Essay on the Composition of a Sermon.

II. The sources whence inferences are deducible, are divided by Professor Rambach (to whom we are almost wholly indebted for this chapter)³ into two classes, viz. internal and external: the former are inherent in the text, and flow from it, considered in itself; the latter are derived from a comparison of the text with other passages and circumstances.

To illustrate these definitions by a few examples:—The sources whence inferences may be deduced, are internal, or inherent in the text, when such consequences are formed, 1. From the affections of the sacred writer or speaker; 2. From words and their signification; 3. From the emphasis and force of words; and, 4. From the structure and order of the words contained in the sacred text.

³ Dr. Hammond (on Acts xlii. 48.) has cited and commented on several passages which we have not room to state. He renders the word τιταγμένοι by fily disposed and qualified; Dr. Wall, by fit to receive; and Mr. Thompson, the learned North American translator of the Scriptures from the Greek, by fily disposed. Wolfius (Cur. Philol. in loc.) considers the phrase τιταγμένοι as equivalent to εὐδοκῶντες (Luke ix. 62.) in our version rendered fit (Gr. more correctly, rightly disposed) for the kingdom of God. Dr. Whitby translates the word by disposed, and Dr. Doddridge by determined, in order to preserve the ambiguity of the word. The meaning, he observes, of the sacred penman seems to be, that all who were deeply and seriously concerned about their eternal happiness, openly embraced the Gospel. And where the temper was, it was undoubtedly the effect of a divine operation on their hearts. See Whitby, Doddridge, Wall, Wetstein, Bengel, Rosenmüller, and especially Limborch (Commentarius in Acta Apostolorum, pp. 133–136. folio, Rotterdam, 1711), on Acts xlii. 48., and Kriebel's Observations in Nov. Test. ex Josepho, pp. 222–224. Compare also Franzius de Interpretatione Sacrarum Scripturarum, pp. 104–115.; G. Taylor's Works, vol. ix. p. 140.; and Bishop Wilson's Works, Sermon 57. vol. ii. p. 272. folio edit. Bath, 1792.

⁴ See particularly §§ 17–26. in Dr. Williams's edition of Claude's Essay, Christian Preacher, pp. 300–346.; or Mr. Simeon's much improved edition, Cambridge and London, 1827. 12mo.

⁵ Institutiones Hermeneuticæ Sacre, lib. iv. c. 3. pp. 801–822.

1. Inferences deduced from the affections of the writer or speaker, whether these are indicated in the text, or are left to the investigation of the interpreter.

Thus, in Mark iii. 5. we read that Jesus Christ looked round about on those who opposed him with anger, being grieved for the hardness of their hearts: the anger here mentioned was no uneasy passion, but an excess of generous grief occasioned by their obstinate stupidity and blindness. From this passage the following conclusions may be drawn: 1. It is the duty of a Christian to sorrow, not only for his own sins, but also to be grieved for the sins of others. 2. All anger is not to be considered sinful. 3. He does not bear the image of Christ, but rather that of Satan, who can either behold with indifference the wickedness of others, or rejoice in it. 4. Nothing is more wretched than an obdurate heart, since it caused him, who is the source of all true joy, to be filled with grief on beholding it. 5. Our indignation against wickedness must be tempered by compassion for the persons of the wicked.

2. Inferences deduced from words themselves, and their signification.

For instance, in Luke xxi. 15. our Lord, addressing his disciples, says, I will give you a mouth and wisdom. Inference 1. Christ, the eternal wisdom, is the source and spring of all true wisdom. 2. Will give. They who attempted to procure wisdom by their own strength, without the aid of prayer, may justly be charged with presumption. 3. You. No one stands more in need of the gift of divine wisdom than they who are intrusted with the charge of teaching others. 4. A mouth, or ready utterance. The gift of eloquence is bestowed by God, as well as every other gift. Wisdom. It is possible for a man to acquire cunning by the mere force of corrupt nature; but nature cannot possibly confer true wisdom. 5. And. Eloquence, when not united with wisdom, is of little utility in promoting the kingdom of Christ. From this last inference, it appears, that even the smallest particles sometimes afford matter from which we may deduce practical conclusions.

3. Inferences deduced from the emphasis and force of words.

We have an example in 1 Pet. v. 5. Be clothed with humility: for God resisteth the proud. Inference 1. Humility. Christian humility does not reside in filthy or ragged garments, but in a modest mind, that entertains humble views of itself. Be ye clothed, εταξάμενοι, from ετ, in, and ταξω, to gather or tie in a knot. The word means to clothe properly, with an outer ornamental garment, tied closely upon one with knots. True humility is an ornament; which decorates the mind much more than the most costly garments do the body. 2. Humility is a garment with which we cover both our own virtues and the defects of others. 3. This ornament of humility, being exposed to many snares, must be most carefully guarded, and retained around us. 5. The proud, υπερηφανοί, from υπερ, above, and ετινω, to appear, because such persons exalt themselves above others. No sin is capable of being less concealed, or of escaping the observation of others, than pride. 6. God resisteth the proud man: literally, SETTETH HIMSELF AS IN ARRAY against the proud man: this is a military term. The inference deducible is, that while all other sinners retire as it were, from the presence of God, and seek for shelter against his indignation, the proud man alone openly braves it.

4. Inferences deduced from the order and structure of the words contained in the sacred text.

Thus, from Rom. xiv. 17. The kingdom of God is righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost, the following inferences may be derived, according to the order of the words, which depends upon the connection and order of the subjects treated of. 1. No constant and lasting peace of conscience is to be expected, unless we previously lay hold of the righteousness of Christ by faith. 2. They only possess a genuine and permanent joy, who, being justified, cultivate peace with God through Jesus Christ. 3. In vain do those persons boast of the righteousness of Christ, who still continue in a state of hostility and enmity with God and man. 4. A serene and peaceful conscience is the only source of spiritual joy.

III. The sources of inferences are external, when the conclusions are deduced from a comparison of the text, 1. With the state of the speaker;—2. With the scope of the book or passage;—3. With antecedents and consequents; or, in other words, with the context;—4. With parallel passages, and other circumstances.

I. Inferences deduced from the state of the writer or speaker

Thus, when Solomon, the wisest and richest of sovereigns, whose eager desire after the enjoyment of worldly vanities was so great, that he left none of them untried, and whose means of gratifying himself in every possible pleasure and delight were unbounded,—when he exclaims (Eccl. i. 2.), Vanity of vanities, all is vanity, the following inferences may be deduced from his words, compared with the state of his mind. (1.) Since the meanest artisan is not to be despised when speaking properly and opportunely of his own business, he must be more than usually stupid who does not give diligent attention when a most illustrious monarch is about to speak. (2.) How admirable is the wisdom of God, who, when it pleased him to select a person to proclaim and testify the vanity of all things human, made choice of one who had most deeply experienced how truly vain they were! (3.) When a sovereign, thus singularly possessed of glory, fame, human wisdom, riches, and every facility for the enjoyment of pleasures, proclaims the vanity of all these things, his testimony ought to be received by every one with great respect. (1.) Since princes, above all others, are exposed to the insidious wiles of pleasures, it is worthy of remark that God raised up one of their own rank to admonish them of their danger.

⁵ It may be worth the reader's while to reconsider what has already been stated on the subject of emphatic words, which, in fact, are so many sources whence inferences may be judiciously deduced.

2. Inferences deduced.

(1.) From the general scope of an entire book.—For instance, let the following words of Jesus Christ (John viii. 51.), Verily, verily, I say unto you, if a man keep my saying he shall never see death, be compared with the general scope of the book which is announced in John xx. 31. These are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing ye might have life through his name. From this collation the following inferences will flow. (i.) Faith in Christ is to be proved and shown by obedience to his word. (ii.) True faith cordially receives not only the merits of Christ, but also his words and precepts. And, (iii.) Whosoever is made through faith, a partaker of spiritual life, shall also be freed from spiritual and eternal death.

(2.) From the special scope of a particular passage.—The particular scope of Jesus Christ in the passage above cited (John viii. 51.), was to demonstrate that he was not possessed by an evil spirit, since the keeping of his words would procure eternal life for all who obey him, while Satan, on the contrary, leads men into sin, whose wages is death, or everlasting perdition. Hence we may deduce the subsequent inferences. (i.) That doctrine which produces such very salutary effects cannot necessarily be false and diabolical. (ii.) Saving truths are to be proposed even to those who are guilty of committing them. (iii.) There is no nearer way, by which to liberate the mind from doubts formed against truth, than a ready obedience to acknowledge truth. (iv.) The precepts of Christ are to be regarded and obeyed, even though they should be ridiculed or defamed by the most learned men.

(3.) From the very special scope of particular words or phrases.—The passage just referred to will supply us with another illustration. For instance, should it be asked, (1.) Why our Lord prefixed to his declaration, a solemn asseveration similar to an oath? It is replied, because he perceived the very obstinate unbelief of his hearers; whence it may be inferred, that it is a shameful thing that Christ should find so little faith among men. (ii.) Should it be further inquired, why he prefixed a double asseveration? It is answered in order that, by such repetition, he might silence the repeated calumnies of those who opposed him; hence, also, it may be inferred, that in proportion to the malice and effrontery of men in asserting calumnies, the greater zeal is required in vindicating truth. (iii.) Should it still be asked, why our Lord added the words, I say unto you, we reply, in opposition to the assertion of his enemies in the 45th verse, —Say ye not well, that thou hast a demon? From which we may infer, that he who is desirous of knowing the truth ought not only to attend to the stories invented and propagated by wicked men against the godly, but also to those things which Christ says of them, and they of him. Other instances might be adduced, but the preceding will suffice.

3. Inferences deduced from a collation of the text with the context.

In this case, the principal words of the text should be compared together, in order that inferences may be deduced from their mutual relation. (1.) Collate 1 Tim. i. 15. It is faithful saying, with verse 6. Neither give heed to fables. Inference. The idle legends of the Jews (desires, and the appearances of the latter, are compared to uncertain fables; but the narration in the Gospel concerning Jesus Christ is both certain, and worthy of being received with faith. (ii.) Collate also 1 Tim. i. 15, with verse 6. Vain jangling, or empty talking. Inference. God usually punishes those who will not believe the most certain words of the Gospel, by judiciously giving them up to a voluntary belief of the most absurd and lying fables. (iii.) Compare the words Worthy of all acception (1 Tim. i. 15.), with verse 8. The law is good. Inference. The law, as given by God, is both good in itself and has a good tendency, though to a sinner it is so formidable as to put him to flight; but the Gospel recommends itself to the terrified conscience, as a saying or discourse every way worthy of credit.

4. Inferences deduced from a collation of the text with parallel passages.

The advantage resulting from such a comparison, in investigating the sense of a passage of Scripture, has already been stated and illustrated; and the observations and examples referred to, if considered with a particular view to the deduction of inferences, will supply the reader with numerous instances, whence he may draw various important corollaries. One instance, therefore, will suffice to exemplify the nature of the inferences deducible from a comparison of the text with parallel passages. In 2 Tim. i. 8. Saint Paul exhorts Timothy not to be ashamed of the testimony of the Lord. Compare this with Rom. i. 16. where he says, I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ; for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth, to the Jew first, and also to the Greek; and with Isa. xxviii. 16. and xlix. 23. last clause (cited in Rom. x. 11.), where it is said, Whosoever believeth in him (Christ) shall not be ashamed, that is, confounded or disappointed of his hope. From this collation the two following inferences may be derived. (1.) Faithful ministers of the Gospel require nothing from others which they do not by their own experience know to be both possible and practicable. And, (2.) All those who have already believed, or do now or shall hereafter believe in Christ, have in and through him, all the blessings foretold by the prophets: all the promises of God, in (or through) him, being yea, that is, true in themselves, and amen, that is, faithfully fulfilled to all those who believe in Christ. (2 Cor. i. 20.)

5. A fifth external source of inferences is the collation of the text with the consideration of the following external circumstances, viz.

(1.) THE TIME when the words or things were uttered or took place.

Thus, in Matt. xxvii. 52. we read that many bodies of the saints which slept arose; but when? After Christ's resurrection (v. 53.), not before (as Rabbins themselves, among other eminent divines, has supposed; for Christ himself was the first-fruits of them that slept. (1 Cor. xv. 20.) The graves were opened at his death by the earthquake, and the bodies came out at his resurrection. Inference. The satisfactory efficacy of Christ's death was so great, that it opened a way to life to those who believed on him as the Messiah (that was to come, as well as to those who believe in him subsequently to his incarnation: and both are equally partakers of the benefits flowing from his resurrection.

(2.) THE PLACE where the words were uttered.

As in Matt. xxvi. 39. 42. Not my will, but thine be done! Where did Christ utter this exclamation? In a garden. Inference. He who made atonement for the sins of all mankind, voluntarily submitted himself, in the garden of passion, to the will of God: from which man withdrew himself in a garden of pleasure.

(3.) THE OCCASION upon which the words were spoken.

Thus, in Matt. xvi. 3. Christ rebukes the Pharisees, because they did not observe the signs of the times. On what occasion? When they required him to show them a sign from heaven. Inference. Such are the blindness and corruption of men, that disregarding the signa exhibited to them by God himself, they frequently require new signs that are more agreeable to their own desires.

(4.) THE MANNER in which a thing is done.

Acts ix. 9. During the blindness in which Saul continued for three days and three nights, God brought him to the knowledge of himself. Inference. Those, whom God vouchsafes to enlighten, he first convinces of their epiritual blindness.

Other instances, illustrating the sources whence inferences are deducible, might be offered, were they necessary, or were the preceding capable of being very soon exhausted. From the sources already stated and explained, various kinds of inferences may be derived, relating both to faith and practice. Thus, some may be deduced for the confirmation of faith, for exciting sentiments of love and gratitude, and for the support of hope: while others contribute to promote piety, Christian wisdom and prudence, and sacred eloquence; lastly, others are serviceable for doctrine, for reproof, for instruction, and for comfort. He, who adds personal practice to the diligent reading of the Scriptures, and meditates on the inferences deduced from them by learned and pious men, will abundantly experience the truth of the royal psalmist's observations, —Thy commandment is exceeding broad; and, the entrance of thy words giveth light, it giveth understanding to the simple. (Psal. cxix. 96. 130.) "The Scriptures," says the late eminent Bishop Horne, "are the appointed means of enlightening the mind with true and saving knowledge. They show us what we were, what we are, and what we shall be: they show us what God hath done for us, and what he expecteth us to do for him; they show us the adversaries we have to encounter, and how to encounter them with success; they show us the mercy and the justice of the Lord, the joys of heaven, and the pains of hell. Thus will they give to the simple, in a few days, an understanding of those matters, which philosophy, for whole centuries, sought in vain."

In conducting, however, the inferential reading above discussed, we must be careful not to trust to the mere effusions of a prurient or vivid fancy: inferences, legitimately deduced, unquestionably do essentially promote the spiritual instruction and practical edification of the reader. "But when brought forward for the purpose of interpretation, properly so called, they are to be viewed with caution, and even with mistrust. For scarcely is there a favourite opinion, which a fertile imagination may not thus extract from some portion of Scripture: and very different, nay contrary interpretations of this kind have often been made of the very same texts according to men's various fancies or inventions."²

SECTION II.

ON THE PRACTICAL READING OF SCRIPTURE.

HAVING hitherto endeavoured to show how we may ascertain and apply the true sense of the Sacred Writings, it remains only to consider in what manner we may best reduce our knowledge to practice; for, if serious contemplation of the Scriptures, and practice, be united together, our real knowledge of the Bible must necessarily be increased, and will be rendered progressively more delightful. If, says Jesus Christ, any man will do his (God's) will, he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God. (John vii. 17.) This is the chief end for which God has revealed his will to us (Deut. xxix. 29.); and all Scripture is profitable for this purpose (2 Tim. iii. 16.), either directing us what we should do, or inciting and encouraging us to do it: it being written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope (Rom. xv. 4.); that is, that by the strenuous exercise of that patience, which the consolations administered in Scripture so powerfully support, we might have an assumed and joyful hope in the midst of all our tribulation. Even those things, which seem most notional and speculative, are reducible to practice. (Rom. i. 20, 21.) Those speculations, which we are enabled to form concerning the nature and attributes of God, grounded upon his works, ought to induce us to glorify him as such a God as his works declare him to be: and it is a manifest indication that our knowledge is not right, if it hath not this influence upon our conduct and conversation. (1 John ii. 3.)

The practical reading here referred to, is of such a nature, that the most illiterate person may prosecute it with advantage: for the application of Scripture which it enjoins, is connected with salvation: and, consequently, if the unlearned were incapable of making such application to themselves, it would be in vain to allow them to peruse the Sacred Writings.¹ After what has been stated in the preceding part of this volume, the author trusts he shall stand acquitted of undervaluing the knowledge of the original languages of the Scriptures, an acquaintance with which will suggest many weighty practical hints, that would not present themselves in a version. It is, however, sufficient, that every thing necessary to direct our faith, and regulate our practice, may easily be ascertained by the aid of translations. Of all modern versions, the present authorized English translation is, upon the whole, undoubtedly the most accurate and faithful: the translators having seized the very spirit of the sacred writers, and having almost every where expressed their meaning with a pathos and energy that have never been rivalled by any subsequent versions either of the Old or the New Testament, or of detached books, although, in most of these, particular passages are rendered more happily, and with a closer regard to the genius and spirit of the divine originals.

The simplest practical application of the word of God will, unquestionably, prove the most beneficial: provided it be conducted with a due regard to those moral qualifications which have already been stated and enforced, as necessary to the right understanding of the Scriptures.² Should, however, any hints be required, the following may, perhaps, be consulted with advantage.³

I. In reading the Scriptures, then, with a view to personal application, we should be careful that it be done with a pure intention.

The Scribes and Pharisees, indeed, searched the Scriptures, yet without deriving any real benefit from them: they thought that they had in them eternal life: yet they would not come to Christ that they might have life. (John v. 40.) He, however, who peruses the Sacred Volume, merely for the purpose of amusing himself with the histories it contains, or of beguiling time, or to tranquilize his conscience by the discharge of a mere external duty, is deficient in the motive with which he performs that duty, and cannot expect to derive from it either advantage or comfort amid the trials of life. Neither will it suffice to read the Scriptures with the mere design of becoming intimately acquainted with sacred truths, unless such reading be accompanied with a desire, that, through them, he may be convinced of his self-love, ambition, or other faults, to which he may be peculiarly exposed, and that by the assistance of divine grace, he may be enabled to root them out of his mind.

II. *In reading the Scriptures for this purpose, it will be advisable to select some appropriate lessons from its most useful parts; not being particularly solicitous concerning the exact connection or other critical niceties that may occur (though at other times, as ability and opportunity offer, these are highly proper objects of inquiry), but simply considering them in a devotional or practical view.*⁴

After ascertaining, therefore, the plain and obvious meaning of the lesson under examination, we should first consider the present state of our minds, and carefully compare it with the passage in question: next, we should inquire into the causes of those faults which such perusal may have disclosed to us; and should then look around for suitable remedies to correct the faults we have thus discovered.

III. We should carefully distinguish between what the Scripture itself says, and what is only said in the Scripture, and, also, the times, places, and persons, when, where, and by whom any thing is recorded as having been said or done.

In Mal. iii. 14. we meet with the following words: "It is in vain to serve God, and what profit is it that we have kept his ordinance?" And in 1 Cor. xv. 32. we meet with this maxim of profane men—"Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." But, when we read these and similar passages, we must attend to the characters introduced, and remember that the persons who spoke thus were wicked men. Even those, whose piety is commended in the Sacred Volume, did not always act in strict conformity to it. Thus, when David vowed that he would utterly destroy Nabal's house, we must conclude that he sinned in making that vow: and the discourses of Job's friends, though in themselves extremely beautiful and instructive, are not in every respect to be approved: for we are informed by the sacred historian, that God was wrath with them, because they had not spoken of him the thing that was right. (Job xlii. 7.)

IV. In every practical reading and application of the Scriptures to ourselves, our attention should be fixed on Jesus Christ, both as a gift, to be received by faith for salvation, and also as an exemplar, to be copied and imitated in our lives.

We are not, however, to imitate him in all things. Some things he did by his divine power, and in those we cannot imitate him: other things he performed by his sovereign authority, in those we must not imitate him: other things also he performed by virtue of his office, as a Mediator, and in these we may not, we cannot follow him. But in his early piety, his obedience to his reputed earthly parents, his unwearied diligence in doing good, his humility, his unblameable conduct, his self-denial, his contentment under low circumstances, his frequency in private prayer, his affectionate thankfulness, his compassion to the wretched, his holy and edifying discourse, his free conversation, his patience, his readiness to forgive injuries, his sorrow for the sins of others, his zeal for the worship of God, his glorifying his heavenly Father, his impartiality in administering reproof, his universal obedience, and his love and practice of holiness,—in all these instances, Jesus Christ is the most perfect pattern for our imitation.⁵ And the observation of these things, in a practical point of view, will be of singular use to us on this account; namely, that whatever sympathy and benevolence Christ displayed on earth, he retains the same in heaven, seeing that he is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever, and that he ever liveth to make intercession for them that come unto God by him. For we have not an high-priest that cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, but [one who was] in all points tempted like as we are; so that we may now come with humble confidence to the throne of grace; assuring themselves, that we shall find, from the true mercy-seat of God, sufficient help in all our distresses. (Heb. xiii. 8. vii. 25. and iv. 15, 16.) Jesus Christ, then, being our most perfect exemplar (1 Cor. xi. 1.), the particular actions and general conduct of other men, as related in the Scriptures, should be regarded by us as models of imitation, only so far as they are conformable to this standard.

V. *"An example (that is, every good one) hath the force of a rule; all of them being 'written for our admonition.' (1 Cor. x. 11.) But then we must be careful to examine and discern whether the example be extraordinary or ordinary, according to which the application must be made."*⁶

In illustration of this remark, it may be observed, 1. That in matters which were extraordinary, such as the killing of Eglon by Ehud (Judg. iii. 21.), Elijah's killing the prophets of Baal (1 Kings xviii. 40.), and his invoking fire from heaven (2 Kings i. 10.), a conduct which, though approved in him, was condemned by our Lord in the apostles (Luke ix. 54, 55.);—2. In matters that were temporary; such were many of the ceremonies

⁴ Doddridge's Rise and Progress of Religion, ch. xix. § 9. (Works, vol. i. p. 369. Leeds edit. 8vo.)

observed by the Jews, the washing of his disciples' feet by our Lord (John xiii. 14.), the celebration of love-feasts by the primitive Christians, &c.; and, 3. In matters that were sinful, as the drunkenness of Noah (Gen. ix. 21.), the adultery of David (2 Sam. xi.), the repining of Jonah (Jonah iv. 1—9.), Peter's denial of Christ (Matt. xxvi. 69—75. Mark xiv. 66—72. Luke xxii. 55—62. John xviii. 25—27.), &c.;—in matters which were thus extraordinary, temporary, or sinful, the practice of holy men recorded in the Scriptures, is not to be a pattern for us: but in all general holy duties, and in such particular duties as belong to our respective situations and callings, we are to set them before our eyes, and to follow their steps. When, therefore, we read of the uprightness of Noah, of Abraham's faith, the meekness of Moses, of David's devotions, the zeal of Josiah, the boldness of Peter and John in Christ's cause, of the labours of Saint Paul, and other virtues of the ancient saints, it should be our study to adorn our profession with similar graces and ornaments.

"Instead," therefore, "of adopting the sayings and actions recorded in Scripture, implicitly and absolutely, we ought to reason in some such manner as this: If such a person, so situated, best answered the ends of such an institution, by acting in such a manner, how shall we, in our situation, best answer the ends of the same? Sometimes merely proposing this form of inquiry will carry us right: but, in more difficult cases, we shall have the general principles, the nature and end of the duty in question to investigate, and from these to determine the particular cases; that is, how, in such cases, the ends of the duty can be best attained. However, in most questions, a good heart will be more requisite than a good head." 1

VI. When we read of the failings, as well as the sinful actions of men, recorded in the Scriptures, we may see what is in our own nature: for there are in us the seeds of the same sin, and similar tendencies to its commission, which would bring forth similar fruits, were it not for the preventing and renewing grace of God. And as many of the persons, whose faults are related in the volume of inspiration, were men of infinitely more elevated piety than ourselves, we should learn from them, not only to "be not high-minded, but fear" (Rom. xi. 20.); but further, to avoid being rash in censuring the conduct of others.

The occasions of their declensions are likewise deserving of our attention, as well as the temptations to which they were exposed, and whether they did not neglect to watch over their thoughts, words, and actions, or trust too much to their own strength (as in the case of St. Peter's denial of Christ): what were the means that led to their penitence and recovery, and how they demeaned themselves after they had repented. By a due observation, therefore, of their words and actions, and of the temper of their minds, so far as this is manifested by words and actions, we shall be better enabled to judge of our real progress in religious knowledge, than by those characters which are given of holy men in the Scriptures, without such observation of the tenor of their lives, and the frame of their minds.²

VII. In reading the promises and threatenings, the exhortations and admonitions, and other parts of Scripture, we should apply them to ourselves in such a manner, as if they had been personally addressed to us.

For instance, are we reading any of the prophetic Sermons? Let us so read and consider them, and, as it were, realize to ourselves the times and persons when and to whom such prophetic discourses were delivered, as if they were our fellow-countrymen, fellow-citizens, &c. whom Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and other prophets rebuke in some chapters; while in others they labour to convince them of their sinful ways, and to convert them, or, in the event of their continuing disobedient, denounce the divine judgments against them.³ So, in all the precepts of Christian virtue recorded in Matt. v. vi. and vii. we should consider ourselves to be as nearly and particularly concerned, as if we had personally heard them delivered by Jesus Christ on the Mount.⁴

Independently, therefore, of the light which will thus be thrown upon the prophetic or other portions of Scripture, much practical instruction will be efficiently obtained; for, by this mode of reading the Scriptures, the promises addressed to others will encourage us, the denunciations against others will deter us from the commission of sin, the exhortations delivered to others will excite us to the diligent performance of our duty, and, finally, admonitions to others will make us walk circumspectly. Thus will Saint Paul's comprehensive observations be fully realized; Whatsoever things were written aforetime, were written for our learning (Rom. xv. 4.); and All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; that the man of God may be made perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works. (2 Tim. iii. 16, 17.)

VIII. The words of the passage selected for our private reading, after its import has been ascertained, may beneficially be summed up or comprised in very brief prayers, or ejaculations.⁵

The advantage resulting from this simple method, says Rambach, has been proved by many who have recommended it.—If we pray over the substance of Scripture, with our Bible before us, it may impress the memory and heart more deeply, and may form us to copiousness and variety both of thought and expression in prayer.⁶ Should any references to the Scriptures be required, in confirmation of this statement, we would briefly notice that the following passages, among many others that might be cited, will, by addressing them to God, and by a slight change also in the person, become admirable petitions for divine teaching; viz. Col. i. 9, 10. Eph. i. 17, 18, 19. 1 Pet. ii. 1, 2. The hundred and nineteenth Psalm contains numerous similar passages.

IX. In the practical reading of the Scriptures, all things are not to be applied at once, but gradually and successively; and this application must be made, not so much with the view of supplying us with materials for talking, as with matter for practice.

Finally, This practical reading and application must be diligently continued through life; and we may, with the assistance of divine grace, reasonably hope for success in it, if to reading, we add constant prayer and meditation on what we have read.

Prayer enlightens meditation, and by meditation, prayer is rendered more ardent.⁷ With these, we are further to conjoin a perpetual comparison of the Sacred Writings; daily observation of what takes place in ourselves, as well as what we learn from the experience of others; a strict and vigilant self-examination; together with frequent conversation with men of learning and piety, who have made greater progress in saving knowledge; and, lastly, the diligent cultivation of internal peace.⁸

Other observations might be offered: but the preceding hints, if duly considered and acted upon, will make us "neither barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ." (2 Pet. i. 8.) And if, to some of his readers, the author should appear to have dilated too much on so obvious a topic, its importance must be his apology. Whatever relates to the confirmation of our faith, the improvement of our morals, or the elevation of our affections, ought not to be treated lightly or with indifference. To borrow a remark of the eminently learned Dr. Waterland, with a trifling variation,—while moral or spiritual uses or improvements are raised upon texts of Scripture, for the purposes of practical edification (whether such spiritual uses were really intended by the sacred penman or not), if the words be but aptly accommodated to them, and pertinently and soberly applied, and the analogy of faith be preserved, a good end will be answered, and the true doctrine at least will be kept, if not a true interpretation.

1 Dr. Hey's Norissian Lectures, vol. i. p. 77. The whole of his chapter on "applying sayings and actions recorded in the Scriptures to ourselves," abounds with profound views, happily illustrated, and is worthy of repeated perusals.

2 Lukin's Introduction to the Scriptures, p. 215. 12mo. London, 1669.

3 Franz's Tractatus de Interpretatione Sacrarum Scripturarum, Præf. p. 9.

4 "This close application," says an excellent, but now neglected writer, "will render what we read operative and effective, which, without it, will be useless and insignificant. We may see an instance of it in David: who was not at all convinced of his own guilt by Nathan's parable; though the most apposite that was imaginable, till he roundly applied it, saying, Thou art the man." (2 Sam. xiii. 7.) And, unless we treat ourselves at the same rate, the Scriptures may fill our heads with high notions, say, with many speculative truths, which yet amount to no more than the devil's theology (James. ii. 19.), and will as little advantage us." Lively Oracles, sect. viii. §41.

5 Professor Franck has given several examples of the practice here recommended in the "Brevis Institutio," at the end of his Prælectiones Hermeneuticæ. Similar examples are also extant in the well known and useful little tract, entitled "Plain Directions for reading the Holy Scriptures," published by the Society for promoting Christian Knowledge.

6 Dr. Doddridge, Works, vol. i. p. 360.

7 Oratio et meditatio conjunctione necessariâ sibi ad invicem copulantur. Et per orationem illuminatur meditatio, et in meditatione exardescit oratio. (Bernard's Opera, tom. v. p. 260. no. 2.) In p. 156. no. 56. of the same volume, Bernard has the following apposite observations on this topic:—"Nemo repente fit summus: Ascendamus, non volando, apprehenditur summus scale. Ascendamus igitur, duobus veluti pedibus, Meditatione et Oratione. Meditatio siquidem docet, quid desit: Oratio, ne desit, obtinet. Illa viam ostendit, ista deducit. Meditatione denique agnoscimus imminere nobis pericula: Oratio evadimus, præstante Domino Nostro Jesu Christo."

8 The subjects briefly noticed in this paragraph, are discussed more at length by Franzius, in the preface (pp. 9—11.) to his Tractatus Theologicus de Interpretatione Scripturæ Sacræ.

ON THE BOOKS COMMONLY TERMED THE APOCRYPHA.

SECTION I.

ON THE APOCRYPHAL BOOKS ATTACHED TO THE OLD TESTAMENT.

[Referred to in p. 31. of this Volume.]

Derivation of the term Apocrypha—Reasons why the apocryphal Books were rejected from the Canon of Scripture.

I. They possess no authority whatever, to procure their admission into the sacred Canon.—II. They were not admitted into the Canon of Scripture during the first four centuries of the Christian Church.—III. They contain many things which are fabulous, and contrary to the canonical Scriptures, both in facts, doctrines, and moral practice.—IV. They contradict all other profane historians.

BESIDES the Scriptures of the Old Testament, which are universally acknowledged to be genuine and inspired writings, both by the Jewish and Christian churches, there are several other writings partly historical, partly ethical, and partly poetical, which are usually printed at the end of the Old Testament in the larger editions of the English Bible,—under the appellation of the "APOCRYPHA,"—that is, books not admitted into the sacred canon, being either spurious, or at least not acknowledged to be divine. The word Apocrypha is of Greek origin, and is either derived from the words ἀπο τῆς κρυπτης, because the books in question were removed from the crypt, chest, ark, or other receptacle in which the sacred books were deposited, whose authority was never doubted; or more probably, from the verb ἀποκρύπτω, to hide or conceal, because they were concealed from the generality of readers, their authority not being recognised by the church, and because they are books which are destitute of proper testimonials, their original being obscure, their authors unknown, and their character either heretical or suspected.¹ 1. The advocates of the church of Rome, indeed, affirm that even these are divinely inspired; but it is easy to account for his assertion: these apocryphal writings serve to countenance some of the corrupt practices of that church.

The Protestant churches not only account those books to be apocryphal, and merely human compositions, which are esteemed such by the church of Rome, as the prayer of Manasseh, the third and fourth books of Esdras, the addition at the end of Job, and the hundred and fifty-first psalm; but also the books of Tobit, Judith, the additions of the book of Esther, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch the prophet, with the epistle of Jeremiah, the Song of the Three Children, the story of Susannah the Story of Bel and the Dragon, and the first and second books of Maccabees. The books here enumerated are unanimously rejected by Protestants for the following reasons:—

1. THEY POSSESS NO AUTHORITY WHATEVER, EITHER EXTERNAL OR INTERNAL, TO PROCURE THEIR ADMISSION INTO THE SACRED CANON.

1. Not one of them is extant in Hebrew.

With the exception of the fourth book of Esdras, which is only extant in Latin, they are all written in the Greek language, and for the most part by Alexandrian Jews.

2. They were written subsequently to the cessation of the prophetic spirit, though before the promulgation of the Gospel.

In the prophecy of Malachi (iv. 4—6) it is intimated that after him no prophet should arise, until John the Baptist, the harbinger of the Messiah, should appear in the spirit and power of Elijah; and the Jews unanimously agree that the prophetic spirit ceased with Malachi. The author of the book of Wisdom pretends that it was written by Solomon—a pretension not only manifestly false, but which also proves that book not to have been inspired. For, in the first place, the author, whoever he was, cites many passages from Isaiah and Jeremiah, who did not prophecy till many ages after the time of Solomon, and consequently the book could not have been written by him; and, secondly, it represents the Israelites (Wisd. ix. 7, 8, xv. 14.) as being in subjection to their enemies: whereas we know from the sacred writings, that they enjoyed great peace and prosperity during the reign of Solomon.

3. Not one of the writers, in direct terms, advances any claim to inspiration.

On the contrary, so far are the authors of the apocryphal books from asserting their own inspiration, that some of them say what amounts to an acknowledgement that they were not inspired. Thus, in the prologue to the book of Ecclesiasticus, the son of Sirach intreats the reader to pardon any errors he may have committed in translating the works of his grandfather Jesus into Greek. In 1 Mace. iv. 46. and ix. 27. it is confessed that there was at that time no prophet in Israel; the second book of Maccabees (ii. 23.) is an avowed abridgment of five books originally written by Jason of Cyrene; and the author concludes with the following words, which are utterly unworthy of a person writing by inspiration.—If I have done well, and as it is fitting the story, it is that which I desired; but, if slenderly and meanly, it is that which I could attain unto. (2 Mace. xv. 38.)

4. The apocryphal books were never received into the sacred canon by the Jewish church, and therefore they were not sanctioned by our Saviour.

No part of the apocrypha is quoted, or even alluded to by him or by any of his apostles; and both Philo and Josephus who flourished in the first century of the Christian æra, are totally silent concerning them.²

² The testimony of Josephus is very remarkable:—"We have not," says he, "an innumerable multitude of books among us disagreeing from and contradicting one another, but only twenty-two books, containing the records of all past times, which are justly believed to be divine. Five of them belong to Moses, which contain his laws, and the traditions concerning the origin of mankind till his death. But as to the time from the death of Moses, till the reign of Artaxerxes king of Persia, who reigned after Xerxes, the prophets who were after Moses wrote down what was done in their times in thirteen books. The remaining four books contain hymns to God, and precepts for the conduct of human life. Our history, indeed, has been written, since Artaxerxes, very particularly; but it has not been esteemed of equal authority with the former by our forefathers, because there had not been an exact succession of prophets since that time. And how firmly we have given credit to these books of our own nation, it is evident by what we do: for during so many ages as have already passed, no one has been so bold as either to add any thing to them, to take any thing from them, or to make any change in them; but it is become natural to all Jews, immediately and from their very birth, to esteem these books to contain divine doctrines, and to persist in them, and if it be necessary, willingly to die for them." Josephus contra Apion, lib. i. § 8. Josephus's testimony is related by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. lib. iii. c. ix. and x.) and it is further worthy of remark, that the most learned Romanist writers admit that the apocryphal books were never acknowledged by the Jewish Church. See particularly Huet's Démonstr. Evangelica, prop. iv. tom. i. De Libro Tobit, p. 206. De Libro Judith, p. 309. De Libris Maccabæorum, p. 460. De Caione, Librorum Sacrorum, p. 473. See also Dupin's Dissertation Préliminaire ou Prolegomènes sur la Bible, pp. 85, 86, 89, 112. Amst. 1701.

I. THE APOCRYPHAL BOOKS WERE NOT ADMITTED INTO THE CANON OF SCRIPTURE DURING THE FIRST FOUR CENTURIES OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

They are not mentioned in the catalogue of inspired writings made by Melito, bishop of Sardis, who flourished in the second century,¹ nor in those of Origen,² in the third century, of Athanasius,³ Hilary,⁴ Cyril of Jerusalem,⁵ Epiphanius,⁶ Gregory Nazianzen,⁷ Amphilochius,⁸ Jerome,⁹ Rufinus,¹⁰ and others of the fourth century; nor in the catalogue of canonical books recognised by the council of Laodicea,¹¹ held in the same century, whose canons were received by the Catholic church; so that, as Bishop Burnet well observes, "we have the concurring sense of the whole church of God in this matter."¹² To this decisive evidence against the canonical authority of the apocryphal books, we may add that they were never read in the Christian church until the fourth century; when, as Jerome informs us, they were read "for example of life, and instruction of manners, but were not applied to establish any doctrine;"¹³ and contemporary writers state,¹⁴ that although they were not approved as canonical or inspired writings, yet some of them, particularly Judith, Wisdom, and Ecclesiasticus, were allowed to be perused by catechumens. As a proof that they were not regarded as canonical in the fifth century, Augustine relates, that when the book of Wisdom was publicly read in the church it was given to the readers of inferior ecclesiastical officers, who read it in a lower place than those books which were universally acknowledged to be canonical, which were read by the bishops and presbyters in a more eminent and conspicuous manner.¹⁵ To conclude:—Notwithstanding the veneration in which these books were held by the Western Church, it is evident that the same authority was never ascribed to them as to the Old and New Testament; until the last council of Trent, at its fourth session, presumed to place them all (excepting the prayer of Manasseh and the third and fourth books of Esdras) in the same rank with the inspired writings of Moses and the prophets.¹⁶

II. THE APOCRYPHAL BOOKS CONTAIN MANY THINGS WHICH ARE FABULOUS AND CONTRADICTORY TO THE CANONICAL SCRIPTURES BOTH IN FACTS, DOCTRINES, AND MORAL PRACTICE.

A few instances, out of many that might be adduced, will suffice to prove this assertion.

I. FABULOUS STATEMENTS.

(1.) Rest of chapters of Esther, x. 6. A little fountain became a river, and there was light, and the sun, and much waters. This river is Esther, whom the king married, and made queen. xiv. 2.

(2.) The story of Bell and the Dragon is, confessedly, a mere fiction, which contradicts the account of Daniel's being cast into the lion's den.

(3.) The stories of water being converted into fire, and vice versa (2 Macc. i. 19–22), and of the Tabernacle and Ark walking after Jeremiah at the prophet's command. (2 Macc. ii. 4.)

II. CONTRADICTORY STATEMENTS.

(1.) The author of the book of the Wisdom of Solomon alludes to the people of Israel as being in subjection to their enemies, which was not the case during Solomon's reign. We read, indeed, that he had enemies in the persons of Hadad, Rezon and Jeroboam (1 Kings ii. 14, 23, 25, 26), who vexed him: but we nowhere find that they attacked his people; and the schism of the ten tribes did not take place until after the death of Solomon.

¹⁵ On this subject the reader is referred, for much curious and important information, to the Rev. G. C. Gorham's Statement submitted to the members of the Bible Society, relative to the circulation of the apocryphal books, chap. i., and his Reply to two Letters addressed to him by Dr. Lardner Vol. Ess. (London, 1826. 8vo.)

(2.) Baruch is said (i. 2.) to have been carried into Babylon, at the very time when Jeremiah tells us (xliii. 6, 7.) that he was carried into the land of Egypt.

(3.) The story in 1 Esdras iii. iv., besides wanting every mark of the majesty and sanctity of the Sacred Writings, contradicts Ezra's account of the return of the Jews from Babylon under Cyrus.

(4.) The first and second books of Maccabees contradict each other: for in the former (1 Macc. vi. 4–16.) Antiochus Epiphanes is said to have died in Babylon; and in the latter he is represented, first, as having been slain by the priests at Nanea, in Persia (2 Macc. i. 13–16.), and afterwards (ix. 28.) as dying a miserable death in a strange country among the mountains.

(5.) In the book o Tobit, the angel that is introduced (v. 12.) as representing himself as being a kinsman of Tobit, in xii. 15. contradicts himself, by affirming that he is Raphael, one of the holy angels. The author of this book has also added to the views of God and of Providence, delineated in the Old Testament, tenets of Assyrian or Babylonian origin.

III. CONTRADICTORY DOCTRINES.

(1.) Prayers for the Dead—2 Macc. xii. 43, 44. And when he had made a gathering throughout the company, to the sum of 2000 drachm of silver, he sent it to Jerusalem to offer a sin-offering, doing therein very well and honestly: for, if he had not hoped that they that were slain should have risen again, it had been superfluous and vain to pray for the dead. This statement contradicts the whole tenor of the Sacred Writings, which nowhere enjoin or allow of prayers for the dead.

(2.) The heathen Notion of the Transmigration of Souls, which is equally contradictory to the Bible, is asserted in Wisd. viii. 19, 20. For I was a witty child, and had a good spirit; yea, rather being good, I came in: to a body unfilled.

(3.) Justification by the Works of the Law (in opposition to the Scriptures, which teach that we are justified or accounted righteous only by faith) is taught in various parts of the apocryphal books:—2 Esdras viii. 33. The just which have many good works laid up with thee, shall out of their own deeds receive reward. Tobit xii. 8, 9. Prayer is good with fasting, and alms, and righteousness. Alms doth deliver from death, and shall purge away all sins. Those that exercise alms and righteousness shall be filled with life. Ecclesi. iii. 3. Whoso honoureth the father maketh atonement for his sins. 30 Alms maketh an atonement for sins! xxxv. 3. To forsake righteousness is a prostitution.

(4.) Sinless perfection. Ecclesi. xiii. 24. Riches are good unto him that hath no sin. But what say the Scriptures? Eccles. vii. 20. There is not a just man upon earth, that doth good, and sinneth not. Rom. ii. 23. ALL have sinned and come short of the glory of God 1 John i. 8. If we say that we have no sin we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us.

IV. IMMORAL PRACTICES

Commended in the apocryphal books, which practices are prohibited in the Scriptures.

(1.) Lying.—The instances cited No. (5.) may also be adduced here.

(2.) A desperate act of Suicide (which is expressly forbidden in Exod. xx. 13. Thou shalt not kill) is related in 2 Macc. xiv. 41–46. as a manful act, and in terms of great commendation.

(3.) Assassination, which is equally prohibited, is commended in the book of Judith (ix. 2–9) in the case of the Shechemites, whose base murder is justly condemned in Gen. xlix. 7.

(4.) Magical Incantations, which are forbidden in Lev. xix. 26. and Deut. xviii. 10, 11, 14. are introduced in Tobit vi. 16, 17. as given by the advice of an angel of God.¹⁷

V. LASTLY, THERE ARE PASSAGES IN THE APOCRYPHAL BOOKS, WHICH ARE SO INCONSISTENT WITH THE RELATIONS OF ALL OTHER PROFANE HISTORIANS, THAT THEY CANNOT BE ADMITTED WITHOUT MUCH GREATER EVIDENCE THAN BELONGS TO THESE BOOKS.

Thus in 1 Macc. viii. 16. it is said that the Romans "committed their government to one man every year, who ruled over all that country, and that all were obedient to that one, and that there was neither envy nor emulation amongst them."

Now this assertion is contradicted by every Roman historian without exception. The imperial government was not established until more than a century after the time when that book was written. In like manner, the account (in 1 Macc. i. 6, 7.) of the death of Alexander, misnamed the Great, is not supported by the historians who have recorded his last hours.

Although the Apocryphal books cannot be applied "to establish any doctrine," yet "they are highly valuable as ancient writings, which throw considerable light upon the phraseology of Scripture, and upon the history of manners of the East: and as they contain many noble sentiments and useful precepts, the Anglican church, in imitation of the primitive church of Christ, doth read them for example of life and instruction of manners."¹⁸ On this account the reader will find an analysis of these books, in the second volume of this work, Part V. Chap. VIII.

¹⁷ Romanism contradictory to Scripture, pp. 47, 48.

¹⁸ It may be proper to remark, that the Anglican church does not read all the books of the apocrypha. It reads as lessons no part of either books of Esdras, or of the Maccabees, or of the additions of the book of Esther; nor does it read the prayer of Manasseh. Bp. Tomline's Elements of Christ. Theol. vol. ii. p. 199. Pfeiffer, Critica Sacra, cap. 14. (Op. tom. ii. pp. 795, 799.) Moldenhawer, Intro. ad Vet. Test. pp. 145–155. Heidegger Enchirid. Biblicum, pp. 326–322. See also Bp. Marsh's Comparative View of the Churches of England and Rome, pp. 73–93.

SECTION II.

ON THE WRITINGS USUALLY CALLED THE APOCRYPHAL BOOKS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

[Referred to in p. 88. of this Volume.]

1. Enumeration of these Apocryphal Writings.—II. External Evidence to show that they were never considered as inspired or canonical.—III. Internal Evidence.—IV. These Apocryphal Books are so far from affecting the credibility of the genuine books of the New Testament, that the latter are confirmed by them.

I. It is not wonderful that, besides those which are admitted to be canonical books of the New Testament, there were many others which also pretended to be authentic. "Men of the best intentions might think it incumbent on them to preserve, by writing, the memory of persons, facts and doctrines, so precious in their estimation, who might at the same time be deficient in the talents and information requisite to discriminate, and duly to record the truth. The sacred writers intimate that such men had already begun, even in their time, to appear; and gave warning that others would arise, less pure in their motives. Luke says that many had taken in hand to write gospels (Luke i. 1.); Paul cautions the Galatians against other gospels than that which they had received from him (Gal. i. 6—9.); and warns the Thessalonians not to be troubled by any letter as from him, declaring that the day of Christ is at hand" (2 Thess. ii. 2.) In the ages following the apostles, the apocryphal writings, which were published under the names of Jesus Christ and his apostles, their companions, &c. (and which are mentioned by the writers of the first four centuries under the names of gospels, epistles, acts, revelations, &c.) greatly increased. Most of them have long since perished,¹ though some few are still extant, which have been collected (together with notices of the lost pieces) and published by John Albert Fabricius, in his Codex Apocryphus Novi Testamenti, the best edition of which appeared at Hamburg, in 1719—1743, in three parts, forming two volumes, 8vo.² Of this work the Rev. and learned Mr. Jones made great use, and, in fact, translated the greater part of it in his "New and Full Method of settling the Canonical Authority of the New Testament." The apocryphal books extant are, an Epistle from Jesus Christ to Abgarus; his Epistle, which (it is pretended) fell down from heaven at Jerusalem directed to a priest named Leopas, in the city of Eris: the constitutions of the Apostles; The Apostles' Creed; the Apostolical Epistles of Barnabas, Clements or Clement, Ignatius, and Polycarp; the Gospel of the Infancy of our Saviour; the Gospel of the birth of Mary; The prot-evangelion of James; the Gospel of Nicodemus; the Martyrdom of Thecla or Acts of Paul; Abdias's History of the Twelve Apostles; the Epistle of Paul to the Laodiceans;³ the Six Epistles of Paul to Seneca, &c. Of these various productions, those of which the titles are printed in Italics are comprised in the publication, intitled "The Apocryphal New Testament, being all⁴ the Gospels, Epistles, and other Pieces now extant, attributed in the first four centuries to Jesus Christ, his Apostles, and their companions, and not included in the New Testament by its compilers. Translated and now collected into one volume, with Prefaces and Tables, and various Notes and References. London, 1820."—Second edition, 1821, 8vo. The writings ascribed to Barnabas, Ignatius (at least his genuine epistles), Polycarp, and Hermas, ought not in strictness to be considered as apocryphal, since their authors, who are usually designated, the Apostolical Fathers, from their having been contemporary for a longer or shorter time with the apostles of Jesus Christ, were not divinely inspired apostles. The first epistle of Clement to the Corinthians, indeed, was for a short time received as canonical in some few Christian churches, but was soon dismissed as an uninspired production; the fragment of what is called the second epistle of Clement to the Corinthians, Dr. Lardner has proved not to have been written by him. These productions of the apostolical fathers, therefore, have no claim to be considered as apocryphal writings.

As the external form of the New Testament⁵ harmonises with that of the larger octavo editions of the authorised English Version of the New Testament, the advocates of infidelity have availed themselves of it, to attempt to undermine the credibility of the genuine books of the New Testament. The preface to the compilation, intitled "The Apocryphal New Testament." is, certainly, so drawn up, as apparently to favour the views of the opposers of divine revelation; but as its editor has disclaimed any sinister design in publishing it, the writer of these pages will not impute any such motives to him.

II. In order, however, that the reader may see how LITTLE the writings of the New Testament can suffer from this publication,⁶ a brief statement shall be given of the very satisfactory reasons, for which the apocryphal (or rather spurious) writings ascribed to the apostles have been deservedly rejected from the canon of Scripture.

1. In the first place, they were not acknowledged as authentic, nor were they much used, by the primitive Christians.

There are no quotations of these apocryphal books in the genuine writings of the apostolic fathers, that is, of Clement of Rome, Ignatius, Polycarp, and Hermas, whose writings reach from about the year of Christ 70 to 108; nor are they found in any ancient catalogues of the sacred books. Some of them indeed are mentioned, but not cited by Irenæus and Tertullian, who lived in the second century. Indeed the apocryphal books above mentioned are expressly, and in so many words, rejected by those who have noticed them, as the forgeries of heretics, and, consequently, as spurious and heretical.

2. The enemies of Christianity who were accustomed to cite passages from the four gospels for the sake of perverting them, or of turning them into ridicule, have never mentioned these productions; which we may be sure they would have done, had they known of their existence, because they would have afforded them much better opportunities than the genuine Gospels did, for indulging their malevolence.

3. Few or none of these productions, which (it is pretended) were written in the apostolic age, were composed before the second century, and several of them were forged so late as the third century, and were rejected as spurious at the time they were attempted to be imposed upon the Christian world.

² In 1698 Mr. Toland published his Amyntor, in which he professed to give a catalogue of books, attributed in the primitive times to Jesus Christ, his apostles, and other eminent persons "together with remarks and observations relating to the canon of Scripture." He there raked together whatever he could find relating to the spurious gospels and pretended sacred books which appeared in the early ages of the Christian church. These he produced with great pomp, to the number of eighty and upwards, and though they were most of them evidently false and ridiculous, and carried the plainest marks of forgery and imposture, of which, no doubt, he was very sensible, yet he did what he could to represent them as of equal authority with the four gospels, and other sacred books of the New Testament, now received among Christians. To this end he took advantage of the unwary and ill-grounded hypotheses of some learned men, and endeavoured to prove that the books of the present canon lay concealed in the coffers of private persons, till the latter times of Trajan or Adrian, and were not known to the clergy or churches of those times, nor distinguished from the spurious works of the heretics; and that the scriptures, which we now receive as canonical, and others which we now reject, were indifferently and promiscuously cited and appealed to by the most ancient Christian writers. His design, in all this, manifestly, was to show, that the gospels and other sacred writings of the New Testament, now acknowledged as canonical, really deserve no greater credit, and are no more to be depended upon, than those books which are rejected and exploded as forgeries. And yet he had the confidence to pretend, in a book he afterwards published, that his intention in his Amyntor, was not to invalidate, but to illustrate and confirm the canon of the New Testament. This may serve as one instance out of many that might be produced, of the insincerity of this opposer of revelation, whose assertions have been adopted by infidels of the present day. Many good and satisfactory refutations of Toland were published at that time by Dr. Samuel Clarke, Mr. Nye, and others, and especially by the learned Mr. Jeremiah Jones in his "New and Full Method of settling the Canonical Authority of the New Testament," in 2 vols. 8vo., reprinted at Oxford in 1798 in 3 vols. 8vo. From this work the following refutation of the pretensions of the apocryphal books of the New Testament has been principally derived, as well as from Dr. Lardner, who in different parts of his works has collected much curious information respecting them. The passages being too numerous to be cited at length, the reader will find them indicated in the fifth index to his works, article Apocryphal Books. Six months after the publication of the second edition of this work, the late Rev. Thomas Rennell, who so ably distinguished himself by his powerful writings against the atheistical physiologists of this age, published "Proofs of Inspiration, or the grounds of distinction between the New Testament and the apocryphal volume, occasioned by the recent publication of the Apocryphal New Testament by Hone, London, 1822." 8vo. As the arguments produced in this learned tract are necessarily similar to those stated in the former part of this volume, as well as in the present article of this Appendix, this brief notice of Mr. R's pamphlet may suffice.

¹ See an alphabetical catalogue of them, with references to the fathers by whom they were mentioned, in Jones on the Canon, vol. i. pp. 119—123.

² Another apocryphal book, purporting to be the Acts of the Apostle Thomas, has lately been discovered at Paris. It was published at Leipsic in 1823, by Dr. J. C. Thilo.

³ That St. Paul did not write any epistle to the Laodiceans see Vol. II. Part VI. Chap. III. Sect. VII. § II.

⁴ This is a misnomer; for all the apocryphal writings are not included in the publication in question.

A brief statement of the dates of the pieces contained in the Apocryphal New Testament (with the exception of the writings of the apostolic fathers, which are omitted for the reason already stated), will demonstrate this fact.

Thus, the pseudo-Epistles of Abgarus prince of Edessa, and of Jesus Christ, were never heard of, until published by Eusebius in the fourth century.¹—Though an Epistle of Paul to the Laodiceans was extant in the second century, and was received by Marcion the heretic, who was notorious for his mutilations and interpolations of the New Testament, yet that now extant is not the same with the ancient one under that title in Marcion's Apostolicon, or collection of apostolical epistles. It never was extant in Greek, and is a production of uncertain, but unquestionably very late, date.—Mr. Jones conjectures it to have been forged by some monk, not long before the reformation;² and, as is shown in page 441 and 442, infra, it was compiled from several passages of St. Paul's Epistles.—The six Epistles of Paul to Seneca, and eight of the philosopher to him, were never heard of, until they were mentioned by Jerome and Augustine, two writers who lived at the close of the fourth century; and who do not appear to have considered them as genuine.³—In the third or perhaps the second century a Gospel of the Birth of Mary was extant and received by several of the ancient heretics, but it underwent many alterations, and the ancient copies varied greatly from that now printed in the apocryphal New Testament which was translated by Mr. Jones from Jerome's Latin Version, first made at the close of the fourth century.⁴ This gospel of the birth of Mary is for the most part the same with the Prot-evangelion, or Gospel of James (which, nevertheless, it contradicts in many places); and both are the production of some Hellenistic Jew. Both also were rejected by the ancient writers.—The two Gospels of the Infancy (the second of which bears the name of Thomas) seem to have been originally the same; but the ancient gospel of Thomas was different from those of the infancy of Christ. They were received as genuine only by the Marcionites, a branch of the sect of Gnostics, in the beginning of the second century; and were known to Mohammed or the compilers of the Koran, who took from them several idle traditions concerning Christ's infancy.⁵—The Gospel of Nicodemus, also called the Acts of Pilate, was forged at the latter end of the third or the beginning of the fourth century, by Leucius Charinus, who was a noted forger of the Acts of Peter, Paul, Andrew, and others of the apostles.⁶—The Apostles' Creed derives its name, not from the fact of its having been composed, clause by clause, by the twelve apostles (of which we have no evidence), but because it contains a brief summary of the doctrines which they taught. It is nearly the same with the creed of Jerusalem, which appears to be the most ancient summary of the Christian faith that is extant; and the articles which have been collected from the catechetical discourses of Cyril, who was Bishop of Jerusalem in the fourth century.—The Acts of Paul and Thecla, though ranked among the apocryphal scriptures by some of the primitive Christians (by whom several things therein related were credited), were in part the forgery of an Asiatic presbyter at the close of the first or at the beginning of the second century, who confessed that he had committed the fraud out of love to Paul, and was degraded from his office; and they have subsequently been interpolated.⁷

4. When any book is cited, or seems to be appealed to, by any Christian writer, which is not expressly and in so many words rejected by him, there are other sufficient arguments to prove that he did not esteem it to be canonical.

For instance, though Origen in one or two places takes a passage out of the Gospel according to the Hebrews, yet in another place he rejects it, under the name of the gospel of the twelve apostles, as a book of the heretics, and declares that the church received only four Gospels.⁸ Farther, though several of these apocryphal books are mentioned by Clement of Alexandria as well as by Origen, yet Clement never does it as attributing any authority to them, and sometimes he notices them with expressions of disapprobation. In like manner, though Eusebius mentions some of them, he says that they were of little or no value, and that they were never received by the sounder part of Christians. Athanasius, without naming any of them, passes a severe censure upon them in general; and Jerome speaks of them with dislike and censure.

5. Sometimes the Fathers made use of the apocryphal books to show their learning, or that the heretics might not charge them with partiality and ignorance, as being acquainted only with their own books.

Remarkable to this purpose are those words of Origen:—"The church receives only four Gospels, the heretics have many; such as that of the Egyptians, Thomas, &c. These we read that we may not be esteemed ignorant, and by reason of those who imagine they know something extraordinary, if they know the things contained in these books." To the same purpose says Ambrose;⁹ having mentioned several of the apocryphal books, he adds, "We read these, that they may not be read (by others); we read them, that we may not seem ignorant; we read them, not that we may receive them, but reject them and may know what those things are of which they (heretics) make such boasting."

6. Sometimes, perhaps, these books may be cited by the Fathers, because the persons against whom they were writing received them, being willing to dispute with them upon principles out of their own books.

7. It may, perhaps, be true, that one or two writers have cited a few passages out of these books, because the fact they cited was not to be found in any other.

St. John tells us (xvi. 25.) that our Lord did many other things besides those which he had recorded: the which, says he, if they should be written every one, I suppose the world itself could not contain the books which should be written. Some accounts of these actions and discourses of Christ were unquestionably preserved, and handed down to the second century, or farther, by tradition, which though inserted afterwards into the books of the heretics, may be easily supposed to have been cited by some later writers, though at the same time they esteemed the books which contained them uninspired, and not of the canon. This was the case with respect to Jerome's citing the Hebrew Gospel, which he certainly looked upon as spurious and apocryphal.

III. The internal evidence for the spuriousness of these productions is much stronger than the external evidence: for, independently of the total absence of all those criteria of genuineness, which (it has been shown in the preceding part of this volume) are clearly to be seen in the canonical books, it is evident that the apocryphal productions, ascribed to the apostles, are utterly unworthy of notice; for, 1. They either propose or support some doctrine or practice contrary to those which are certainly known to be true;—2. They are filled with absurd, unimportant, impertinent, and frivolous details;—3. They relate both useless and improbable miracles;—4. They mention things, which are later than the time when the author lived, whose name the book bears;—5. Their style is totally different from that of the genuine books of the New Testament;—6. They contain direct contradictions to authentic history, both sacred and profane;—7. They are studied imitations of various passages in the genuine Scriptures, both to conceal the fraud and to allure readers; and, 8. They contain gross falsehoods, utterly repugnant to the character, principles, and conduct of the inspired writers.

1. The apocryphal books either propose or support some doctrine or practice contrary to those which are certainly known to be true, and appear designed to obviate some heresy, which had its origin subsequent to the apostolic age.

One of the doctrines, which these spurious writings were intended to establish, was the sanctity of relics. As a striking proof of this, we are told in the First Gospel of the Infancy, that when the Eastern magi had come from the East to Jerusalem, according to the prophecy of Zoradach, and had made their offerings, the lady Mary took one of his swaddling clothes in which the infant was wrapped, and gave it to them instead of a blessing, which they received from her as a most noble present.¹¹ As bandages, of a similar nature and efficacy, were preserved in some churches with the most superstitious reverence, the purpose for which the above was written was obvious.

"The corrupt doctrines relative to the Virgin Mary form an essential part in the scheme of some of these designers. Those who believed, or affected to believe, that the Virgin was exalted into heaven, who adopted the notion of her immaculate conception, and her power of working miracles, found but little countenance for their absurdities in the genuine Gospels. It was a task too hard for them to defend such tenets against their adversaries, while the canonical books were the only authority they could appeal to. Hence a Gospel was written De Nativitate Mariæ (the Gospel of the birth of Mary),¹² in which her birth is foretold by angels, and herself represented as always under the peculiar protection of Heaven. Hence in the Gospel attributed to James, which assumed the name of Prot-Evangelium, as claiming the superiority over every other, whether canonical or apocryphal, the fact of the immaculate conception is supported by such a miracle, as to leave no doubt upon the most incredulous mind. Hence, too, in the Evangelium Infantie, or Gospel of the Infancy, the Virgin, who is simply said by St. Matthew to have gone into Egypt, is represented as making her progress more like a divinity than a mortal, performing, by the assistance of her infant Son, a variety of miracles,¹ such as might titlle her, in the minds of the blind and bigotted, to divine honours.²

In further corroboration of the design of exalting the Virgin Mary, she is sometimes made to work miracles herself, is almost always made the instrument or means of working them, and the person applied to, and receiving the praise of the work, while Joseph stands by as an unconcerned spectator, and is never mentioned. But what is most remarkable, is, that she is canonised, and called always (not only by the author of the Gospel, but by those who were perfect strangers to her before in Egypt, and elsewhere) diva Maria and diva sancta Maria; which we know not how better to translate, than in the language of her worshippers, the Lady St. Mary. And aged Simeon in his prayer, which is here chap. ii. v. 25.3 and recorded in Luke ii. 28—34, is introduced as stretching out his hands towards her, as though he worshipped her. But of all this the first ages were ignorant; nor in the first centuries after Christ do we find any thing of this prodigious deference to the Virgin: this was an invention of later ages, and was not heard of in the church before the fourth or fifth century, nor was it so common as this book supposes till some centuries after.

2. Whoever has perused with candour and attention the memoirs of the four evangelists, cannot but be struck with the natural and harmless manner in which they relate every fact. They never stop to think how this or that occurrence may be set off to most advantage, or how any thing unfavourable to themselves may be palliated. Nothing ludicrous, no impertinent or trifling circumstances are recorded by them. Every thing, on the contrary, proves that they derived the facts which they have related from infallible and indisputable sources of information. Far different was the conduct of the compilers of the apocryphal gospels. The unimportant, impertinent, and frivolous details with which their pages are filled, plainly prove that they were not possessed of any real and authentic information upon the subject, which they undertake to elucidate: and clearly invalidate their pretensions as eye-witnesses of the transactions which attended the introduction of the religion of Jesus Christ.

Thus, in the pseudo-gospel of the Birth of Mary,⁴ we have an idle tale of Christ's ascending the stairs of the temple by a miracle at three years of age, and of angels ministering to Mary in her infancy.⁵ So in the prot-evangelion ascribed to James the Less,⁶ we are presented with a dull and silly dialogue, between the mother of Mary and her waiting-maid Judith, and with another equally impertinent, between the parents of Mary.⁷ We have also in the same performance an account of Mary being fed by angels,⁸ and a grave consultation of priests concerning the making of a veil for the temple.⁹ The pseudo-gospel of the Infancy, and that ascribed to the apostle Thomas, present childish relations of our Saviour's infancy and education, of vindictive and mischievous miracles wrought by him, of his learning the alphabet, &c. &c.¹⁰

3. In the pseudo-gospels of Mary, of the Infancy, and of Thomas (which have been already cited), numerous miracles are ascribed to the mother of Jesus, or to himself in his infancy, which are both USELESS and IMPROBABLE.

The proper effect and design of a miracle is to mark clearly the divine interposition; and as we have already seen, the manner and circumstance of such interposition must be marked with a dignity and solemnity befitting the more immediate presence of the Almighty. When, therefore, we observe any miraculous acts attributed to persons, not exercising such a commission, performed upon frivolous or improper occasions, or marked by any circumstance of levity or inanity, we conclude that the report of such miracles is unworthy our attention, and that the reporters of them are to be suspected of gross error or intentional deceit. Thus we smile with contempt, at the prodigies of a writer, who gravely relates, as a stupendous miracle, that a child, at the age of three years, ascended without assistance the steps of the temple at Jerusalem, which were half a cubit each in height.¹¹ In the same Gospel, in supposed accommodation to a prophecy of Isaiah, which is most grossly misinterpreted, a declaration from heaven is alleged to have taken place in favour of Joseph the reputed father of Jesus, similar to that which, upon the strongest grounds, we believe to have been made in honour of Jesus at his baptism. The bandage which was mentioned in p. 438, as having been presented by Mary to the magi, is, of course, represented as the instrument of a miracle, being cast into a fire, yet not consumed. In another of these ingenious productions, when Elizabeth wished to shelter her infant son from the persecution of Herod, she is said to have been thus wonderfully preserved:—*Elizabeth also hearing that her son John was about to be searched for, took him and went up into the mountains, and looked around for a place to hide him, and there was no secret place to be found. Then she groined within herself, and said, 'O mountain of the Lord, receive the mother with the child.' For Elizabeth could not climb up. And instantly the mountain was divided and received them. And there appeared an angel of the Lord to preserve them.*¹² Various miracles are said to be wrought both by Mary and her son, particularly by the latter, who is represented as employing his powers to assist Joseph in his trade (he being but a bungling carpenter), especially when he had made articles of furniture of wrong dimensions.¹³ The various silly miracles attributed to the apostles throughout these writings, are so many arguments to prove that the compilations containing them are apocryphal,—or more correctly, spurious; and that they are either the productions of the weakest of men, who were fondly credulous of every report, and had not discretion enough to distinguish between sense and nonsense, or between that which was credible and that which was utterly unworthy of credit: or else that these compilations are the artful contrivance of some who were more zealous than honest, and who thought by these strange stories to gain credit to their new religion.

4. Things are mentioned, which are later than the time in which the author lived, whose name the book bears.

Thus the epistle under the name of our Saviour to Abgarus¹⁴ is manifestly a forgery, for it relates that to have been done by Christ which could not possibly have been done till a considerable time after Christ's ascension. Thus, in the beginning of the epistle a passage is cited out of St. John's Gospel, which was not written till a considerable time after our Lord's ascension: the words are, Abgarus, you are happy, forasmuch as you have believed on me whom you have not seen; for it is written concerning me, That those who have seen me should not believe on me, that they who have not seen might believe and live. This is a manifest allusion to those words of our Saviour to Thomas (John xx. 29), Blessed are they who have not seen, and yet have believed. Here indeed that which the epistle says is written concerning Christ, but in no other passage of the New Testament. The same proof of forgery occurs in the Gospel of Nicodemus,¹⁵ in which the Jews style Pilate, your highness,—a title which was not known to the Jews or used among them at that time;—in the story of Christ going down into hell to recover and bring thence the patriarchs;¹⁶—in the profound veneration paid to the sign of the cross, particularly the practice of signing with the sign of the cross, which is here said to be done by Charinus and Lenthius;¹⁷ before they enter upon their relation of the divine mysteries:—and in Christ's making the sign of the cross upon Adam and upon all the saints in hell¹⁸ before he delivered them from that state. It is to be observed that the practice of signing with the cross, though very common in the fourth and following centuries, was not at all known till towards the end of the second century, when it was mentioned by Tertullian. Similar anachronisms are pointed out by Mr. Jones in various parts of his New Method of settling the Canonical Authority of the New Testament, to which want of room compels us necessarily to refer the reader. See also § 1. p. 363. supra, for some additional instances of anachronism.

5. The style of the authors of the New Testament, we have already seen,²⁰ is an indisputable proof of its authenticity. Whereas the style of the pseudo-evangelical compilations is totally different from, or contrary to, that of the genuine writings of the author or authors whose names they bear. Every page of the apocryphal New Testament confirms this remark; but especially the pretended gospel of Nicodemus, and the epistles of Paul to Seneca.

¹² Prot-evangelion, xvi. 3—8. Apoc. New Test. p. 19.

¹⁴ And Joseph, wheresoever he went in the city, took the Lord Jesus with him, where he was sent for to work, to make gates or milk-pails, or sieves, or boxes; the Lord Jesus was with him, wheresoever he went. And as often as Joseph had any thing in his work to make longer or shorter, or wider or narrower, the Lord Jesus would stretch his hand towards it, and presently it became as Joseph would have it; so that he had no need to finish any thing with his own hands, for he was not very skillful at his carpenter's trade. On a certain time the king of Jerusalem sent for him and said, 'I would have thee make me a throne, of the same dimensions with that place in which I commonly sit.' Joseph obeyed, and forthwith began the work, and continued two years in the king's palace, before he finished it. And when he came to fix it in its place, he found it wanted two spans on each side of the appointed measure. When which the king saw, he was very angry with Joseph; and Joseph, afraid of the king's anger, went to bed without his supper, taking not any thing to eat. Then the Lord Jesus asked him, 'What he was afraid of?' Joseph replied, 'Because I have lost my labour in the work which I have been about these two years.' Jesus said to him, 'Fear not, neither be cast down; do thou lay hold on one side of the throne, and I will the other, and we will bring it to its just dimensions.' And when Joseph had done as the Lord Jesus said, and each of them had with strength drawn his side, the throne obeyed and was brought to the proper dimensions of the place: which miracle, when they who stood by saw, they were astonished, and praised God. The throne was made of the same wood which was in being in Solomon's time, viz. wood adorned with various shapes and figures. 1 Infancy vi. (1.) The names given in the pseudo-gospel of Nicodemus to those who are represented as being Jews, are not Jewish, but either Greek, Roman, or of other foreign countries. Such are the names of Summas, Datam, Alexander, Cyrus,¹ Asterius, Antonius, Carus or Cyrus, Crispus or Crispus,² Charinus, and Lentilius,³ which evidently indicate imposture. Further, the Gospel of Nicodemus is not extant in Greek: that which is now extant is evidently a translation into very bald and barbarous Latin.⁴

(2.) Nothing can be more unlike the known style of the confessedly genuine epistles, than is the style of the spurious epistles bearing the names of Paul and Seneca, in the apocryphal New Testament.⁵ This is so obvious to every one who is at all acquainted with those two writers, that it is unnecessary to multiply examples. The epistles attributed to Paul have not the least vestige of his gravity, but are rather compliments and instructions. Further, the subscriptions of the letters are very unlike those used by the supposed authors in their genuine epistles. Thus, in the first epistle of Seneca, the subscription is, *Bene te valere, frater, cupio, I wish your welfare, my brother,*⁶—which was an appellation exclusively in use among Christians. And in Paul's fifth epistle to Seneca, he concludes with, *Vale, devotissimo magister,—Farewell, most respected master;*⁷ which is not only contradictory to Paul's usual mode of concluding his letters, but also most barbarous Latinity, such as did not exist in the Roman language till several hundred years after the time of Paul and Seneca.

6. The apocryphal books ascribed to the apostles and evangelists contain direct contradictions to authentic history both sacred and profane.

Thus, in the beginning of the epistle of Abgarus,⁸ that monarch is made to confess his faith in Christ as God, and as the Son of God; in the latter part he invites Christ to dwell with him in his city, because of the malice of the Jews, who intended him mischief. Now this is a plain contradiction; for had he really thought him God, he must certainly think him possessed of Almighty power, and consequently to be in no need of the protection of his city. This seems to be as clear a demonstration as subjects of this sort are capable of receiving; nor are we aware of any objection that can be made, unless it be that Peter, who had confessed him to be the Son of God (Matt. xvi. 16), yet when he came to be apprehended thought it necessary to interpose with human force to attempt his rescue. (Matt. xxvi. 51. compared with John xviii. 10.) To which it is easy to answer, that whatever opinion Peter, or indeed any of the apostles, had of Christ before this time, they seem now to have changed it, and by the prospects of his danger and death to have grown cool in their opinion of his Almighty power, else they would never all have forsaken him at his crucifixion, as they did. But nothing of this can be supposed in the case of Abgarus, who cannot be imagined to have altered his sentiments in the interval of writing so short an epistle.

Again, several parts of the above-cited letters, which profess to be addressed to Seneca, suppose Paul to have been, at the time of writing, at Rome: whereas others imply the contrary. That he was then at Rome is implied in the first words of the first letter, in which Seneca tells Paul, that he supposed he had been told the discourse that passed the day before between him and Lucilius by some Christians who were present: as also in the first words of Paul's Epistle, and that part of Seneca's second, where he tells him, He would endeavour to introduce him to Cæsar, and that he would confer with him, and read over together some parts of his writings; and in that part of Paul's second, where he hopes for Seneca's company, and in several other places. But, on the other hand, several parts of the letters suppose Paul not at Rome, as where Seneca (Epist. iii.) complains of his staying so long away, and both Paul and Seneca are made to date their letters, when such and such persons were consuls: see Paul's fifth and sixth, and Seneca's sixth, seventh, and eighth epistles. Now, had they both been in the same city, nothing can be more unreasonable than to suppose that they would have dated thus: what need could there be to inform each other who were consuls? Paul, therefore, is supposed to be and not to be at Rome at the same time, which is a manifest contradiction. Besides this contradiction, the very dating of their letters by consulships seems to be no small evidence of their spuriousness, because it was a thing utterly unknown that any person ever did so; nor does one such instance occur in the epistles of Seneca, Cicero, or any other writer. To which we may add, that, in these letters, there are several mistakes in the names of the consuls who are mentioned; which clearly prove that these epistles could not have been written by Paul and Seneca. Another circumstance which proves the epistles ascribed to the Apostle to be a gross forgery, is that the latter is introduced as intreating Seneca not to venture to say any thing more concerning him or the Christian religion to Nero, lest he should offend him.⁹ Now it is utterly improbable that Paul would obstruct Seneca in his intentions of recommending Christianity to the emperor Nero; and it is directly contrary to his known and constant zeal and endeavours for its propagation. Would he not rather have rejoiced in so probable an opportunity of spreading the knowledge of Christ, and by the means of one so near to, and so much in favour with, the emperor, have procured the liberty for himself and the other Christian converts of exercising their religion freely? To imagine the contrary is to suppose the Apostle at once defective in his regards to himself and the whole body of Christians, and acting in direct contradiction to the whole of his conduct, and zealous endeavours to advance the interests of Christianity. But, besides, it has happened here, as commonly in such cases: want of memory betrays the forgery. Although the author, so unlike Paul, in this place wishes not to discover the Christian religion to the emperor, yet in another epistle, viz. the sixth of Paul, he is made to advise Seneca to take convenient opportunities of insinuating the Christian religion and things in favour of it, to Nero and his family—than which nothing can be a more manifest contradiction.

Similar gross and glaring contradictions occur in the Gospel of Nicodemus. To instance only one or two, which are very notorious. In chap. ii. 14,¹⁰ the twelve men, Eliezer, Asterius, Antonius, &c. declare themselves to be no proselytes, but born Jews; when Pilate tendered them an oath, and would have had them swear by the life of Cæsar, they refused, because, they say, we have a law that forbids our swearing, and makes it sinful to swear; yet, in ch. iv. 7, the elders, scribes, priests, and Levites are brought in swearing by the life of Cæsar without any scruple;¹¹ and in ch. ii. 23,¹² they make others, who were Jews, swear by the God of Israel; and Pilate gives an oath to a whole assembly of the scribes, chief priests, &c. ch. xxii. 3.¹³ This seems a manifest contradiction. Another is, that in ch. xi. 15,¹⁴ Pilate is introduced as making a speech to the Jews, in which he gives a true and just abstract of the Old Testament history relating to the Israelites, viz. what God had done for them, and how they had behaved themselves to him. Whereas the same Pilate, ch. xxiii. 2,¹⁵ is made to be perfectly ignorant of the Bible, and only to have heard by report that there was such a book; nor can it be said, that Pilate here only refers to the Bible kept in the temple; for the manner of speech shows he was ignorant of the contents of the book: I have heard you have a certain book, &c. and this is in itself very probable.

Further, this book contains many things contrary to known truths. Such indeed is the whole of it, besides what is taken out of our present genuine Gospels. Who, for instance, will credit the long story, ch. xv.—xviii.¹⁶ of Christ's going down to hell, and all the romantic fabulous relations of what happened in consequence of it? Who will believe that Christ there signed Adam and the Patriarchs with the sign of the cross, and that all the holy Patriarchs were in hell till that time? &c. Besides, in other places there are notorious falsehoods; as that is, to make the Jews understand our Saviour as saying, that he would destroy Solomon's temple, ch. iv. 4,¹⁷ which they could not but know had been destroyed several hundred years before. To make the name Centurio to be the proper name of a man who came to Christ, when it is certain it was the name of his post or office, &c. To make the words of Paul, I Cor. xv. 55., O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? to be the words of Isaiah, ch. xxi. 1; and to make Simeon (ch. xvi. and xvii.) to be a high priest, which it is certain he was not.

7. *The striking contrast between truth and falsehood is naturally heightened, when those passages come under consideration which are borrowed from the genuine Scriptures, and, with more or less deviation from the original, adapted to the purposes of the apocryphal writers.*¹⁸

Thus, the simple fact contained in Matt. i. 19. is expanded through a chapter and a half of the prot-evangelion.¹⁹ Again, the plain narrative of Luke ii. 16. is not thought sufficient for the great event, which was just before related, and accordingly it is thus improved in the Gospel of the Infancy:—"After this, when the shepherds came, and had made a fire, and they were exceedingly rejoicing, the heavenly host appeared to them, praising and adoring the supreme God; and as the shepherds were engaged in the same employment, the cave at that time seemed like a glorious temple, because both the tongues of angels and men united to adore and magnify God, on account of the birth of the Lord Christ. But when the old Hebrew woman saw all these evident miracles, she gave praises to God, and said, I think thee O God, thou God of Israel, for that mine eyes have seen the birth of the Saviour of the world."²⁰ The short and interesting account which is given by the genuine evangelist at the end of the same chapter, is considered, by the author of a spurious Gospel, as by no means adequate to the great dignity of our Saviour's character, nor calculated to satisfy the just curiosity of pious Christians. We are therefore informed, that Jesus in his conference with the doctors in the temple, after explaining the books of the law, and unfolding the mysteries contained in the prophetic writings, exhibited a knowledge no less profound of astronomy, medicine, and natural history.²¹ Hence, too,

The latter part is so curious, and forms such a contrast to the sober narrative of the sacred historians, and indeed of all serious history, that we cannot resist the temptation of transcribing it. "When a certain astronomer who was present asked the Lord Jesus, 'Whether he had studied astronomy?' The Lord Jesus replied, and told him the number of the spheres and heavenly bodies, and also their triangular, square, and sextile aspect; their progressive and retrograde motion; their size, and several prognostications; and other things, which the reason of man had never discovered. There was also among them a philosopher well skilled in physic and natural philosophy, who asked the Lord Jesus 'Whether he had studied physic?' He replied, and explained to him physics and metaphysics, also those things which were above and below the power of nature; the powers also of the body, its humours, and their effects; also the number of its members, and bones, veins, arteries, and nerves: the several constitutions of body, hot and dry, cold and moist, and in the Gospel attributed to Nicodemus, the particulars of our Saviour's trial are enumerated most fully, the testimony of the witnesses both for and against him is given at large, and the expostulations of Pilate with the Jews are recorded with a minuteness equal to their imagined importance. And as, in the genuine history of these transactions, the Roman governor is reported to have put a question of considerable moment, to which our Saviour vouchsafed no answer, or the evangelists have failed to record it, these falsifiers have thought proper to supply so essential a defect. "Pilate saith unto him, What is truth? Jesus said, Truth is from heaven. Pilate said, Therefore truth is not on earth? Jesus saith unto Pilate, Believe that truth is on earth, among those who, when they have the power of judgment, are governed by truth, and form right judgment."¹

In the proto-evangelion, there are not fewer than twelve circumstances stolen from the canonical books, and in the Gospel of the birth of Mary six circumstances² and by far the greater part of the pretended Gospel of Nicodemus is transcribed and stolen from other books. Nothing can be more evident to any one who is acquainted with the sacred books, and has read this Gospel, than that a great part of it is borrowed and stolen from them. Every such person must perceive, that the greatest part of the history of our Saviour's trial is taken out of our present Gospels, not only because it is a relation of the same facts and circumstances, but also in the very same words and order for the most part; and though this may be supposed to have happened accidentally, yet it is next to impossible to suppose a constant likeness of expression, not only to one, but sometimes to one, and sometimes to another of our evangelists. In short, the author seems to have designed a sort of abstract or compendium of all which he found most considerable to his purpose in our four Gospels; though he has but awkwardly enough put it together.³

But the most flagrant instance, perhaps, of fraudulent copying from the canonical books, is to be found in the pretended epistle of Paul to the Laodiceans, almost every verse of which is taken from the great apostle's genuine writings, as will appear from the following collation, which is taken from Mr. Jones's work on the Canon,¹ whose translation is reprinted without acknowledgment in the Apocryphal New Testament.⁵

The Epistle of St. Paul to the Laodiceans. The places in St. Paul's genuine Epistles, especially that to the Philippians, out of which this to the Laodiceans was compiled.

1. Paul an apostle, not of men, neither by man, but by Jesus Christ, to the brethren which are at Laodicea.

2. Grace be to you, and peace from God the Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ.

3. I thank Christ in every prayer of mine, that ye continue and persevere in good works, looking for that which is promised in the day of judgment.

4. Let not the vain speeches of any trouble you, who pervert the truth, that they may draw you aside from the truth of the Gospel which I have preached.

5. And now may God grant, that my converts may attain to a perfect knowledge of the truth of the Gospel, he beneficent, and doing good works which accompany salvation.

6. And now my bonds, which I suffer in Christ are manifest, in which I rejoice, and am glad.

7. For I know that this shall turn to my salvation for ever, which shall be through your prayer, and the supply of the Holy Spirit.

8. Whether I live or die; (for) to me to live shall be a life to Christ, to die will be joy.

9. And our Lord will grant us his mercy, that ye may have the same love, and be like minded.

10. Wherefore, my beloved, as ye have heard of the coming of the tendencies of them: how the soul operated upon the body; what its various sensations and faculties were: the faculty of speaking, anger, desire; and, lastly, the manner of its composition and dissolution; and other things, which the understanding of no creature had ever reached. Then that philosopher arose, and worshipped the Lord Jesus, and said, 'O Lord Jesus, from henceforth I will be thy disciple and servant.'⁶ the Lord, so think and act in fear, and it shall be to you life eternal;

11. For it is God, who worketh in you;

12. And do all things without sin.

13. And what is best, my beloved, rejoice in the Lord Jesus Christ, and avoid all filthy lucre.

14. Let all your requests be made known to God, and be steady in the doctrine of Christ.

15. And whatsoever things are sound, and true, and of good report, and chaste, and just, and lovely, these things do.

17. All the saints salute you.

18. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit. Amen.

19. Cause this epistle to be read to the Colossians, and the Epistle of the Colossians to be read among you.

8. Lastly, as the credibility of the genuine books of the New Testament is established by the accounts of countries, governors, princes, people, &c. therein contained, being confirmed by the relations of contemporary writers, both friends and enemies to Christians and Christianity (and especially by the relations of hostile writers); so the spuriousness of the pseudo-evangelical writings is demonstrated by their containing gross falsehoods, and statements which are contradicted by the narratives of those writers who were contemporary with the supposed authors of them.

Thus, in the fourth of Seneca's epistles to Paul,⁶ we read that the emperor (Nero) was delighted and surprised at the thoughts and sentiments in Paul's epistle to the Churches; and in the fourth of Paul's epistle to the philosopher,⁷ that the emperor is both an admirer and favourer of Christianity. These assertions are notoriously false, and contrary to the unanimous relations of heathen and Christian writers concerning Nero and his regard to the Christians. The Gospel of Mary contains at least two gross falsehoods and contradictions to historical fact; and not fewer than seven equally glaring instances exist in the pseudo-gospel or proto-evangelion of James;⁸ six others occur in the two gospels of Christ's infancy,⁹ which relate things notoriously contrary to the benevolent design of Christ's miracles, and to his pure and holy doctrine, which prohibited revenge, and promoted universal charity and love. Lastly, for it would exceed the limits of this article (already perhaps too much extended) to specify all the absurd falsehoods contained in the spurious writings which we have been considering—the Acts of Paul and Thecla directly falsify the doctrines and practice of the Apostle, concerning the unlawfulness of marriage, (which he is here said to have taught, though the reverse is evident to the most cursory reader of his epistle); and concerning the preaching of women.—Thecla being said to be commissioned by him to preach the gospel, though it was not only contrary to the practice of both Jews and Gentiles, but also to St. Paul's positive commands in his genuine epistles.¹⁰ But what proves the utter spuriousness of these Acts of Paul and Thecla,—if any further proof were wanting,—is the fact that Paul, whose life and writings bespeak him to have been a man of unimpeachable veracity, is introduced in them as uttering a wilful and deliberate lie. That he is so introduced is evident; for after an intimate acquaintance between Paul and Thecla,¹¹ and their having taken a journey together to Antioch,¹² he is presently made to deny her, and to tell Alexander, I know not the woman of whom you speak, nor does she belong to me. But how contrary this is to the known and true character of St. Paul every one must see. He, who so boldly stood up for the defence of the Gospel against all sorts of opposition, who hazarded and suffered all things for the sake of God and a good conscience, which he endeavoured to keep void of offence towards God and man, most unquestionably never would so easily have been betrayed to so gross a crime, as to make a sacrifice of the credit of his profession, and the peace of his conscience, at once upon so slight a temptation and provocation. Nor will it be of any force to object here, that in the received Scriptures

Abraham is said twice to have denied his wife, viz. Gen. xii. 19. and ix. 2 &c.; as also Isaac is said to have denied his, Gen. xxvi. 7, &c.; and in the New Testament that Peter denied his Master, and declared he did not know him, Matt. xxvi. 72; for the circumstances are in many cases different, and especially in this, that Paul appeared now in no danger if he had confessed her; or if he had been in danger might have easily delivered himself from it; to which we must add, that he had undergone a thousand more difficult trials for the sake of God and a good conscience, and never was by fear betrayed into such a crime.¹

"Such are the compositions which attempted to gain credit, as the real productions of the apostles and evangelists; and so striking is the contrast between them and the genuine writings, whose style they have so successfully endeavoured to imitate. It deserves the most serious consideration of every one, who is unhappily prejudiced against Christianity, or (what is almost as fatal) who has hitherto not thought the subject worthy his attention, whether, if the canonical books of the New Testament had been the productions of artifice or delusion, they would not have resembled those which are avowedly so, in some of their defects. Supposing it, for a moment, to be a matter of doubt, by whom the canonical books were written; or allowing them the credit, which is granted to all other writings having the same external authority, that of being written by the authors whose names they have always borne; upon either of these suppositions, the writers of the New Testament could not, either in situation or attainment, have had any advantages, humanly speaking, which the authors of the apocryphal books were not as likely to have possessed as themselves: consequently, if the first books had been founded upon the basis of fiction, it is surely most probable, that subsequent attempts would have equalled, if not improved upon, the first efforts of imposture. If, however, it appears, upon a candid and close investigation, that one set of compositions betrays no proofs of a design to impose upon others, and no marks that the authors were themselves deceived; while, on the contrary, the others evince in every page the plainest symptoms of mistake and fraud; is it fair, is it reasonable, to ascribe to a common origin, productions so palpably and essentially different? or, rather, is it not more just, and even philosophical, to respect truth in those performances, which bear the fair stamp of her features; and to abandon those, and those only, to contempt, which have indubitable traces of imposture?"²

IV. From the preceding view of the evidence concerning the apocryphal productions, which have lately been reprinted, the candid reader will readily be enabled to perceive how little cause there is, lest the credibility and inspiration of the genuine books of the New Testament should be affected by them. "How much soever we may lament the prejudice, the weakness, the wickedness, or the undefinable hostility of those who enter into warfare against the interests of Christ; whatever horror we may feel at the boldness or the scurrility of some anti-christian champions; we feel no alarm at the onsets of infidelity in its attempts against the Gospel. We know that the cause of Revelation has sustained already every species of assault which cunning could contrive, or power direct. It has had its enemies among the ignorant and among the learned, among the base and among the noble. Polite irony and vulgar ribaldry have been the weapons of its assailants. It has had its Celsus, and its Porphyry, and its Julian. And what were the effects of their opposition? The same as when the 'rulers and elders and scribes' united against it—its purification and increase. It has had its Bolingbrokes and its Woolstons, its Humes and its Gibbons: and what disadvantages has it sustained, what injuries has it received? Has it lost any of its pretensions, or been deprived of any portion of its majesty and grace, by their hatred and their hostility? Had they a system more credible, more pure, better comporting with the wants of man, and with the anticipations of everlasting existence, to enlighten and sanctify man, and to effect the regeneration of the world, for which they were able to prevail on mankind to exchange the system of Jesus of Nazareth? We gain but little from our reading, but little from our observation, if we shake with the trepidations of fear when truth and error are combatants. All facts connected with the history of the Christian religion are confirmations of a Christian's faith, that the doctrine which he believes, will resist every attack, and be victorious through all opposition. No new weapons can be forged by its enemies; and the temper and potency of those which they have so often tried, they will try in vain. They may march to battle; but they will never raise their trophies in the field."³

The apocryphal pieces which have thus been considered, have been in circulation for ages, as were many others of a similar kind, which have perished, leaving only their titles behind them, as a memorial that they once existed. Many of them, indeed, soon became extinct, the interest which was felt in them not affording the means of their preservation. But we think that it is of special importance, that some of the spurious productions which either the mistaken zeal of Christians, or the fraud of persons who were in hostility to the Gospel, sent abroad in the primitive or in later times, should have been saved from destruction. Such books as the "Gospel of Mary," the "Prot-evangelion," the "Gospel of the Infancy," the "Gospel of Nicodemus," "Paul and Thecla," &c. &c. are not only available as means of establishing the superior excellence of the books of the New Testament, in the composition of which there is the most admirable combination of majesty with simplicity, strikingly in contrast with the puerilities and irrationalities of the others:—but they are of great service in augmenting the evidences and confirming the proof of Christianity.⁴ So far, indeed, are these books from militating in any degree against the evangelical history, that on the contrary, they most decidedly corroborate it: for they are written in the names of those, whom our authentic Scriptures state to have been apostles and companions of apostles; and they all suppose the dignity of our Lord's person, and that a power of working miracles, together with a high degree of authority, was conveyed by him to his apostles. It ought also to be recollected that few, if any, of these books, were composed before the beginning of the second century. As they were not composed before that time, they might well refer (as most of them certainly do) to the commonly received books of the New Testament; and, therefore, instead of invalidating the credit of those sacred books, they really bear testimony to them. All these books are not properly spurious; that is, ascribed to authors who did not compose them: but, as they were not composed by apostles, nor at first ascribed to them, they may with great propriety be termed apocryphal: for they have in their titles the names of apostles, and they make a specious pretence of delivering a true history of their doctrines, discourses, miracles, and travels, though that history is not true and authentic, and was not written by any apostle or apostolic man. Further, we may account for the publication of these apocryphal or pseudopigraphal books as they were unquestionably owing to the fame of Christ and his apostles, and the great success of their ministry. And in this respect the case of the apostles of Jesus Christ is not singular: many men of distinguished characters have had discourses made for them, of which they knew nothing, and actions imputed to them which they never performed; and eminent writers have had works ascribed to them of which they were not the authors. Thus, various orations were falsely ascribed to Demosthenes and Lysias; many things were published in the names of Plautus, Virgil, and Horace, which never were composed by them. The Greek and Roman critics distinguished between the genuine and spurious works of those illustrious writers. The same laudable caution and circumspection were exercised by the first Christians, who did not immediately receive every thing that was proposed to them, but admitted nothing as canonical that did not bear the test of being the genuine production of the sacred writer with whose name it was inscribed, or by whom it professed to have been written. On this account it was that the genuineness of the Epistle to the Hebrews, of some of the Catholic Epistles, and of the Apocalypse, was for a short time doubted by some, when the other books of the New Testament were universally acknowledged. Upon the whole, the books which now are, and for a long time past have been, termed apocryphal, whether extant entire, or only in fragments,—together with the titles of such as are lost,—are monuments of the care, skill, and judgment of the first Christians, of their presiding ministers, and their other learned guides and conductors. The books in question afford no valid argument against either the genuineness or the authority of the books of the New Testament, which were generally received as written by the apostles and evangelists; but, on the contrary, they confirm the general accounts given us in the Canonical Scriptures, and thus indirectly establish the truth and divine authority of the Everlasting Gospel.⁵

No. II.

ON THE INSPIRATION OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES.

[Referred to in p. 93, of this Volume.]

I. Nature of Inspiration.—II. Observations on the Inspiration of the Old Testament.—III. And of the New Testament.—
IV. Conclusions derived from these considerations.

THE necessity of the divine inspiration of the sacred Scriptures having been stated, and the proofs of that inspiration having been exhibited at considerable length in the preceding pages, it is proposed in this place to offer to the biblical student a few additional observations on the nature and extent of such inspiration, the introduction of which would have interrupted the chain of argument in the former part of this volume.

I. Inspiration, in the highest sense, is the immediate communication of knowledge to the human mind by the Spirit of God; but, as we have already observed, it is commonly used by divines, in a less strict and proper sense, to denote such a degree of divine influence, assistance, or guidance, as enabled the authors of the Scriptures to communicate religious knowledge to others, without error or mistake, whether the subjects of such communication were things then immediately revealed to those who declared them, or things with which they were before acquainted.

“When it is said, that Scripture is divinely inspired, we are not to understand that the Almighty suggested every word, or dictated every expression. From the different styles in which the books are written, and from the different manner in which the same events are related and predicted by different authors, it appears that the sacred penmen were permitted to write as their several tempers, understandings, and habits of life, directed; and that the knowledge communicated to them by inspiration on the subject of their writings, was applied in the same manner as any knowledge acquired by ordinary means. Nor is it to be supposed that they were even thus inspired in every fact which they related, or in every precept which they delivered. They were left to the common use of their faculties, and did not, upon every occasion, stand in need of supernatural communication; but whenever, and as far as divine assistance was necessary, it was always afforded. In different parts of Scripture we perceive, that there were different sorts and degrees of inspiration. God enabled Moses to give an account of the creation of the world; Joshua to record with exactness the settlement of the Israelites in the land of Canaan; David to mingle prophetic information with the varied effusions of gratitude, contrition, and piety; Solomon to deliver wise instructions for the regulation of human life; Isaiah to deliver predictions concerning the future Saviour of mankind; Ezra to collect the Hebrew Scriptures into one authentic volume: but all these worketh that one and the self-same spirit, dividing to every man severally as he will. (1 Cor. xii. 11.) In like manner the apostles were enabled to record, in their own several styles and ways, the life and transactions of Jesus Christ. The measure of assistance thus afforded to the several writers of the Old and New Testament, has been termed INSPIRATION OF DIRECTION. In some cases, inspiration only produced correctness and accuracy in relating past occurrences, or in reciting the words of others; and preserved the writers generally from relating any thing derogatory to the revelation with which it was connected. This has been termed INSPIRATION OF SUPERINTENDENCY. Where, indeed, it not only communicated ideas, new and unknown before, but also imparted greater strength and vigour to the efforts of the mind than the writers could otherwise have attained, this divine assistance has been called INSPIRATION OF ELEVATION. Further, when the prophets and apostles received such communications of the Holy Spirit, as suggested and dictated minutely every part of the truths delivered, this, which is the highest degree of divine assistance, has been termed INSPIRATION OF SUGGESTION. All these kinds of inspiration are possible to the almighty power of God; since there is nothing in any of them contradictory to itself, or which appears contradictory to any of the divine perfections. But whatever distinctions are made with respect to the sorts, degrees, or modes of inspiration, we may rest assured that one property belongs to every inspired writing, namely, that it is free from error, that is, any material error. This property must be considered as extending to the whole of each of those writings, of which a part only is inspired; for it is not to be supposed that God would suffer any such errors as might tend to mislead our faith, or pervert our practice, to be mixed with those truths which he himself has mercifully revealed to his rational creatures as the means of their eternal salvation. In this restricted sense it may be asserted, that the sacred writers always wrote under the influence, or guidance, or care, of the Holy Spirit, which sufficiently establishes the truth and divine authority of all Scripture.”

II. That the authors of the historical books of the OLD TESTAMENT were occasionally inspired is certain, since they frequently display an acquaintance with the counsels and designs of God, and often reveal his future dispensations in the clearest predictions. But though it is evident that the sacred historians sometimes wrote under the immediate operation of the Holy Spirit, it does not follow that they derived from revelation the knowledge of those things which might be collected from the common sources of human intelligence. It is sufficient to believe, that, by the general superintendence of the Holy Spirit, they were directed in the choice of their materials, enlightened to judge of the truth and importance of those accounts from which they borrowed their information, and prevented from recording any material error. Indeed, the historical books (as we have already shown at considerable length)¹ were, and could not but be, written by persons who were for the most part contemporary with the periods to which they relate, and had a perfect knowledge of the events recorded by them; and who, in their descriptions of characters and events (of many of which they were witnesses) uniformly exhibit a strict sincerity of intention, and an unexampled impartiality. Some of these books, however, were compiled in subsequent times from the sacred annals mentioned in Scripture as written by prophets or seers, and from those public records, and other authentic documents, which, though written by uninspired men, were held in high estimation, and preserved with great care by persons specially appointed as keepers of the genealogies and public archives of the Jewish nation. It is not necessary to be able to distinguish the inspired from the uninspired parts of the historical books of the Old Testament. It is enough for us to know, that every writer of the Old Testament was inspired, and that the whole of the history it contains, without any exception or reserve, is true. These points being ascertained and allowed, it is of very little consequence, whether the knowledge of a particular fact was obtained by any of the ordinary modes of information, or whether it was communicated by immediate revelation from God; whether any particular passage was written by the natural powers of the historian, or by the positive suggestion of the Holy Spirit. Whatever uncertainty may exist concerning the direct inspiration of any historical narrative, or of any moral precept, contained in the Old Testament, we must be fully convinced that all its prophetic parts proceeded from God. This is continually affirmed by the prophets themselves, and is demonstrated by the indubitable testimony which history bears to the accurate fulfilment of many of these predictions; others are gradually receiving their accomplishment in the times in which we live, and afford the surest pledge and most positive security for the completion of those which remain to be fulfilled.

III. If the books of the Old Testament, which relate to the partial and temporary religion of the Jews, were written under the direction and superintendence of God himself, surely we cannot but conclude the same of the books of the NEW TESTAMENT, which contain the religion of all mankind. The apostles were constant attendants upon our Saviour during his ministry; and they were not only present at his public preaching, but after addressing himself to the multitudes in parables and similitudes, when they were alone he expounded all things to his disciples (Mark iv. 34). He also showed himself alive to the apostles, after his passion, by many infallible proofs, being seen by them forty days, and speaking of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God. (Acts i. 3.) Yet our Saviour foresaw that these instructions, delivered to the apostles as men, and impressed on the mind in the ordinary manner, would not qualify them for the great work of propagating his religion. It was, therefore, promised, that the Holy Ghost should not only bring all things to their remembrance, which the apostles had heard from their divine Master; but he was also to guide them into all truth, to teach them all things, and to abide with them for ever. (John xiv. 16, 17. 26. xvi. 13, 14.)

The truth into which the Holy Spirit was to lead them, means, undoubtedly, all that truth which, as the apostles of Jesus Christ, they were to declare unto the world. It does not mean natural, mathematical, or philosophical truth, and it would be absurd to refer the language of our Lord to either of these. But it means Christian Truth,—the truth which they were to teach mankind, to make them wise and holy, and direct them in the way to heaven through our Lord Jesus Christ. The apostles knew something of this truth already, but they did not know it perfectly. They were ignorant of some things, and mistaken as to others. But the Spirit was to guide them into all truth. No branch of it was to be kept from them. They were to be led into an acquaintance with religious truth in general; with the whole of that religious truth which it was necessary for them to teach, or for men to know. Must they not then have been preserved from error in what they taught and declared? The Spirit was to teach them all things:—not the things of the natural or civil world, but those things of the Gospel which they were as yet unacquainted with. And if the Holy Spirit taught them all things respecting Christianity, which they did not already know, then there was nothing in what they declared of the Christian system, but what they had received, either from his teachings, or from the instructions of Christ, which were of equal validity, or from the evidence of their senses, which could not deceive them; so that they must be preserved from error or mistake concerning it.

The Spirit was also to bring all things to their remembrance, that Christ had said unto them. Their memories were naturally like those of other men, imperfect and fallible; and amidst the numerous things, which their Lord had said and done amongst them, some would be forgotten. But the Spirit was to assist their memories in such a manner, that they should have a perfect recollection of whatsoever Christ had said to them. This assistance of the Spirit implied, not merely recalling to the view of their minds the things which Christ had spoken, but also the enabling them to understand those things rightly, without that confusion and misapprehension, which Jewish prejudices had occasioned in their ideas when they first heard them. Unless they were led into such a perfect understanding of the things they were enabled to remember, the bare recollection of them would be of little use, nor would the Spirit act according to his office of leading them into all truth, unless they were enabled, by his influences, properly to understand the truths which Christ himself had taught them.

The Holy Spirit, under whose teaching they were to be thus instructed, was to abide with them for ever, as the Spirit of truth, guiding them into all truth, teaching them all things respecting the doctrine of Christ, which they were to communicate to the world. These important promises of the effusion, assistance, direction, and perpetual guidance of the Spirit with the apostles, were most certainly fulfilled, in all their extent and meaning. They were promises given by Christ himself, the great and chief prophet of the church; and to entertain a doubt of their most complete accomplishment, would be to impeach the veracity and mission of the Son of God, and to admit a supposition that would strike at the truth of Christianity in general. From this examination, therefore, of the nature, extent, and fulfilment of our Lord's promises, concerning the gift of the Spirit to the apostles, does it not necessarily follow, that, in addition to what they previously knew of Christianity, they were led under the teachings of the Spirit into a perfect acquaintance with it; and that through his constant inhabitation and guidance, they were infallibly preserved in the truth, and kept from error in declaring it to mankind? The Spirit of truth guided them into all truth, and abode with them for ever.

It is material to remark that these promises of supernatural instruction and assistance plainly show the insufficiency of common instruction, and the necessity of inspiration in the first teachers of the Gospel; and we are positively assured that these promises were accurately fulfilled. Of the eight writers of the New Testament, Matthew, John, James, Peter, and Jude, were among these inspired preachers of the word of God; and, therefore, if we admit the genuineness and authenticity of the books ascribed to them, no reasonable doubt can be entertained of their inspiration. Indeed, if we believe that God sent Christ into the world to found an universal religion, and that by the miraculous gifts of the Holy Ghost he empowered the apostles to propagate the Gospel, as stated in these books, we cannot but believe that he would, by his immediate interposition, enable those whom he appointed to record the Gospel, for the use of future ages, to write without the omission of any important truth, or the insertion of any material error. The assurance that the Spirit should abide with the apostles for ever, must necessarily imply a constant inspiration, without change or intermission, whenever they exercised the office of a teacher of the Gospel, whether by writing or by speaking. Though Mark and Luke were not of the twelve apostles, nor were they miraculously called, like Paul, to the office of an apostle, yet we have the strongest reason to believe that they were partakers of the extraordinary effusion of the Holy Spirit granted to the disciples of Christ; and such was the unanimous opinion of the primitive Christians. Besides, a perfect harmony exists between the doctrines delivered by Mark and Luke, and by the other writers of the New Testament. Indeed, we can scarcely conceive it possible, that God would suffer four Gospels to be transmitted, as a rule of faith and practice to all succeeding generations, two of which were written under the immediate direction of his Holy Spirit, and the other two by the unassisted powers of the human intellect. It seems impossible that John, who wrote his Gospel more than sixty years after the death of Christ, should have been able, by the natural power of his memory, to recollect those numerous discourses of our Saviour which he has related. Indeed, all the evangelists must have stood in need of the promised assistance of the Holy Ghost to bring to remembrance the things which Christ had said during his ministry. We are to consider Luke in writing the Acts of the Apostles, and the apostles themselves in writing the Epistles, as under a similar guidance and direction. Paul, in several passages of his Epistles, asserts his own inspiration in the most positive and unequivocal terms. The agreement which subsists between his Epistles and the other writings of the New Testament is also a decisive proof that they all proceeded from one and the self-same Spirit. It appears, however, that the apostles had some certain method, though utterly unknown to us, of distinguishing that knowledge which was the effect of inspiration, from the ordinary suggestions and conclusions of their own reason.¹

IV. From the preceding account of the inspiration of the apostles, the two following conclusions are justly drawn by a late learned and sensible writer:—

1. First, that the apostles had a complete knowledge of Christianity, or of the Gospel which they published to mankind. When it is said that they had a complete knowledge of the Gospel, we mean, that they knew, and well understood, the truths which they were commissioned to preach, and the duties they were to inculcate. Having been instructed by Christ himself, having been witnesses of his works, and of his death and resurrection, and having received the Spirit to guide them into all truth, they had a competent knowledge of the various subjects, which they were to preach and publish to the world, to instruct men in the knowledge of God, the way of salvation, and the duties of holiness. They were neither insufficient nor defective preachers of the word of truth. They were at no loss to know what was true or what was false, what was agreeable to the will of God or what was not. They had a complete and consistent view of the whole system of Christian truth and duty; and there was no diversity of religious opinions amongst them. Their knowledge of Christianity was perfect, for they were acquainted with all things which it was the will of God should be revealed unto men, to teach them the way of salvation.

“Whether, as is most probable, the apostles had this complete knowledge of the Gospel at once, on the day of Pentecost; or whether there might be some truths and duties of religion which were not revealed to them until after that time, is of no importance for us to determine. For it is certain, that their knowledge of Christianity was complete long before the records of it in the New Testament were written for our instruction. It is evident, also, that the apostles, in the course of their ministry, were never at a loss what doctrines they were to preach, but had at all times a perfect knowledge of the things which it was the will of God they should, at those respective times, declare. Less than this cannot be inferred from their own declaration, that they spoke the things of the Gospel, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth.

"As the apostles, by means of our Lord's instructions and the teaching of his Spirit, had this complete knowledge of Christianity, it follows, that the most entire credit is to be given to their writings; and that they were not mistaken in what they have written concerning it, whether we suppose them to be immediately guided by the Spirit at the time they were writing or not. For, allowing only that they were honest men who completely understood Christianity, it is evident that they must give a true and faithful account of it. Honest men would not deceive, and men who had a complete knowledge of the subjects they were treating of could not be mistaken. If any errors in doctrine or sentiment were admitted into their writings, it must be either by design, or through accident. To imagine that they could be inserted designedly, would impeach the integrity of the apostles, and consequently their credibility in general. And to imagine that they crept in accidentally, would impeach the competency of their knowledge, and suppose that the apostles of Jesus Christ did not understand Christianity: a supposition that can never be reconciled with the very lowest construction which can be fairly put upon our Lord's promise, that the Spirit should guide them into all truth. Allowing them therefore to be out honest men, it follows, considering the sources of information they enjoyed, that all they have recorded concerning Christianity is truth, and that they were not mistaken in any of the positions which they laid down respecting it in their writings.

2. "A second and principal deduction, however, to be drawn from the account before given, and which is of most importance to the subject, is, that the apostles of Jesus Christ were under the infallible guidance of the Spirit of Truth, as to every religious sentiment which they taught mankind. Here, it may be necessary to explain the sense in which this expression is used. By every religious sentiment is intended, every sentiment that constitutes a part of Christian doctrine, or Christian duty. In every doctrine they taught, in every testimony they bore to facts respecting our Lord, in every opinion which they gave concerning the import of those facts, in every precept, exhortation, and promise they addressed to men, it appears to me, that they were under the infallible guidance of the Spirit of Truth. By being under his guidance is meant, that through his influence on their minds, they were infallibly preserved from error in declaring the Gospel, so that every religious sentiment they taught is true, and agreeable to the will of God.

"As to the nature of this influence and guidance, some things may be farther remarked. It was before observed, that inspiration, in the highest sense, is the immediate communication of knowledge to the human mind, by the Spirit of God. In this way the apostle Paul was taught the whole of Christianity; and this kind of inspiration the other apostles had, as to those things which they were not acquainted with, before they received the gift of the Holy Spirit. This is what some have called the inspiration of suggestion. But as to what they had heard, or partly known before, the influence of the Spirit enabled them properly to understand it, and preserved them from error in communicating it. This has been called the inspiration of superintendency. Under this superintendency, or guidance of the Spirit, the apostles appear to have been at all times throughout their ministry, after Christ's ascension. For less than this cannot be concluded, from our Lord's declaration, that the Spirit should abide with them for ever, and lead them into all truth.

"When they acted as writers, recording Christianity for the instruction of the church in all succeeding times, I apprehend that they were under the guidance of the Spirit, as to the subjects of which they treated; that they wrote under his influence and direction; that they were preserved from all error and mistake, in the religious sentiments they expressed; and that, if any thing were inserted in their writings, not contained in that complete knowledge of Christianity of which they were previously possessed (as prophecies for instance), this was immediately communicated to them by revelation from the Spirit. But with respect to the choice of words in which they wrote, I know not but they might be left to the free and rational exercise of their own minds, to express themselves in the manner that was natural and familiar to them, while at the same time they were preserved from error in the ideas they conveyed. If this were the case, it would sufficiently account for the very observable diversity of style and manner among the inspired writers. The Spirit guided them to write nothing but truth concerning religion, yet they might be left to express that truth in their own language.

"It may readily and justly be concluded, that men who were under the perpetual guidance of the Spirit of Truth when they preached the Gospel, were thus under his infallible direction and influence, as to all religious sentiments, when they committed the things of the Gospel to writing, for the future instruction of the church. This is the view of the inspiration of the writers of the New Testament, which seems naturally to arise, from their own account of the way in which they received their knowledge of Christianity, and from what is declared in their writings, concerning the constant agency and guidance of the Spirit, with which they were favoured." The following advantages attend this view of the subject:—

"Maintaining that the apostles were under the infallible direction of the Holy Spirit, as to every religious sentiment contained in their writings, secures the same advantages as would result from supposing that every word and letter was dictated to them by his influences, without being liable to those objections which might be made against that view of the subject. As the Spirit preserved them from all error in what they have taught and recorded, their writings are of the same authority, importance, and use to us, as if he had dictated every syllable contained in them. If the Spirit had guided their pens in such a manner, that they had been only mere machines under his direction, we could have had no more in their writings than a perfect rule, as to all religious opinions and duties, all matters of faith and practice. But such a perfect rule we have in the New Testament, if we consider them as under the Spirit's infallible guidance in all the religious sentiments they express, whether he suggested the very words in which they are written or not. Upon this view of the subject, the inspired writings contain a perfect and infallible account of the whole will of God for our salvation, of all that is necessary for us to know, believe, and practise in religion; and what can they contain more than this, upon any other view of it!

"Another advantage attending the above view of the apostolic inspiration is, that it will enable us to understand some things in their writings, which it might be difficult to reconcile with another view of the subject. If the inspiration and guidance of the Spirit, respecting the writers of the New Testament, extended only to what appears to be its proper province, matters of a religious and moral nature, then there is no necessity to ask, whether every thing contained in their writings were suggested immediately by the Spirit or not: whether Luke were inspired to say, that the ship in which he sailed with Paul was wrecked on the island of Melita (Acts xxviii. 1.); or whether Paul were under the guidance of the Spirit, in directing Timothy to bring with him the cloke which he left at Troas, and the books, but especially the parchments (2 Tim. iv. 13.); for the answer is obvious, these were not things of a religious nature, and no inspiration was necessary concerning them. The inspired writers sometimes mention common occurrences or things in an incidental manner, as any other plain and faithful men might do. Although, therefore, such things might be found in parts of the evangelic history, or in epistles addressed to churches or individuals, and may stand connected with important declarations concerning Christian doctrine or duty, yet it is not necessary to suppose, that they were under any supernatural influence in mentioning such common or civil affairs, though they were, as to all the sentiments they inculcated respecting religion.

"This view of the subject will also readily enable a plain Christian, in reading his New Testament, to distinguish what he is to consider as inspired truth. Every thing which the apostles have written or taught concerning Christianity; every thing which teaches him a religious sentiment or a branch of duty, he must consider as divinely true, as the mind and will of God, recorded under the direction and guidance of his Spirit. It is not necessary that he should inquire, whether what the apostles taught be true. All that he has to search after is, their meaning; and when he understands what they meant, he may rest assured that meaning is consistent with the will of God, is divine infallible truth. The testimony of men who spoke and wrote by the Spirit of God is the testimony of God himself; and the testimony of the God of Truth is the strongest and most indubitable of all demonstration.

"The above view of the apostolic inspiration will likewise enable us to understand the apostle Paul, in the seventh chapter of his first epistle to the Corinthians, where in some verses he seems to speak as if he were not inspired, and in others as if he were. Concerning some things he saith, But I speak this by permission, and not of commandment (ver. 6.); and again, I have no commandment of the Lord; yet I give my judgment, as one that hath obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful (ver. 25.). The subject on which the apostle here delivers his opinion was a matter of Christian prudence, in which the Corinthians had desired his advice. But it was not a part of religious sentiment or practice; it was not a branch of Christian doctrine or duty, but merely a casuistical question of prudence, with relation to the distress which persecution then occasioned. Paul, therefore, agreeably to their request, gives them his opinion as a faithful man; but he guards them against supposing that he was under divine inspiration in that opinion, lest their consciences should be shackled, and he leaves them at liberty to follow his advice or not, as they might find convenient. Yet he intimates that he had the Spirit of the Lord as a Christian teacher; that he had not said any thing contrary to his will; and that the opinion which he gave was, on the whole, advisable in the present distress. But the Apostle's declaration, that, as to this particular matter, he spoke by permission, and not of commandment, strongly implies, that in other things, in things really of a religious nature, he did speak by commandment from the Lord. Accordingly, in the same chapter, when he had occasion to speak of what was matter of moral duty, he immediately claimed to be under divine direction in what he wrote. And unto the married I command, yet not I, but the Lord, Let not the wife depart from her husband. (1 Cor. vii. 10.) This would be a breach of one of the chief obligations of morality, and therefore Paul interdicts it under the divine authority. Respecting indifferent things he gave his judgment as a wise and faithful friend; but respecting the things of religion he spake and wrote as an apostle of Jesus Christ, under the direction and guidance of his Spirit.¹¹

No. III.

ON THE ASCENSION OF JESUS CHRIST.

[Referred to in p. 114 of this Volume.]

THE Ascension of Jesus Christ into heaven, however astonishing it may appear, is a miraculous FACT, which, like every other matter of fact, is capable of proof from testimony. It is not necessary, in this place, again to prove the confidence which is due to the apostolic testimony, because we have already stated its force when treating on the resurrection of Christ. (pp. 249—258. supra.) It only remains to show that the circumstances of the fact contributed to its certainty, by removing every idea of deceit or fraud on the one hand, and of error on the other.

1. Observe the PLACE of his Ascent.

It was a mountain, the mount of Olives, a spot which was well known to the apostles, for it had been the scene of many of Christ's conversations with them. On an eminence or hill, there was less probability of the spectators being deceived, than there would have been in many other places, where the view was confined and the sight obstructed; and where, if any delusion had been intended, he might have more easily conveyed himself out of their sight, and by a sudden disappearance given room for the imagination or invention of some extraordinary removal from them. But, from this eminence, the view around them must have been more extensive, any collusive concealment of himself from them must have been more easily discovered, a real ascent into heaven more clearly seen, and the ascent itself for a longer space and with greater distinctness pursued, and attended to, by the beholders. So that, if Christ's ascension was to be real, an eminence or hill was the most proper place that could be chosen from which he could rise, because he could be more distinctly, and for the most considerable space, beheld. But, assuredly, it was the most unsuitable of all others, if any fraud were intended, to favour deceit, and render imposition effectual. No impostor would have selected such a spot, in order to feign an ascension.

2. The TIME must also be considered, when this fact took place.

It was during broad day-light, while an impostor would have availed himself of darkness in order to effect his escape. Under such circumstances, the apostles might have credited an illusion; but illusion is impossible, when every object is illuminated by a strong light.

3. Observe further the MANNER of Christ's Ascent towards heaven.

(1.) It was not instantaneous and sudden, nor violent and tempestuous, but gradual, easy, and slow. Romulus was said to have been lost in a furious storm of thunder and lightning, and being suddenly missed by the Roman people, they were the more easily persuaded of his translation into heaven: which tale the patricians first invented, in order to cover the suspicion that, during the storm, they had seized the opportunity of assassinating him; though there is not the shadow of a pretence that any one saw his translation. On the contrary, Christ's ascension was public, gentle, and by degrees; so that the eyes of the beholders steadily followed him, rose with him as he advanced higher, and pursued him until lost in the immensity of the height of heaven. The spectators "looked steadfastly towards heaven as he went up," till the cloud had carried him out of their sight.

(2.) Moreover, it is a remarkable circumstance in this account, that he was taken from them, while they were actually near him; while he was in the midst of them, conversing with them, instructing and blessing them: and, in the midst of these transactions, "whilst they beheld him," and their eyes were attentively fixed on him, he arose out of their sight into the celestial glory. The apostles, therefore, could not be imposed on by any sudden and fallacious conveyance of himself away from them.

4. The SENSE OF HEARING also came in aid of sight; for, if any error could be supposed in the latter, it is impossible to admit any mistake in the former. The apostles could not possibly imagine that they heard the consolatory discourse by which two angels announced to them that Jesus, who had thus ascended into heaven, would at the last day "so come in like manner as they had seen him go into heaven."

5. The NUMBER, too, of these witnesses is a strong confirmation of their testimony.

It was in the view of all the apostles. He was taken up, after he had given commandment to them, while they were ALL assembled together, and while they themselves were actually beholding him.

To all these circumstances it may be added, that the evident proofs which (it is shown in the ensuing article of this Appendix) demonstrate the effusion of the Holy Spirit on the apostles, also demonstrate the reality of their Master's ascension.

Since, therefore, we have the unanimous testimony of persons, who by the evidence of their own sight, confirmed by the voice of angels, were assured of Christ's ascension; since they were persons incapable of forming or conducting any artful design; since it was a doctrine, which, if false, could be productive of no advantage to the propagators of it; and since they persevered in asserting it in despite of all the tortures that cruelty could devise or power could inflict; we have the fullest evidence of the reality of Christ's ascension, which the nature of the fact can admit, or we in reason can require.²

ON THE DESCENT OF THE HOLY SPIRIT ON THE APOSTLES.

[Referred to in p. 114. of this Volume.]

If the Gospel be the invention of man,—if Jesus Christ has not risen from the dead and ascended into heaven,—the DESCENT of the Holy Spirit on the apostles, together with the effects produced by it, is another fact for which no adequate cause can be assigned. The miracle itself is related in the second chapter of the Acts of the Apostles. Taking it for granted that the reader has perused the graphic narrative of the evangelist Luke, we shall proceed to offer a few remarks upon this fact.

1. This amazing and astonishing gift, the gift of tongues, was a miracle, new and unheard of in former ages, and greater or more decisive than any which had been wrought by Jesus Christ himself, during his ministry. Demoniacal possessions, or diseases, might be counterfeited; even death might be only apparent; the reality, therefore, of such cures and restorations to life, might be questioned by gainsayers and denied by infidels. But, to inspire twelve unlettered Galileans, (who knew only their mother-tongue, and whose dialect was proverbial for its vulgarity,) suddenly, and instantaneously, with the knowledge and expression of sixteen or eighteen different languages or dialects; when, in the ordinary course of things, it is a work requiring no small labour fully to understand a single new language, and still more to speak it with fluency and correctness; this was indeed a miracle of the most stupendous nature, carrying with it the most overpowering and irresistible conviction, the simplest and plainest in itself, and utterly impossible to be counterfeited. For, if the apostles had expressed themselves improperly, or with a bad accent, as most people do when they speak a living language which is not natural to them, the hearers, who at that time were not converted to Christianity, would have suspected some fraud, would have taken notice of such faults, and would have censured them; but, since no such objections were made, we are justified in concluding that they had no ground for censure.

It is no wonder, then, that the effect was so prodigious as the conversion of three thousand prejudiced Jews, in one day, to the faith of a crucified Saviour at Jerusalem,—the very scene of his ignominious crucifixion, and only fifty days afterwards, on the day of Pentecost.

In reviewing the whole of the transaction, this alternative necessarily presents itself. Either the apostles themselves were deceived, in the first place, or they wished to impose on others, respecting the descent of the Holy Spirit, and the miracles which accompanied it.

If the mind revolts at the first of these suppositions, on account of its absurdity, the second can scarcely appear more reasonable. Men, who undertake to establish a religion, and to whom credit is necessary, will not invent a fable which can be confuted upon the spot by all those persons to whose testimony they appeal. They will not place the scene of their pretended miracle under the eyes of an innumerable multitude, in the very midst of their enemies. They will not blend with their recital incidents notoriously false, utterly useless for their purpose, and peculiarly well adapted to convict them of fraud and deceit.

I can easily conceive persons remaining in a state of doubt or unbelief, who take only a general view of this history, after the lapse of eighteen centuries, without giving themselves the trouble to weigh all its circumstances. But will not conviction succeed to unbelief and doubt, if they transport themselves to the very time and spot, when and where the event took place; if they reflect that they are reading the work of a contemporary author, and that the facts related in his book were published throughout Judea, in Greece, and in Asia Minor, before he composed his history?

In the history of remote ages, the facts recorded not unfrequently borrow their authority from the character of the writer; out, in a recent and contemporary history, the writer is indebted for all his authority to the truth of the facts which he narrates. The book of the Acts of the Apostles would never have been received as a canonical book, if the first Christians had not found in it those facts which they all believed, and of which many of them had actually been eye-witnesses. And such, especially, were the miracles which distinguished the day of Pentecost.

2. Besides this proof, which arises out of the nature of the fact and the circumstances that attended it, there is another, not less striking, which is founded on the connection of this miracle with the events that preceded and followed it.

We have already had occasion to observe the striking difference in the conduct of the apostles before and after their Master's death (see pp. 113, 114.); and this change is the more remarkable, because it was contrary to what might naturally have been expected. But the descent of the Holy Spirit explains to us why the apostles, who were so ignorant and timid when they were instructed and supported by their Master, were filled with so much wisdom and intrepidity, when they seemed to be abandoned to themselves;—why these men, who had fled at the sight of the danger that threatened Jesus, boldly published his divinity in the presence of the very men who had crucified him;—and why Peter, who had basely denied him at the word of a female servant, so boldly confessed him in the midst of the synagogue.

Separate from this history the miraculous descent of the Holy Spirit, and you can no longer perceive either motive, connection, or probability in this series of facts otherwise incontestable. Every one of those facts is contrary to the common principles of moral order.—The apostles, the converted Jews, as well as those who continued to reject the Gospel, do nothing which they ought to do, and every thing which they ought not to do. The city of Jerusalem for a long series of years was only a scene of illusion and delirium. We should not endure even the reading of a romance, in which all the personages should be represented as acting like those who are exhibited in the establishment of Christianity.

But, would you give order and connection to the facts? Would you ascribe to all the actors motives, conduct, and a character consistent with nature? Would you render credible a history, the basis of which, after all, it is impossible for you to deny, and the consequences of which it is impossible to mistake?—Put in its proper place the visible descent of the Holy Spirit; and this miracle alone will render an infinite number of others unnecessary. You will find in it an explanation of those difficulties which perplex your mind, and which cannot be satisfactorily explained upon any other hypothesis.

3. Observe, further, the intrinsic probability of the miracle, which was wrought on the day of Pentecost—a probability, founded on the agreement of the fact with the known designs and predictions of the author of Christianity.

During his life, Jesus Christ had confined his ministry within the limits of Judæa: he was not sent, as he himself declared, “but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel” (Matt. xv. 24.): his doctrine was not to be preached to the Gentiles, until after his death. That mission was reserved for the apostles, and he solemnly charged them to fulfil it, just before his ascension into heaven. But, before they could enter upon their apostolic functions, it was necessary that these timid and ignorant men should receive the Holy Spirit agreeably to Christ's promise,—even that Spirit by whom they were to be endued with power from on high and guided into all truth. The miracle of the day of Pentecost was then announced and foretold. But, what grandeur, what wisdom, what an admirable selection of circumstances do we see in the fulfilment of this prediction! The apostles were appointed the teachers of all nations; and it was in the sight of persons of every nation, assembled at Jerusalem on occasion of one of the great solemnities of the Mosaic Law, that they received from heaven the authentic credentials of the divine mission. Sent to all nations, it was necessary that all nations should be able to understand them. By an astonishing miracle these men were enabled, without study, to speak all the languages or dialects of the East. But the gift of tongues was not conferred on them merely to accelerate the progress of their doctrine: it serves also to characterise, from its very birth, that universal religion which embraces both Jew and Gentile, Greek and Barbarian.

How closely connected is every part of the evangelical history! How admirably do the means answer to the end! How do the most signal miracles acquire probability by their mutual relation and by the place which they hold in the dispensation of religion!

EXAMINATION OF THE DIFFICULTIES ATTENDANT ON THE PROPAGATION OF CHRISTIANITY.

[Referred to in p. 114, of this Volume]

"THE rapid and astonishing progress, which Christianity made in the world in a very few years after its publication, is not only an irrefragable argument of its divine origin and truth, but also a striking instance of the credulity of those, who assert that the Gospel is the contrivance of man. For, according to the common course of things, how utterly incredible was it, that the religion taught by an obscure person, in an obscure station of life, in an obscure country, should in so short a space of time penetrate to the utmost boundaries of the Roman empire. According to all present appearances, how romantic and visionary would the assertion of a private Jew seem to a philosopher, to whom he should declare that the principles of the sect, which he had founded, should be preached to every creature under heaven! That a miserable company of fishermen, from a country that was despicable to a proverb, without learning and without interest, should penetrate into the heart of so many various nations, should establish their tenets in the bosom of the largest cities, and gain converts to their principles in the courts of sovereigns and princes, is a truth not to be accounted for on any principal but that of a signal and divine interposition in their favour." The force of this argument will more fully appear if we take a short retrospect of the progress of Christianity.

Two months had not elapsed after the death of Jesus Christ, when his apostles suddenly presented themselves, and publicly taught in the midst of Jerusalem; whence their doctrine spread throughout Judæa and the neighbouring provinces. Shortly after, it was carried into Greece, Italy, and even into Spain. They founded societies of Christians in the cities of Cæsarea, Rome, Athens, Corinth, Thessalonica, Phillippi, Antioch, Ephesus, and in many other regions, towns, and cities; so that, (as heathen adversaries, together with Christian writers, acknowledge), before three centuries were completed, the Gospel had penetrated into every region of the then known world, and far beyond the boundaries of the Roman empire. Wherever the preachers of Christianity travelled, they declared that the person, whose religion they taught, had been despised by his own countrymen and crucified by the Romans. And, what is more, they preached a religion which was contrary to the pleasures and passions of mankind; which prohibited all sensual indulgences; which indispensably required from its professors temperance, self-denial, and inviolable purity and sanctity of manners, and was diametrically repugnant to the prevailing principles and maxims of those times. "It is wonderful beyond all example, that a few illiterate Galileans issuing from an obscure corner of a distant Roman province, unlearned and unsupported, should, in no long time, overturn the two greatest establishments that ever were erected in the world, and triumph over all the power of every confederated nation, that universally associated to oppose them. Such an astonishing and sudden revolution in the religious and moral state of the world, produced by such agents, could be effected by nothing less than a most signal interposition of God, endowing these his messengers with supernatural powers, and visibly supporting them in the cause in which they were engaged." Indeed, if we contrast the various obstacles, which actually opposed the progress of the Gospel, with the human means which its preachers enjoyed, we must feel the justice of the remark that was made by an apostle:—"God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty." (1 Cor. i. 27.) For, no sooner was the Christian church formed into a body, than it was assailed by three descriptions of enemies, either all at once or in succession, viz. 1. The prejudices of authority and of human wisdom;—2. The violence of persecution;—and, 3. The artifices of policy.

I. The progress of Christianity was assailed and impeded by the PREJUDICES OF AUTHORITY AND OF HUMAN WISDOM. From its very origin, the Gospel was "a stumbling-block to the Jews, and to the Greeks foolishness."

1. With regard to the JEWS:—On the one hand, we behold that people exclusively attached to the law of Moses, and intoxicated with pride, on account of their being descended from Abraham; their hypocritical teachers who affected to be models of wisdom, piety, and holiness, usurping the highest influence over the minds of the people, who were blindly devoted to the prejudices which they cherished, respecting the duration of the levitical worship, the nature of the Messiah's kingdom, and the importance of their traditions. And, on the other hand, we see twelve men,—from the lowest class of their nation, formerly imbued with the same prejudices, who accused them of making void the Commandments of God by their traditions:—who deeply offended their national pride by telling them that the Almighty was not the God of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles, and that the heathen would rise up as witnesses against them, and would be admitted into covenant with God, while they themselves would be excluded from it:—who announced to them that the levitical worship was about to terminate, and that the Supreme Being was no longer to be adored exclusively at Jerusalem, but that men might offer to him acceptable worship at all times and in all places:—who substituted to the splendid ceremonial enjoined by the Mosaic law (which was a constant source of credit and of emolument to a host of ministers who attended at the alters) a simple and spiritual worship, which rendered their functions useless, and in which every Christian was to be the priest, the altar, and the victim:—who undeceived them respecting the nature of the Messiah's Kingdom, by apprising them, that it is not of this world, and that they must renounce all their ardent hopes concerning it:—who censured with equal force and boldness their pharisaic devotion, long prayers, ostentatious fasts, and all those exterior observances, in which they made the essence of piety to consist:—and, finally, who excited their self-love, by preaching to them the stumbling-block of the cross. Can any one believe that these were likely means to procure the preachers of the Gospel a hearing,—much less to censure them success?

2. With regard to the HEATHEN NATIONS, the prejudices opposed by paganism were not less powerful than those entertained by the Jews. Pagan idolatry traced its origin to the remotest antiquity. The most imposing pomp and magnificence entered into its worship and ceremonies. Temples of the most splendid architecture,—statues of exquisite sculpture,—priests and victims superbly adorned,—attendant youths of both sexes, blooming with beauty, performing all the sacred rites with gracefulness heightened by every ornament,—magistrates arrayed in the insignia of their office,—religious feasts, dances, and illuminations,—concerts of the sweetest voices and instruments,—perfumes of the most delightful fragrance,—every part of the heathen religion, in short, was contrived to allure and to captivate the senses and the heart. Amid all these attractive objects, we see, on the one hand, a multitude of priests enjoying the most extensive influence, supported by omens, auguries, and every kind of divination to which ignorance and anxiety for the future attribute so much power, while their persons were rendered sacred under that profound idolatry and superstition which had overspread the earth. And, on the other, we see twelve Jewish fishermen, declaring that those deities which had so long been revered were only dumb idols, and that they must turn to the one living and true God, the maker of heaven and earth; and who had conceived no less a design than that of expelling so many deities, throwing down so many altars, putting an end to so many sacrifices, and, consequently, of annihilating the dignity of such a multitude of priests, and of drying up the sources of their riches and credit. And can any one believe that these were likely means of success? Further,—

• Dr. Harwood's Introduction to the New Testament, vol. i. p. 80.

• Ibid. p. 85.

On the one hand, we see paganism intimately united with political governments, and sovereigns making use of its decisions in order to justify the enterprises even of tyrannical power. More particularly at Rome, under the republic, religion was a political system admirably adapted to the genius of the people, and was not only protected but in many instances administered by the civil magistrate: it grew with the growth of the republic, and seemed to promise itself a duration equal to that of the eternal city. During the imperial government, we see the emperors causing altars to be erected to themselves, in their life-time, or expecting them after their death.

On the other hand, we behold a religion, according to which an apotheosis is an act of daring impiety; which, inculcating only one God, allowed no rival deity to those who embraced it; and which therefore necessarily caused its followers to be accounted both impious and rebels. Can any rational person believe that these were proper or likely means to cause such a religion to be received?

Lastly, on the one hand, we see corruption, the fruit of ignorance, and of error combined with the passions, spread over the earth, the most shameful practices sanctioned by the precepts and the examples of the philosophers, vices ranked as virtues, in short, a state of universal depravity, both moral and religious, which the apostle Paul has by no means exaggerated in the sketch of it which he has drawn; since it is fully justified by contemporary authors, both Jews and Heathens. On the other hand, again, behold the Gospel, inculcating a sublime morality which at that time was more difficult to be observed than ever; referring every thing to the glory of God, and enjoining the renunciation of passions equally cherished and corrupted, together with a total change of heart and mind, continual efforts after holiness, the duty of imitating even God himself, and the absolute necessity of taking up the cross of Christ, and submitting to the loss of all earthly good, as well as to the endurance of every evil. Think, how sinful propensities would rise at hearing this novel doctrine, how the corrupt heart of man would be offended at it, and how horrible that salutary hand must appear, which came to apply the probe, the knife, and the fire to so many gangrened parts: and then say, whether these were likely or probable means to obtain a reception for that doctrine? Does not the success, which attended the labours of the first preachers of the Gospel,—a success not only without a cause, but also contrary to all human causes,—does not this success demonstrate the mighty protection of God, and the victorious force of truth?

II. THE VIOLENCE OF PERSECUTION WAS another most formidable obstacle to the propagation of the Christian religion.

In fact, from its first origin to the time of Constantine, Christianity, with the exception of a few short intervals, was subjected to the most violent persecutions. At Jerusalem the apostles were imprisoned, scourged, or put to death in various ways. Wherever they directed their steps, they were pursued by the Jews, who either accused them before Jewish and Heathen tribunals, or stirred up the populace against them. But these persecutions were, comparatively, only slight forerunners of those which succeeding ages witnessed; and ecclesiastical history (which is corroborated by heathen writers as well as by heathen edicts and inscriptions that are still extant) records ten grievous GENERAL persecutions of the Christians under the pagan emperors, within the space of two hundred and fifty years.

1. The first who led the way in these attacks upon the professors of the Christian faith, was the ferocious Nero; who, in order that he might wreak upon them the odium which he had justly incurred for setting the city of Rome on fire, inflicted upon them the most exquisite tortures, attended with every circumstance of the most refined cruelty. Some were crucified; others, impaled; some were tied up in the skins of wild beasts that they might be torn to pieces by dogs; and others were wrapped in garments dipped in pitch and other combustibles, and burnt as torches in the gardens of Nero, and in other parts of the city, by night. This persecution, though it raged most at Rome during the year 64, appears to have continued, with little abatement, nearly three years (A. D. 64—67), and to have extended to every part of the empire.

The short reigns of Galba, Otho, and Vitellius, and the mild and equitable administration of the emperors Vespasian and Titus, gave some rest to the Christians, until,

2. Domitian, succeeding to the empire, began a new persecution, which also continued almost three years, A. D. 93—96. "For this persecution no motive is assigned, but the prodigious increase of converts to Christianity, and their refusal to pay divine honours to the emperor. The extent and severity of this persecution may be conceived from Domitian's including among its victims even his chief ministers and his nearest kindred and relations." The death of this second Nero delivered the Christians from this calamity; and his successor, Nerva, permitted them to enjoy a season of tranquility, and rescinded the sanguinary edicts of his predecessor.

3. The second century of the Christian era opened with the persecution, which was commenced in the reign of Trajan, when so great a multitude of believers suffered martyrdom, that the emperor, astonished at the accounts which he received, prohibited them to be sought for; though, if they were accused, he permitted them to be punished. This persecution continued under the reign of Hadrian, the adopted son and successor of Trajan.

4, 5. The fourth and fifth persecutions prevailed under Antoninus and Marcus Aurelius. The apology, addressed by Justin Martyr to the former emperor, induced him to stop all proceedings against the Christians in Europe; but a very strong edict from Antoninus could only quash the persecution in Asia. And under Marcus Aurelius, who credulously listened to the calumnious charges of their enemies, the torture and the cross were in full force against the professors of the Christian faith.

6—10. In the third century, several persecutions are recorded to have taken place. Severus, Maximin, Decius, and Valerian, successively attacked the Christians, and let loose all their imperial vengeance against them. "But the climax of persecution was carried to its utmost height in the reign of Dioclesian," which indeed extended into the fourth century. In this persecution, "the fury of the pagan world, instigated by Galerius and other inveterate enemies of Christianity, was poured forth with unparalleled violence, and with a determinate resolution (it should seem) to extirpate, if possible, the whole race of believers. The utmost pains were taken to compel Christians to deliver up to the magistrates all the copies of the Holy Scriptures, that they might be publicly burnt, and every vestige of their religion destroyed. But although this part of the imperial edict, together with that which respected the demolition of the Christian churches, was executed with extreme rigour; yet such were the firmness and fidelity of the Christians, and such their profound reverence for the sacred writings, that many of them suffered the severest tortures rather than comply with this decree." The human imagination, indeed, was almost exhausted in inventing a variety of tortures. Some were impaled alive; others had their limbs broken, and in that condition were left to expire. Some were roasted by slow fires, and some suspended by the feet with their heads downward; and, a fire being made under them, were suffocated by the smoke. Some had melted lead poured down their throats, and the flesh of some was torn off with shells; and others had the splinters of reeds thrust beneath the nails of their fingers and toes. The few, who were not capitally punished, had their limbs and their features mutilated. No war, that had ever taken place, had caused the death of so great a multitude of persons as this tenth general persecution devoured. Almost the whole of the then known world was deluged with the blood of the martyrs. If the Gospel be only the contrivance of man, the conduct of these its defenders is utterly inexplicable.

III. But not only was the progress of Christianity impeded by he prejudices of authority and human wisdom, as well as by the violence of persecution; it also encountered a formidable obstacle in the ARTIFICES OF POLICY.

As soon as those who had embraced the religion of Jesus Christ began to be known by the appellation of Christians, they were pourtrayed by their enemies in the blackest colours. Jews and heathens alike united all their efforts to ruin a religion which tended to annihilate every thing that appeared venerable to them, regardless of the evidences which demonstrated that religion to be from God: and they represented the professors of the Gospel as dangerous innovators, the declared enemies of all that was sacred, disturbers of the public peace, profligate and immoral; in short, as persons utterly destitute of religion, and impious atheists. These, unquestionably, are most powerful means of prejudicing nations against a doctrine; and for a long time the church had to conflict with these calumnies.

When the Christians began to indulge the hope of enjoying some tranquillity, after Constantine was invested with the imperial purple, and had declared themselves their protector, a new enemy arose, who employed the most insidious artifices against the Christian faith. The emperor Julian, who had apostatised from the Gospel, in his zeal for the restoration of paganism, left no means unattempted to undermine the very foundations of the church. Though he refrained from open persecution, yet he connived at that of his officers, who persecuted the Christians in places remote from the court. He endeavoured to reform paganism, and to bring it as near as might be to the admirable methods, by which he perceived Christianity had prevailed in the world. He diligently seized every opportunity of exposing Christians and their religion to ridicule; and exhausted all his powers of wit and sophistical ingenuity to exhibit them in a contemptible point of view. Sometimes, he endeavoured to surprise unwary Christians into a compliance with pagan superstitions, that he might raise horror in their minds, or injure their reputation. At others, he sought by all means to weaken the power and influence of the Christians, by depriving them of all places of honour and authority, unless they would sacrifice to idols, and by incapacitating them from holding any civil offices, from executing testaments, or transferring any inheritance. Among other expedients to which Julian's hatred of Christianity induced him to have recourse, was the endeavour to suppress and extinguish all human learning among the Christians, well knowing how naturally ignorance opens a door to contempt, barbarism, and impiety. With this design, he prohibited them from teaching philosophy, and the liberal arts, and annulled all the privileges which they had hitherto enjoyed. And, lastly, still further to gratify his rancour against the Christians, he protected and favoured the Jews, and resolved to rebuild their temple at Jerusalem: but this attempt served only to afford a further testimony to the truths of the Gospel predictions: for it is related both by pagan as well as Christian historians, that balls of fire repeatedly issued from the foundations and destroyed many of the artificers, and scorched the rest, who, after many attempts, were compelled to desist from their purpose. These various acts, however, proved fruitless. The Christians, though oppressed, continued faithful to their religion, and the death of Julian, after a short reign, left the church in safety.

From the preceding view of the progressive establishment of Christianity, it is evident that it was not indebted for its success to the nature of its doctrine, or to the personal qualities of those who taught it, or to the dispositions and prejudices of those who embraced it, or, lastly, to the influence of the government. On the contrary, the striking contrasts between the nature of Christianity and the state of the world were such powerful obstacles to it, that they excited against it both Jews and Gentiles. Princes, priests, and philosophers, vied with one another, in making the greatest efforts to extinguish this religion. Means the most insidious as well as the most cruel appeared to be the most certain for the accomplishment of their designs. Persecutions, opprobrium, unheard-of torments, the most exquisite punishments, as well as politic artifices, were employed for three successive centuries, in order to prevent it from establishing itself, and yet it did establish itself throughout every part of the then known world. Unquestionably, this great revolution is not to be accounted for by means so contrary to the end. Where then are we to seek for other human means?

Do we find them in the eloquence of its preachers? But they did not possess that human eloquence which surprises and subjugates the mind; and if they had that eloquence, which carries persuasion with it, because it proceeds from a heart deeply penetrated and convinced, it is the seal of truth, and not of imposture.

Shall we seek for them in credit and authority? It would be utterly ridiculous and absurd to attribute any wordly credit or authority to the apostles.

Do we find them in their riches? They had none to offer: besides, they who were desirous of embracing the Gospel were required to be ready to abandon their possessions. Could earthly pleasures promote their success? The persecutions to which Christians were exposed cut them off from every hope of enjoying them.

Did the apostles possess the means of constraining persons to embrace their doctrines? The first preachers of the Gospel were totally destitute of coercive means, and the nature of their doctrine prohibited them from having any recourse to them. Yet all these means were employed against them in their utmost force.

If, notwithstanding all these obstacles, and this weakness of its resources, there is nothing inexplicable in the establishment of Christianity, how comes it to pass, since it did spread into every part of the known world, that all the philosophers of antiquity had only a small number of disciples? Those philosophers, with all their united knowledge, eloquence, and celebrity, never were able to effect any change in religion, or to produce any general moral reformation in the world; and yet the antagonists of Christianity think it an easy matter that twelve fishermen should have enlightened the world, and persuaded it to abandon its false gods, to renounce its vices, and to follow a man who expired upon the cross, and to die for him!

The establishment of Christianity is a fact so striking, so singular, so contrary to every thing which has ever yet been seen, so disproportionate to its apparent causes, that it was not without reason remarked by a father of the church, that if Christianity established itself without a miracle, it is itself the greatest of all miracles.¹

A TABLE OF THE CHIEF PROPHECIES RELATIVE TO THE MESSIAH.

CHAPTER I.

THE PRINCIPAL PROPHECIES RELATIVE TO THE MESSIAH, WITH THEIR ACCOMPLISHMENT, IN THE VERY WORDS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

[Referred to in pages 127. and 148. of this volume.]

SECTION I.

PROPHECIES RELATIVE TO THE ADVENT, PERSON, SUFFERINGS, RESURRECTION, AND ASCENSION OF THE MESSIAH.

§ 1. That a Messiah should come.

PROPHECY.—Gen. iii. 15. He (the seed of the woman) shall bruise thy head and thou shalt bruise his heel. Compare Gen. xxii. 18. xii. 3. xxvi. 4. xxviii. 4. and Psalm. lxxii. 17.—Isa. xl. 5. The glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together.—Hag. ii. 7. The desire of all nations shall come.

FULFILMENT.—Gal. iv. 4. When the fulness of time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman (4000 years after the first prophecy was delivered.)—Rom. xvi. 20. The God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly.—1 John iii. 8. The Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the Devil (that old serpent, Rev. xi. 9.) See also Heb. ii. 14.—Luke ii. 10. I bring you tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people.

§ 2. When he should come.

PROPHECY.—Gen. xlix. 10. The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come. The Messiah was to come at a time of universal peace, and when there was a general expectation of him; and while the second temple was standing, seventy weeks (of years, i. e. 490 years) after the rebuilding of Jerusalem. See Hag. ii. 6—9.; Dan. ix. 24, 25.; Mal. iii. 1.

FULFILMENT.—When the Messiah came, the sceptre had departed from Judah; for the Jews, though governed by their own rulers and magistrates, yet were subject to the paramount authority of the Roman emperors; as was evinced by their being subject to the enrolment of Augustus, paying tribute to Caesar, and not having the power of life and death. Compare Luke ii. 1. 3—5.; Matt. xxii. 20, 21.; and the parallel passages; and John xviii. 31.—When Jesus Christ came into the world, the Roman wars were terminated, the temple of Janus was shut, and peace reigned throughout the Roman empire; and all nations, both Jews and Gentiles, were expecting the coming of some extraordinary person. See Matthew ii. 1—10.; Mark xv. 43.; Luke ii. 25. 38.; and John i. 19—45. for the expectation of the Jews. The two Roman historians, Suetonius and Tacitus, confirm the fulfilment of the prediction, as to the expectation of the Gentiles.

§ 3. That the Messiah should be God and man together.

PROPHECY.—Psal. ii. 7. Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee.—Psal. cx. 1. The Lord said unto my Lord.—Isa. ix. 6. The mighty God, the everlasting Father.—Mic. v. 2. Whose goings forth have been from old, from everlasting.

FULFILMENT.—Heb. i. 8. Unto the Son he saith, "Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever." Compare Matt. xxii. 42—45.; 1 Cor. xv. 25.; Heb. i. 13.—Matt. i. 23. They shall call his name Emmanuel, that is, God with us.—John i. 1. 14. The Word was with God, and the Word was God. The Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us.—Rom. ix. 5. Of whom (the fathers) as concerning the flesh Christ came, who is God over all, blessed for ever. See also Col. ii. 9.; 1 John v. 20.

§ 4. From whom he was to be descended.

PROPHECY.—From the first woman, Gen. iii. 15.

From Abraham and his descendants (Gen. xii. 3. xviii. 18.);

viz. Isaac (Gen. xxvi. 4.); Jacob (Gen. xxviii. 14.); Judah (Gen. xlix. 10.); Jesse (Isa. xi. 1.); David (Psal. cxxxii. 11. lxxxix. 4. 27.; Isa. ix. 7.; Jer. xxxiii. 5. xxxiii. 15.)

FULFILMENT.—Gal. iv. 4. When the fulness of time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman.

Acts iii. 25. The covenant, which God made with our fathers, saying unto Abraham, "And in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." (See Matt. i. 1.)—Heb. vii. 14. It is evident that our Lord sprang out of Judah.—Rom. xv. 12. Isaiah saith there shall be a root of Jesse.—John vii. 42. Hath not the Scripture said, that Christ cometh of the seed of David? See also Acts ii. 30. xiii. 23.; Luke i. 32.

§ 5. That the Messiah should be born of a virgin.

PROPHECY.—Isa. vii. 14. Behold a Virgin shall conceive and bring forth a Son.—Jer. xxxi. 22. The Lord hath created a new thing on the earth; a woman shall compass a man. (N. B. The ancient Jews applied this prophecy to the Messiah, whence it follows, that the later interpretations to the contrary are only to avoid the truth which we profess, viz. That Jesus was born of a Virgin, and therefore is THE CHRIST or Messiah.—Bp Pearson on the Creed, Art. III. p. 171. edit. 1715. folio.)

FULFILMENT.—Matt. i. 24, 25. Joseph took his wife and knew her not, till she had brought forth her first-born son. Compare Luke i. 26—35.—Matt. i. 22, 23. All this was done, that it might be fulfilled, which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet, saying, "Behold a virgin shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son."

§ 6 Where the Messiah was to be born.

PROPHECY.—Mic. v. 2. Thou Bethlehem Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah; yet out of thee shall he come forth unto me that is to be the ruler in Israel.

FULFILMENT.—Luke ii. 4—6. All went to be taxed (or enrolled), every one into his own city. And Joseph also went up from Gallilee, with Mary his espoused wife, unto Bethlehem; and while they were there she brought forth her first-born son. Compare also Luke ii. 10, 11. 16. and Matt. ii. 1. 4.—6. 8. 11.; John vii. 42.

§ 7. That a prophet, in the spirit and power of Elias, or Elijah, should be the Messiah's forerunner and prepare his way.

PROPHECY.—Malachi iii. 1. and iv. 5.; Isa. xl. 3.; Luke i. 17. Behold I will send my messenger, and he shall prepare my way before me.

FULFILMENT.—Matt. iii. 1. In those days came John the Baptist preaching in the wilderness of Judæa, saying, Repent ye, the kingdom of heaven is at hand.—Matt. xi. 14.; Luke vii. 27, 28. This is Elias which was for to come.

§ 8. That the Messiah was to be a Prophet.

PROPHECY.—Deut. xvii. 15. I. I will raise them up a Prophet from among their brethren, like unto thee.

FULFILMENT.—John iv. 19. The woman saith unto him, Sir, I perceive that thou art a Prophet.—John ix. 17. He is a Prophet.—Matt. xxi. 46. They took him for a Prophet.—Mark vi. 15. It is a Prophet, or as one of the Prophets.—Luke vii. 16. A great Prophet is risen up among us.—John vi. 14. This is of a truth that Prophet, which should come into the world.—John vii. 40. Of a truth this is the Prophet.—Luke xxiv. 19. Jesus of Nazareth, which was a Prophet, mighty in deed and word before God and all the people.—Matt. xxi. 11. This is Jesus the Prophet, of Nazareth of Galilee.

§ 9. That the Messiah should begin to publish the Gospel in Galilee

PROPHECY.—Isa. ix. 1, 2. In Galilee of the nations, the people that walked in darkness have seen a great light.

FULFILMENT.—Matt. iv. 12, 17. Now when Jesus heard that John was cast into prison, he departed into Galilee. From that time Jesus began to preach and to say, Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.

§ 10. That the Messiah shall confirm his doctrine by great miracles.

PROPHECY.—Isa. xxxv. 5, 6. Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped: then shall the lame man leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing.—Isa. xliii. 7. To open the blind eyes.—Isa. xxxiii. 3. The eyes of them that see shall not be dim; and the ears of them that hear, shall hearken.—Isa. xxix. 18. The deaf shall hear the words of the book; and the eyes of the blind shall see out of obscurity and darkness.

FULFILMENT.—Matt. xi. 4, 5. Jesus... said, "Go, and show John those things which ye do hear and see: the blind receive their sight, and the lame walk: the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, the dead are raised up.—Luke viii. 21. In the same hour, he cured many of their infirmities and plagues, and of evil spirits; and unto many that were blind, he gave sight.—Matt. iv. 23, 24. Jesus went about all Galilee... healing all manner of sickness, and all manner of disease among the people... They brought unto him all sick people that were taken with divers diseases and torments, and those which were possessed with devils, and those which were lunatic, and those which had the palsy, and he healed them.—Matt. xv. 30, 31. And great multitudes came unto him, having with them those that were lame, blind, dumb, maimed, and many others; and cast them down at Jesus's feet, and he healed them. Inasmuch that the multitude wondered, when they saw the dumb to speak, the maimed to be whole and the lame to walk, and the blind to see.—Acts ii. 22. Jesus of Nazareth, a man approved of God among you by miracles and wonders and signs; which God did by him in the midst of you, as ye know.

As it would swell this article of the Appendix to an undue length, were we to state at length all the miracles of Jesus Christ related by the evangelists, we annex (in further proof of the fulfilment of the prophecies concerning them) the following catalogue of them, from the Rev. Mr. Archdeacon Nares's Veracity of the Evangelists Demonstrated, pp. 283—286. :—

§ 11. In what manner the Messiah was to make his public entry into Jerusalem.

PROPHECY.—Zech. ix. 9. Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Jerusalem, behold, thy King cometh unto thee; he is just, and having salvation; lowly, and riding upon an ass, even upon a colt the foal of an ass.

FULFILMENT.—Matt. xxi. 7—10. The disciples—brought the ass and the colt, and put on them their clothes, and set him (Jesus) thereon (that is, upon the clothes). And great multitudes spread their garments, &c. &c.—Matt. xxi. 4, 5. All this was done, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, saying, Tell ye the daughter of Sion, "Behold, thy king cometh," &c. &c.

§ 12. That the Messiah should be poor and despised, and be betrayed by one of his own disciples for thirty pieces of silver (at that time the ordinary price of the vilest slave); with which the potter's field should be purchased.

PROPHECY.—Isa. liii. 3. There is no beauty that we should desire him. He is despised and rejected of men, a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief; and we hid as it were our faces from him: he was despised, and we esteemed him not.—Ps. xli. 9. and Ps. lv. 12—14. Yea, mine own familiar friend in whom I trusted, who did eat of my bread, hath lift up his heel against me.—Zech. xi. 12. So they weighed for my price thirty pieces of silver.—Zech. xi. 13. And the Lord said unto me, Cast it unto the potter: a goodly price that I was prized at of them! And I took the thirty pieces of silver, and cast them to the potter in the house of the Lord.

¹ St. Matthew says two demoniacs, the others mention only one. Probably one was more remarkable than the other.

² St. Matthew says two blind men. Of whom, doubtless, Bartimeus was the most remarkable.

FULFILMENT.—Luke ix. 58. The Son of man hath not where to lay his head.—2 Cor. viii. 9. For your sakes he became poor.—John xi. 35. JESUS WENT.—Luke xxii. 3, 4. Then Satan entered into Judas, being one of the twelve, and he went his way and communed with the chief priests how he might betray him unto them.—Matt. xxvi. 14. And Judas went unto the chief priests, and said unto them, What will ye give me, and I will deliver him unto you! and they covenanted with him for thirty pieces of silver.—Matt. xxvii. 3—8. Then Judas, who had betrayed him, brought again the thirty pieces of silver, saying, I have sinned in that I have betrayed innocent blood; and he cast down the pieces of silver in the temple, and departed, and went and hanged himself. And the chief priests took the silver, and they said, It is not lawful to put it into the treasury, because it is the price of blood, and they took counsel, and bought with them the potter's field, to bury strangers in.

§ 13. That the Messiah should suffer pain and death for the sins of the World.

PROPHECY.—Psal. xxii. 16, 17. For dogs (that is the Heathens, whom the Jews called dogs,) have compassed me; the assembly of the wicked have inclosed me; they pierced my hands and my feet. I may tell all my bones; they look and stare upon me.—Isa. l. 6. I gave my back to the smilers, and my cheeks to them that plucked off the hair. I hid not my face from shame and spitting.—Isa. liii. 5, 8. He was wounded for our transgressions: he was bruised for our iniquities; by his stripes we are healed. He was cut off out of the land of the living, for the transgression of my people was he stricken.—Isa. liii. 12. And he bare the sin of many.

FULFILMENT.—John xix. 1, 2. Then Pilate took Jesus, and scourged him. And the soldiers platted a crown of thorns,—and they smote him with the palms of their hands.—Matt. xxvii. 30.; Mark xv. 19. And they did spit upon him,—and smote him on the head.—Mark xv. 25. And they crucified him.—1 Pet. ii. 23, 24. Who, when he was reviled, reviled not again; when he suffered, he threatened not. Who bare our sins in his own body on the tree (the cross).

§ 14. That the Messiah should be cruelly mocked and derided.

PROPHECY.—Psal. xxii. 12, 13, 7, 8. Many bulls have compassed me; strong bulls of Bashan—(that is, the wicked and furious Jews, who like the beasts fattened on the fertile plains of Bashan "waxed fat and kicked;"—became proud and rebellious)—have beset me round. They gaped upon me with their mouths as a ravening and roaring lion. All they that see me, laugh me to scorn; they shoot out the lip, saying, He trusted in God that he would deliver him; let him deliver him, seeing he delighted in him.

FULFILMENT.—Matt. xxvii. 39, 41, 42.; Mark xv. 31, 32.; Luke xxiii. 35, 36. And they that passed by, reviled him, wagging their heads. Likewise also the chief priests, and the rulers also with them, derided, and mocking, said among themselves, with the scribes and elders, "He saved others, himself he cannot save; if he be the Christ, the chosen of God, let him now come down from the cross, and save himself, that we may see, and we will believe him. He trusted in God, let him deliver him now if he will have him." And the soldiers also mocked him,—saying, "If thou be the king of the Jews, save thyself."

§ 15. That vinegar and gall should be offered to the Messiah upon the cross: and that his garments should be divided, and lots cast for his vesture.

PROPHECY.—Psal. lxix. 21. They gave me also gall for my meat, and in my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink.—Psal. xxii. 18. They part my garments among them, and cast lots upon my vesture.

FULFILMENT.—John xix. 29.; Matt. xxvii. 48.; Mark xv. 36. And they filled a sponge with vinegar, and put it upon hyssop, and put it to his mouth.—John xix. 23, 24. And the soldiers when they had crucified Jesus, took his garments and made four parts, to every soldier a part; and also his coat; now the coat was without seam. They said therefore, "Let us not rend it, but cast lots whose it shall be."

§ 16. That not a bone of the Messiah should be broken, but that his side should be pierced.

PROPHECY.—Psal. xxxiv. 20. He keepeth all his bones; none of them is broken.—Zech. xii. 10. And they shall look upon me whom they have pierced.

FULFILMENT.—John xix. 32—34. Then came the soldiers and brake the legs of the first and of the other which was crucified with him: but when they came to Jesus, and saw that he was dead already, they brake not his legs. But one of the soldiers, with a spear, pierced his side, and forthwith there came out blood and water.

§ 17. That the Messiah should die with malefactors, but be buried honourably.

PROPHECY.—Isa. liii. 9. And he made his grave with the wicked, and with the rich in his death.

FULFILMENT.—Matt. xxvii. 38, 57—60. Then were there two thieves crucified with him. There came a rich man of Arimathea, named Joseph, and begged the body of Jesus; and he wrapped it in a clean linen cloth and laid it in his own new tomb.

§ 18. That the Messiah should rise from the dead, and ascend into heaven.

PROPHECY.—Psal. xvi. 9, 10. My flesh also shall rest in hope, for thou wilt not leave my soul in hell (the separate state of departed spirits), neither wilt thou suffer thy holy one to see corruption.—Isa. liii. 10. When thou shalt make his soul an offering for sin,—he shall prolong his days.—Psal. lxxviii. 18. Thou hast ascended up on high; thou hast led captivity captive; thou hast received gifts for men, that the Lord God might dwell among them.

FULFILMENT.—Acts ii. 31. (David) spake before the resurrection of Christ, that his soul was not left in hell (Hades, or the separate state); neither did his flesh see corruption. See also Acts xiii. 35.—Matt. xxviii. 5, 6. The angels said unto the women, "He is not here, for he is risen, as he said." See Luke xxiv. 5, 6.—1 Cor. xv. 4. He rose again the third day, according to the Scriptures.—Acts i. 3. He showed himself alive, after his passion, by many infallible proofs.—Mark xvi. 19.; Luke xxiv. 51.; Acts i. 9. So, then, after the Lord had spoken to them, while he was blessing them, and while they beheld, he was parted from them, and carried up into heaven, and sat at the right hand of God. Compare also 1 Pet. iii. 22.; 1 Tim. iii. 16.; Heb. vi. 20.

§ 19. That the Messiah should send the Holy Spirit, the Comforter.

PROPHECY.—Joel. ii. 28. I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh; and your sons and your daughters shall prophecy.

FULFILMENT.—See all these promises and predictions fulfilled in Acts ii. 1—4.; iv. 31.; viii. 17.; x. 44.; xi. 15

SECTION II.

PREDICTIONS RELATIVE TO THE OFFICES OF THE MESSIAH.

§ 1. That the Messiah was to be a PROPHET and LEGISLATOR LIKE UNTO MOSES, but superior to him, who should change the law of Moses into a new and more perfect law, common both to Jews and Gentiles, and which should last for ever.

PROPHECY.—Deut. xviii. 18, 19. I will rise them up a Prophet from among their brethren like unto thee, and will put my words into his mouth.... And it shall come to pass, that whosoever will not hearken unto my words which he shall speak in my name, I will require it of him. See also Deut. xviii. 15.; Acts iii. 22. and vii. 37.

FULFILMENT.—That the Messiah was to be a Prophet, generally, see § 8. p. 451. supra; and how closely Jesus Christ resembled Moses, to whom he was also infinitely superior in many respects, will appear from the following particulars:—

(i.) As to the dignity of his person.—Heb. iii. 5, 6. Moses verily was faithful in all his house, as a servant, for a testimony of those things which were to be spoken after; but Christ as a Son over his own house, whose house are we. Other prophets had revelations in dreams and visions, but Moses talked with God face to face. Christ spake that which he had seen with the Father.

(ii.) As to his legislative office.—Moses was a Legislator, and the Mediator of a covenant between God and Man. Christ was the Mediator of a better covenant than that which was established by the sacrifice of bulls and goats. The one was mortal; the other divine. Other prophets were only interpreters and enforcers of the law, and, in this respect, were greatly inferior to Moses. This is, of itself, a sufficient proof, that a succession of prophets could not be solely alluded to. The person who was to be raised up, could not be like Moses, in a strict sense, unless he were a legislator—he must give a law to mankind, and, consequently, a more excellent law; for if the first had been perfect, as the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews argues, there could have been no room for a second. Christ was this legislator, who gave a law more perfect in its nature, more extensive in its application, and more glorious in its promises and rewards.—Heb. vii. 18, 19. There is a disannulling of the commandment going before, for the weakness and unprofitableness thereof; for the law made nothing perfect, but the bringing in of a better hope (i. e. of a new law) did, by the which we draw nigh to God.

The Law of Moses belonged to one nation only; but the Gospel, which is the Law of Christ, is designed for all nations. The Messiah was to enact a new Law; Isa. ii. 3. Out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. This new law or covenant was to be common to all nations; see Isa. ii. 2, 3, and li. 4, 5; and was to endure for ever; see Isa. liv. 21; Jer. xxxi. 34; Ezek. xxxvi. 27. xxxvii. 26; Isa. lv. 3. lxi. 8; Jer. xxxii. 40; Ezek. xxxiv. 25; Dan. vii. 13, 14; Isa. xlii. 6. lxiii. 2; compared with Matt. xxviii. 19, 20. Moses instituted the passover, when a lamb was sacrificed, none of whose bones were to be broken, and whose blood protected the people from destruction—Christ was himself that paschal lamb. Moses had a very wicked and perverse generation committed to his care; and to enable him to rule them, miraculous powers were given to him, and he used his utmost endeavours to make the people obedient to God, and to save them from ruin; but in vain; in the space of forty years they all fell in the wilderness except two—Christ also was given to a generation not less wicked and perverse; his instructions and his miracles were lost upon them; and in about the same space of time, after they had rejected him, they were destroyed.

(iii.) As to his prophetic office and character.—Moses foretold the calamities that would befall his nation for their disobedience.—Christ predicted the same events, fixed the precise time, and enlarged upon the previous and subsequent circumstances.

Moses chose and appointed seventy elders to preside over the people—Christ chose the same number of disciples. Moses sent twelve men to spy out the land which was to be conquered—Christ sent his twelve apostles into the world, to subdue it by a more glorious and miraculous conquest.

(iv.) As to the benefits conferred.—Moses delivered the Israelites from their cruel bondage in Egypt; he contended with the magicians, and had the advantage over them so manifestly, that they could no longer withstand him, but were constrained to acknowledge the divine power by which he was assisted. Moses conducted the Israelites through the desert, assuring them that, if they would be obedient, they should enter into the happy land of promise, which the wiser Jews usually understood to be a type of the eternal and celestial kingdom, to which the Messiah was to open an entrance. And Moses interceded with the Almighty for that rebellious people, and stopped the wrath of God, by lifting up the brazen serpent in the wilderness. The people could not enter into the land of promise till Moses was dead—by the death of Christ “the kingdom of heaven was opened to believers.”—But Jesus has delivered us from the far worse tyranny of Satan and sin, and He saves ALL who truly believe in him and unfeignedly repent, from the guilt, the power, and the punishment of their sins. (Matt. i. 21.)—Jesus Christ cast out evil spirits, and received their acknowledgments both of the dignity of his nature and the importance of his mission. He was lifted up on the cross, and was the atonement for the whole world. He has also brought life and immortality to light; and opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers. As our forerunner, he hath entered into heaven, that where he is, there his followers may be also (Heb. vi. 20. ix. 24; John xiv. 2, 3); and as an Advocate he ever liveth to make intercession for all that come unto God by him. (1 John ii. 1; Heb. vii. 25.)

Moses wrought a great variety of miracles, and in this particular the parallel is remarkable; since beside Christ there arose not a prophet in Israel like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face, in all the signs and the wonders which the Lord sent him to do. (Deut. xxxiv.) Moses was not only a lawgiver, a prophet, and a worker of miracles, but a king and a priest. He is called king (Deut. xxxiii. 5), and he had, indeed, though not the pomp, and the crown, and the sceptre, yet the authority of a king, and was the supreme magistrate; and the office of priest he often exercised. In all these offices the resemblance between Moses and Christ was striking and exact.

Moses fed the people miraculously in the wilderness—Christ with bread and with doctrine; and the manna which descended from heaven, and the loaves which Christ multiplied, were proper images of the spiritual food which the Saviour of the world bestowed upon his disciples.

Moses expressly declares, “That it shall come to pass, that whosoever will not hearken unto my words which the prophet shall speak in my name, I will require it of him.” The Jews rejected Christ, and God rejected them. In the whole course of the history of the Jews there is no instance recorded, where, in the case of disobedience to the warnings or advice of any prophet, such terrible calamities ensued, as those which followed the rejection of the Messiah. The overthrow of the Jewish empire, the destruction of so many Jews at the siege of Jerusalem, the dispersion of the surviving people, and the history of the Jews down to the present day—calamities beyond measure and beyond example—fulfilled the prophecy of Moses.

(v.) As to the circumstances of his death.—Moses died in one sense for the iniquities of his people: it was their rebellion, which was the occasion of it, which drew down the displeasure of God upon them and upon him: “The Lord,” said Moses to them, “was angry with me for your sakes, saying, Thou shalt not go in thither, but thou shalt die.” (Deut. i. 37.) Moses, therefore, went up, in the sight of the people, to the top of Mount Nebo, and there he died, when he was in perfect vigour, “when his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated.”—Christ suffered for the sins of men, and was led up, in the presence of the people, to Calvary, where he died in the flower of his age, and when he was in his full natural strength. Neither Moses nor Christ, as far as we may collect from sacred history, were ever sick, or felt any bodily decay or infirmity which would have rendered them unfit for the toils they underwent. Their sufferings were of another kind.

As Moses, a little before his death, promised the people that God would raise them up a Prophet like unto him—so Christ, taking leave of his afflicted disciples, told them, I will not leave you comfortless: I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter. (John xiv. 18. 16.)

“Is this similitude and correspondence, in so many particulars, the effect of mere chance?” says Dr. Jortin, to whom we are principally indebted for the preceding circumstances of resemblance between Jesus Christ and the Great Prophet and Legislator of the Jews:—“Let us search all the records of universal history, and see if we can find a man who was so like to Moses as Christ was. If we cannot find such a one, then we have found him of whom Moses in the law and the prophets did write, to be Jesus of Nazareth, THE SON OF GOD.”¹

§ 2. The Messiah was to be a Teacher, who was to instruct and enlighten men.

(i.) Messiah was to be a Teacher.

PROPHECY.—Isa. lxi. 1. The Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek.—Isa. liv. 13. All thy people shall be taught of the Lord.—Psal. lxxviii. 2. I will open my mouth in a parable.

FULFILMENT.—Mark i. 14. Jesus came . . . preaching the kingdom of God.—Luke viii. 1. He went throughout every city and village, preaching, and showing the glad tidings of the kingdom of God.—Mark vi. 6. He went round about all the villages teaching.—Luke iv. 15. 44. He taught in their synagogues; and he preached in the synagogues of Galilee. See also Matt. iv. 23. ix. 35; Mark i. 38, 39.—Matt. xi. The poor have the Gospel preached unto them.—Matt. xiii. 34. All these things spake Jesus unto the multitude in parables, and without a parable spake he not unto them, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, saying, I will open my mouth in parables.—Mark iv. 33. With many such parables spake he the word unto them. The following list of parables may serve to illustrate the prophetic character of the Messiah as a teacher: it is borrowed from Mr. Archdeacon Nare's Veracity of the Evangelists demonstrated, pp. 287—289:—

1. Of the Blind leading the Blind	Luke vi.
2. Of the House built on a Rock	{ Matt. vii. Luke vii.
3. Of the two Debtors	Luke vii.
4. Of the relapsing Demoniac	{ Matt. xii. Luke xi.
5. Of the rich Man and his vain Hopes	Luke xii.
6. Of the Lord returning from a Wedding	Luke xii.
7. Of the barren Fig-tree	Luke xiii.
8. Of the Sower	{ Matt. xiii. Luke iv.
9. Of the Tares	Luke viii.
10. Of the Seed sown	Matt. xiii.
11. Of the Mustard Seed	{ Matt. xiii. Mark iv.
12. Of the Leaven	Matt. xiii.
13. Of the hid Treasure	Ibid.
14. Of the Merchant seeking Pearls	Ibid.
15. Of the Net cast into the Sea	Ibid.
16. Of the good Householder	Matt. xiii.
17. Of the new Cloth and old Garment	{ Matt. ix. Mark i.
18. Of the new Wine and old Bottles	Luke v.
19. Of the Plant not planted by God	{ Matt. ix. Mark ii.
20. Of the lost Sheep	Luke xv.
21. Of the unmerciful Servant	Matt. xviii.

(ii.) Messiah was to instruct and enlighten men.

PROPHECY.—Isaiah ix. 2. The people that walked in darkness had seen a great light; they that dwell in the land of the shadow of death, upon them hath the light shined.

FULFILLMENT.—John xii. 46. I am come a light into the world, that whosoever believeth on me should not abide in darkness. (See also John viii. 12. ix. 5.)—Luke ii. 32. A light to lighten the Gentiles.—Acts xxvi. 18. To open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God.—Eph. v. 8. Ye were sometimes darkness, but now ye are light in the Lord; walk as children of light.—Acts iii. 26. God having raised up his son Jesus, sent him to bless you, in turning away every one of you from his iniquities.

§ 3. He was to be the Messiah, Christ, or Anointed of God.

PROPHECY.—Isaiah lxi. 1. The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek.—Dan. xi. 24, 25. To anoint the most holy,—the Messiah the Prince.—Psal. cxxxii. 17. I have ordained a lamp for mine Anointed. See also Psal. lxxxix. 20. 51.—Psal. ii. 2. The rulers take counsel together against the Lord and against his Anointed or Messiah.

FULFILLMENT.—John iv. 25, 42. I know that the Messiah cometh, which is called the Christ. This is indeed the Christ.—vi. 69. We believe and are sure that thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God. See also John xi. 27.; Matt. xvi. 16.—Matt. xxvi. 63, 64. The high priest said, “I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou be the Christ the Son of God;” Jesus saith unto him, “Thou hast said.” See also Mark xiv. 61.—Acts xviii. 28. He mightily convinced the Jews, and that publicly, showing by the Scriptures that Jesus was the Christ. See also Acts ix. 22. and xvii. 3.—Acts ii. 36. Let all the house of Israel know assuredly, that God hath made that same Jesus whom ye have crucified both Lord and Christ.—Phil. ii. 11. That every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord.

§ 4. The Messiah was to be a Priest.

PROPHECY.—Psal. cx. 4. Thou art a priest for ever, after the order of Melchizedek (cited in Heb. v. 6. vii. 21.).—Zech. vi. 13. He shall be a priest upon his throne.

FULFILLMENT.—Heb. iv. 14. We have a great high priest that is passed into the heavens, Jesus the Son of God. (See also viii. 1.)—Heb. iii. 1. x. 21. Consider the apostle and high priest of our profession, Christ Jesus.—Heb. ii. 17. That he might be a merciful and faithful high priest in things pertaining to God, to make reconciliation for the sins of the people.—

Heb. vii. 24. This man because he continueth forever hath an unchangeable priesthood.

§ 5. The Messiah was, by the offering of himself as a sacrifice for sin, to make an end of sin, to make reconciliation for iniquity, to make men holy, and to destroy the power of the devil.

PROPHECY.—Isa. liii. 6, 10, 11, 12. The Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all. Thou shalt make his soul an offering for sin. He shall bear their iniquities. He bare the sin of many.—Dan. ix. 24. To finish the transgression, to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in an everlasting righteousness.—Gen. iii. 15. It (the seed of woman, the promised Messiah) shall bruise thy (Satan's) head.

FULFILLMENT.—Eph. v. 2. Christ hath given himself for us, an offering, and a sacrifice to God. (See also 2 Cor. v. 21. Rom. viii. 3.)—1 John ii. 2. He is the propitiation for our sins.—Heb. ix. 14. Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without spot, to God.—1 Pet. i. 19. Redeemed—with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish.—1 Pet. iii. 18. Christ hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust.—Heb. x. 12. This man, after he had offered one sacrifice for sins, for ever sat down on the right hand of God.—Heb. ix. 12. Neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood he entered in once into the holy place.—Heb. vii. 27. Who needeth not daily, as those high priests, to offer up sacrifice first for his own sins, and then for the people's; for this he did once when he offered up himself. Heb. ix. 25, 26. Nor yet that he should offer himself often, as the high priest entereth into the holy place every year with the blood of others. But now, once in the end of the world hath he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself.—John i. 29. The lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world.—Acts v. 31. To give repentance to Israel and forgiveness of sins.—1 Cor. xv. 3. Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures.—1 John i. 7. The blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin.—Rom. v. 10. We were reconciled to God by the death of his Son.—2 Cor. v. 18. Who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ.—Col. i. 20. By him (Christ) to reconcile all things unto himself.—Heb. v. 8, 9. He became the author of salvation unto all them that obey him.—2 Cor. v. 15. He died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them. (See also Rom. vi. 10—12. 1 Thess. v. 10.)—1 Pet. ii. 24. Who his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree, that we, being dead to sin, should live unto righteousness.—Tit. ii. 14. Who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people zealous of good works.—1 Cor. vi. 20. Ye are bought with a price; therefore glorify God in your body and in your spirit which are God's.—1 Pet. iv. 1, 2. As Christ has suffered for us in the flesh, arm yourselves likewise with the same mind; for he that hath suffered in the flesh hath ceased from sin, that he no longer should live the rest of his time in the flesh, to the lusts of men, but to the will of God.

§ 6. The Messiah was to be a Saviour.

PROPHECY.—Isa. lix. 20. The Redeemer shall come to Zion, and to them that turn from transgression in Jacob.—lxii. 11. Say ye to the daughter of Zion “Behold thy salvation cometh.”

FULFILLMENT.—1 John iv. 14. The Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world.—Luke ii. 11. Unto you is born a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord. (See also Matt. i. 21. Acts xiii. 23.)—John iv. 42. We have heard him ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world.—Acts v. 31. Him hath God exalted with his right hand to be a prince and a Saviour, for to give repentance to Israel and forgiveness of sins.—2 Pet. ii. 20. Have escaped the pollutions of the world through the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. (See also 2 Pet. iii. 18.)—Tit. iii. 6. The Holy Ghost, which he shed on us abundantly, through Jesus Christ our Saviour.—2 Pet. i. 1. Through the righteousness of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ.—Phil. iii. 20. From whence (heaven) we also look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ.—Tit. ii. 13. Looking for . . . the appearing of our great God and Saviour, Jesus Christ.

§ 7. The Messiah was to be a Mediator.

PROPHECY.—Psal. cx. 1. The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand.—Dan. ix. 17, 19. O our God, cause thy face to shine upon thy sanctuary that is desolate for the Lord's sake. Defer not for thine own sake, O my God. Isa. viii. 14. He shall be for a sanctuary.

FULFILMENT.—John xiv. 6. Jesus saith unto him, "I am the way, and the truth, and the life; no man cometh unto the Father but by me."—1 Tim. ii. 5. There is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus.—Heb. xii. 24. Jesus the mediator of the new covenant. (See also Heb. vii. 22. viii. 6. ix. 15.)—John xv. 16. xvi. 23, 24. Whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name, he will give it you; hitherto ye have asked nothing in my name.—John xiv. 14. If ye shall ask any thing in my name I will do it.

§ 8. The Messiah was to be an Intercessor.

PROPHECY.—Isa. liii. 12. He made intercession for the transgressors.

FULFILMENT.—Luke xxiii. 34. Jesus said, Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do. Heb. ix. 24. Christ is entered into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us.—1 John ii. 1. If any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous.—Rom. viii. 34. Christ, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us.—Heb. vii. 25. He is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them.

§ 9. Messiah was to be a Shepherd.

PROPHECY.—Isa. xl. 11. He shall feed his flock like a shepherd, he shall gather the lambs with his arm, and carry them in his bosom, and shall gently lead those that are with young.—Ezek. xxxiv. 23. I will set up one shepherd over them, even my servant David. (See also Ezek. xxxvii. 24.)

FULFILMENT.—John x. 11. 14. I am the good shepherd, and know my sheep, and am known of mine. Other sheep (that is, the Gentiles) I have, which are not of this fold... and they shall hear my voice; and there shall be one fold, and one shepherd.—Heb. xiii. 20. Our Lord Jesus, that great shepherd of the sheep.—1 Pet. ii. 25. Ye are now returned unto the shepherd and bishop of your souls.—1 Pet. v. 1, 2, 4. The elders, I exhort, feed the flock of God; and when the chief shepherd shall appear ye shall receive a crown.

§ 10. Messiah was to be a king, superior to all others, the head and ruler of the church, and more particularly exalted as a king, after his sufferings and resurrection.

(i.) Messiah was to be a King.

PROPHECY.—Psal. ii. 6. Yet have I set my king upon my holy hill of Zion.—Psal. cxxxii. 11. The Lord hath sworn to David, "Of the fruit of thy body will I set upon thy throne." (See also Isa. ix. 6. lv. 4. Zech. vi. 13.)—Jer. xxiii. 5, 6. A king shall reign, and prosper; this is the name whereby he shall be called, "The Lord our righteousness." (See also Isa. xxxii. 1.)—Ezek. xxxvii. 24, 25. David my servant shall be king over them. (See also xxxiv. 23, 24. Jer. xxx. 9. Hos. iii. 5.)—Zech. ix. 9. Shout, O daughter of Jerusalem, behold thy king cometh unto thee. (Cited as fulfilled in Matt. xxi. 5. John xii. 15. Luke xix. 38.)

FULFILMENT.—Matt. ii. 5, 6. Thus it is written by the prophet, "Out of thee shall come a governor, that shall rule my people Israel." (Mich. v. 2.)—Luke i. 32, 33. The Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever.—John i. 49. Nathaniel answered, "Thou art the Son of God, thou art the king of Israel."—John xviii. 33, 36, 37. Pilate said, "Art thou the king of the Jews?" Jesus answered, "My kingdom is not of this world: now is my kingdom not from hence." Pilate said, "Art thou a king then?" Jesus answered "Thou sayest that I am a king." (See also Matt. xxvii. 11.)—Acts v. 31. Him hath God exalted with his right hand to be a prince and a Saviour.

(ii.) Messiah was to be a king, superior to all others, the head and ruler of the church.

PROPHECY.—Psal. lxxxix. 27, 36. I will make him, my first-born, higher than the kings of the earth. His throne as the sun before me.—Dan. vii. 13, 14. One like the Son of Man;—There was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom; that all people, nations, and languages should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion. (See also Dan. vii. 27. ii. 44.)

FULFILMENT.—Rev. i. 3. The Prince of the kings of the earth.—1 Tim. vi. 15. Who is the blessed and only potentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords. (See also Rev. xvii. 14. xix. 16.)—Eph. i. 21. Far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come.—Phil. ii. 9. God hath highly exalted him, and given him a name, which is above every name.—Eph. i. 22, 23. God hath put all things under his feet, and gave him to be Head over all things to the Church, which is his body.—Col. i. 18. Christ is the Head of the Church, which is his body. (See also Eph. v. 23.)—Eph. iv. 15, 16. Who is the Head, even Christ; from whom the whole body fitly joined together and compacted... maketh increase.—1 Cor. xii. 27. Ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular.

(iii.) Messiah the king was to be exalted, more particularly after his sufferings and resurrection.

PROPHECY.—Psal. ii. 6, 7. (cited and applied to Christ in Acts xiii. 33. and Heb. v. 5.) I have set my King upon my holy hill of Zion. Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee.—Psal. viii. 5. Thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honour.—Isa. liii. 10, 12. When thou shalt make his soul an offering for sin, he shall see his seed; and the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hand.—Therefore will I divide him a portion with the great, and he shall divide the spoil with the strong, because he hath poured out his soul unto death.

FULFILMENT.—1 Pet. i. 11. The prophets... testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ and the glory that should follow.—Luke xxiv. 26. Ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and to have entered into glory?—John xvii. 1. The hour is come, glorify thy Son.—Rom. i. 4. Declared to be the Son of God with power... by the resurrection from the dead.—1 Pet. i. 21. God... raised him up from the dead, and gave him glory.—1 Pet. iii. 22. Who is gone into heaven, and is on the right hand of God; angels, and authorities, and powers being made subject unto him.—Acts ii. 32, 33. Jesus hath God raised up... therefore being by the right hand of God exalted.—Phil. ii. 8, 9. Being found in fashion as man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross; wherefore God also hath highly exalted him.—Heb. ii. 9. We see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels, for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honour.—Heb. xii. 2. Who, for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God.

CHAPTER II.

THE PRINCIPAL PREDICTIONS BY JESUS CHRIST RELATIVE TO HIS SUFFERINGS, DEATH, RESURRECTION, THE SPREAD OF THE GOSPEL, AND THE DESTRUCTION OF JERUSALEM.

[Referred to in page 129 of this volume.]

SECTION I.

PREDICTIONS (FOR THE CONFIRMATION OF HIS DISCIPLES' FAITH) THAT THEY WOULD FIND THINGS ACCORDING TO HIS WORD.

PROPHECY.—Matt. xxi. 1, 2, 3. Mark xi. 2. Luke xix. 30, 31. Jesus sent two disciples, saying unto them, "Go into the village over against you, and straightway ye shall find an ass tied and a colt with her; loose them, and bring them unto me; and if any man shall say aught unto you, ye shall say, 'The Lord hath need of them,' and straightway he will send them."—Mark xiv. 13, 14, 15. Go ye into the city, and there shall meet you a man bearing a pitcher of water, follow him; and wheresoever he shall go in, say ye to the good man of the house, "The master saith, Where is the guest-chamber, where I shall eat the passover with my disciples?" And he shall show you a large upper room. (See also Matt. xxvi. 18.)

FULFILMENT.—Mark ix. 4, 5, 6. Luke ix. 32. They found the colt tied by the door without, in a place where two ways met, and they loose him; and certain of them that stood there said to them, "What do ye, loosing the colt?" and they said to them even as Jesus had commanded, and they let them go.—Luke xxii. 13. Mark xiv. 16. They went and found as he had said unto them.

SECTION II.

PREDICTIONS OF JESUS CHRIST RELATIVE TO HIS SUFFERINGS, DEATH, RESURRECTION, AND ASCENSION.

§ 1. That he was to be betrayed by one of his disciples, and by Judas Iscariot.

PROPHECY.—John vi. 70, 71. Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil? He spake of Judas Iscariot, the son of Simon, for he it was that should betray him.—Matt. xx. 18. Behold we go up to Jerusalem, and the Son of Man shall be betrayed unto the chief priests and unto the scribes. (See also Matt. xvii. 22. Mark x. 33. Luke ix. 44.)—Matt. xxvi. 2. Ye know, that after two days is the feast of the passover, and the Son of Man is betrayed to be crucified.—John xiii. 10, 11. Ye are clean, but not all; for he knew who should betray him; therefore, said he, ye are not all clean. (18. xvii. 12.)—Mark xiv. 18. Jesus said, Verily I say unto you, One of you which eateth with me shall betray me. (Matt. xxvi. 21. John xiii. 21.) Luke xxii. 21.)—John xiii. 26. He it is to whom I shall give a sop:—he gave it to Judas Iscariot. (Mark xiv. 20.)—Mark xiv. 42. He that betrayeth me is at hand. (Matt. xxiv. 46.)

FULFILMENT.—Matt. xxvi. 14, 15, 16. One of the twelve, called Judas Iscariot, went unto the chief priests and said unto them, What will ye give me, and I will deliver him unto you? and they covenanted with him for thirty pieces of silver; and from that time he sought opportunity to betray him. (Mark xiv. 10. Luke xxiii. 3. John xiii. 2.)—Matt. xxvi. 47—49. Judas, one of the twelve came, and with him a great multitude with swords and staves, from the chief priests and elders of the people. Now he that betrayed him gave them a sign, saying, Whomsoever I shall kiss, that same is he, hold him fast; and forthwith he came to Jesus, and said, Hail, Master, and kissed him.

§ 2. That his other disciples would forsake him.

PROPHECY.—Mark xiv. 27. Matt. xxvi. 31. Jesus saith unto them, All ye shall be offended because of me this night; for it is written, "I will smite the shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered."—John xvi. 32. The hour cometh, yea is now come, that ye shall be scattered every man to his own, and shall leave me alone.—John xviii. 8, 9. Jesus answered, If ye seek me, let these go their way; that the saying might be fulfilled which he spake, Of them which thou gavest me have I lost none.

FULFILMENT.—Matt. xxvi. 56. Then all the disciples forsook him and fled.—Mark xiv. 53. And they all forsook him and fled.

§ 3. That Peter would deny him.

PROPHECY.—Luke xxii. 31, 32. Simon, Simon, behold Satan hath desired to have you, that he may sift you as wheat; but I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not; and when thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren.—John xiii. 38. Wilt thou lay down thy life for my sake? Verily, verily, I say unto thee, The cock shall not crow till thou hast denied me thrice. (See also Matt. xxvi. 34. Luke xxii. 34.)—Mark xiv. 30. Verily I say unto thee, That this day, even in this night, before the cock crow twice, thou shalt deny me thrice.

FULFILMENT.—Luke xxii. 60, 61, 62. Peter said, Man, I know not what thou sayest; and immediately, while he yet spake, the cock crew. And the Lord turned, and looked upon Peter; and Peter remembered the word of the Lord, how he had said unto him, Before the cock crow, thou shalt deny me thrice; and Peter went out and wept bitterly. (See also Matt. xxvi. 75. John xviii. 27.)—Mark xiv. 72. The second time the cock crew, and Peter called to mind the word that Jesus said unto him, Before the cock crow twice, thou shalt deny me thrice.

(i.) That he should suffer.

PROPHECY.—Matt. xvi. 21. Mark viii. 31. Luke ix. 22. Jesus began to teach and to show unto his disciples, how that he, the Son of Man, must go unto Jerusalem, and suffer many things, and be rejected of the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and after three days, be raised again the third day.—Mark ix. 31. Matt. xvii. 22, 23. The Son of man shall be delivered into the hands of men, and they shall kill him: and after that he is killed, he shall rise the third day.—Mark x. 33, 34. Matt. xx. 18, 19. Luke xviii. 31—33. Behold we go up to Jerusalem, and all things that are written in the prophets concerning the Son of Man shall be accomplished: and the Son of man shall be betrayed, and delivered unto the chief priests, and unto the scribes; and they shall condemn him unto death, and shall deliver him unto the Gentiles. And they shall mock and spitefully entreat him, and shall scourge him, and shall spit upon him, and shall kill him, and crucify him; and the third day he shall rise again.

FULFILMENT.—John xi. 53. They took counsel together to put him to death.—Matt. xxvi. 4. Mark xiv. 1. Luke xxii. 2. And consulted how they might take Jesus by subtlety and put him to death.—Matt. xxvi. 66. Mark xiv. 64. Luke xxii. 71. They answered and said, "He is guilty of death."...and they all condemned him to be guilty of death.—Matt. xxvii. 26. Luke xxiii. 21. John xix. 16. When he had scourged Jesus, he delivered him to be crucified.—John xix. 18. Matt. xxvii. 35. Luke xxiii. 33....Golgotha; where they crucified him, and two others with him. Luke xxiv. 6, 7, 26, 46. Remember how he spake unto you, when he was yet in Galilee, saying, "The Son of Man must be delivered into the hands of sinful men, and be crucified, and the third day rise again."... "Ought not Christ to have suffered these things?"...Thus it behoved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead the third day.—Acts ii. 23. Him...ye have taken, and by wicked hands crucified and slain.—Acts xiii. 27. They have fulfilled (the prophecies) in condemning him.—Acts xvii. 3. (Paul opened and alleged out of the Scriptures) That Christ must needs have suffered and risen again from the dead.—Gal. iii. 1.....Christ hath evidently been set forth crucified among you.

(ii.) The place where he should suffer, viz. at Jerusalem.

PROPHECY.—Matt. xvi. 21. Luke ix. 31. He must go unto Jerusalem and suffer.—Luke xiii. 31, 33. Herod will kill thee. It cannot be that a prophet perish out of Jerusalem.—Luke xviii. 31. Matt. xx. 18. We go up to Jerusalem, and all things that are written by the prophets concerning the Son of Man shall be accomplished.

FULFILMENT.—Luke xxiv. 18. Art thou only a stranger in Jerusalem, and hast not known the things which are come to pass there in these days? (See also Matt. xxvii. Mark xv. Luke xxiii. John xix.)—Acts xiii. 27. They that dwell at Jerusalem, and their rulers, because they knew him not, nor yet the voices of the prophets, which are read every Sabbath-day, they have fulfilled them in condemning him.—Heb. xiii. 12. Jesus...suffered without the gate.

(iii.) The persons, by whom he was to suffer, viz. particularly by the Chief Priests and Gentiles.

PROPHECY.—Matt. xvi. 21. Mark viii. 31. Luke ix. 22. He must suffer many things of the elders and chief priests and scribes.—Matt. xvii. 12. Likewise shall also the Son of Man suffer of them.—Mark x. 33. The Son of man shall be delivered to the chief priests and to the scribes, and they shall condemn him to death.

FULFILMENT.—Matt. xxvi. 3, 4. John xi. 53. Then assembled together the chief priests and the scribes and the elders of the people unto the palace of the high priest who was called Caiaphas; and consulted that they might take Jesus by subtlety and kill him.—John xviii. 13, 24. Matt. xxvi. 57. They led him away to Annas first. Now Annas had sent him bound unto Caiaphas the high priest.—Matt. xxvi. 65, 66. Mark xiv. 64. The high priest rent his clothes, saying, "He hath spoken blasphemy,—what think ye?" They answered and said, "He is guilty of death." Matt. xxvii. 20. Luke xxiii. 18. The chief priests and elders persuaded the multitude that they should ask Barabbas, and destroy Jesus.—Luke xxiv. 20. Acts xiii. 28. The chief priests and rulers delivered him to be condemned to death.

(b.) By the Gentiles.

PROPHECY.—Luke xviii. 31, 32. Mark x. 33. Matt. xx. 19. The Son of Man shall be delivered to the Gentiles. (Note, that when Jesus foretold that he should be crucified, it also implied that he should be delivered to the Gentiles; for crucifixion was a Roman not a Jewish punishment.)

FULFILMENT.—Acts xiii. 28. Though they found no cause of death in him, yet desired they Pilate that he should be slain.—Matt. xxvii. 2. Mark. xv. 1. They delivered him unto Pontius Pilate the governor.—John xviii. 31, 32. Pilate said unto them, "Take ye him, and judge him according to your law." The Jews, therefore, said unto him, "It is not lawful for us to put any man to death;" that the saying of Jesus might be fulfilled.—Mark xv. 15. Luke xxiii. 24. Pilate delivered Jesus, when he had scourged him, to be crucified.—Acts iv. 27. Against thy holy child Jesus, whom thou hast anointed, both Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles and the people of Israel, were gathered together.

(iv.) The manner of his sufferings, viz. by mocking and crucifixion.

(a.) Jesus foretold that he should be mocked.

PROPHECY.—Mark. ix. 12. The Son of Man must suffer many things, and be set at nought.—Luke xviii. 32. Mark x. 34. The Son of Man shall be delivered to the Gentiles, and shall be mocked, and spitefully intreated, and spitted on.

FULFILMENT.—At the high priest's.—Matt. xxvi. 67, 68. Mark xiv. 65. Then did they spit in his face, and buffeted him, and others smote him with the palms of their hands, saying, Prophecy unto us, thou Christ, who is he that smote thee."—Before Herod.—Luke xxiii. 11. Herod, with his men of war, set him at nought, and mocked him, and arrayed him in a gorgeous robe.—At Pilate's judgment hall.—Mark xv. 17, 18, 19. Matt. xxvii. 28. John xix. 2. They clothed him with purple, and platted a crown of thorns and put it about his head, and began to salute him, "Hail, king of the Jews!" and they smote him on the head with a reed, and did spit upon him, and bowing their knees worshipped him.—At the Cross.—Mark xv. 29—32. They that passed by railled on him, wagging their heads and saying, "Ah, thou that destroyest the temple, and buildest it in three days, save thyself, and come down from the cross." Likewise, also, the chief priests, mocking, said, among themselves, with the scribes, "He saved others, himself he cannot save; let Christ the king of Israel descend now from the cross, that we may see and believe." And they that were crucified with him reviled him.

(b.) Jesus foretold that he should be crucified.

PROPHECY.—John iii. 14. As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up.—John xii. 32. And I, if I be (more correctly, when I am) lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me.—John viii. 28. When ye have lifted up the Son of Man, then shall ye know that I am he.—Matt. xx. 19. To mock and to scourge and to crucify him.

FULFILMENT.—Matt. xxvii. 31. John xix. 16. They led him away to crucify him.—Luke xxiii. 33. Mark xv. 20, 25. When they were come to the place which is called Calvary, there they crucified him.—Luke xxiv. 6, 7. Remember how he spake to you.... The Son of Man must be.... be crucified. Compare also Luke xxiv. 20. Acts ii. 23, and iv. 10. 1 Cor. i. 23. Gal. iii. 1.

§ 5. Jesus Christ predicted his resurrection.

PROPHECY.—John ii. 19, 21. Jesus said, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up." He spake of the temple of his body.—John x. 17. I lay down my life that I might take it again.—Mark x. 34. (See also Mark viii. 31. Luke ix. 22.) They shall kill him, and the third day he shall rise again.—Matt. xxvii. 62, 63. The chief priests and Pharisees came together to Pilate, saying, Sir, we remember that that deceiver said, while he was yet alive, "After three days I will rise again."

FULFILMENT.—Luke xxiv. 5, 6. Why seek ye the living among the dead? he is not here, but is risen; remember how he spake to you when he was yet in Galilee. See also Matt. xxviii. 6, and xxviii. 9, 11. Luke xxiv. 15, 34, 36. John xx. 14, 19, and xxi. 4.—John xx. 27. Then saith he to Thomas, "Reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands, and reach hither thy hand and thrust it into my side; and be not faithless, but believing."—Acts i. 3. To whom also he showed himself alive after his passion by many infallible proofs, being seen of them forty days.—Acts x. 40, 41. Him God raised up the third day, and showed him openly, not to all the people, but to witnesses chosen before of God, even to us, who did eat and drink with him after he rose from the dead. See also Acts ii. 32, and iv. 33. 1 Cor. xv. 20. Acts xvii. 3. xxvi. 23. Rom. i. 4.

§ 6. Jesus Christ foretold that he would appear again to his disciples.

PROPHECY.—John xvi. 16, 22. A little while and ye shall not see me, and again a little while and ye shall see me, because I go to the Father. I will see you again.—Matt. xxvi. 32. Mark xiv. 28. After I am risen again I will go before you into Galilee.—Matt. xxviii. 10. Mark xvi. 7. Go tell my brethren that they go into Galilee, and there shall they see me.

FULFILMENT.—Mark xvi. 14. John xx. 19. Luke xxiv. 36. He appeared to the eleven as they sat at meat, and upbraided them with their unbelief.—Matt. xxviii. 16, 17. The eleven disciples went away into Galilee, into a mountain where Jesus had appointed them. And when they saw him they worshipped him, but some doubted.—John xxi. 1. Jesus showed himself again to the disciples at the sea of Tiberias.—1 Cor. xv. 5, 6. He was seen of Cephas, then of the twelve, after that he was seen of above five hundred brethren at once.

§ 7. Jesus Christ foretold his ascension into heaven.

PROPHECY.—John vi. 62. What if ye shall see the Son of Man ascend up where he was before.—xvi. 28. I came forth from the Father, and am come into the world; again I leave the world and go to the Father.—xx. 17. I am not yet ascended to my Father; but go to my brethren and say unto them "I ascend unto my Father and your Father, and to my God and your God." (See also John vii. 33, xiii. 33, xiv. 19, and xvii. 13.)

FULFILMENT.—Mark xvi. 19. After the Lord had spoken unto them, he was received up into heaven, and sat on the right hand of God. (See also Luke xxiv. 51.)—Acts i. 9, 10. While they beheld he was taken up, and a cloud received him out of their sight. They looked steadfastly towards heaven as he went up.—Eph. iv. 10. He that descended is the same also that ascended up far above all heavens. See also 1 Pet. iii. 22. Heb ix. 24. iv. 14. vi. 20. 1 Tim. iii. 16.

SECTION III.

PROPHECIES BY JESUS CHRIST RELATIVE TO THE DESTRUCTION OF JERUSALEM.

§ 1. The signs, which were to precede the destruction of Jerusalem.

(i.) The first sign is, the appearance of false Christs or Messiahs.

PROPHECY.—Matt. xxiv. 4, 5. Mark xiii. 5, 6. Luke xxi. 8. Take heed that no man deceive you; for many shall come in my name, saying, "I am Christ," and shall deceive many; and the time draweth near.

FULFILMENT.—These false Christs began to appear soon after our Lord's death, but they multiplied as the national calamities increased. Josephus informs us, that there were many who, pretending to divine inspiration, deceived the people, leading out numbers of them into the desert. He does not indeed expressly say that they called themselves the Messiah or Christ; yet he says that which is equivalent, viz. that they pretended that God would there show them the signs of liberty, meaning redemption from the Roman yoke, which thing the Jews expected the Messiah would do for them (compare Luke xxiv. 21.) Josephus further adds, that an Egyptian false prophet led thirty thousand men into the desert, who were almost entirely cut off by Felix, the Roman Procurator.¹ The same historian relates, that, in the reign of Claudius, "the land was overrun with magicians, seducers, and impostors, who drew the people after them in multitudes into solitudes and deserts, to see the signs and miracles which they promised to show by the power of God."² Felix, and afterwards Festus, governors of Judæa, judging these proceedings to be the commencement of rebellion against the Romans, continually sent out detachments of soldiers, and destroyed great numbers of the deluded populace. Among these impostors were Dositheus, the Samaritan, who affirmed that he was the Christ foretold by Moses; Simor Magus, who said that he appeared among the Jews as the Son of God; and Theudas, who, pretending to be a prophet, persuaded many of the people to take their goods and follow him to the river Jordan, declaring that he was divinely commissioned, and that at his command the waters would be divided, and give them a safe passage to the opposite side.³ Many other examples of pretended Messiahs might be adduced; but the preceding are sufficient to establish the truth of our Lord's prediction.⁴

² Josephus, Ant. Jud. lib. 20. c. 68. § 6.

³ Josephus, Ant. Jud. lib. 20. c. 4. (al. 5.) § 1.

⁴ In the Rev. David Simpson's Key to the Prophecies there is an instructive History of twenty-four false Messiahs, who deluded the Jews during the time of the emperor Adrian and the year of Christ 1632. See pp. 133—148.

(ii.) The SECOND SIGN is, Wars and Commotions.

PROPHECY.—Matt. xxiv. 6. Mark xiii. 7. Luke xxi. 9. When ye shall hear of wars and rumours of wars, and commotions, see that ye be not troubled, and terrified; for all these things must come to pass, but the end is not yet.

FULFILMENT.—These wars and commotions were as the distant thunder, that foretold approaching storms. Previously to the destruction of Jerusalem, the greatest agitation prevailed in the Roman empire, and the struggle for the succession to the imperial throne was attended by severe and bloody conflicts. Four emperors, Nero, Galba, Otho, and Vitellius, suffered violent deaths within the short space of eighteen months. The emperor Caligula commanded the Jews to place his statue in their temple; and in consequence of a positive refusal to comply with so impious a request, he threatened them with an invasion, which was prevented by his death.¹ Jesus Christ added, see that ye (my disciples) be not troubled, as the Jews will be, expecting the approaching destruction of their nation; but the end is not yet: these events, alarming as they seemed, were only the preludes to the dreadful and tumultuous scenes that followed.

PROPHECY.—Matt. xxiv. 7. Mark xiii. 8. Luke xxi. 10. Nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom.

FULFILMENT.—In this prediction, Christ declares that greater disturbances than those which happened under Caligula would take place in the latter part of Claudius's reign, and during that of Nero. The rising of nation against nation portended the dissensions, insurrections, and mutual slaughter of the Jews, and those of other nations, who dwelt in the same cities together; as particularly at Caesarea,² where the Jews and Syrians contended about the right of the city, which contention at length proceeded so far, that above twenty thousand Jews were slain, and the city was cleared of the Jewish inhabitants. At this blow the whole³ nation of the Jews were exasperated, and, dividing themselves into parties, they burnt and plundered the neighbouring cities and villages of the Syrians, and made an immense slaughter of the people. The Syrians, in revenge, destroyed not a less number of the Jews, and every city, as Josephus⁴ expresses it, was divided into two armies. At Scythopolis⁵ the inhabitants compelled the Jews who resided among them to fight against their own countrymen; and, after the victory, basely setting upon them by night, they murdered above thirteen thousand of them, and spoiled their goods. At Ascalon⁶ they killed two thousand five hundred, at Ptolemais two thousand, and made not a few prisoners. The Tyrrians put many to death and imprisoned more. The people of Gadara did likewise, and all the other cities of Syria in proportion as they hated or feared the Jews. At Alexandria⁷ the old enmity was revived between the Jews and Heathens, and many fell on both sides, but of the Jews to the number of fifty thousand. The people of Damascus,⁸ too, conspired against the Jews of the same city, and assaulting them unarmed, killed ten thousand of them. The rising of kingdom against kingdom portended the open wars of different tetrarchies and provinces against one another; as that⁹ of the Jews who dwelt in Perea against the people of Philadelpia concerning their bounds, while Cuspius Fadus was procurator; and that¹⁰ of the Jews and Galileans against the Samaritans, for the murder of some Galileans going up to the feast of Jerusalem, while Cumanus was procurator; and that¹¹ of the whole nation of the Jews against the Romans and Agrippa and other allies of the Roman empire, which began while Gessius Florus was procurator. But, as Josephus says,¹² there was not only sedition and civil war throughout Judaea, but likewise in Italy—Otho and Vitellius contending for the empire.

(iii.) The THIRD SIGN is, Famines and Pestilences.

PROPHECY.—Matt. xxiv. 7. Mark xiii. 8. Luke xxi. 10. And there shall be famines and pestilences.

FULFILMENT.—There was a famine predicted by Agabus (Acts xi. 28.) which is mentioned by Suetonius, Tacitus, and Eusebius,¹³ and which came to pass in the days of Claudius Caesar, and was so severe at Jerusalem, that (Josephus informs us) many people perished for want of food.¹⁴ Pestilences are the usual attendants of famines, as scarcity and badness of provisions almost always terminate in some epidemic distemper. That Judaea was afflicted with pestilence we learn from Josephus; who says that when one Niger was put to death by the Jewish zealots, besides other calamities, he imprecated famine and pestilence upon them, "all which imprecations God confirmed against these impious men."¹⁵

(iv.) The FOURTH SIGN is Earthquakes.

PROPHECY.—Matt. xxiv. 7. Mark xiii. 8. Luke xxi. 11. There shall be earthquake.

FULFILMENT.—Earthquakes, in prophetic language, mean commotions and popular insurrections: if these be intended, they have already been noticed under the second sign; but if we understand this prophecy literally, of tremors or convulsions of the earth, many such occurred at the times to which our Lord referred; particularly one at Crete, in the reign of Claudius, and others at Smyrna, Miletus, Chios, Samos, and other places, in all of which Jews were settled.¹⁶ Tacitus mentions one at Rome in the same reign, and says, that in the reign of Nero, the cities of Laodicea, Hierapolis, and Colosse were overthrown; and that the celebrated city of Pompeii in Campania was overthrown,¹⁷ and almost demolished, by an earthquake.¹⁸ And another earthquake at Rome is mentioned by Suetonius as having happened in the reign of Galba.¹⁹

(v.) The FIFTH SIGN is, Fearful Sights and Signs from Heaven.

PROPHECY.—Luke xxi. 11. There shall be fearful sights and signs from heaven.

FULFILMENT.—Many prodigies are related by Josephus; particularly that in Judaea, at the commencement of the war, and before the siege of Jerusalem by Titus,²⁰ there broke out a prodigious storm in the night with the utmost violence and very strong winds, with the largest showers of rain, with continued lightnings, terrible thunderings, and amazing concussions and bellowsings of the earth that was in an earthquake. These things were a manifest indication, that some destruction was coming upon men, when the system of this world was thrown into such a disorder; and any one would guess that these wonders portended some grand calamities that were impending.²¹ The same historian, in the preface²² to his history of the Jewish war, undertakes to record the signs and prodigies that preceded it; and accordingly in his sixth book²³ he enumerates them thus:—1. A star hung over the city like a sword, and the comet continued for a whole year.—2. The people being assembled to celebrate the feast of unleavened bread, at the ninth hour of the night there shone so great a light about the altar and the temple that it seemed to be bright day, and this continued for half an hour.—3. At the same feast a cow, led by the priest to sacrifice, brought forth a lamb in the middle of the temple.—4. The eastern gate of the temple, which was of solid brass, and very heavy, and was scarcely shut in an evening by twenty men, and was fastened by strong bars and bolts, was seen at the sixth hour of the night opened of its own accord, and could hardly be shut again.—5. Before the setting of the sun there was seen all over the country, chariots and armies fighting in the clouds, and besieging cities.—6. At the feast of Pentecost, as the priests were going into the inner temple by night as usual to attend their service, they heard first a motion and noise, and then a voice as of a multitude, saying, Let us depart hence.—7. What Josephus reckons as the most terrible of all, one Jesus, an ordinary country fellow, four years before the war began, and when the city was in peace and plenty, came to the feast of tabernacles, and ran crying up and down the streets day and night, "A voice from the east, a voice from the west, a voice from the four winds, a voice against Jerusalem and the temple, a voice against the bridegrooms and the brides, a voice against all people." The magistrates endeavoured by stripes and torture to restrain him; but he still cried with a mournful voice, "Woe, woe, to Jerusalem." This he continued to do for seven years and five months together, and especially at the great festivals; and he neither grew hoarse, nor was tired; but went about the walls and cried with a loud voice, "Woe, woe, to the city, and to the people, and to the temple," and as he added at last, Woe, woe, also to myself, it happened that a stone from some sling or engine immediately struck him dead. These were indeed fearful signs and great sights from heaven; and there is not a more credible historian than the author who relates them, and who appeals to the testimony of those who saw and heard them.²⁴ But it may add some weight to his relation, that Tacitus, the Roman historian, also gives us a summary account of the same occurrences. He says²⁵, that there happened several prodigies, armies were seen engaging in the heavens, arms were seen glittering, and the temple shone with the sudden fire of the clouds, the doors of the temple opened suddenly and a voice greater than human was heard, that the gods were departing, and likewise a great motion of their departing. Dr. Jortin's remark is very pertinent:—If Christ had not expressly foretold this, many who give little heed to portents, and who know that historians have been too credulous in that point, would have suspected that Josephus exaggerated, and that Tacitus was misinformed; but as the testimonies of Josephus and Tacitus confirm the predictions of Christ, so the predictions of Christ confirm the wonders recorded by these historians.²⁶ synagogues, and to prisons, to be beaten; and shall kill you. And ye shall be hated of all nations, and shall be brought before rulers and kings for my name's sake, for a testimony against them.

FULFILMENT.—The precision with which the time is specified, is very remarkable. Previously to the other prognostics of the destruction of Jerusalem, the disciples of Jesus Christ were taught to expect the hardships of persecution; and how exactly this prediction was accomplished we may read in the Acts of the Apostles. There we find that some were delivered to councils, as Peter and John. (iv. 5., &c.) Some were brought before rulers and kings, as Paul before Gallio (xviii. 12.), (Felix xxiv.), Festus and Agrippa (xxv.). Some had a mouth and wisdom which all their adversaries were not able to gainsay nor resist, as it is said of Stephen (vi. 10.), that they were not able to resist the wisdom and the spirit of which he spake, and Paul made even Felix to tremble (xv. 25.), and the Gospel still prevailed against all opposition and persecution whatever. Some were imprisoned, as Peter and John (iv. 3.). Some were beaten, as Paul and Silas (xvi. 23.). Some were put to death, as Stephen (vii. 59.), and James the brother of John (xii. 2.). But if we would look farther, we have a more melancholy proof of the truth of this prediction, in the persecutions under Nero, in which (besides numberless other Christians) fell those two great Champions of our faith, St. Peter and St. Paul. And it was nomini prælium, as Tertullian² terms it; it was a war against the very name. Though a man was possessed of every human virtue, yet it was crime enough if he was a Christian: so true were our Saviour's words, that they should be hated of all nations for his name's sake. Hence arose that common saying among the heathens—Vir bonus Catus Sejus; tanquam modo quoddam Christianus: Catus Sejus is a good man, only he is a Christian.

(vii.) The SEVENTH SIGN was, The Preaching of the Gospel throughout the known world.

PROPHECY.—Mark xiii. 10. The Gospel must be published among all nations. This FULFILMENT of this prediction is recorded, from Christian and from Heathen testimony, supra, pp 130, 131.

§ 2. The Circumstances of the Destruction of Jerusalem.

(i.) The Siege of Jerusalem by the Roman Armies.

PROPHECY.—Luke xxi. 20. Matt. xxiv. 15. Mark xiii. 14. When ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, [and] the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, standing where it ought not, in the holy place,—then know that the desolation thereof is nigh.—Luke xix. 43. The days shall come upon thee, that thine enemies shall cast a trench round about thee, and compass thee round, and keep thee in on every side.

FULFILMENT.—The devoted place, which was the immediate object of these formidable denunciations, is here most clearly pointed out. The abomination of desolation is the Roman Army; and the abomination of desolation standing in the holy place is the Roman army encamped around Jerusalem; for not only the temple and the mountain on which it stood, but also the whole city of Jerusalem and several furlongs of land round it, were accounted holy. This Jesus Christ declared to be the abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet in his ninth and eleventh chapters; and so let every one who reads these prophecies understand them, and in reference to this very event they are understood by the rabbins. The Roman army is further called the abomination, on account of its ensigns, for the images of the emperor and the eagles, which were carried in front of the legions, were regarded with religious abhorrence by the Jews, as they were ranked among the pagan deities, and revered with divine honours. Josephus relates, that after the city was taken, the Romans brought their ensigns into the temple, placed them over the eastern gate, and sacrificed to them there.³

A trench was literally cast about Jerusalem, when that city was besieged by Titus. The Roman armies compassed it round about completely; and although it was at first considered an impracticable project to surround the whole city with a wall, yet Titus animated his army to make the attempt. Josephus has given a very particular account of the building of this wall; which, he says, was effected in three days, though it was not less than thirty-nine furlongs (nearly nine English miles) in length, and had thirteen towers erected at proper distances, in which the Roman soldiers were placed, as in garisons. When the wall was thus completed, the Jews were so inclosed on every side, that no person could escape out of the city, and no provision could be brought in: so that the besieged Jews were involved in the most terrible distress by the famine that ensued.⁴

(ii.) Christ's prophetic advice to the Christians who might then be in Jerusalem to make their escape.

PROPHECY.—Matt. xxiv. 16—18. Mark xiii. 14—16. Luke xxi. 21. Then let them which are in Judæa flee to the mountains, and let them which are in the midst of it depart out, and let them that are in the [adjacent] countries enter therein.

And let not him that is on the house-top go down into the house, neither enter therein to take any thing out of his house. And let him that is in the field not turn back again to take up his garment (which he had thrown aside as an incumbrance).

FULFILMENT.—This counsel was wisely remembered and wisely followed by the Christians afterwards. By Judæa, in this part of our Lord's prophecy, we are to understand all the southern parts of Palestine, both the plain and the hill countries, which at this time had received the appellation of Judæa. By the mountains we are to understand the countries on the eastern side of the river Jordan, especially those which during the Jewish war were under the government of the younger Agrippa, to whom the emperor Claudius gave Batanæ and Trachonitis (the tetrarchy of Philip), and Abilene (the tetrarchy of Lysanius). Nero afterwards added that quarter of Galilee where Tiberias and Tarichea stood, and in Peræa, Julias with its fourteen villages. As all these mountainous countries remained in obedience to the Romans, those who fled into them were safe. In the twelfth year of Nero, Josephus informs us that Cestius Gallus, the president of Syria, came with a powerful army against Jerusalem; which he might have assaulted and taken; but without any just reason, and contrary to the expectation of all, he raised the siege and departed. Immediately after his retreat, "many of the principal Jewish people forsook the city, as men do a sinking ship." And a few years afterwards when Vespasian was drawing his forces towards Jerusalem, a great multitude fled from Jericho into the mountainous country for their security.⁵ Among these it is probable that there were some Christians; but we learn more certainly from ecclesiastical historians,⁷ that at this juncture, all who believed in Jesus Christ, warned by this oracle or prophecy, quitted Jerusalem, and removed to Pella, and other places beyond the river Jordan: and thus marvellously escaped the general shipwreck of their country; for we do not read any where that so much as one Christian perished in the siege of Jerusalem.

(iii.) The appearance of false Christs and false prophets during the siege.

PROPHECY.—Mark xiii. 22. Matt. xxiv. 24. False Christs and false prophets shall rise, and shall show great signs and wonders; inasmuch that if it were possible, they should deceive the very elect (that is), the disciples of Jesus Christ.

FULFILMENT.—Our Saviour had before cautioned his disciples against false Christs. (See p. 458. supra.) This prediction is not a repetition of the former prophecy, but relates to those impostors who appeared during the time of the siege, and concerning whom Josephus⁸ thus speaks:—"The tyrannical zealots, who ruled the city, suborned many false prophets to declare, that aid would be given to the people from heaven. This was done to prevent them from attempting to desert, and to inspire them with confidence. In this manner impostors, abusing the sacred name of God, deluded the unhappy multitude; who, like infatuated men that have neither eyes to see, nor reason to judge, regarded neither the infallible denunciations pronounced by the ancient prophets, nor the clear prodigies that indicated the approaching desolation."

(iv.) The Miseries of the Jews during, and subsequently to, the siege.

PROPHECY.—Luke xxi. 22. For these to be the days of vengeance, that all things which are written are fulfilled.—Mark xiii. 17. 19. Matt. xxiv. 19. 21. Luke xxi. 23. 24. But woe to them that are with child, and that give suck in those days, for in those days there shall be great tribulation, distress in the land, and wrath upon this people; such as was not from the beginning of the creation which God created, unto this time; no, nor ever shall be. And they shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations.

FULFILMENT.—It is a very material circumstance in this prophecy that the calamity of the Jews should be so strange and unparalleled, as never was in the world before; for though it might easily have been foretold from the temper of the people, which was prone to sedition, that they were very likely to provoke the Romans against them; yet there was no probability that all things should have come to such an extremity; for it was not the design of the Roman government to destroy any of those provinces which were under them, but only to keep them in subjection, and reduce them by reasonable severity in case of revolt. But that such a calamity should have happened to them under Titus, who was the mildest, and farthest from severity of all mankind, nothing was more unlikely; and that any people should conspire together to their own ruin, and so blindly and obstinately run themselves into such calamities, as made them the pity of their enemies, was the most incredible thing; so that nothing less than a prophetic spirit could have foretold so contingent and improbable a thing as this was. To the extreme sufferings of the Jews, Josephus bears most ample testimony. In the preface to his history of the Jewish War, speaking generally of the calamities that befell the Jews, he says, almost in our Saviour's words, that "all the calamities, which had befallen any nation from THE BEGINNING OF THE WORLD, were but small in comparison to those of the Jews."¹ A brief enumeration of particulars, will, however, show the extremities to which this unhappy nation was reduced.

Within the city, the fury of the opposite factions was so great that they filled all places, even the temple itself, with continual slaughters. Nay, to such a height did their madness rise, that they destroyed the very granaries of corn, which should have sustained them; and burnt the magazines of arms which should have defended them.² By this means, when the siege had lasted only two months, the famine began to rage, and at length reduced them to such straits, that the barbarities which they practised are not to be imagined. All the reverence due to age, and the sacred ties of parent and child were annihilated. Children snatched the half baked morsels which their fathers were eating, out of their mouths; and mothers even snatched the food out of their own children's mouths.³ As the siege advanced, the ravages of the famine increased, and devoured the people by whole houses and families; the upper rooms were filled with women and children who were dying by famine, and the lanes of the city were full of the dead bodies of the aged.⁴ The children, also, and the young men, wandered about the market places like shadows, and fell down dead whosoever their misery seized them. At length the famine became so extreme, that they gladly devoured what the most sordid animals refused to touch; and a woman of distinguished rank (who had been stripped and plundered of all her goods and provisions by the soldiers), in hunger, rage, and despair, killed and roasted her babe at the breast, and had eaten one half of him before the horrid deed was discovered.⁵

During the siege, many hundreds, who were taken by the Romans, were first whipped, then tormented with various kinds of tortures, and finally crucified; the Roman soldiers nailing them (out of the wrath and hatred they bore to the Jews), one after one way, and another after another, to crosses by way of jest: until at length the multitude became so great that room was wanting for the crosses, and crosses for the bodies.⁶ Thus terribly was their imprecation fulfilled:—His blood be on us, and on our children! (Matt. xxvii. 25.)

Not to enter into details of the multitudes that were massacred by the contending factions at Jerusalem, the full accomplishment of Christ's prediction, that the Jews should fall by the edge of the sword, is recorded by Josephus⁷ when describing the sacking of that city.

"And now rushing into every lane, they slew whomsoever they found, without distinction, and burnt the houses and all the people who had fled into them. And when they entered for the sake of plunder, they found whole families of dead persons, and houses full of carcases destroyed by famine; then they came out with their hands empty. And though they thus pitied the dead, they did not feel the same emotion for the living, but killed all they met, whereby they filled the lanes with dead bodies. The whole city ran with blood, inasmuch, that many things which were burning, were extinguished by the blood." Thus were the inhabitants of Jerusalem slain by the sword; thus was she laid even with the ground, and her children with her. "The soldiers being now wearied with killing the Jews, and yet a great number remaining alive, Cæsar commanded that only the armed, and they who resisted, should be slain. But the soldiers killed also the old and the infirm; and taking the young and strong prisoners, carried them into the women's court in the temple. Cæsar appointed one Fronto, his freedman and friend, to guard them, and to determine the fate of each. All the robbers and the seditious he slew, one of them betraying another. But picking out such youths as were remarkable for stature and beauty, he reserved them for the triumph. All the rest that were above seventeen years old he sent bound into Egypt, to be employed in labour there. Titus also sent many of them into the provinces, to be slain in the theatres, by beasts and the sword. And those who were under seventeen years of age were slain. And during the time Fronto judged them, a thousand died of hunger."

But the falling by the edge of the sword mentioned in our Lord's prophecy is not to be confined to what happened at the siege, in which not fewer than eleven hundred thousand perished.⁸ It also comprehended all the slaughters made of the Jews, in different battles, sieges, and massacres, both in their own country and at other places, during the whole course of the war. Thus, by the command of Florus, who was the first author of the war, there were slain at Jerusalem, three thousand and six hundred:—By the inhabitants of Cæsarea,⁹ above twenty thousand:—At Scythopolis,¹⁰ above thirteen thousand:—At Ascalon,¹¹ two thousand five hundred, and at Ptolemais, two thousand:—At Alexandria, under Tiberius Alexander the president,¹² fifty thousand:—At Joppa, when it was taken by Cestus Gallus,¹³ eight thousand four hundred:—In a mountain called Asamon, near Sepphoris,¹⁴ above two thousand:—At Damascus,¹⁵ ten thousand:—

In a battle with the Romans at Ascalon,¹ ten thousand:—In an ambuscade near the same place,² eight thousand:—At Joppa,³ fifteen thousand:—By the Samaritans upon Mount Garizin,⁴ eleven thousand and six hundred:—At Jotapa,⁵ forty thousand:—At Jezza, when taken by Vespasian,⁶ four thousand two hundred:—At Tarichea,⁷ six thousand five hundred and after the city was taken, twelve hundred:—At Gamala,⁸ four thousand slain, besides five thousand who threw themselves down a precipice:—Of those who fled with John from Gischala,⁹ six thousand:—Of the Gadarenes,¹⁰ fifteen thousand slain, besides an infinite number drowned:—In the villages of Idumea,¹¹ above ten thousand slain:—At Gerasa,¹² a thousand:—At Macharus,¹³ seventeen hundred:—In the wood of Jorides,¹⁴ three thousand:—In the castle of Masada,¹⁵ nine hundred and sixty:—In Cyrene, by Catullus the governor,¹⁶ three thousand:—Besides these, many of every age, sex, and condition, were slain in this war, who are not reckoned; but of those who are reckoned, the number amounts to above one million three hundred fifty-seven thousand six hundred and sixty: which would appear almost incredible, if their own historian had not so particularly enumerated them.

But besides the Jews who fell by the edge of the sword, others were also to be led away captive into all nations; and, considering the numbers of the slain, the number of the captives too was very great. There were taken particularly at Joppa,¹⁷ two thousand one hundred and thirty:—At Jotapa,¹⁸ one thousand two hundred:—At Tarichea,¹⁹ six thousand chosen young men sent to Nero, the rest sold, to the number of thirty thousand and four hundred, besides those who were given to Agrippa:—Of the Gadarenes,²⁰ two thousand two hundred:—In Idumea,²¹ above a thousand. Many besides these were taken at Jerusalem, so that, as Josephus himself informs us,²² the number of the captives taken in the whole war amounted to ninety-seven thousand; the tall and handsome young men Titus reserved for his triumph; of the rest, those above seventeen years of age were sent to the works in Egypt; but most were distributed through the Roman provinces, to be destroyed in their theatres by the sword or by the wild beasts; those under seventeen were sold for slaves. Of these captives many underwent a hard fate. Eleven thousand of them²³ perished for want. Titus exhibited all sorts of shows and spectacles at Cæsarea, and²⁴ many of the captives were there destroyed, some being exposed to the wild beasts, and others compelled to fight in troops against one another. At Cæsarea, too, in honour of his brother's birth-day,²⁵ two thousand five hundred Jews were slain; and a great number likewise at Berytus in honour of his father's. The like²⁶ was done in other cities of Syria. Those whom he reserved for his triumph²⁷ were Simon and John, the generals of the captives, and seven hundred others of remarkable stature and beauty. Thus were the Jews miserably tormented, and distributed over the Roman provinces; and are they not still distressed and dispersed over all the nations of the earth?

Was not this a time of great tribulation? Were not these days of vengeance indeed? Was there ever a more exact accomplishment of any prediction than these words of our Saviour had?

PROPHECY.—Matt. xxiii. 37, 38. Luke xiii. 34, 35. O Jerusalem! Jerusalem! Behold your house is left unto you desolate.—Matt. xxiv. 2. Mark xiii. 2. Luke xxi. 6. The days will come, in the which there shall not be left here one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down.—Luke xiv. 44. They shall lay thee even with the ground, and shall not leave in thee one stone upon another.—Luke xxi. 24. Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled.

FULFILMENT.—It seemed exceedingly improbable that the events here foretold by Jesus Christ should happen in that age, when the Jews were at perfect peace with the Romans; and the strength of their citadel was such, as constrained Titus to acknowledge that it was the SINGULAR HAND OF GOD, that compelled them to relinquish fortifications which no human power could have conquered.²⁸ Our Saviour's words, also, were almost literally fulfilled, and scarcely one stone was left upon another. The temple was a building of such strength and grandeur, of such splendour and beauty, that it was likely (as it was worthy) to be preserved, for a monument of the victory and glory of the Roman empire. Titus was accordingly very desirous of preserving it, and protested²⁹ to the Jews, who had fortified themselves within it, that he would preserve it, even against their will. He had³⁰ expressed the like desire of preserving the city too, and repeatedly sent Josephus and other Jews to their countrymen, to persuade them to a surrender. But an over-ruling Providence directed things otherwise. The Jews themselves³¹ first set fire to the porticoes of the temple, and then the Romans. but urged by a certain divine impulse, threw a burning brand in at the golden window, and thereby set fire to the buildings of the temple itself. Titus¹ ran immediately to the temple, and commanded his soldiers to extinguish the flame. But neither exhortations nor threatenings could restrain their violence. They either could not hear, or would not hear; and those behind encouraged those before to set fire to the temple. He was still for preserving the holy place. He commanded his soldiers even to be beaten for disobeying him: but their anger, and their hatred of the Jews, and a certain warlike vehement fury overcame their reverence for their general, and their dread for his commands. A soldier in the dark set fire to the doors; and thus, as Josephus says, the temple was burned against the will of Cæsar.

When the soldiers had rested from their horrid work of blood and plunder, Titus gave orders to demolish the foundations of the city and the temple.—But, that posterity might judge of the glory and value of his conquests, he left three towers standing as monuments of the prodigious strength and greatness of the city; and also a part of the western wall, which he designed as a rampart for a garrison to keep the surrounding country in subjection. All the other buildings were completely levelled with the ground. It is recorded by Maimonides, and likewise in the Jewish Talmud, that Terentius Rufus, an officer in the army of Titus, with a ploughshare tore up the foundations of the temple, and thus remarkably fulfilled the words of the prophet Micah: Therefore shall Zion, for your sake, be ploughed as a field, and Jerusalem shall become heaps, and the mountain of the house as the high places of the forest. (Micah iii. 12.) The city also shared the same fate, and was burnt and destroyed together with the temple.² With the exception of the three towers, above mentioned as being left standing,³ all the rest of the city was so demolished and levelled with the ground, that those who came to see it could not believe that it had ever been inhabited. And when Titus came again to Jerusalem in his way from Syria to Egypt, and beheld the sad devastation, he bitterly lamented the cruel necessity, which had compelled him to destroy so magnificent a city. After the city was thus taken and destroyed, a great quantity of riches were found by the Romans, who dug up the ruins in search of the treasures which had been concealed in the earth.⁴ So literally were the words of Jesus Christ accomplished in the ruin both of the city and of the temple! Well might Eleazer say to the Jews who were besieged in the fortress of Masada—"What is become of our city, which was believed to be inhabited by God?—It is now demolished to the very foundations; and the only monument of it that is left is—the camp of those who destroyed it, which is still pitched upon its remains." Well might he express a passionate wish that they had all died before they beheld that holy city demolished by the hands of their enemies, and the sacred temple so profanely dug up from its foundation.⁵

As the Jews were to be led away captive into all nations, so was Jerusalem to be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled. So completely was Judea subjugated, that the very land itself was sold by Vespasian, the Gentiles possessing it, while the Jews were nearly all slain or led into captivity; and Jerusalem has never since been in the possession of the Jews. When, indeed, the emperor Hadrian visited the eastern parts of the Roman empire and found Jerusalem a heap of ruins, forty-seven years after its destruction, he determined to rebuild it; but not exactly on the same spot. He called the new city Ælia, placed a Roman colony in it, and dedicated a temple to Jupiter Capitolinus, in the room of the temple of Jehovah. This profanation of the holy place was the great cause of the rebellions and sufferings of the Jews during the reign of Hadrian. The city was once more taken by them and burnt.—Hadrian rebuilt it—re-established the colony—ordered the statue of a hog (which the Jews held in religious abhorrence) to be set up over the gate that opened towards Bethlehem; and published an edict, strictly forbidding any Jew, on pain of death, to enter the city, or even to look at it from a distance. Thus the city remained, till the time of Constantine, the first Christian emperor, who greatly improved it, and restored the name of Jerusalem; but the Jews were not permitted to reside there. Attempting in vain to get possession of their capital, Constantine caused their ears to be cut off, their bodies to be marked as rebels, and dispersed them over all the provinces of the empire, as fugitives and slaves. The emperor Julian, from enmity to the Christians, favoured the Jews; and, in the vain hope of contradicting the prophecy concerning it, attempted to rebuild the temple; but he was miraculously prevented, and obliged to desist from his impious undertaking. Jovian revived the severe edict of Hadrian; and the Greek emperors continued the prohibition; so that the wretched Jews used to give money to the soldiers for permission to behold and weep over the ruins of their temple and city, particularly on the return of that memorable day on which it had been taken by the Romans. In the reign of Heraclius, Chosroes, king of Persia, took and plundered it; but Heraclius soon recovered the possession of it.—In 637, the Christians surrendered Jerusalem to Omar, the Saracen caliph, who built a mosque upon the site of Solomon's temple. It remained in the possession of the Saracens above 400 years, and then was taken by the Turks. They retained it till the year 1099, when the Franks took it under Godfrey of Boulogne, General of the Crusaders. The Franks kept possession 88 years, that is, till 1187, when the Turks, under Saladin, retook it by capitulation, and with them it has remained ever since.⁶

"Thus literally has this prophecy been hitherto fulfilled!—Jerusalem has been thus constantly trodden down of the Gentiles,—the Romans, the Saracens, the Franks, and the Turks.—Its ancient inhabitants have been expelled, and persecuted, and its holy places have been polluted. The eagles of idolatrous Rome, the crescent of the impostor Mahomet, and the banner of popery, carried by the Crusaders, have been successively displayed amidst the ruins of the sanctuary of Jehovah, for nearly eighteen hundred years." And the Jews are still preserved a living and continued monument of the truth of our Lord's prediction, and of the irrefragable truth of the Christian religion.

The conclusion of the prediction, however (TILL the time of the Gentiles be fulfilled), indicates that Jerusalem,—the city once beautiful for situation and the joy of the whole earth,—shall not be trodden down for ever. "The times of the Gentiles will be fulfilled, when the times of the four great kingdoms of the Gentiles, according to Daniel's prophecies, shall be expired, and the fifth kingdom, or the kingdom of Christ, shall be set up in their place, and the Saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom for ever, even for ever and ever. Jerusalem, as it has hitherto remained, so probably will remain in subjection to the Gentiles, until these times of the Gentiles be fulfilled; or, as St. Paul expresses it, (Rom. xi. 25, 26.) until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in; and so all Israel shall be saved, and become again the people of God. The fulness of the Jews will come in as well as the fulness of the Gentiles. For (ver. 12, 25, 26.) if the fall of them be the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles; how much more their fulness? For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, that blindness in part has happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. And so all Israel shall be saved."

THAT THERE IS SALVATION ONLY THROUGH CHRIST—AND THE DANGER OF REJECTING IT.

§ 1. That there is salvation only through Christ.

PROPHECY.—Zech. xiii. 1. In that day there shall be a fountain opened to the house of David, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, for sin and for uncleanness.—Mal. iv. 2. Unto you that fear my name shall the Sun of Righteousness arise, with healing in his wings.—Isa. liii. 11. By his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many.—Isa. lix. 20. The Redeemer shall come to Zion, and unto them that turn from transgression in Jacob. See Rom. ix. 26.—Ps. cxviii. 22. The stone which the builders refused, the same is become the head stone of the corner. Isa. xxviii. 16. Matt. xxi. 42.

FULFILMENT.—John iii. 16. God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him, should not perish, but have everlasting life. Compare also 1 Thes. v. 9; John xvii. 3.—Luke xxiv. 47. That repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name. See also Acts x. 43.—Acts xiii. 38, 39. Through this man is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins; and by him all that believe are justified.—Acts iv. 11, 12. This is the stone which was set at nought of you builders, which is become the head of the corner. Neither is their salvation in any other: for there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved.

§ 2. Of the necessity of believing in Christ, and the danger of rejecting him.

Deut. xviii. 15, 19. The Lord will raise up unto thee a prophet. Unto him shall ye hearken.—Whosoever will not hearken unto my words, which he shall speak in my name, I will require it of him. The soul that doth aught presumptuously—reproacheth the Lord: and that soul shall be cut off from among his people, because he hath despised the word of the Lord.—Ps. ii. 12. Kiss the Son, lest he be angry, and ye perish from the right way.

John iii. 18. He that believeth on him is not condemned; but he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only Son of God.—Heb. ii. 3. How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation?—Heb. x. 26, 29. If we sin wilfully, after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins, but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries. He that despised Moses's law died without mercy, under two or three witnesses: of how much sorer punishment shall he be thought worthy, who hath trodden under foot the Son of God, and hath counted the blood of the covenant wherewith he was sanctified an unholy thing, and hath done despite unto the Spirit of grace.—The Lord shall be revealed from Heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Christ. 2 Thes. i. 7, 8.

"The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy" (Rev. xix. 10.);—and of that testimony it were easy to have offered hundreds of instances equally striking with those above given. Copious as the preceding table of prophecies is, the selection has necessarily been restricted to the principal, in order that this article of our Appendix might not be extended an undue length. The reader, who is desirous of seeing all (or nearly all) the predictions relative to the Messiah, is referred to Huet's Demonstratio Evangelica, Prop. IX. (vol. ii. pp. 595—1056, Amsterdam, 1680,) and to Mr. Barker's "Messiah: being the Prophecies concerning him methodized, with their Accomplishments;" London, 1780." 8vo. Both these works have been consulted in drawing up the preceding table of prophecies and their accomplishments. At the end of Vol. II. Book II. (pp. 1374—1380.) of Dr. Hales's Analysis of Sacred Chronology, that learned writer has given two series of the great prophecies and allusions to Christ in the Old Testament; which are expressly cited either as predictions fulfilled in him, or applied to him by way of accommodation, in the New Testament. The first of these series describes Jesus Christ in his human nature, as the PROMISED SEED OF THE WOMAN in the grand charter of our Redemption (Gen. iii. 15.); and his pedigree, sufferings, and glory in his successive manifestations of himself, until the end of the world. The second series describes his character and offices, human and divine. Although these two series of prophecies consist only of references to the Old and New Testament, some of which necessarily coincide with the predictions above given at length; yet the biblical student will find his time not ill spent in comparing them. The second series contains many titles and offices of Jesus Christ, which could not, for want of room, be inserted in the present work.

To conclude:—It is a fact worthy of remark, and which ought never to be forgotten, that most of the prophecies, delivered in the Old Testament concerning the Messiah, were revealed nearly, and some of them more than three thousand years ago, and yet scarcely one of them can be applied to any man that ever lived upon earth except to Him, who is Immanuel, God with us, the Lord Jesus Christ, to whom "give all the prophets witness." (Acts x. 43.) With regard to the predictions announced by Jesus the Messiah, the voice of history in every age—(and especially the present state of Jerusalem and of the Jews)—conspires to demonstrate their truth, and, consequently, the truth of the Gospel. The more, therefore, we contemplate these astonishing facts,—the more deeply we investigate the wonderful display of divine power, wisdom, and goodness,—the more we shall be disposed to exclaim, with the amazed centurion,—TRULY THIS WAS THE SON OF GOD!

No. VII.

PROOFS OF THE GENUINENESS OF JOSEPHUS'S TESTIMONY CONCERNING JESUS CHRIST.

[Referred to in p. 81. of this Volume.]

JOSEPHUS, though a strict pharisee, has borne such a noble testimony to the spotless character of Jesus Christ, that Jerome considered and called him a Christian writer. Mr. Whiston, and some modern writers are of opinion that he was a Nazarene or Ebionite Jewish Christian; while others have affirmed, that the passage, above cited from his Jewish Antiquities, is an interpolation, principally (it should seem) on the ground that it is too favourable to be given by a Jew to Christ: and that, if Josephus did consider Jesus to be the Christ or expected Messiah of the Jews, he must have been a believer in him, in which case he would not have despatched the miraculous history of the Saviour of the World in one short paragraph. When, however, the evidence on both sides is fairly weighed, we apprehend that it will be found to preponderate most decidedly in favour of the genuineness of this testimony of Josephus: for,

1. It is found in all the copies of Josephus's works, which are now extant, whether printed or manuscript; in a Hebrew translation preserved in the Vatican Library¹, and in an Arabic Version preserved by the Maronites of Mount Libanus.

2. It is cited by Eusebius, Jerome, Rufinus the antagonist of Jerome, Isidore of Pelusius, Sozomen, Cassiodorus, Nicephorus, and by many other authors, Greeks, Syrians, and Egyptians, of the fourth and fifth centuries; all of whom had indisputably seen various manuscripts, and of considerable antiquity. How then can men, living eleven or twelve hundred years after these writers—and, who are so remote both from the sources consulted by them, as well as from the events related by them,—prove that all these ancient authors were utterly destitute of discernment and that all sagacity is exclusively reserved for our times?

3. Josephus not only mentions with respect John the Baptist, but also James the first bishop of Jerusalem.—"Ananus" (he says) "assembled the Jewish Sanhedrin, and brought before it JAMES the Brother of Jesus who is called Christ, with some others, whom he delivered over to be stoned as infractors of the law."² This passage, the authenticity of which has never been disputed or suspected, contains an evident reference to what had already been related concerning Christ; for why else should he describe James—a man of himself but little known—as the brother of Jesus, if he had made no mention of Jesus before?

4. It is highly improbable that Josephus, who had discussed with such minuteness the history of this period,—mentioned Judas of Galilee, Theudas, and the other obscure pretenders to the character of the Messiah, as well as John the Baptist and James the brother of Christ,—should have preserved the profoundest silence concerning Christ, whose name was at that time so celebrated among the Jews, and also among the Romans, two of whose historians (Suetonius and Tacitus), have distinctly taken notice of him. But in all the writings of Josephus, not a hint occurs on the subject except the testimony in question.

5. It is morally impossible that this passage either was or could be forged by Eusebius who first cited it, or by any other earlier writer. Had such a forgery been attempted, it would unquestionably have been detected by some of the acute and inveterate enemies of Christianity; for both Josephus and his works were so well received among the Romans, that he was enrolled a citizen of Rome, and had a statue erected to his memory. His writings were also admitted into the Imperial Library: the Romans may further be considered as the guardians of the integrity of his text; and the Jews we may be assured, would use all diligence, to prevent any interpolation in favour of the Christian cause. Yet it cannot be discovered that any objection was ever made to this passage, by any of the opposers of the Christian faith in the early ages: their silence therefore concerning such a charge is a decisive proof that the passage is not a forgery. Indeed, the Christian cause is so far from needing any fraud to support it, that nothing could be more destructive to its interest, than a fraud so palpable and obtrusive.

To this strong chain of evidence for the genuineness of Josephus's testimony, various objections have been made, of which the following are the principal:—

OBJECTION.—1 This passage was not cited by any early Christian before Eusebius, such as Justin Martyr, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian or Origen; nor is it cited by Chrysostom or Photius, who lived after his time.

ANSWER.—There is no strength in this negative argument against Eusebius, drawn from the silence of the ancient fathers. The fathers did not cite the testimony of Josephus, 1. either because they had no copies of his works; or, 2. because his testimony was foreign to the design which they had in writing; which was, to convince the Jews that Jesus was the Messiah, out of the Old Testament, and, consequently, they had no need of other evidence; or, 3. because, on account of this very testimony, the evidence of Josephus was disregarded by the Jews themselves.¹

² Ant. Jud. lib. 13. c. 5. § 2.

³ Ibid lib. 20. c. 8. (al.) 9. § 1.

OBJECTION. 2.—The passage in question interrupts the order of the narration, and is unlike the style of Josephus.

ANSWER.—It is introduced naturally in the course of the historian's narrative, the order of which it does not disturb. It is introduced under the article of Pilate, and connected with two circumstances, which occasioned disturbances,² and was not the putting of Jesus to death, and the continuance of the apostles and disciples after him, declaring his resurrection, another very considerable circumstance, which created very great disturbances? And though Josephus does not say this in express terms, yet he intimates it, by connecting it with the two causes of commotion, by giving so honourable a testimony to Jesus, and telling us that he was crucified at the instigation of the chief persons of the Jewish nation. It would scarcely have been decent in him to have said more on this head. The following view of the connection of the passage now under consideration will confirm and illustrate the preceding remarks:—

In his Jewish Antiquities, (book xviii. c. i.) he relates, in the first section, that Pilate introduced Cæsar's images into Jerusalem, and that, in consequence of this measure producing a tumult, he commanded them to be carried thence to Cæsarea. In the second section, he gives an account of Pilate's attempt to bring a current of water to Jerusalem, the expense of which he defrayed out of the sacred money: this also caused a tumult, in which a great number of Jews were slain. In the third section he relates that about the same time Pilate crucified Jesus, who was called Christ, a wise and holy man; and (§ 4.) about the same time also, he adds, another sad calamity put the Jews into disorder, which he promises to narrate after he had given an account of a most flagitious crime which was perpetrated at Rome in the temple of Isis: and, after detailing all its circumstances, he proceeds (§ 5.), agreeably to his promise, to describe the expulsion of the Jews from Rome, by the emperor Tiberius, in consequence of the villainous conduct of four of their countrymen. Such is the connection of the whole chapter; and when it is fairly considered, we may safely challenge any one to say, whether the passage under consideration interrupts the order of the narration: on the contrary, if it be taken out, that connection is irrecoverably broken. It is manifest, that Josephus relates events in the order in which they happened, and that they are connected together only by the time when they took place.

With regard to the objection that the passage in question is unlike the style of Josephus, it is sufficient to reply in the quaint but expressive language of Huet, that one egg is not more like another, than is the style of this passage to the general style of his writings. Objections from style are often fanciful; and Daubuz has proved, by actual collation, the perfect coincidence between its style and that of Josephus in other parts of his works.² This objection, therefore, falls to the ground.

OBJECTION 3.—The Testimony of Josephus concerning Jesus, could not possibly have been recorded by him; for he was not only a Jew, but also rigidly attached to the Jewish religion. The expressions are not those of a Jew, but of a Christian.

ANSWER.—Josephus was not so addicted to his own religion, as to approve the conduct and opinion of the Jews concerning Christ and his doctrine. From the moderation which pervades his whole narrative of the Jewish war, it may justly be inferred, that the fanatic fury, which the chief men of his nation exercised against Christ could not but have been displeasing to him. He has rendered that attestation to the innocence, sanctity, and miracles of Christ, which the fidelity of history required: nor does it follow that he was necessitated to renounce on this account the religion of his fathers. Either the common prejudices of the Jews, that their Messiah would be a victorious and temporal sovereign, or the indifference so prevalent in many towards controverted questions, might have been sufficient to prevent him from renouncing the religion in which he had been educated, and embracing a new one, the profession of which was attended with danger: or else, he might think himself at liberty to be either a Jew, or a Christian, as the same God was worshipped in both systems of religion. On either of these suppositions, Josephus might have written every thing which this testimony contains; as will be evident from the following critical examination of the passage.

The expression, "if it be lawful to call him a man," does not imply that Josephus believed Christ to be God, but only an extraordinary man, one whose wisdom and works had raised him above the common condition of humanity. He represents him as having "performed many wonderful works." In this there is nothing singular, for the Jews themselves, his contemporaries, acknowledge that he wrought many mighty works. Compare Matt. xiii. 54. xiv. 2, &c. and the parallel passages in the other Gospels. Josephus further says, that "he was a teacher of such men as gladly received the truth with pleasure,"—both because the moral precepts of Christ were such as Josephus approved, and also because the disciples of Christ were influenced by no other motive than the desire of discerning it. "He drew over to him many, both Jews and Gentiles." How true this was, at the time when Josephus wrote, it is unnecessary to show. The phrase, "This was the Christ,"—(ὁ Χριστός οὗτος ἦν,) by no means intimates that Jesus was the Messiah, but only that he was the person called Christ both by the Christians and Romans; just as if we should say, "This was the same man as he named Christ." Jesus was a common name, and would not have sufficiently pointed out the person intended to the Greeks and Romans. The name by which he was known to them was Chrestus or Christus, as we read in Suetonius and Tacitus; and if (as there is every reason to believe) Tacitus had read Josephus, he most probably took this very name from the Jewish historian. With regard to the resurrection of Christ, and the prophecies referring to him, Josephus rather speaks the language used by the Christians than his own private opinion: or else he thought that Christ had appeared after his arrival, and that the prophets had foretold this event,—a point which, if admitted, and if he had been consistent, ought to have induced him to embrace Christianity. But it will readily be imagined, that there might be many circumstances to prevent his becoming a proselyte; nor is it either new or wonderful that men, especially in their religious concerns, should contradict themselves, and withstand the conviction of their own minds. It is certain that, in our own times, no one has spoken in higher terms concerning Christ than M. Rousseau; who, nevertheless, not only in his other writings, but also in the very work that contains the very eloquent eulogium alluded to, inveighs against Christianity with acrimony and rancour.¹

The whole of the evidence concerning the much litigated passage of Josephus is now before the reader; who, on considering it in all its bearings, will doubtless agree with the writer of these pages, that it is GENUINE, and consequently affords a noble testimony to the credibility of the facts related in the New Testament.
